"Than when," the man finished, smiling strangely, "you and I, my charming Violet, contracted a very convenient compact giving us each what we both wanted at the time—you, money, and I——" he shrugged his shoulders. "A very poor bargain after all!"

"What do you mean?" the woman flashed. "I gave of my life and soul, you only a few pounds that you barely missed! I gave blood, you paltry gold!"

"Hardly paltry, my dear sister-in-law," murmured the baronet, casting a glance round the richly-appointed room in which they stood, "since for twenty years it has kept up this place for you, and given your beauty a decent background. On the other hand, it is I who should grumble. Your sister—my dear, lamented wife"—his voice was curiously low—"did not prove the gold mine I expected of her. There was no heir to take my title and the money after me, and I am placed in the unhappy position of being unable to marry again."

The woman clasped her white hands, on the fingers of which glittered precious stones.

"You killed her soul, and flung open the windows of her mind! You allowed her to—tumble upon the truth—the awful truth that she told me!"

Digitized by Google

Sir Cyprian Rust smiled gently. "Have you seen Marcella yet? She is a promising girl, but I had cause to reprimand her some days ago. She discovered too much. She found—a spade guinea!"

Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox shuddered, and her eyes grew distended with an unspoken thought.

"Marcella! Oh, God, spare her!" she murmured, turning a white, strained face to him. "Don't let her know, Marcella—my——"

"Your niece, Violet," said the cold voice, "is my daughter, and my heiress. After me she inherits the property. Her life is valuable, don't fear."

"Then why did you insure her life when a baby?" she said slowly. "What has caused it to be so valuable—now?"

He smiled slightly. "The life of a child is uncertain—sometimes! Marcella has every reason to live to old age as far as I am concerned."

"But she died!" breathed the woman.

"Yes!" he answered, slowly. "Her death was her own fault. The insurance on her life was paid over to me only after due inquiries had been made by the insurance people. Now," he continued, sarcastically, "that you have satisfied your inquiries, I have my wishes to express to you."

Her eyes dilated suddenly. "They are?"

"The house of that millionaire chap, Johnson, contains a valuable lot of plate, and you have the entrée to it. When next you visit it there are certain details I wish you to note, and——"

"Not that house!" she gasped. "I cannot, even to you! He will be here to-night, as my guest."

He looked at her curiously. "You either do this for me, or Marcella will know that for a certain sum her—aunt—sold her!"

For one brief moment the woman hesitated, then her answer came, slowly:

"I will do it; for my task-master is a hard one!"

As voices drew near they separated, and presently Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox was laughing and chatting with Marcella, who was statuesque in soft silver gauze, while Sir Cyprian Rust and Mr. Caleb J. Johnson discussed the City.

Lady Violet drew the girl aside. "Are you happy, dear, with—with your father?"

Marcella's eyes opened. "Oh, yes, auntie! But he's a fearful recluse at home, and spends all his time in his studio."

Lady Violet shivered and turned to her nephew, Edward Day, a slim, fair, young man, with a weak, effeminate face.

"You must take Marcella to see the conservatory after dinner, Edward; she has not been here before."

In the drawing-room, towards the end of the evening, when Sir Cyprian was playing Bridge with Edward Day, Johnson seized the chance for which he had come.

"Lady Violet, I am a plain, bluff man, like my name but I want to ask you a question. Will you marry me?"

Although she had expected the question, Lady Violet was not prepared with an answer.

"I—I——" she murmured, "am not sure that I can marry you, Mr. Johnson!"

"Why not?" said the financier, coolly. "You are a widow—I, a bachelor. Why should we not marry, if you think we can jog along together comfortably? Is there any just cause or impediment?"

A faint smile touched her lips.

"No, Mr. Johnson. As far as I know, there is no just cause or impediment. I am perfectly free to marry you."

A low, amused laugh broke the stillness that followed her words. It did not come from the financier, but from the balcony that had wide windows flung open.

Lady Violet turned sharply. Her lips were white.

"What was that noise?" she said, hoarsely.

The financier looked at her in surprise. "Some loafer outside," he said. "But, come, Violet; you have not said that you would marry me."

Again the laugh sounded, mockingly derisive; then the palms in front of the window parted suddenly, and a man lurched heavily into the room.

(Another long instalment of this fine serial next week.)

A LOST MEMORY.

The Tale of a Christmas Gift.

THE operation was over.

The cleverest surgeon that could be obtained had finished his work, and now, with the family physician, awaited a final interview with the father of his patient.

There was good and bad news to tell John Chambers about his son.

He came into the room and advanced towards them, with his teeth set; what would their report be? He waited for it anxiously.

'We are glad to say that our work has been successful in one direction, that of saving life, Mr. Chambers, your son will live, but——" the surgeon paused.

"But, sir."

Outwardly calm and possessed, yet with the demon of suspense tugging at his heart, the great financier awaited the conclusion of the sentence. The patient was his only son, in whom all his ambition and hopes were planted.

"We are sorry to state, that when your son recovers consciousness, he will have no memory; all the past will be as a blank; he will not even remember his name, nor the fact that you are his father."

"Thank Heaven!"

Was the man mad? To thank Heaven that his son would be as a complete stranger to him—that his intellect would be clouded of aught that had happened, even as a little child; he would be obliged to trace his progress up the ladder of education. To thank Heaven for that!

"I am afraid you do not fully understand your son's position, sir—what such a state means," said the physician gravely. "Your son will have no affection for you; practically he has to begin life over again."

"Thank you, gentlemen, but I think I fully realise my son's position; physically he will soon be well; mentally, nothing remains to him of the past, no promises he has made or anything of that sort."

The surgeon bowed.

"And for that loss of memory—as his father—I again say 'Thank God,' but I must not keep you waiting. Accept my grateful thanks for what you have done, sir, and this"—handing the astonished surgeon an envelope; "you, doctor, will watch over Edward until he is restored to his normal strength. I have the honour to wish you both 'Good-day.'"

And Mr. Chambers left the room with a brighter step than when he had entered it.

Digitized by Google

Doctors Aknew and Renfrew stared blankly at one another, then the latter said:

"I think it must be this, Mr. Chambers is a most arbitrary and ambitious man. I heard he had set his heart on some marriage for his son, but young Ned turned restive, and vowed he would only marry some penniless lassie whom he had met, and lately there have been rumours of ructions between father and son."

"There may be something in that," responded his companion; "still, it is strange."

* * * * *

John Chambers went to his study, and, unlocking a drawer, took three letters, all written in the same girlish hand, one bearing the postmark of that morning; this he read with a sneer on his face:

"My Dear, Dear Ned,—Why don't you come or write? I am getting so anxious. It is now three weeks since I heard from you, and it will be Christmas Day on Friday. Ned, darling it's not like you to keep your little girl in suspense. Come darling, soon, to your own. "Mary."

This was the reason; this Mary was the girl for whom his son Ned had taken such a mad infatuation; a dancing master's daughter, earning her living at teaching music; a nice wife for his son, who would be heir to over half a million. Fate, however, had played into his hand. He would go to this girl, and in his son's name break off all connection with her. If he had promised to marry her, so much the worse. If she insisted on seeing him, well, she could, for his memory would be a blank as regarded her as well as everyone else. Her voice and figure would awaken no chord. And the hard man chuckled.

He wrote down the address, 2 Rose Mansions, Maida Vale. He would drive there at once.

* * * * *

In her tiny flat Mary Chambers waited and waited for a letter or the appearance of her husband, for Ned Chambers had married her some three months previously, trusting time would soften the old man's heart, and then their secret marriage would be forgiven.

Mary had been averse to the deception, but she was not strong, and the constant out-of-door journeys she was obliged to take—for her music pupils were very scattered—had weakened her constitution, and after a sharp attack of influenza, she had given way and consented, and had promised never to mention the fact that she was married to Edward Chambers to anyone, until he gave her leave.

Edward Chambers had been too much in love to consider the consequences of such a step. His allowance from his father would provide for his wife, and he resolved meantime to fit himself for some profession, so that if in time he should be disinherited because of his refusal to carry out his father's wishes, he would be enabled to maintain himself and his wife.

Fond of engineering, he had for some months been studying it, both practically and otherwise, much to Mr. Chambers' disgust, who, to have more hold upon his son, had purposely prevented his taking up a profession.

In the midst of the girl's sad reflections she heard the bell, and she ran joyfully to answer it: perhaps it was a message from Ned.

In the dusk of the December afternoon she at first thought it was her husband, and she exclaimed:

"Oh! Ned." But as the stranger followed her into the light she saw she had made a mistake, though from his appearance and likeness she knew her visitor to be Ned's father.

"You are my Ned's father, I can tell; is he ill?" she asked anxiously, and her eyes filled with tears, while terror seized her; this hard, stern-faced man had not come as a friend.

John Chambers leisurely surveyed the room, which gave unmistakable evidence of his son's visits. In one corner was his walking-stick, on a small table his engineering books; this was where he spent his time—with this girl.

No mercy should be shown to her.

"I have brought a message to you from my son," he said coldly. "He has gone abroad on special business for me, but before going he asked me to call upon you."

"I do not understand," faltered the girl. "Is Ned ill?"

"Perfectly well." He told the lie without a quiver. She had evidently heard nothing of the motor smash and its sad result—and should continue to know nothing.

Placing an envelope on the table, he said:

"My son desired me to say that he has grown tired of his—ahem!—entanglement with you, and that he desires to forget it, and bade me bring you this," pointing to the letter.

Grown tired of her? What did it mean? Mechanically Mary opened the envelope and saw that its sole contents was a bank-note. The room seemed to be dancing round her. How could he send her that message? He was her husband. This dreadful man did not know that; she would tell him, but—she remembered she had promised not.

She collected her courage, and facing her visitor bravely, said:

"Take back this money, though you are Ned's father. I do not believe he sent it to me, or the message you have brought. I will see him myself."

"You are welcome to, on his return," he answered roughly; "but you will find he will deny all knowledge of you." He added scornfully: "His words to me were, 'if she persists in seeing me, father, I shall deny having known her.'"

Taking no notice of this taunt, Mary said quietly:

"When does he return?"

He made a rapid calculation. It was now December the 24th. If he allowed Ned a month, that would do.

"A month from to-day."

"Very well. I shall call at your house in Palace Gardens on the 24th of January at three o'clock," and with a gentle, dignified manner, she held open the door for her unwelcome visitor to depart.

That night, as he visited the sick-room, and heard the nurse's report as to the progress of her patient, the bells from St. Mary Abbot's chimed out their message of love, forgiveness, and peace—the message which every year they rang out afresh, but they touched no string in the financier's heart; the dust of ambition and avarice had corroded the strings of love and peace. His only son should wed rank and money, not a penniless girl, whose only dower was her looks, so the bells taught him nothing.

But they rang a whisper of comfort and hope to the poor deserted girl bride. There was a God, who would protect and care for her and Ned, for she believed not a word of what that cruel man had said; only she must be patient and wait.

But that Christmas Day was a sad one to the lonely little wife.

Where was Ned?

A month later Mr. Chambers sat after lunch chatting to his son, who, apparently quite well, was trying to grasp everything that those around him endeavoured to impart. But it was hard work.

He could recall nothing, and could only do exactly what he was told, and as the man, who said he was his father, directed.

The butler entered, and whispered something to the elder man.

"All right, show her up in two minutes, Dale. Ned, my boy, I want you to listen to me. There is a lady coming here; she will speak to you, and ask you things, you must simply say, 'I do not know you.' Do you understand?"

"Yes, father," he repeated slowly. "I—do—not—know—you."

Mary Chambers came softly into the room and walked straight to her husband's side. Her voice was sweet and gentle, as she tried to take his hand, saying:

"Ned, why have you not been to see me?" But he strove to push her away, and said in a mechanical way:

"I—do—not—know—you."

The anxiety of the last month had strained Mary's powers of endurance, and when she heard those words from her own husband it was too much: she fell fainting at his feet.

Digitized by Google

When she recovered he was gone out of the room, and her only wish was to be gone also, and, refusing all aid, she walked into the street, alone and friendless, denied by the man who had sworn to cherish her, with the knowledge that for the future she must protect and care for herself.

* * * * *

"This is passing strange, Aknew; a year to-day you operated on him, and we had to tell his father the sad result, and now this afternoon that you should have to operate again. It was unfortunate his getting in this railway smash," said Dr. Renfrew.

"It may be fortunate. I am hopeful that this blow will cause a transformation. I think when I have finished and he awakes his memory will have returned, and only the past twelve months will be a blank."

Mr. Chambers came to them.

"I am glad to see you, sir."

"I hope after I have been with my patient to have some good news for you, Mr. Chambers; but I want to impress upon you this: If your son recovers consciousness, he will, I believe, fancy himself back in the events which happened before he was in that motor smash, and whatever he asks for, whomever he wishes to see—in short, what he wants, must be given to him. His desire must be satisfied if you wish his memory to return," said the surgeon.

"I do indeed wish it," said his listener, and the men of science went away to their patient.

Only a year ago—only one year, and yet to the financier it had seemed a lifetime. That his son Edward; that stupid, inanimate piece of humanity, whose sole wish appeared to be allowed to eat and sleep; this to be his survivor to carry on his race and endow it with distinction and honour. For his treachery Mr. Chambers had indeed been punished.

He had followed the movements of the girl whom his son had loved; she had left her flat and was living in one room, supporting herself with needlework, he discovered. He had many times sent her money, but it was always returned with the one sentence, "Your son denied me, so I can accept nothing from you or him," and in his heart he admired her. She was proud; he liked pride. If only she had been wealthy. Still, if his son's restoration to his normal self meant marriage with her, he would gladly give his consent.

Anxiously he paced the corridor, awaiting the surgeon's report. Suddenly the sound of voices came to him, someone was wishing a companion the compliments of the season. It was Christmas Eve again. What would this Christmas bring to him?

The door of the room in which his son lay opened quickly, and a nurse came to him.

"Your son is conscious and asking for you," she whispered.

"Father," said Ned's voice faintly, "father, have I been ill long? It—all seems—strange. I want my wife—Mary. I married her; that little music teacher, Mary. I want my wife, father, before I die."

"Satisfy him," whispered the surgeon; "say you will bring her; say something, man," for speech appeared to have left Mr. Chambers. Everything was swallowed up in the great thought; it was the voice of his son Ned who spoke; it was no stranger who touched him.

"I will bring her to you, Ned, my boy. Only rest," he said thankfully.

"You—will not be angry with—Mary, father? It was not her fault. You will love her," said the sick man, feverishly.

"Yes, Ned; she shall be a daughter to me," answered his father. And then as swiftly the motor could take him, he went to Shirland, to the poor abode where Mary lived.

Why had not the girl told him Ned had married her? Things would have been different then; he would not have allowed his son's wife to live in this manner, silly girl!

And now perhaps she would never forgive. She and Ned would be reconciled, and he, for his treason and revenge, would be an outsider in their happiness, and the old man sighed. Ned was all he had to love and care for.

Mary answered his knock, and his white face and changed look told her something had happened.

"Come at once," he said hurriedly. "Ned is ill and wants you." And then as they drove to the hospital he explained.

"He was thrown out of a motor a twelvemonth ago, and while he lay ill I opened your letters. When he recovered he had lost his memory, and I saw in that a chance to part you; but I did not know you were his wife. To-day he was injured in the collision at King's Cross, and by almost a miracle the operation has restored his memory. Only he remembers nothing of the events of the last twelve months. He is conscious and asking for you; but why—why did you not tell me he had married you?"

"I had promised Ned not to," she answered simply. But her eyes were shining with hope and joy. Ned had never been false.

Anxiously the medical men awaited their arrival; but their fears were allayed when Mary stole to their patient's side, and, pressing her face to his, whispered his name.

He would live now, and, best of all, regain his mental balance.

Softly they left the room for a few moments, and Mr. Chambers watched the girl kneeling by the bedside with an aching heart. Would Ned ever forgive?

Just then the bells from the neighbouring church rang out their merry chime, and their message this time awoke a response in the old man's heart.

"Ring out the false, ring out the false," that was what they were saying. When his son recovered he would be accounted false, and rung out of the lives of the two he had tried to separate.

He buried his face in his hands.

Then a gentle touch made him look up, and he saw the girl he had deceived standing by his side, and there was no hatred in her face, only a tender pity. He was Ned's father, and it was Christmas, and Ned was given back to her.

"Come to Ned," she whispered, "he wants you," and she led the broken man to his son's side.

"I'm—getting—sleepy, father," said the young fellow, "but before I rest I want to give you my Christmas present—a daughter, my Mary," and he placed the girl's hand in his father's.

And then the nurse gently pushed them away, and said her patient must be quiet, and the old man led his daughter from the room.

"Can you really forgive me, Mary?" he said in astonishment.

"Ah, yes, father, for you too, have something to forgive. We were wrong to deceive you; henceforth there shall be no deception, and Ned and I will try to make you happy."

And the bells chimed out again. But this time their message was "Ring in the new."

Robert Murray.

Digitized by Google

The Heart of Dorothy Nevill.

The Story of a Love that was Cast Aside, but which was Happily Regained.

THE door stood open, showing a glimpse of the sweet, old-fashioned garden, bathed in sunlight, and sweet with the scent of roses, mignonette, and the spicy odour of the tall, white phlox. In the field below they were carrying the corn, and the voices of the reapers sounded pleasantly—the deep tones of the men, the shrill trebles of the children, and sometimes the fuller, sweeter notes of a woman's voice.

I have seen and heard it all, so many, many times, but never before had the summer seemed so glad, never before had the sun shone, the roses bloomed, the nightingale sung, as in that summer. And in all the countryside, I thought, there could not be a happier girl than I, Dorothy Nevill.

All the afternoon I had dreamt under the shade of the tall beech trees, dreamt of all that made life so fair, so gorgeous a thing. But when the sun grew low in the Heavens, I hastened home, and hurrying to my room, slipped on my daintiest frock, a quaintly fashioned gown of pale mauve muslin.

Then, when I was ready I stood before the glass, a tall, slim figure, a childish face, with brown eyes and lips scarlet as the poppy in the corn. Surely I was a pretty thing in those days—days so long ago that I may well be pardoned for remembering.

I had reason for pleasure in my looks, the best, the only reason worth the name. I had a sweetheart, tall, strong, with brave blue eyes and a sunny smile, and I loved him—loved him with all my heart. He was waiting for me now, this moment. I wonder did he keep watch for me as anxiously as I for him?

I passed down the wide oak staircase, pausing a moment as I reached the garden door to pluck a deep red rose. I remember it so well—the cool hush of the twilight, the singing of the birds, and the drowsy humming of the insects in the grass.

As I crossed the meadow I caught sight of Mark standing head and shoulders above the men in the middle of the field. He did not see me, and I felt relieved. Mark was very good to me—a more loving brother no girl ever had—but he was just a little strict, and would as like as not have ordered me back. I had fancied more than once that he had guessed my secret, for he had asked cousin Will how it was "young Verner was always hanging round the place," and had muttered something about "teaching him to keep his distance," in a tone which sent the hot blood to my face.

But Mark, Will, and all else went from my mind as I entered the beech grove, for, coming to meet me with glad eyes and outstretched hands, was my sweetheart, Allen Verner.

"Red as a rose is she," he said, laughing, and kissed my face again to make it redder. "Have you never a word for me, Dorothy?"

I stood there, blushing and confused, the loving speeches in my heart dying away before they reached my lips.

"I thought the time would never come," I faltered out at last.

"You wanted me, Dorothy? That is good news. See what I have brought for you."

He made me shut my eyes, drawing my head upon his shoulder. I felt his fingers touch my wrist, and, looking up, I uttered a little cry of pleasure and surprise.

"Do you like it, dearest?" he said. "I had some difficulty to find a bracelet small enough for such a dainty wrist."

It was an exquisitely-fashioned bracelet of gold, made in the form of a tiny handcuff, with scrolls, and leaves, and flowers, in open work, while here and there peeped out a rosebud of diamonds or a wreath of pearls.

"It is too beautiful for me," I murmured, but he laughed my doubts away.

"Don't I deserve a kiss for it, sweetheart? You've never given me one yet."

"Not for the bracelet," I said reproachfully.

"Well, then, for myself."

Flushing, I raised my face, and wondering greatly at my boldness, clasped my arms about his neck.

"Not for the bracelet, but because I love you," I said softly. Then I kissed him. And I never hear the soft, west wind sighing among the beech trees on the hill, but I remember. He held me to his heart, and called me strange, sweet names, and I was happy beyond all knowledge, past all thought.

The moon had touched the trees to silver, when with a start I thought of Mark.

"It is late," I said, "I must go, I am afraid Mark will be angry."

I half hoped Allen would offer to come with me and explain matters—better than I could—to my brother, but he frowned at the mention of Mark's name, and turned aside with an impatient gesture.

"Why should you worry about your brother, Dorothy?" he said. "You're not a child. Surely you need not ask permission to go for a walk. Take my advice and don't allow any questions. Tell your brother it is not for him to say where you shall go, what you shall do."

He did not ask me, as he usually did, to meet him again. I was seized with a sudden fear that I had vexed him, that he did not mean to see me any more.

"Allen," I cried, "are you angry? Have I said something that you didn't like?"

"Why, Dorothy, how could you vex me? Do you care as much as that?" he whispered, and I noticed a touch almost of sadness in his voice. "I am not worth it; indeed, I think it would be best for you if I went right away."

Digitized by Google

But that I could not bear, and clinging to him I cried out that I should die if he ceased to care for me, to love me.

They told me many things against Allen Verner—many, alas! I found out for myself; but I know that he spoke the truth that evening, when he answered that I was very dear to him.

"I'm going up to town to-morrow," he said, after a while, "so I sha'n't see you for the next week. Will you be here on Wednesday, Dorothy?"

My heart sank at the thought of a whole week without him, but I was made happy once again when he declared that time away from me would be intolerable.

A last embrace, and then we parted, and as I reached the the top of the beech grove I turned and waved my hand. Allen was standing in the moonlight, I could see the smile upon his lips, the tender greeting in his eyes.

I hastened down the road, but as I passed the meadow—quite deserted now—I saw two figures coming from the farm. I recognised them as visitors at the Hall, and one of them, Captain Burton, as Allen's special friend. Somehow I did not want to meet them, so I slipped behind the hedge and waited till they had passed.

"It's a charming old place," said Captain Burton, "and as for the girl, I've never seen a lovelier face the whole world over. The brother's a superior sort of chap, too, for a farmer, isn't he?"

"The Nevills are of good family, I believe," returned the other carelessly, "at least, so Verner told me."

"It strikes me Allen will find the brother an awkward customer to tackle," he went on, "if he gets up to his usual games, let alone that Lady Helen is sure to hear about it."

"You're mistaken, Tollington. I wouldn't forgive Allen if he tampers with the poor child's happiness. He is not incapable of such a thing."

"All the same, my dear chap, she's very pretty, and he's—well, we all know what Verner is where a woman's concerned. I fancy Lady Helen will have rather a time of it."

What they mean, I wondered. Who was Lady Helen, and what had she to do with Allen. And whose happiness were they afraid he'd tamper with, he who had shown me what true happiness was? I felt a sudden chill of fear, and though I thrust it from me, a vague dread remained, and I wished, I wished a thousand times, that Allen was a farmer just like Mark.

And through the night the chill crept ever closer to my heart; but at the quickening of the dawn I heard the glad birds sing, and on the wings of their sweet melody my fear took flight, and with a happy smile I fell asleep.

* * * * *

Ever since I could remember my cousin Will, half in play, half in earnest, had called me his little wife, and until I met Allen I had placidly accepted the future the words implied. But now that I had learnt what true love really meant, I understood how impossible it would have been for me to have married Will, and, foolishly, I took it for granted that he looked upon the matter in the same light as I.

Far from that being so, however, Will was only waiting till I was eighteen to speak to me, and, to my dismay, on the evening of my birthday, he commenced in a serious tone.

"I'm thinking, Dorothy," he said, "that it is time that you and I were promised man and wife. You know I've loved you since you were no higher than my hand, and now, my dear, that you're a woman grown, I think, and Mark agrees, we don't need to wait longer."

"Wait longer?" I stammered. "For what? What do you mean, Will?"

He came quite close and would have put his arm about me but that I pushed it off.

"I asked you, Dorothy, last summer, if you'd marry me?" he said.

"And my reply was 'Some day.' Well, who knows? 'Some day' I may."

But he was not to be so easily disposed of. High words passed between us, and at last, with flushed cheeks and tear-dimmed eyes, I left him brooding over what he called his "wrongs." Both of us had lost our tempers.

I was late at my meeting with Allen, and therefore stayed out later than I mostly did. When I reached the farm Mark was waiting for me at the gate.

"I want you, Dorothy," he said, and with a trembling heart I followed him into the oak-panelled parlour, where Will was waiting.

"You're late," said Mark at last, "Where have you been?"

Something—I know not what—told me that Mark knew about Allen. My brother, quick to blame, was always doubly angered at prevarication. I would answer, I decided, to the point. After all, as Allen said, was I not my own mistress in such a matter?

"I have been for a walk in the beech grove."

"With whom, Dorothy?"

"That has to do with me, Mark. Your question sounds more like a command than I care for."

"I'll answer for you," broke in Will. "You were with Allen Verner, the young squire."

"And what then?" I asked defiantly.

"And what is more," continued Will, paying no heed to the look of defiance that I cast at him, "you've met him almost every evening through the summer. I've heard whispers this long while down in the village, but I never thought it was Dorothy they meant. Dorothy, the girl I've trusted, loved, and cared for, all my life. I never dreamt that she would steal out secretly to meet that scoundrel, Allen Verner."

"How dare you say such things of him—scoundrel—he, the truest lover a woman ever had. It is not like you, Will, to call a man such names when no one is by to defend him but a girl. What is it to do with you that I meet Allen Verner? You say you love me. I don't want your love, for I—I hate you just as much as I love him."

He staggered a little as I finished, and stood against the wall with a dazed look in his eyes.

"Dorothy," said Mark, "you've acted in a foolish, nay, a wicked fashion. When have I ever refused you anything that you should steal out of the house as though you feared me? Had you but given me your confidence, I could have spared you bitter suffering. He's not a good man, Dorothy; you'll rue the day you met him yet."

"That's what is said of every man like Allen," I retorted. "What has he done so bad?"

"You tell me, Dorothy, you love him, and that he loves you?"

"I know he does," I cried, "I'll swear it."

Digitized by Google

My brother laid his hand upon my shoulder and there was kindness in his face, almost pity.

"And has he asked you to be his wife?"

"He means to, he is only waiting. Why do you look like that? Why do you torture and torment me so? What do you mean, Mark, what do you mean?"

But it was not my brother who answered me. He had pity on my white, set face.

"Tell her, Will," he answered hoarsely, "I can't."

"I said that Allen Verner was a scoundrel, and I say it once again," said Will. "All the time that he's been meeting you and winning your heart away from home, from Mark, from me, he meant to marry another woman. He is engaged to marry Lady Helen Stuart in the Spring."

"It is false," I cried; "you're saying it to hurt me. It is not true, I——" but my words died away, and, like a cold hand in the darkness came the memory of the words I'd heard, "I'll not forgive him if he tampers with the girl's happiness," and "Lady Helen will hear of it."

With a bitter cry I turned on both of them. In my despair I uttered words cruel as untrue. I taunted them, my dear, kind brother, and the man who loved me as his life, with speeches, and mad threats poured from my lips, till panting and utterly exhausted, I fell trembling into a chair.

"I'll not believe it," I said sullenly, "unless he tells me so."

Mark called Will to one side, and they talked earnestly for a few moments. Then he told me what he had decided.

"I shall go to the Hall to-night, Dorothy, and see Mr. Verner. If he tells me that he wishes, or intends to marry you, well and good. If not, I shall warn him against seeing you again. In any case I promise to bring you his decision in his own handwriting."

The gate clanged after the two—Will was going to walk up to the Hall with Mark and in the scented darkness of the summer night I waited.

Ah, me! how much I suffered. Each breath seemed but to add to the dull heaviness that pressed upon me.

"It's not true," I sobbed, and lingered to hear Mark's footsteps up the path returning—surely it would be so—with the news that Allen was loyal to me. Even as I told myself that this was so, the doubt weighing upon my heart cried out, "He never loved you," and the clock ticked to the same refrain, and the lilac trees beat with their branches at the window—"Never loved you," and the wind rose to a wail, and the clouds gathered in the summer sky, because he never loved me.

I heard Mark's voice as he came through the gate. I tried to meet him calmly, tried to smile and seem confident of Allen. But when he entered my strength went from me. With a cry I put out my hand and snatched the note.

It ran as follows: "My Dorothy, for the last time I call you mine. I have deceived you wilfully, cruelly; I loved you, and had not the courage to tell you that I was bound to another woman. That I was going to marry Lady Helen Stuart."

The wind was shrieking now, and the rain beating with pitiless force upon the roses—happy roses, they could die, but I, alas, what was there left to me? Alas! he never loved me.

* * * * *

It was two days after that I awoke—just as the blue-grey mists of the early dawn were rising from the valley—with a great start, to find my heart beating as I have seen a bird beat with its wings against a cage. After a while I lay down again, but a sharp noise on the window pane as though a handful of small gravel had been thrown, startled me once more.

Fancying I knew not what, I crept to the window and looked out. Slight as was the noise I made, it had been heard.

"Miss Nevill," said a voice I recognised as Captain Burton's, "Verner's leaving England. He wants to see you once again before he goes, and begs that you will meet him in the beech grove—where he's waiting."

"Now?" I gasped.

"It is the only chance," he said. "I've tried my best to dissuade him, but he swears that he will see you. He wanted to come up to the house last evening, but I feared a quarrel with your brother. If you don't come now, Miss Nevill, I sha'n't be able to prevent him coming round to-morrow, and there may be trouble."

How could I refuse, when I remembered Mark's threat if Allen should again try to see me?

Once again I passed across the meadow, the last buttercups, heavy with dew, brushing against my ankles.

Once again I stood beside my lover at the old familiar spot.

Captain Burton was waiting a short distance down the road with a dogcart to drive Allen to the station after our last "Good-bye."

Even now I cannot recall those last sad words unmoved. But I remember—oh, how gladly—that I forgave him, fully, freely, and that when he talked of breaking faith with Lady Helen I bade him keep true to her and forget me. He had not been so much to blame as Mark had thought. Lady Helen was an heiress, and had been engaged to Allen since they were girl and boy. It was, in fact, a family affair, and his mother would, I think, have broken her heart had her pet scheme fallen through. For Lady Helen's thousands would pay off the many mortgages on the estate and leave her with an unencumbered income.

A lingering hand-clasp, a last fond look, and then I threw my arms about his neck and pressed my lips to his.

"For the last time," I said with a break in my voice, and then a rustling in the bushes, a muttered oath, a shot—Allen lay stretched upon the ground, and at his side, a grim look upon his face, stood Will.

"You thought to steal away with her this morning," he said. "Thank God, I've stopped your villainy once and for all."

I watched dazed, uncomprehending. As they lifted Allen from the ground, I heard him whisper, "Remember, Burton, the gun went off by accident. Don't let them know that Dorothy was here—poor Dorothy."

I followed Will up to the farm—and then for the first time I understood how terrible a thing had happened.

Allen was shot, and Will, my cousin Will, was guilty, if he died, of murder!

A merciful unconsciousness came over me, and I remember nothing more.

* * * * *

When I came downstairs once more I found the snow upon the ground in place of the rose petals I had left.

Allen had recovered sooner than was expected, and, Mark told me in a hesitating voice, was already married. Will had gone abroad, but before he went had been up to the Hall to visit Allen, and the two had shaken hands and parted, if not on friendly, still not on terms of enmity. No one had learnt the truth of the affair, and if Lady Helen guessed the wound was not a self-inflicted one she made no sign.

After a while I missed Will's face, his kindly smile, and pleasant voice.

"Why does not Will come back?" I said to Mark. But he only looked at me and sighed.

Christmas had come and gone before they thought me strong enough to venture out, and at the first step that I took I was reminded once again of Will.

The Winter snows had gone, and the first violets blossomed, and still he had not come. The freshness of the Spring seemed to lay a cool calm hand upon me. I saw with clearer eyes, with better judgment, and gradually I understood that my feeling towards Allen had been but "the first mistaken impulse of an undisciplined heart," and at the same moment I realised the value of the love which I had cast aside.

"Mark," I said one night, "will he never come?"

But on an April morning when the earth was fair with daffodils, and tall Lent lilies, Mark called me to go into the garden.

There, under the hawthorn tree was Will—love in his eyes, love in his heart, and both for me.

"I've come back, Dorothy," he said quite quietly, "shall I stay?"

And with my hands in his, my eyes fixed on his own, I answered with a sob:

"For ever."

John K. Prothero.

Digitized by Google

Under the Mistletoe

A TALE OF THE AWAKENING OF LOVE

"How dare you kiss me, Gerald Loraine!"

"How dare you kiss me, Gerald Loraine!" exclaimed Marian, her voice filled with the sudden anger his caress aroused.

"Well, weren't you under the mistletoe, and isn't it a man's privilege at this season to kiss the maid he finds there?" inquired the offender with exasperating coolness, holding her fast.

"Do you imagine I could forego so tempting a pleasure when it was within my grasp? A joy for which I have hungered for three long years! Then you promised that the sweetness of these lips would be for me alone, and now that I have come to claim the fulfilment of the pledge you gave me, I receive cold words and scornful glances."

"Gerald, you are mad!" cried the girl, in terror lest someone should enter the room and see them. "In pity, release me—you have forgotten yourself. You are cruel."

"I have forgotten nothing, save that to-morrow we part! But for this moment you are mine—mine!" exclaimed Gerald. "Marian, do not grudge me this mite of happiness, for he will possess you during all the future, while I must be content with the memory of that which I have lost!"

"Let me go, Gerald," she pleaded again. "Someone will see us."

"Let them; let him come and see you in your rightful place," retorted Gerald recklessly. "Oh, Marian, how can you sell yourself to that old man? What has come over you that you can find in his withered life, and empty title, a recompense for your youth, beauty, and stainless womanhood? Oh, my darling, cannot you see that he cares for no one but himself?"

"I am perfectly aware of the gentleman's motive in desiring to marry me, just as everyone else is," she answered, a little frightened by the stern look that had settled on his face, and the unflinching gaze bent upon her. "It isn't complimentary to a woman, nor could it possibly prove agreeable to one who, from her earliest infancy, was taught to hold honour and virtue, mind and soul, above worldly position, purple and gold.

"I doubt that any girl today is so unsophisticated, so devoid of natural reasoning powers that she fails to detect the genuine from the counterfeit. It is a plain business transaction in which sentiment plays no part, and if the purchaser secures all he wants and the seller is likewise satisfied, then they are quits.

"Others have sold themselves knowingly, willingly, have counted the cost and considered the prize worth the sacrifice, why should not I if I wish?" She raised her head and looked at him.

"Yes, why?" he repeated after her slowly.

The words so quietly uttered cut like a keen blade, yet his manner piqued her pride and urged her to further malice. Compelling her eyes to meet his steady regard, she flung another taunt into his face.

"Love and marriage do not always go hand-in-hand; a man may love one woman but find it more to his interest to wed some other one; I have no means of knowing that other men, if less frank, are not impelled by the same spirit that animates my ancient moneyed suitor."

There was no mistaking the implied accusation contained in the words, and the face she gazed at flushed, then every vestige of colour receded and left it white.

There was a quick indrawing of the breath as if it had received a sudden shock, that momentarily confused and surprised him, and into his eyes there crept a shadow of mute wonder and pain.

"I did not think of that, Marian, and I should never have thought that you would either," came the answer. The passion that had been surging through his heart died, leaving behind sorrow and pity for her and himself.

"When the news reached me long ago on the other side of the world that Marian Wybrant was to marry a nobleman, I did not believe it, I trusted you too implicitly. I felt that if such were true you would inform me of it, as certainly your promise gave me the right to know.

"At our parting you asked for three years to test your love and mine. I waited the full time, God knows how impatiently, but at last it was over and I came for my final answer.

Digitized by Google

"That you could change, that you should choose another was very possible, but surely you could have told me that such was the case; instead you met me as a stranger, and treated me as someone guilty of wrongdoing. Was that fair, Marian? Is it just to condemn me without a hearing? Why I don't even know of what I am accused."

He paused, hoping she might make some answer, but although she felt the justice of his appeal, and was already repenting her hasty, ungenerous insinuations, she made no reply.

"I never stopped to consider my position as a poor, struggling artist," continued Gerald, in the same quiet, even tone, drawing a step nearer to her and trying to read in the averted face some sign of relenting. "Strange, but it never occurred to me that I might be looked upon as mercenary because Fate had willed it that I should love a girl who some day was destined to be an heiress; for it seems that as long as I can remember but two things filled my thoughts—you and my art."

"Are you sure?" interrupted Marian, the desire to hear him speak of the woman she imagined her rival, overcoming her determination not to be the first to broach the subject.

"I am sure," he returned, with calm emphasis. "And now that I have what I came for, there is no necessity to fore you longer with my presence. This is not my first bailure, however," he added wearily, "and doubtless it will not be the last; but its pain will linger and be hard to endure!"

"But Madeline will help you bear it, and comfort you for my loss," said Marian, as he turned and walked towards the door.

Gerald stood for an instant like a person stunned. Those few involuntary words were a revelation. In the habitually soft, musical voice there echoed a note of unmistakable jealousy, bitter and despairing. Then he remembered the innocent one whose name she had spoken.

"How dare you speak of her in that fashion?" he demanded, wheeling round on Marian. "What do you know about Madeline that you bring up her name here? Has she anything to do with you or me—with your broken faith? No, but even you must cast a stone at that child of misfortune! Poor Madeline, would to Heaven I knew where you were this night!"

Gerald went to the window and gazed with sorrowful wistfulness out upon the snow-clad landscape.

"I know nothing about the person except what others have said," said Marian coldly. "The names of Gerald Loraine and his beautiful model have been public property for some time, and they who talked seemingly knew——"

"Hush!" he interposed. "I know what you are going to say—it is the old, old story of the artist in love with the maid who poses for him. The story is old enough to be new again, and absurd enough for a joke."

"But do you?" The question seemed literally forced from her lips, so mad was her desire to hear a denial. "I have heard it reiterated everywhere I went. Tell me, Gerald?"

She drew nearer, looking at him with her soul in her eyes, while a desperate fear tugged at her heart.

Gerald was touched by the unconscious confession; joy thrilled through every nerve and fibre of his being, he longed to take her in his arms; but with an effort he controlled the impulse, and responded calmly:

"Yes, I do love Madeline as a friend or brother might. Her beauty I admired as I love and admire the wild grandeur of the mountains, or the perfect loveliness of that flower upon your breast; and her spirit matched the setting. That was all; Madeline liked me in return, but the one great love that a woman gives, was won before I had ever seen her. There was a husband and child——"

"A husband and child!" she gasped. "Oh, how miserably mean I have been—how cruelly unjust!"

"Yes, unjust, Marian," said Gerald softly. "This girl is no older than yourself, yet she had endured more wretchedness in her short life than you can even conceive of. Her husband was stricken down by an accident at the mills where he was making for her and his child a good living, and left a hopeless invalid, to be a burden upon the wife he idolised. For his sake and that of the helpless little one, she serves me as model."

Marian remorsefully turned up to him a face that the flickering firelight revealed wet with tears, holding out her hands with a repentant gesture:

"I—I don't deserve it, but—but, oh, Gerald, forgive me! —it drove me almost distracted to hear everybody saying that you loved——"

He did not wait for her to finish, but catching her to his breast, smothered the words on her lips.

"Is it true, Marian, that the poor, struggling artist is cared for when you have so many of these great titled knights at your feet?" he cried.

"Can you ask, Gerald?" was all she answered.

Nellie G. Coleman.

A Little Misunderstanding.

Which Originated in a Little Miss Understanding Too Much.

Freda and Dora Cuthbert were sisters, and furthermore they were both very pretty. Freda was twenty-one years of age, and fair. Dora was sixteen, and dark. They were the only children of a wealthy merchant, a widower, who lived in a large mansion somewhere in the Northern part of the county of Middlesex.

Now, how this story came to be written originates in the fact that Freda Cuthbert had lost her heart to a Mr. Wilfred Maitland, who was a doctor. In addition, this gentleman reciprocated the feeling, whilst neither knew how affairs were with each other, so to speak.

Wilfred Maitland was certainly an attractive man, and presumably that was why Dora Cuthbert gave her youthful heart to him without his being aware of the fact.

Thus we have a triangular love affair. Freda and Dora both love Wilfred; Wilfred loves Freda; Wilfred does not love Dora; Freda does not know Wilfred loves her, and vice versa; neither does Freda know Dora loves Wilfred; Dora, however, is fully aware of Freda's feelings and resents them.

I hope you have understood this somewhat tangled statement.

At "The Briars," which is the name of Mr. Cuthbert's house, they have a telephone, which telephone is an unwitting factor to this story.

It was two days before Christmas that the tinkle of the telephone bell caused Dora to jump up from her seat by the fire, and rush to answer the ring.

Digitized by Google

"Hullo, is that 'The Briars'?"

"Yes, who are you?"

"Wilfred Maitland," came the reply. "I want to speak to Miss Dora."

"That's me," came the prompt, albeit ungrammatical reply.

"Oh, how do you do, Miss Dora? I say, I want you to do a little favour for me, will you?"

"With pleasure, Mr. Maitland."

"Thank you so much. I am sending a little Christmas present for your sister. I want it to surprise her, so, if you don't mind, I will send it to you, and you can give it to her on Christmas Day."

Dora's face went red with vexation as she heard this request, and her little foot tapped the floor angrily. However, she did not permit her annoyance to be heard in her voice as she replied:

"Very well, Mr. Maitland. You send it addressed to me, and I shall know what to do with it."

"Thank you very much, Miss Dora," came Maitland's voice over the wires. "Merry Christmas to you."

"Thanks, same to you! Good-bye," answered Dora.

"Good-bye!"

Then the bell tinkled again.

"A present for Freda," muttered Dora, "and from him, too. Ugh! I could——" She paused, and then began to smile. "But perhaps he will send me one, too. I'll wait and see."

On the following afternoon a small parcel addressed to Dora arrived by special messenger. She took it up to her room and eagerly opened it.

"Oh!" she gasped as she saw an exquisitely wrought chain to which was attached a glistening diamond pendant. "Oh, how lovely!"

After feasting her eyes on the present for some while, she turned her attention to the note which accompanied it. This was very short.

"Dear Miss Dora,—You know what to do with the inclosed. I am unexpectedly called away to the country for Christmas. My address will be 'The Grange, Lonsby Hill, Berkshire.' With best wishes for a happy Christmas.—Believe me, yours sincerely, "Wilfred Maitland."

"And this is for Freda?" she muttered, as she gazed at the handsome gift. A wave of jealous anger rushed through her, and she clenched her fists, her eyes blazing.

"She sha'n't have it unless he's sent me something," she whispered through her set teeth.

Dora Cuthbert's temper had always been a great trial to Mr. Cuthbert, and he had endeavoured to curb it, but had failed. Now she was the picture of simmering wrath, with her dark eyes flashing with tears of anger.

Christmas morning dawned. Dora was downstairs early, and eagerly examined the many presents that had fallen to her lot, but there was nothing from Wilfred Maitland beyond a card. Concealing her vexation, she hastened back to her room, and took out the chain and pendant.

"Freda shall pay for having it," she muttered. "I'll do it, yes, I'll do it."

In her outspoken thoughts she was referring to a plan which she had formulated during the night. She read and re-read the letter, and was apparently satisfied with the result. Then she placed Wilfred's present around her neck, and, with the letter grasped in her hand, she sought Freda's room, for she knew that her sister had not gone downstairs yet.

"Merry Christmas, Dora," cried Freda. "I'm just coming down. I've had a lovely lot of presents, father sent them up to me."

Before Dora could answer, Freda had caught sight of the diamond pendant.

"Oh, Dora!" she exclaimed rapturously. "How beautiful? Whoever gave you that?"

"Wilfred Maitland."

"What!"

"Why, you seem surprised, Freda. Yes, Wilfred sent it with this note." She handed Freda the letter which Wilfred had sent to her. Then she stood and watched her sister's pale face, while she gloated over her triumph.

With wistful eyes Freda read the letter, and all the colour left her face. An involuntary sigh rose to her lips, but she checked it as she cried,

"But, Dora, why did he send you this?"

"Why?" questioned her sister in apparently surprised tones. "Why do men send girls presents?"

"But you're only a child, Dora."

"Oh?"

"Still, it's very nice of Mr. Maitland."

"Am I only a child, Freda? Do you think Wilfred would have sent me this if he had thought so. What a pity it is he had to go away so soon."

Dora walked towards the door as she spoke. Then, with a sudden cruel whim, she raised the pendant to her lips and went out.

Freda stood still for a few moments as Dora had left her. Then she threw herself on her bed in an agony of grief.

"Oh, Wilfred," she moaned, "I love you so!"

Presently she stood up, and, with a queer little shrug of her shoulders, she laughed.

"Oh, well," she muttered. "What does it matter? I I don't care, no, not a bit."

But she did, and in her heart of hearts she knew it.

Meanwhile, Dora had returned to her room full of gratification. She replaced the present in its case, and then sat down to think.

"It's a good job I'm going abroad with aunt in a fortnight," she murmured. "There will be a terrible fuss if it comes out, but by the time I return they will have forgotten it. Ugh! I hate him!"

With a rapid change characteristic of her temperament, Dora's infatuation for Wilfred had turned into fierce hate.

"I'd better tell Freda to keep it dark for the present," she went on, still speaking her thoughts aloud.

She met her sister in the corridor. To Dora's discomfiture, Freda showed no signs of being at all upset.

"Look here, Freda," she said. "I don't want you to say anything to father about Wilfred's present to me. Not yet, at any rate. Do you understand?"

"Oh, perfectly!" answered Freda. "I shall not concern myself with it in any way. As a matter of fact, I had completely forgotten about it."

Dora, however, immediately saw how deep her shaft had gone home, despite her sister's calm exterior, and her wicked little spirit rejoiced exceedingly.

Christmas Day passed very slowly for Freda, she could hardly call to mind a more miserable Christmas. Boxing Day went in a similarly dreary manner, leaving Freda more sad than ever.

Away down in the country Wilfred Maitland looked eagerly for a letter from Freda, but none came, and it was two days since Christmas.

"I suppose I ought not to have given her that," he mused. "Just like me, impetuous, and then I spoil everything."

At that moment a message came that he was wanted on the telephone.

"Is that Mr. Maitland?" came a voice, rather faintly.

"Yes."

"I'm Dora Cuthbert. I'm speaking from home."

"Oh, yes!" answered Wilfred, and his heart gave a great leap.

"Are you going to be at the Coleridges' ball on Friday?"

"Yes," he replied. "Are you going?"

"Oh, rather?"

"And your sister, as well?"

"Yes," replied Dora. "We shall see you then, I suppose?"

"Oh, I am certain to be there!"

"Good-bye, Mr. Maitland, till Friday."

"Good-bye," he answered in puzzled tones.

He replaced the receiver and walked thoughtfully away. Then a light seemed to dawn on him.

"Of course," he cried, "that's it. Hardly liked to write to me, I expect."

Digitized by Google

At the other end of the wire Dora was laughing silently as she walked from the instrument.

"Just been speaking to Wilfred," she said to her sister shortly afterwards.

"What, is he here?" cried Freda, whilst a vivid blush suffused her countenance.

"Oh, no! He spoke to me on the telephone from Berkshire," answered Dora. "He told me he would be at the Coleridges' ball on Friday."

"Oh, yes!" murmured Freda in reply, whilst she made a mental note not to go to the ball.

If the careful reader has noticed, it will be seen that Dora has not told an untruth at all. But all that she has said has been calculated to be understood in an erroneous manner. For instance, she said that Wilfred had sent her the chain and pendant. So he had. Thus she consoled herself as she ruminated over all she was doing, and began to grow aghast at all that was happening and would happen.

Once she had made up her mind to make a clean breast of it all to Freda, but the latter only added to her own unhappiness by unwittingly frustrating Dora. It happened in this manner.

"Freda," said Dora, "aren't you sorry Wilfred did not send you anything?"

"Sorry, why should I be sorry?"

"Well, he sent me that lovely pendant and chain——"

"My dear Dora," broke in Freda rather sharply, "If Mr. Maitland chooses to throw away costly presents on children who have not yet completed their education, in what manner does it concern me?"

Dora's face went white with anger, and with a malevolent glance at her sister she left the room, all feelings of repentance gone from her. And Freda—must I record it—well, Freda went to her room and sobbed as though her heart would break, whilst down in Berkshire, Wilfred went to and fro with a light heart and happy face.

When Friday came round Freda pleaded a headache, and declared her intention of staying at home. Consequently Mr. Cuthbert and Dora went on to the ball alone, which was exactly as Dora had anticipated.

Wilfred Maitland had returned from Berkshire that afternoon. He had rooms in a house at High Barnet, which was several miles away from "The Briars." The mansion wherein the ball was to take place was very close to the Cuthberts' home, and Wilfred had to pass "The Briars" to reach his destination.

At the ball Dora Cuthbert watched for the appearance of Wilfred Maitland. Her plan was to make him think, although she would not actually say it, that Freda would not come to the ball when she heard he was coming.

She watched the entrance to the ballroom, every moment growing angrier. But Wilfred did not appear, and her venomous appetite remained unappeased.

As Wilfred passed the entrance to "The Briars," he decided that he would call in and accompany the Cuthberts to the ball. But, as he passed in at the west entrance to the grounds, Mr. Cuthbert and Dora in the carriage passed out of the east entrance. However, Wilfred was not to know that, as he made his inquiry from the footman.

"Mr. Cuthbert and Miss Dora have gone out, sir, but Miss Cuthbert is in," the footman informed him.

Freda in! What did this mean? Was she not going to the ball? But Dora had told him that they were both going. Perhaps he had really offended her, and she was not going for that reason.

These and a host of other thoughts rushed through Wilfred's brain as he heard the footman's reply. Then, all in a moment, he resolved that he would hesitate no longer, but would see Freda and find out for himself how matters really stood.

"Will you tell Miss Cuthbert I wish to see her?" he said.

The man departed on his errand, and presently came back with the reply that Miss Dora had gone to the ball.

"But I wish to see Miss Freda Cuthbert," Wilfred said, "not Miss Dora. Will you please say that?"

The footman went away once more, and presently returned with the message that Miss Cuthbert would see him. Wilfred followed the man into the library where Freda was seated before a huge fire.

"Good evening, Mr. Maitland," said Freda in level tones, as the footman closed the door.

Then they stood and looked at each other, both feeling very nervous, neither knowing what to say. At last Freda spoke.

"When I sent that message out I was under the impression that you wished to see Dora, and not me."

"I was not aware," he replied in slightly nettled tones, "that I have shown such a marked preference for your sister's society."

"That is hardly a question we need discuss," said Freda in a dignified manner.

"I must have offended her," he thought. "However am I to find out?"

Once again they faced each other, quite at a loss for words.

"Are you not going to the ball?" said Freda at last. "You will be late; I expect Dora will be waiting for you."

"Dora again!" cried Wilfred. "Why do you continually refer to Dora and myself in such a marked way?"

"Well, you see," commenced Freda, now somewhat ill at ease. "I thought that—er—you rather liked Dora."

"I like your little sister, of course I do," he answered in puzzled tones.

"Well, Mr. Maitland," cried Freda, "I should think you do, considering your present to her at Christmas."

"My present to her at Christmas?" he repeated, more mystified than ever.

"Yes, surely you remember? Or do you give away so many presents to your girl friends?" Freda replied somewhat sarcastically.

"I do not remember giving Dora anything," he said.

"Then you must evidently be quite accustomed to give away diamond pendants and gold chains," cried Freda, stung to angry utterance by his apparent unconcern.

"What!" he cried. "I gave Dora a diamond pendant? Do you mean to say that she kept——" he paused and stared in amazement at Freda.

"Well, Mr. Maitland, she showed me your letter and present. But perhaps I ought not to have said anything; it was meant to be a secret, wasn't it?"

He was still gazing at her in undisguised astonishment, too astounded to speak.

"Why," he said at last, "I only sent one present at Christmas, and that was to you."

"To me?" she cried.

"Yes, I asked Dora on the telephone to give it you. I sent a note as well."

"B—but Dora said you sent it to her."

"So I did, but to give to you."

"Oh!" cried Freda, she could say nothing more.

Somehow her heart grew light, and the dead weight of oppression was gone from her.

"Yes, Freda," went on Wilfred. "I sent it to you, dear, because I love you."

"You do?" she cried joyously, and then they both laughed, and gazed into each other's eyes.

"Yes," he cried. "I love you, Freda."

"Oh!" was once more the only reply she could make, but her eyes gave him all the answer he wanted.

"My Freda," he whispered as he took her in his arms, and then their lips met and they tasted the joy that only comes to man and woman when true love meets true love.

"But what about Dora?" Freda said some time later on, when they both occupied the same armchair before the fire.

"I cannot understand it," he said. "I must have offended her in some way, and it was a childish spite on her part."

But Freda was a woman, and she knew her sex as man can never do; therefore she knew different.

"Let us forgive her, dear," Freda said.

"Very well, but mind you get back my Christmas present," was his laughing reply.

And there we will leave them.

B. N. E.

Digitized by Google

The Miser's Christmas Holiday.

Telling of a Good Deed Well Done.

LONDON is frost and fog-bound; and Morgan Carlaw, money-lender and miser, bending over his well-thumbed ledgers shivers with the cold.

The room he calls his "office"—one in a great nest of more or less reputable chambers within sound of St. Paul's chimes—is a small one, but the fire in the dust-choked grate is too small even for it, and the solitary gas-jet that fights against the fog diffuses little heat.

As his master shivers, so does Godfrey Chatterton, his clerk, scowling in turn at the miserable fire, the feeble light, and the safe in the corner.

It seems strange that Morgan Carlaw, owner of the bonds and securities in that safe—totalling how much he alone knows—should deny himself ordinary creature comforts on such an inclement December 24th as this; but the miser's mind is warped out of all reason by long years of business selfishness, and solitude, and he grudges the spending of every penny.

There is but one redeeming feature about him, his clerk thinks. For the sake of appearances he dresses, if not well, at least tidily and clean. Lean, keen-jawed, grey-haired, iron-souled, methodical, merciless—that is how his clerk sums him up.

Godfrey Chatterton himself is also old, grey, and cadaverous, eking out a miserable existence on a mean salary, because his employer knows certain things about his past.

Business is slack this morning, and callers few. The spider at the centre of his web is not perturbed, for at the close of the year his victims do not care for many personal interviews; but in fastening his strands yet more securely round them per post and legal process, he always finds something to do.

Chatterton is glad when his employer, five minutes later than his usual time, goes out to dinner, leaving him in charge of the office and in sole control of the coal-box.

Outside the snow lies thick on neglected pavements, and Morgan Carlaw, buttoning his overcoat closely on his spare figure, creeps carefully along the dim streets to the cheap cook-shop he favours with his mean patronage.

So dense is the fog that traffic is almost suspended, and the shops, with their outspread Christmas cheer, make but a poor show in the gloom.

A street away from the restaurant, a small boy, coming round a corner, runs up against Mr. Carlaw, and but for the latter's outstretched hand, would fall from the recoil. He is a very small boy, of puny limbs and pinched face, with blue nose, and eyes that give evidence of recent tears.

"You should look where you are going, boy," says the moneylender sharply; "especially in this fog."

"Please, sir, I didn't hear you coming. Can you tell me the way to the big stores? I have asked ever so many, and they all tell me to keep on this way."

Morgan Carlaw looks closely at the small, cold, drawn face and the big, pleading eyes, a strange expression coming into his own.

"What's your name, my boy?" he asks quickly, but more kindly than usual for him.

"Gifford—Teddy Gifford—sir," says the boy, wondering.

Though the idea has occurred to him, Carlaw starts. These are her eyes; that is her very expression; the boy's voice is like her voice; and Gifford is her name now. And where has he heard the name during the past year?

"Come in here, Teddy," he says, taking the boy's hand and leading him into the shelter of an archway. "Now tell me, is your mother's name Mary?"

"Yes, sir. Father used to call her Mary."

"Umph! What do you want to go to the big stores for? What stores?"

"Please, I don't know," says the boy in a quavering tone, reverting to his misery. "Mother's poor, now—now father's gone, and we can't get nice things now to eat—and she cries often—and I heard Lizzie—that's the little girl in the next room—say that people get Santa Claus from the big stores at Christmas. And this morning a letter came, a blue one from Mr. Carlaw, who wants some money—and mother cried because she hadn't any, and I thought I'd go and find Santa Claus and ask him to bring us some money instead of other things."

The little fellow stops, out of breath with so unusually long a speech, and tears tremble in his eyes.

"Do you think he will do it, if I ask him?" he says.

"No, I am afraid not, Teddy," says the miser, in a tone that sounds strange even to his own ears. "He doesn't take notice of anyone but grown-up people. You had better be going back to mother, or she will think you are lost. It is not so dark now, see."

"I must go back if mother wants me; I never thought of that," says Teddy; then adds wistfully: "But will you go and ask Santa Claus for me, sir—you are a grown-up man, aren't you?"

"I think so," says Morgan Carlaw. "I will ask him for you. You must run back now. Wait a bit, though."

He hurries the boy to a confectioner's, goes in with a gait and air long foreign to him, and purchases a loaf of bread and another of cake. These he gives to Teddy, with a sense of immense sacrifice, and scarcely hearing or heeding the astonished recipient's grave thanks, hastens him off on his homeward way. Then, with the same strange gait and air, he pursues his own journey to the cook-shop and orders his usual dinner.

Digitized by Google

He eats the niggardly meal and goes back to the office like a man in a waking dream. The sudden revivifying of an old memory has pierced his soul to the core. Scenes of the past come before him—the past that he had thought buried out of sight and mind.

He had thought, as others had done, that his soul was all shrivelled to dry husk; and he finds that he is yet human within.

A few moments of reminiscence, aided by the speaking likeness of little Teddy's face, has undone the work of years of miserly scheming.

Morgan Carlaw has not always been as he is now. He remembers, as plainly as though it had only been yesterday, his courtship of Mary Howarth; their weekly walks and talks; some nights at a suburban theatre; a few excursions to Margate, and once up the river; her unfailing freshness of spirits and charm of face; his dim knowledge that she was too bright and good for his even then sordid temperament.

He remembers how the brief dream of happiness passed, and one more worthy of her, more fitting to win her love, had taken her from him. He remembers, bitterly, how he resolved to cast her out of his life, to crush down every thought of her, and to be revenged on the man who had robbed him of happiness.

He remembers, remorsefully now, how he compassed that man's ruin, and struck Mary down to poverty at the same time; and how, in a moment of repentant sanity, he made a will bequeathing all his possessions to Mary or her children, and would even have helped her temporarily had she not refused his aid with anger, and moving to another address, escaped his further notice.

It is some consolation to him now to reflect that he had never told her his profession, or his professional name—Carlaw. She would never think of him as the vulture he knows himself to be.

He knows how he has given himself up, body and soul, to money-getting, until avarice has become both first and second nature.

And he remembers having "business transactions" with several Giffords during the past year; and Teddy's pitiful story of the blue letter that made his mother cry, brings to his mind that one of them was a widow who had tried to raise money on a disputed will of her husband's parents.

He had put Chatterton in charge of the affair when the payments began to fail, with instructions to go on without reference to the woman's appeals for delay—she never came personally, always writing.

He sees it all clearly now, as he goes through the yellow mist and smudgy snow to his den—his Mary, left alone in the world, had sunk from poverty to penury, had tried to obtain the money left to her husband, but had been defrauded by his family; and finally, had borrowed, unwittingly, of him.

It was his order that had dispatched the pitiless letter that had sent Teddy into the streets to seek Santa Claus.

It affords him a sort of negative satisfaction to know that he has not destroyed the will made in Mary's favour. He had meant to do, but had put it off, thinking that there was ample time.

His first words, when he gets back to the office, startle Chatterton more than anything he has heard for many a year.

"You can go as soon as you like to-day, Chatterton," he says, "and I sha'n't want you back till Thursday."

"But what about business?" asks the clerk, staring incredulously at his employer. "We have always balanced the books on Christmas Day. It'll be the first time we've had a day off since I came here! Are you actually going to have a holiday?"

"Yes; I'm going to take a holiday," says Carlaw, testily. "I suppose I can do as I like without asking you? Take yourself off, and you needn't come on Friday if you don't like."

"All right, Mr. Carlaw," says the clerk, quickly changing his tone. "No offence meant. I'll come Friday. Merry Christmas!"

Morgan Carlaw does not answer this grim pleasantry. His mind is still busy with the past, and sub-consciously working out a problem of the future.

He sits in the decrepit chair beside the desk for more than an hour after Chatterton's departure, in a fixed attitude—his chin on his collar, his hands grasping the chair arms.

The fire goes out, its red heart slowly dying to grey ash; and the growing darkness outside seems merely accentuated by the puny gas jet over the desk.

At last he gets up, seizes pen and paper, and writes a brief note to his solicitor, then takes from a pigeon-hole a dust-grimed document marked "Last Will and Testament of William Carter, alias Morgan Carlaw," and incloses it with the letter, which he goes out and posts.

At any rate, that is safe now from Chatterton's possible tampering; and when he dies Mary's troubles will be at an end.

Back again, he sets to work to balance his books alone, poring over apparently interminable agreements, securities, deeds, approaching a total that he knows will over-reach five figures—a total that will all be Mary's.

Ten o'clock comes—eleven—twelve, and Christmas Eve passes into Christmas Day; two, three, four, five, and joy-bells ring in the city, and life becomes more evident in the snow-whitened streets; and still the miser toils on in gloom and cold, shivering, with cramped fingers, over the details of his hoarded wealth.

As the figures grow, he gloats over them in ecstasy, forgetting his discomfort, forgetting all but his overmastering avarice.

Six, seven, eight, strike and on the eve of nine o'clock on Christmas morning his task is over.

He sits up, stretching and chafing his chilled and aching limbs; then putting the balance sheet into a big blue envelope addresses to his solicitor and sealing it with red wax, pigeon-holes it.

Outside the snow has ceased falling, the fog has gone, and people are exchanging the old-time greetings in the fresh, cold, sunlit day.

A ray of sunlight, escaping the forbidding roof-angles around, shoots at last into Morgan Carlaw's office, and piercing its gloom and floating dust, settles on the chimney-piece.

The miser, seeing it, extinguishes the wasteful gas-jet, and takes from the crowded shelf a small, dark-blue bottle, black with smoke. He brushes it carefully with his coat-sleeve, exposing to view the red label upon it, and at what he reads on the label, smiles.

Yes, he thinks, he has chosen well. He is glad he made the will in Mary's favour; gladder that he had never altered it. It is the best way he can atone for the past—can prove himself worthy of something higher than greed of gain.

All his wealth will be Mary's—all—when he is dead. It is better than helping her whilst he is alive—and he always objects to charity, on principle—and he feels sure she would refuse his aid, even if offered.

Yes, it is best as he has chosen. Whilst he lives this wealth is his—all his; after his death it will be hers, and she will know at last that he is not quite all mercenary husk.

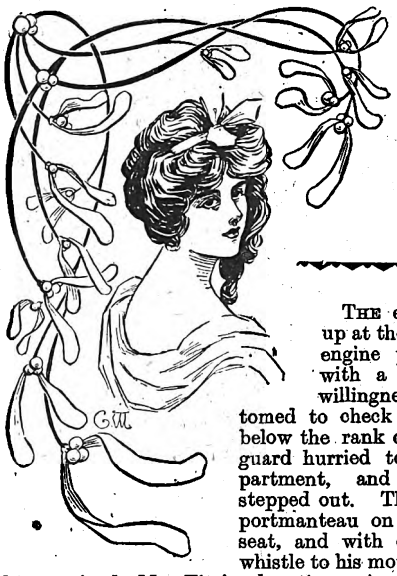
He picks up the little bottle, regarding it as a silent friend and long companion who promises a final consolation after the wreck of his wasted years, and uncorking it, sniffs the contents; then, with a quick, resolute effort, drains it.

A moment later he falls, face forward, on the desk. The ray of sunlight, journeying across the room, reaches the label of the empty bottle at the silent man's elbow, and picks out in letters of black on a dull red ground the one word: "Poison."

Morgan Carlaw, money-lender and miser, has set out upon his Christmas holiday; and before the New Year dawns little Teddy Gifford knows that the kind gentleman's intercession with Santa Claus has not been in vain.

Geo. Wallis.

Digitized by Google



A Sense of Humour.

The Story of a Literary Lion.

By W. PETT RIDGE.

THE express train pulled up at the small station; the engine performing the act with a suggestion of unwillingnesss, as one unaccustomed to check itself at anything below the rank of a junction. The guard hurried to a first-class compartment, and Mr. Andrew Tite stepped out. The guard placed the portmanteau on the rustic garden-seat, and with one hand held his whistle to his mouth; with the other he received Mr. Tite's donation. A porter of amazing youthfulness strolled up from the signal-box at the end of the platform as the train started.

"Now then, ten-twenty," said the infantile porter to the guard, with much truculence, "'urry up."

The train hastened away, and the small porter watched it.

"That train ain't stopped 'ere," he said, with a reminiscent air, to Mr. Andrew Tite, "not for the last free months. Last gent it stopped for was Sir 'Enry——"

"I want this portmanteau taken up to the Unicorn," interrupted Mr. Tite sharply. "Do you know it?"

"Well," said the boy, "I ort to."

"Certainly you ought. But do you?"

"There ain't many men that knows the Unicorn better than me," said the small porter, with a knowing smile. "If I don't know the Unicorn, why nobody don't know it."

"That's all right, then. Bring this up there as soon as you can, and I'll walk on."

"You go through this orchard," explained the boy, "and you bear jest the least bit to the left, and you come to a——"

"I know the way quite well," said Andrew Tite. "I used to live here."

"What name, may I ask?" said the boy. He took a piece of chalk from his pocket.

"Tite," said Andrew Tite.

"It's new to me," remarked the boy. And he wrote carefully on the portmanteau with a piece of chalk one word:

TIGHT.

Mr. Andrew Tite crossed the line and opened the gate of the orchard. He had had so much of praise during the past year that he should have been glad to be exempt from it for a time; yet, somehow, he could not help feeling disappointment at the small porter's ignorance of his fame. To come back after a few years of absence to the village where he had spent his early days had occurred to him as a pleasing and an impressive thing to do, and though he had a special difficulty to face in the shape of a visit to the doctor's house—Florence Saxby was a niece of Doctor Parr—even there it would be agreeable to hear their opinions of his books. What he proposed to do was to call after lunch and just stay for half-an-hour or so.

"Poor little Florence!" said Mr. Andrew Tite.

He kicked a stone out of his way and adjusted his tie. It was rather a large flowing tie with a fine suggestion of the Boulevards about it, and when, of late, lady journalists had interviewed the newest literary lion, his tie was always made the subject of a separate paragraph.

"It's hard on her, of course," acknowledged Andrew Tite to himself. "Very hard, and very disappointing. And really up to last year I thought I should have kept up the correspondence and the love of years ago. But, good gracious, such a lot of things have happened since then. For instance, there's Miss Vanbury."

It was surprising to find how very small the small village seemed. In five minutes he was near to the one hotel of the place, and he had always had an impression that it was quite a long distance from the station. He looked up at his old school-house, and made a mental note to call in to-morrow and request for the boys a special half-holiday. This would be a genial, semi-regal, inexpensive action, which would be in every way gratifying.

At the Unicorn, a pleasant scent of lunch. A bustle and hurrying to and fro of white-aproned maids. A look of gay expectancy on the face of Mrs. Hostess, mingled with some nervousness.

"This way, sir," said Mrs. Hostess, bustling out of her room into the dim entrance. "We had your wire and the room is ready, and we sent word to Jim Turley, and he's going to call later on, and he says the links are in perfect condition, and there's no reason, Sir Henry, why you shouldn't begin to-morrow, and Jim Turley has got a cousin who can——"

"I beg your pardon," said Andrew crossly. "Pray don't talk so fast, and pray tell me what in the world you are talking about. I'm not Sir Henry Anybody."

"I'm afraid I am," said a big voice behind him. "Hullo, Tite, is that you? What the dickens are you doing here? What has induced you to——"

"I was born here," said Andrew. He dropped his pince-nez and took limply the hand which the breezy youth offered.

"Well, that's some excuse, certainly. Even a novelist, I suppose, must be born somewhere."

"Perhaps you will allow me, Rowlands, to ask what is your reason for coming to a place like this. It isn't Tooting Common, and it isn't Chingford."

"Wish to goodness it were. The links here are not good, but I'm down here partly for a bit of quiet practice, and partly for—well, that's about all. It does one good to have a change."

"What I want just now," said Andrew, "is not so much change as lunch."

"I'll see to that, sir," said Mrs. Hostess, interposing. "At the same table?"

"At the same table," said Rowlands. "Tite, you will be my guest for this feed?"

Andrew Tite fixed his pince-nez carefully on the bridge of his nose, and surveyed the impulsive youth before him. They happened to be members of the same club in town, where they knew just enough of each other to quarrel on political questions. Rowlands was a man so accustomed to score at golf that he kept up the method in other games, and this brought him into conflict with other masterful players.

"Be my guest at lunch?" repeated Rowlands.

"You're very good," said Andrew Tite. "I will."

"In a quarter of an hour, sir," said Mrs. Hostess anxiously, "and not a moment later."

Digitized by Google

"I'll see that he is punctual," said young Sir Henry Rowlands.

They strolled down the village together, passing en route the doctor's house. It stood well back from the road, and Andrew Tite, trying to look through the thick, short line of trees that protected it, stopped a lecture that he was making on the subject of agricultural stupidity. The thought of the old evenings came swiftly back to him, evenings when he used to stand near the gate and a note written in a schoolgirl hand used to be passed through the branches with much elaboration of wholly unnecessary secrecy, to be answered that night by a sealed communication delivered with similar mystery.

"I think we'll turn," he said.

Rowlands went up to the gate and peered through curiously.

"Come away, Rowlands," said Andrew; "people don't care for that sort of thing here."

"Thought I saw a girl," remarked Rowlands. "Such things do grow in the country, I believe."

"Pray be careful," begged Andrew. "I know the people there."

"Really?"

"Yes."

"Well, I'm hanged," said Rowlands, astonished.

At the Unicorn, such a lunch as the Unicorn had never before dreamt of. Mrs. Hostess, caring nothing at all for literary lions, had found herself spurred to most excellent performance by the presence of a baronet. There was no menu, but Mrs. Hostess obligingly came in at the beginning of the lunch, and mentioned in the manner of a dioramic lecturer, with a respect that was concentrated exclusively on Rowlands, a few of the important features.

"Fried soles," said Mrs. Hostess. "Fried soles, Sir Henry; lamb and mint sauce, game pie, Sir Henry; roast fowl, blue mange, Sir Henry, and cheese and salad. And" —this is a kind of bon voyage wish—"I hope it'll be to your liking, Sir Henry; and of course you, sir, as well."

Lunch, after several times threatening to come to an end, and not coming to an end, did come to an end, and the two men sat out in the shade at the entrance of the Unicorn, and lighted their cigars. The smoke went up to the nostrils of the rampant, white Unicorn over the doorway, and gave to that rare animal an increased appearance of being about to sneeze. Mrs. Hostess, red with encouraging nimble-footed white-aproned maids, went back to her room, and fanned herself with an Advertiser.

"And, as I say," concluded Andrew Tite, "there is something in the dull monotony of country life which seems to destroy, for those who live in it, all sense of humour."

"I see your argument," remarked Rowlands. "I daresay there's something in it."

"There's a great deal," said Andrew. "You don't know anybody here, I suppose, Rowlands?"

Rowlands blew a gentle puff of smoke at an insect on a leaf of the creeper at the doorway, and intoxicated it into somnolence before he replied.

"Nobody to speak of," he answered. "Of course you know everybody?"

"Well, no. A good many folk have died since I left."

"Because you left, perhaps."

Andrew Tite did not smile. It is never wise to encourage badinage directed against oneself.

"Who is the doctor?" asked Rowlands casually.

"Dr. Parr," said Andrew. "He has a niece who keeps house for him. That house you were peering at just now in the village. Rather decent sort of girl, too. Some pretensions to good looks."

"That's gratifying," said Rowlands, with some interest, "for all parties. And is Miss Saxby old?"

"How did you know her name was Saxby?" asked Andrew quickly.

"My dear fellow, didn't you say so?"

"She's young," said Andrew. "Still young."

"So much the better!"

It was a little irritating to Andrew, despite the fact that he had relinquished all claim to be considered Florence Saxby's fiancé for quite a year, to find young Rowlands showing this interest in her. But Rowlands' next remark put him again at his ease.

"I didn't tell you, perhaps, before lunch, Tite, did I? I'm going to be married next month."

"I'm glad to hear it," said Andrew, with much heartiness. "Very glad to hear it. And look here, Rowlands. I'm going to call on this Miss Saxby this afternoon. If you like, I'll take you along and introduce you."

It had suddenly occurred to him that the meeting would be less awkward if a stranger were present.

"I shall be very glad," said Rowlands. "I'm ready now, if you are."

"There's no great hurry."

"Let's go now and get it over."

So they went at once.

Dr. Parr was out. "Out," said the neat maid, "and wouldn't be back perhaps for hours upon hours. Miss Saxby? Oh, yes, she was in." The neat maid beamed in the direction of young Rowlands, who stood discreetly at the back of Andrew Tite. Would they kindly step this way?

"I hope this is not an inconvenient time to call, Florence?" said Andrew, as a slim, tall girl entered. "The fact is——"

"I'm very pleased to see an old friend at any time, Andrew."

"This is Sir Henry Rowlands. Rowlands, this is Miss Saxby. I found Rowlands at the Unicorn and I ventured to bring him along."

Rowlands said gravely tht he was very glad, and Miss Saxby, in her merry way, almost laughed with pleasure as she turned to him. It was a relief to the literary lion to find that at any rate she was in no maudlin mood.

"Are you here for long, Sir Henry?" she asked, smilingly.

"I'm here for practice. I want to score if I can this year in more ways than one."

"I hope you will succeed."

"I'm afraid Rowlands does not make himself plain," interposed Andrew.

"No one can say that I'm pretty," said Rowlands.

"What Rowlands means is," explained Andrew carefully, "that he is here practising golf, and he also intends to be married shortly."

"Next month," corroborated Rowlands.

"So soon as that?" said Florence Saxby, opening her eyes widely.

"It seems to me a long time to wait," said Rowlands.

"And you are fond of cricket, Sir Henry?"

"No, no," corrected Andrew, "not cricket. Golf."

"Of course. How stupid of me. Golf, I mean."

"I am fond of it," said Rowlands, "but just now it has the second place in my affections. The first is——"

"Andrew," exclaimed Miss Saxby, hastily, "I am forgetting you. But that only serves you right, because you had distinctly forgotten us. If it hadn't been for your books which we have found in Mudie's box and the little paragraphs about you in the papers——"

"Mr. Andrew Tite is not a Prussian," murmured Rowlands.

"Why, I am afraid we should have been disturbed about you."

"It has been rather a busy time," said Andrew Tite, importantly. "We literary men have few opportunities for cultivating the—what shall I say?"

"The garden?" suggested Rowlands.

"No, no, no. Nothing like that. For cultivating the society of our old friends I mean."

"I understand," said Miss Saxby.

"The world," went on Mr. Andrew Tite, with the frown of conscious notoriety, "the world expects a good deal from those whom it decides to honour. Directly your name gets to be known you are invited here and invited there; women journalists call and interview you——"

"Interesting," remarked Rowlands.

"Publishers pester you, editors worry you, and you don't know, I assure you, what it is to have in your own rooms a quiet chop from one month's end to the other."

Digitized by Google

"A quiet chop," remarked Rowlands, "is really a very pleasant companion. What I can never stand is the noisy, rollicking, talkative chop that——"

"Go on, Andrew," said Miss Saxby, interrupting Rowlands.

"I can assure you," said Mr. Tite, "that over and over again I have longed, absolutely longed, for the old quiet life in this little country village, where life goes so leisurely. The sturm and drang of London life——"

"A foreign expression, Miss Saxby," explained the other.

"Begins to tell after a while even on the strongest brain. It is like the continual clank clank of the machinery on an Atlantic liner, that never stops, night or day, from port to port. One feels at certain times that one is becoming used to it, but as a matter of fact, one never becomes used to it. Its determined, relentless, insistent clank; clank becomes a part of your existence it is true but it is always the ogre of your life, the demon that by his presence makes you old, worn and fatigued before your time."

"I always enjoy lectures," remarked Rowlands, when Andrew paused, "but I think they ought to be accompanied by pictures on a white screen, and a piano."

"So that you have had no time to write," said Miss Saxby, "anything but books?"

"Absolutely no time."

"At any rate we have not forgotten you. We have often talked about you whenever we have seen your name in the papers."

"I am glad," said Andrew, "to think that my memory has been preserved by some means."

"Do you really mean that?" she said brightly.

The challenge seemed to leave no way out.

"I mean," he said, softly, "a great deal more than that."

She smoothed the white gown she was wearing gently over her knee, and for a moment she was thoughtful.

"You can form no idea, though, Miss—Miss——" began Rowlands.

"My name is Saxby, Sir Henry."

"Miss Saxby. You can form no idea what a very important man Mr. Tite is in town. I know one or two men at the club who swear by him."

"I think I can guess. I know that when I was in town last year he was so much engaged that we saw very little of him."

"By-the-bye, Tite, are you really engaged? There was a rumour to that effect. The club fellows told me."

He picked some mignonette, and she placed it, with her old smile, in her blouse.

"If a public man," said Andrew, with some acerbity, "were to contradict all the incorrect reports that are sent round about him he would bring himself to an early end by overwork. I always argue that the private life of a public man has nothing to do with anybody but himself. Upon my word, though, nowadays that seems to be impossible."

"Shows how careful you chaps ought to be," said Rowlands. "Of course the report must be very annoying too, to Miss Vanbury."

"Was that the lady——" began Florence Saxby.

"I particularly want you, Florence," interposed Andrew hastily, "to show me, the garden round your lawn. I want to freshen my recollection of it. Rowlands, you can stay here if you like. I believe you are no lover of flowers."

"I think I would like, if Miss Saxby will excuse me."

"You will find the Times there, Sir Henry. I shall not keep you long."

"I hope you will," he whispered.

Miss Saxby handed the paper to Rowlands, and Rowlands, instead of taking the paper, touched her hand, and the paper dropped to the floor. Andrew picked it up.

"You are a clumsy fellow," he said.

Really it was very soothing and consoling and altogether agreeable, to be once more strolling round the small, square clean-shaven lawn with the slim girl in white at his side. He picked some mignonette, and she placed it, with her old smile, in her blouse.

Digitized by Google

"Do you remember when I last did that?" he asked.

"I don't think I am likely to forget. There are so few romances in one's life that it is quite easy to remember every page."

"What do you think of Rowlands?"

"He seems a straightforward sort of young man," she said, judicially, "as far as I can judge."

"He's not quite my sort," said Andrew, "but he's got a certain manner with him that enables him to get on with people. Only, of course," he laughed, "no one would claim that he was a man of intellect."

They stopped and looked through the open window into the room. Rowlands had relinquished the Times, and had taken up an illustrated ladies' journal, and was studying, with much interest, portraits of the current bridegrooms.

"I suppose it is natural that you should say that, Andrew, of almost anybody. Do you still live in chambers?"

"Yes, I shall live there until I cease to be a bachelor."

She looked up. He put his arm under hers and she turned to the window nervously.

"Florence, dear, I'm sorry that I behaved rather meanly to you. I ought not to have dropped you without a word of explanation. If you think you can forgive me, give me back one sprig of mignonette."

She took a sprig from her blouse without any hesitation.

"And we are good friends again?" he asked anxiously.

"Excellent friends, I hope," she said.

"I can't tell you how happy that reply makes me. I came down here to-day with the full intention of only just calling and seeing you, and now——"

Andrew was on the point of stating the truth. He stopped himself just in time.

"I say," called Rowlands from the open window, "I say. Will someone kindly tell me how it is all bridegrooms frown?"

"It is done," explained Miss Saxby, "to hide their natural gratification. I wish you would touch that gong, Sir Henry. The maid shall bring tea."

If Florence Saxby had been delightful in the garden, some superlative word was required to describe her as she presided at the tiny tea-table. The figure of Miss Vanbury (a gaunt lady of much cleverness—who wore convex glasses) forced itself upon Andrew's mind. He could see quite clearly now the mistake he had made.

"Wonder whether it's too late to repair the blunder," murmured Andrew. And he took a second cup of tea.

"I think I liked your last novel best," remarked Florence Saxby. "I fancy it shows greater insight into actual things; and there is a very pleasant strain of humour. Don't you think so, Sir Henry?"

"I can't say," confessed Rowlands, "that I've read any of them very carefully. But I daresay it is as you say, Miss Saxby. Tite is a rare man for humour. He argues that the leading characteristic of the bucolic mind is its want of that particular quality. I tell him that he is rather sweeping in his charge."

"I suppose women share that trait," said the young lady.

"It is easy to see the failings of other people," remarked Andrew with an impartial air. "I daresay as a matter of fact we all have our weaknesses. Are you keeping up your painting, Florence?"

"As well as I can. Would you care to see some of my work? Sir Henry, will you come too?"

"I don't know much about art," said Rowlands.

"Then you will be able to play critic. This way."

With Rowlands looking closely at a small portrait at one end of the small studio, Andrew found a second opportunity of speaking words of confidence. Rowlands really seemed a youth with a commendable amount of tact. When he noticed that the two were in earnest conversation near the large easel he increased his attention to the portrait.

"Florence!"

"Andrew!"

"I suppose it is quite understood that our half-engagement is at an end?"

"Oh, quite at an end."

"And there is no sort of bond between us now?"

"Excepting that of friendship, Andrew."

"There is no reason why we should not be capital friends."

"Capital friends," she agreed, smiling.

"What a good, sensible girl you are, Florence." Andrew sighed and touched lightly a fold of her white sleeve. "Do you know I have often thought of the old days, the days just after I left school, when I used to send stuff to London editors—and such stuff, too—and you and I used to wait at the post-office for the big envelopes that always came back? You were in shortish dresses then."

"I'm rather glad, I think," she said brightly, "to find that you still remember those days. I shall never forget them."

"However successful a man may become," said Andrew Tite oracularly, "he always remembers his first sweetheart."

"Especially if he marries her," suggested Florence.

"That," said Mr. Tite, "that does not affect the matter. Is this crayon work yours? It seems very fair."

The scent from the trees at the back of the house came lazily through the open window and contested in a slow, dogged way with the smell of the paint tubes. Rowlands, with his back to the two, put down the portrait and looked about for another.

"Just one more word, Florence. You were always the best of girls, and I am so glad we have not quarrelled."

"I don't think I could have done so, Andrew."

"Shall we shake hands?"

"With all the pleasure possible."

It was a small hand with a rather good ring on one of the fingers. It was a soft, white hand, too, and it lay in Andrew's with such a gentle pressure that for one moment the canvases danced before his eyes an intricate gavotte. But this was no excuse for the immediate action of Andrew Tite. In view of the existing circumstances—existing circumstances including Miss Vanbury—nothing, I am bound to say, could excuse Andrew seizing the small white hand, pressing it hurriedly to his lips, and murmuring hastily two words:

"Dearest love!"

Rowlands was really very sorry that he had dropped the canvas. He did hope that no harm was done. Miss Saxby assured him, after careful inspection, that no harm whatever had been done.

"I think we had better go, Rowlands," said Andrew Tite, with a flushed face.

"I'm ready."

"And perhaps you will let us call to-morrow, Florence?"

"I hope you will. And you too, Sir Henry."

"You're very kind, Miss Saxby. I hope we shall see each other again."

"You must try to call, Sir Henry, when my uncle is in."

"Even if he were not in——" began Rowlands.

"Now, come along, Rowlands. Good-bye, dear. Good-bye."

Andrew Tite ran back to the gate after the two had proceeded a few steps.

"May I send you a note this evening?" he asked hurriedly.

"You are one of my favourite writers," said Florence Saxby demurely.

Andrew Tite went up to his room and Rowlands, being called for by the excellent Turley, went for an hour's practice. Andrew's writing work consisted of one communication, and he did not commence that until he had walked about the room and considered a great deal. The letter began:

"DEAR MISS VANBURY,—I want to send you a few words on rather a serious matter. When you promised a few weeks since to be my wife, I——"

There were two sheets of closely-written arguments. At the end was this:

"Pray, therefore, consider that we are released from our engagement to each other. You are a woman of considerable sense, and you will, I am sure, agree that all this is for the best.

Digitized by Google

"My regards to your mother if she has returned from Nice. If I do not call on my return to town you will know that it is because pressure of work prevents me. With sincere regards, believe me, faithfully yours,

"ANDREW TITE."

When he had folded this, he placed it in an envelope, addressed the envelope to—

"The Hon. Miss Vanbury,
"117 Eaton Terrace, London, S.W.,"

and dispatched it by the postman who called at the moment for letters to take by tricycle to a post-office five miles distant, Andrew Tite felt that Volume III. of his life only remained to be penned. That evening he would write to Florence Saxby and renew his engagement with her, and——

Enter Rowlands. Rowlands, back from the links in the best of spirits, Rowlands, fanning himself with his cap, lounges on two chairs at the entrance and hails the literary man, descending the staircase in a loud, boyish way:

"Hullo, there!"

"Ah, Rowlands. Back from play?"

"Play, sir? It's hard work. Real hard work. That's what it is."

"I am rather anxious, Rowlands, to have your opinion. Can you spare a few minutes?"

"Hours."

"It won't take long. I want to know what you think of Miss Saxby."

"Miss Saxby!" said Rowlands wonderingly.

"You surely haven't forgotten the lady to whom I introduced you this afternoon?"

"Oh, that young person. You don't care for her, do you?"

"I'm surprised," said Andrew. "I should have thought she was just the kind to attract you. To me she seems the most delightful of women folk."

"Perhaps your experience has been limited, Tite."

"I don't know so much about that," answers Andrew Tite knowingly. "I know what they are pretty well. I was just wondering what most girls would say if they were proposed to by a man of position in the world."

"So far as I can judge," said Rowlands, "I should imagine that most girls would say 'Yes'."

Andrew smiled.

"I don't think there's much doubt about that, Rowlands. It must be a great satisfaction for a girl to make a really good marriage. And, after all, Florence Saxby is a clever girl. Quite above the ordinary."

"I think so."

"Of course," goes on Andrew argumentatively, "all women have certain drawbacks. As I was pointing out this morning, in the case of the average provincial there is with them all that lack of a sense of humour which is so much to be deplored."

"But, Tite, I fancy there are exceptions. For instance, my fiancée."

"The name of the lady who is to be my dear wife," said Sir Henry, "is Florence Saxby."

"Oh, yes. Your fiancée. You are going to get married, too."

"Going to have a try."

"And what is her name? Who is the lady, Rowlands? Eh?"

Andrew Tite hums a snatch of a popular love song in order to let Rowlands see that he is not going to stand aghast, no matter how high in the peerage the lady in question may be.

"The night has a thousand joys,
The stars, the moon,
And I my love——"

"The name of the lady who is going to be my dear wife," mentions Rowlands deliberately, "and to whom I have been engaged for three months, is Miss Florence Saxby."

* * * * *

Mr. Andrew Tite caught the 5.50 p.m. back to town. The infant porter recognised him and his bag, and took charge of both with an air of extreme friendliness. The infant porter, after he had booked three passengers, and had rung a big brass bell, shouldered the bag, and as he stood on the platform by the side of Andrew Tite, waiting for the up-train, essayed to while away the time by amicable talk.

"'Ad enough of it, sir?"

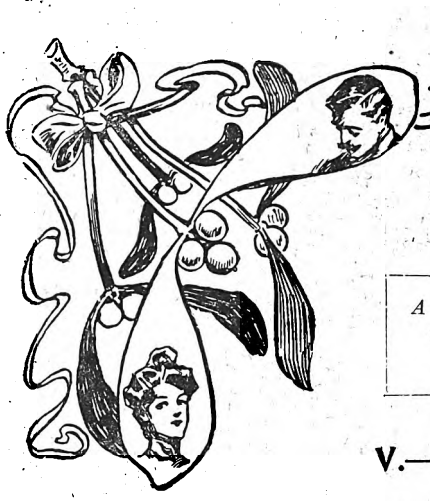
Mr. Tite did not answer; being absorbed in his own thoughts.

"I say, sir." The infant porter tapped him on the arm with the familiarity of a youthful official and nodded towards the village. "I say. 'Ave y'ad enough of it?"

"I have had, my boy," said Andrew Tite gloomily, "just a little too much of it, thank you."

W. Pett Ridge.

Digitized by Google



Unsolved Love Problems.

A Prize of One Guinea is offered to the reader who sends in the most Satisfactory Solution to the Problem. Replies should not exceed one hundred words. See "Your Editor Chats."

V.—THE DUTY OF ROGER FORBES.

It was with a stern look on his handsome face that the young barrister, Roger Forbes, strode up the drive to Mansfield House.

An urgent telegram from his mother had brought him down from town. He knew only too well of late years what the trouble was likely to be, and he braced himself for feeble excuses from his father, and bitter words from his mother.

"Well, mother," he exclaimed, as she came slowly across the handsome drawing-room to meet him, "what is it this time?"

"The end," she replied. Mrs. Forbes had been a very handsome woman, but the havoc of mental and bodily suffering had long swept away all traces of beauty, and the hard expression of her face repelled all idea of love.

"What do you mean?" he asked with alarm in his voice.

"Your father, unable to meet his liabilities, has gone off to America or elsewhere, and like a true man and a gentleman, has left us to face what he could not," she said bitterly.

Roger, trained in his mother's school, showed no emotion at this announcement; he only asked:

"Is it all gone? Yours and Ellen's too?"

"All," she replied. "Oh, read his letter, and you will see his excuses, 'a sure thing, absolutely certain to succeed, and then he would get it all back and more'—only it didn't. Excuses, yes, plenty of excuses."

Roger took the letter and reading it in silence, handed it back to his mother, who, for once, let her stern self-control be broken down.

"Words—words," she cried fiercely, striking the letter on her open palm with her clenched fist, "all words!"

"Mother," said Roger, touching her gently with his hand, "you have always been just, can you not now be merciful also? Do not be too hard in your judgment of him."

She shook off his hand, she had never been a woman who cared for caresses, and she said in a hard, level voice:

"There is a man in possession now, and everything will have to be sold up by next week."

Roger let a groan escape him as he cried: "Poor Ellen!"

Poor Ellen, indeed! His invalid sister, who, in constant pain, only seemed able to live when surrounded by every comfort that money could buy, how would she bear to be uprooted from the corner where she had spent her life and go to a strange place to live with straitened means?

His mother, he knew, felt the shame the most. Deprivations she could bear and make no complaint, but to be unable to pay all they owed in full, he knew would break her heart.

"Well," he said, after a pause. "What do you propose as the best thing to be done?"

"I have thought it out last night," she replied. "How much have you saved?"

"£500," he replied, with a pang, as he remembered how joyfully he had put by each pound for his approaching marriage.

"Well, I suppose, to save your mother and sister from going to the workhouse, you will give half what you had intended to spend on that foolish child, Daisy Mitcham's comfort, to save the necessary furniture from this wreck, to furnish some rooms for us to live in. Then, I suppose, Ellen must 'take in' plain needle-work, and I must give music-lessons or whatever I can get employment in, to pay for our daily bread."

Roger was too much shocked at this picture, to object to the words in which she clothed it, and indeed he had long grown accustomed to her constant gibes at his fiancée and his engagement, for he knew only too well by now that she considered the girl he had chosen to be beneath him, and that she had besides taken a personal dislike to her own since she had seen her shudder at a toad, and heard her confess to being afraid of cows.

The woman, who being always ignored and unconsidered by her husband, had revenged herself by exacting implicit obedience from her children; and that the son of whom she was in her heart so proud, should have set her will at defiance in this important matter, and turned himself resolutely from the bride she had chosen for him, would have caused her to dislike anyone he might choose, and of all the world of women there were no two more likely to misunderstand one another than the girl who was to be his bride and his mother. This had naturally caused an estrangement between mother and son, but knowing what she had to bear, Roger had outwardly shown little sign of what he felt, and had always been willing to come to her assistance as much as he could. Now he said with genuine dismay:

"Oh, mother, you can't. and Ellen can't. Why, some days she is too bad to move a finger."

His mother nodded grimly, with some slight softening of her hard features at the thought of her child's sufferings, but she only quoted: "Needs must when the devil drives."

"Where did you think of living?" he asked thoughtfully.

"I have thought of that too," she replied. "There will be no money to spare for invalid carriages and such luxuries, and it will be too painful and dangerous for Ellen to travel far—we must take some rooms in the village."

"Oh!" he burst out, and then, with a compassionate look at his mother, "However will you bear it?"

"As I have borne other troubles, without a fuss, I hope. I do not think my pride has been indulged much in my married life."

Roger, who knew that the same fall that had stretched his sister on a bed of pain for life, had also given his mother a serious internal disorder, could no longer restrain himself, and he burst forth:

"I cannot allow it. I will spend every penny I have to make you comfortable, and you must both come and live with me, and I will work for all."

Digitized by Google

His mother's face almost kindled into a smile, and she half-put out her hand, and then drew it back, saying:

"Think what that will mean before you decide. You could not keep us and a wife as well; your marriage would have to be indefinitely postponed."

Roger sank into a chair, and buried his face in his hands.

"I will say nothing," she continued in a calm, dispassionate voice, "it is entirely for you to decide. A part of your savings to make a shelter for your sister and myself, is all I ask. For the rest, I believe that between us we could make enough to live on. So it must be only of your own free will that your marriage be put off," and she left the room.

Poor Roger! on the one hand his mother and his helpless sister, and on the other, his dear little sweetheart Daisy, and the marriage that was to have taken place in three months.

The next day Roger sat in his chambers endeavouring to forget his troubles in the intricacies of one of the all too few briefs that came his way, when a gentle knock announced a visitor. Looking up, a glad light came into his eyes at the sight of the charming vision before him.

Daisy Mitcham, small, plump, dark, and lovable, with a broad, white forehead, wavy brown hair, exquisitely marked eyebrows, and most distracting dimples, stood smiling before him. "Why, Daisy, I was just going to write to you," he exclaimed, taking her into his eager arms.

"Never mind now," she cried, freeing herself at last and instinctively putting up her hands to straighten her hat. "Here I am in the flesh, and, moreover, I have come to be comforted."

"What! Are you in trouble too?" he cried in dismay.

"Yes, I am, but if you look so terribly downcast, I shall go right away and say nothing at all."

Roger smiled at her tenderly, and she continued:

"I may as well say it right out at once and have done with it. I have been turned out of the Fitzwilliams' at a moment's notice."

"You have? And why?" he cried, with ready indignation.

"Well—oh—well—you mustn't be angry—but—well—George Fitzwilliam is home just now from Woolwich, and he—he—tried to kiss me."

"The dickens he did, the young beast!" cried Roger, striding about the room.

"Now," said she, going to him and putting her arms round him, "don't be so angry, I knew it was coming, and—and—I didn't tell him."

"Yes, but my darling, this is dreadful, why did you not tell me before? And so you gave notice and left at once?"

"No, no," she said, a little sad look coming into her eyes. "We who have to earn our living cannot afford to resent insults. Mrs. Fitzwilliam saw him, and she was very rude to me and told me to go at once—and so here I am." And she ended with a little sob and her head on his shoulder.

With a furious epithet hurled at the whole family of Fitzwilliams, Roger strove to comfort the girl with caresses and promises of protection.

At last a sudden thought came to him, and he said:

"Has this ever happened before, in any family you have been in?"

Hiding her head still more, she murmured: "Yes."

"When? And how often?" he asked, trying to speak calmly.

"Pretty often," she said, sobbing. "It's generally the elder brothers, but its worse when its the—the—the—fathers."

There was a silence, and Daisy, frightened, lifted up her head, only to read such trouble in the eyes she loved, that she dried her pretty brown eyes and turned consoler, but as the thought of her friendless condition came to her again she could not help saying—

"If only I had some relation I could go to till we are married—if only your mother did not so dislike and despise me, and if I were not so afraid of her."

Poor Roger, here was his difficulty increased tenfold.

Should he allow his mother and sister to go into a miserable drudging poverty, or should he send this fair girl out again to earn her living amongst strangers, and be exposed to insult on all sides?

L. Hughes.

Your Editor Chats.

WELL, now you have our Christmas Number in your hands, and I trust that you are wholly satisfied with it. But I am in no trepidation as to that point, for I fancy that the most fastidious person must admit that the matter in this issue is splendid value for the money outlayed in buying it—twopence. For a few seconds glance through it, and see what is the result. There is a splendid new serial starting, hosts of good stories, plenty of pretty illustrations, two interesting competitions, another Unsolved Love Problem, a page of very funny jokes, and a further instalment of that engaging romance, "A Criminal Millionaire." Assuredly, I may say that it is an excellent twopennyworth!

A YEAR ago, in fact, in last year's Christmas number, I started the Love Problems that were so successful. In this number appears the fifth of a new series of Problems which have been even more appreciated by my readers; and, following my custom, I am offering a prize of one guinea to the person who sends in what I consider to be the best solution of the difficulty in which Roger Forbes is placed.

The number of words in your replies must not exceed one hundred, and must be written on one side of the paper only.

The latest day on which I can receive solutions is Monday, the 28th of this month, but replies may come in any time before then. None arriving after then will be considered.

My decision as to the winner will be final. Envelopes should be addressed to "The Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.," and must have "Xmas Love Problem" plainly marked in the top left-hand corner.

IN CONNECTION with the Problem, "The Dilemma of Betty Carteret," I extend my heartiest congratulations to Mrs. Mabel M. Harvey, of 6 Harpers Lane, Guildford Road, Ash, Surrey, for her in every way excellent arguments bearing out her views that Betty Carteret should tell Geoffrey Hilton the state of her sister Kate's love. I have very much pleasure in awarding her the guinea that I offered for what was, in my opinion, the best solution.

I HOPE that you will all enter for the two competitions that are announced on pages 798 and 807.

The Statue Competition affords a splendid opportunity for testing your skill in artistic arrangement, and is of such a nature that it appeals to old and young alike.

I am sure that the Running Riddles Competition will also be one calculated to take your fancy. What more entertaining way to pass one of these long winter evenings could there be than puzzling out suitable answers to the conundrums given. I anticipate that my readers will show great ingenuity in this direction.

You will notice that I am offering as prizes, besides the money awards, cameras and complete camera outfits. These are very handy articles, and the best of results can be obtained from them. Do not miss these opportunities of becoming the fortunate possessor of one of them.

THAT you will all have a happy Christmas and a bright New Year is the last wish of

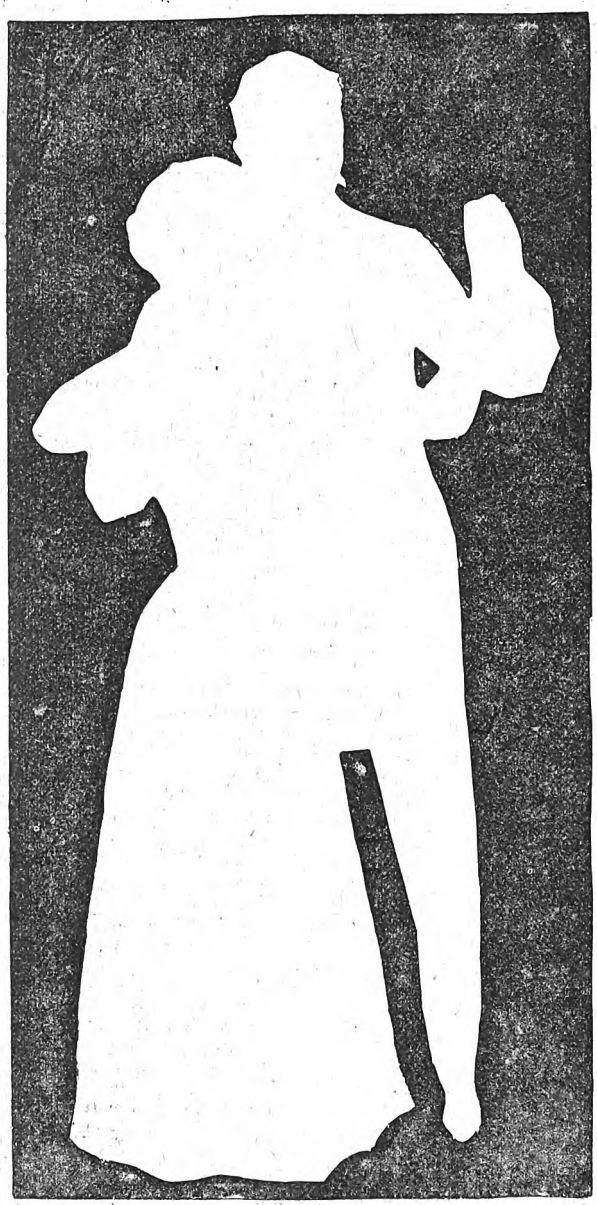
Your Editor.

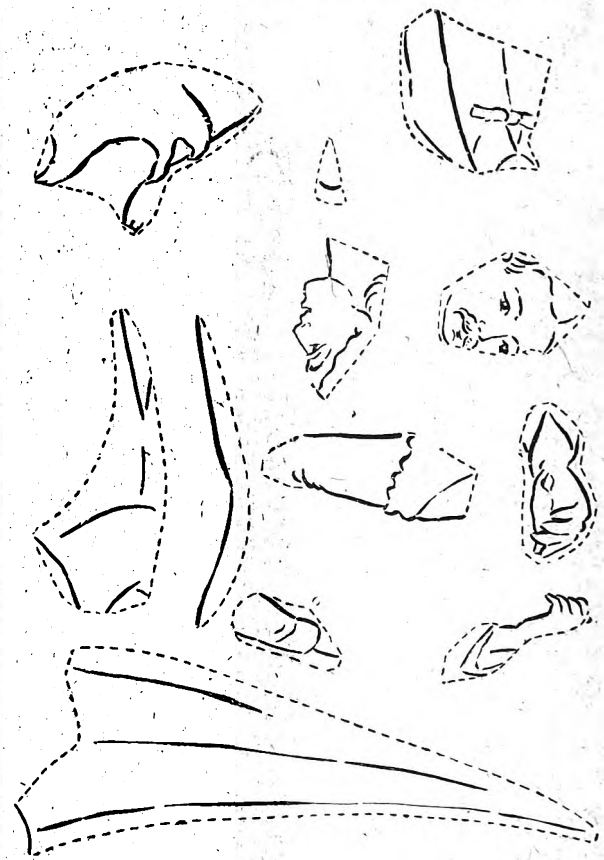
Digitized by Google

Statue Competition.

At the foot of this page will be found particulars of a very simple and entertaining competition. It will afford a very pleasant method of helping to pass away the time of a long winter evening, and readers should try to get all their friends to enter for it.

The prizes will be one of £2, and five splendid hand cameras, with complete photographic outfit.





WHAT TO DO.

Carefully cut out the twelve pieces above. Place them in the white silhouette so as to complete the picture.

To the readers who send in what the Editor considers to be the most correct and neatest pictures the prizes will be awarded.

The Editor's decision will be final, and competitor's entries will be taken as an acknowledgment of this condition. No correspondence will be entered into on the subject.

Readers may make as many attempts as they like.

All attempts must reach this office not later than Thursday, December 31st. None arriving after that date will be considered.

Address your envelopes: "Statue Competition," The Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Name ... .

Address .....

Digitized by Google

The Master of Swan Hall.

How a Gallant Gentleman Won His Christmas Bride.

"Who's that coming?"

"That little villain, Phil Dudley," said Pedro moodily. "Hang the fellow! Is he coming here? Can't he stay at home one day in the week, I'd like to know? He's got the old place, and can't he be content and stay there?"

The door dashed open, and his dark face—a spirited, olive-tinted face, which had gained him the nickname of Don Pedro—softened, the "winter of discontent" vanished, and he nodded a greeting to the charming little gentleman in the black frame of the old doorway—a slim youth, in a grey Norfolk suit; a slender aristocrat, with curled red lips, luminous grey eyes; a bold, delicate nose, and a close crop of waving hair, his head stately poised, and a wicked dimple in one rose-and-lily cheek.

"Hallo!" said Pedro, wiping his gun-stock lovingly with his handkerchief while he eyed his visitor.

"Hallo!" responded Mr. Dudley, airily. "Who's your chum, old man? Introduce a fellow, can't you?"

"You've heard of him, Phil," said Pedro, laughing. "It's Tom Burgoyne, lawyer and—ahem!—lover. Madge's fate, you know. Hallo! What's the matter with you? Where's your backbone gone?"

Phil gathered himself up from the door-post, and put out a slim hand to the brown-bearded, brown-eyed young man, with the pleasant smile, who rose from the edge of the table to greet him.

His face was white, and the hand the lawyer clasped icy and trembling.

"I have heard of you from Madge," he almost gasped. "I am delighted to see you, Mr. Burgoyne."

"Won't you stay and have a cigar, Phil?" asked Pedro.

"No; I—I—— Where's Madge, Pedro? I came over to see her."

"Well, you'll find her in the kitchen, preparing a sacrifice of baked meats in honour of Tom here," said Pedro kindly. "She'll be awfully glad to see you, I dare say."

"I dare say," said Mr. Dudley, with an attempt at airy nonchalance under the observant legal eyes smiling at him. "Madge generally is glad to see a fellow. Well, I'm off."

"How did you come over?"

"I came on my bike," said Mr. Dudley coolly. "The governor goes frantic when he sees me perched on it, so I tried how close to the edge of the cliffs I could keep it all the way from the Hall here. He could see me from his window, and I hope he liked it, that's all. Good-bye, gentlemen."

"It's 'Good-bye' to some purpose," said Pedro, as he vanished, leaving an odour of violets behind him. "He half lives here. Don't set up the Othello business, Tom, but he is up to his pink ears in love with Madge—poor little cub!"

Burgoyne laughed—a mellow laugh, with a ring of truth in its manly music.

"And Madge?"

"Madge is very fond of him," said Pedro, staring down his beloved gun-barrel, "and so am I. His governor is a polished old beast, a bloodless tyrant, with etiquette for a heart, and Phil's poor little neck is under his elegant foot. He's a small dare-devil is Phil, but I've seen him lie a long hour with his head rolled up in Madge's flounces and frills, crying like a baby, after some shindy with old Dudley. He's very reticent, though, about domestic affairs. I tell you, your sudden appearance has cut him up. Don't notice his ways, old fellow; he's only a boy—nineteen next Christmas."

"He may weep on Madge's muslins as long as he likes," said the lawyer, laughing. "I'm not given to jealousy. And so you don't like his father? Well, that's natural under the circumstances."

Pedro groaned, and then laughed.

"Yes, you see poor old Cousin Tom Dudley rather sold me. He had disowned his only child, Phil's governor, years ago for very excellent reasons, and he adopted and educated Madge and me as his co-heirs. That was lovely; but when he died a year ago, his will left all his great wealth to us, with this proviso—that if his son, Courtney Dudley, had a living son, that son was to be heir. Well, Courtney Dudley was advertised for and turned up nine months ago from somewhere in Spain, with a son, Phil, and Madge and I took thankful possession of our legal crumbs—this old cottage and twenty thousand pounds divided between us. Courtney Dudley reigns at Swan Hall until Phil's majority. Come, old chap, if we're to have a shot at anything, suppose we start?"

Digitized by Google

"Pedro bears his disappointment with lots of pluck," thought Burgoyne. "And so young Dudley is in love with my royal Madge—it looks rather that way, I must admit."

"His royal Madge" was dusting the dainty little drawing-room, assisted by Mr. Phil Dudley, who was very pale about the lips, and very large and dark and pathetic as to the grey eyes, and while Pedro went to call the dogs, Burgoyne stood looking at them curiously from the narrow hall.

"Royal Madge" was certainly a lovely girl, very like Pedro, dark, glowing, magnetic, with two kindly brown suns under her sweet broad brows, and a lithe, slim, soft, strong figure, pliable as a willow, and at present draped in soft, flowing, woollen drapery of a deep red.

"Phil," said the richest and most sympathetic of voices, "if you stand so close to my elbow, I'll end by smashing this vase and my heart with it. It's Tom's last present, you know."

Burgoyne's trained, observant eyes flashed, for, with an almost imperceptible gesture, the boy brushed against the lifted arm wielding the feather duster, and, with a crash, the gorgeous bit of china lay on the carpet in fifty fragments, and Burgoyne turned away without having been observed, his lips set, the thin upper one curled a little, lawyer-like.

* * * * *

The next day a groom brought an invitation to dinner from Swan Hall to the cottage.

These civilities were frequently exchanged, for Courtney Dudley found his brilliant, accomplished, young cousins very entertaining from many points of view, and for Phil's sake they were cordial to his father.

"Mr. Burgoyne, your friend, of whom I have heard so often," was included courteously in the informal invitation, and the crisp, golden September sunset, with its grand, patient moon waiting whitely to shine on her throne, and hints of stars in the sky, found them walking up the solemn avenue to the fine old stone house, with angels' heads on its spouts, oriel windows for the sunrise, bay windows for the sunset, mellow stained-glass windows for the cold north, and conservatory roofs glittering on the south—phalanxes of really ancient trees, like groups of kings in coronation robes of September glory, and what gave the place its name—a long, narrow artificial lake white with swans, lying close under the drawing-room windows.

"Prepare for a very dandified lord of Swan Hall," said Pedro to Burgoyne. "Phil looks splendid in evening dress. Ask Madge!"

"Phil is unlike other young men," said Madge, with a rather troubled look, "and if Tom watches him he will see what I mean. Poor Phil!"

"Rats in his garret, Tom," said Pedro concisely—"a decided crack in his noddle. I rather imagine that's the true inwardness of his governor not sending him to college."

"Hush, here he is!" said Madge hastily.

He bounded down the six stone steps in a flying leap, landing before Madge, a jewelled hand on each of her pretty shoulders, the last of the solemn sunset on his spirited, beautiful face, and Pedro winked at Tom with open amusement.

A figure stood before them as nearly as could be approached in a knickerbocker suit of pale-blue velvet, with collar and cuffs of white satin, brocaded with delicate pink roses. Lace adorned his bosom, and fell over his slim hands, diamond studs flashed from the lace, and his exceedingly elegant legs were dreams of beauty in pink silk stockings, while diamond buckles sparkled on his arched insteps. He was simply radiant, but a little penitential.

"Am I forgiven about the vase?" he asked, archly. "I did not venture down to-day in dread of a scolding. I say, Madge, kiss and be friends—won't you, dearest and loveliest? I'll be more careful of your china next time."

He darted a swift, piercing look at Burgoyne, who was staring in open astonishment at the picturesque young gentleman on whom Madge was bestowing a comfortable, sisterly kiss of pardon.

"Come in, boys," he said vivaciously, as he gave Madge his arm, "the governor is in the drawing-room. Madge will go and placate him—he's in a temper—and you fellows come to the billiard-room. The new table came to-day, Pedro, and I want you to see it. It's a beauty."

He whisked Madge's fleecy white wrap off in the hall, flung it to the footman, and led her—a lovely figure in shining, beautiful, pink silk—to the drawing-room door and pushed her in gently.

"Here's Madge, governor," he shouted. "Come out of the blues and entertain her. She's awfully stunning this evening."

He came back, whistling until the grand carved oak ceiling rang.

"He doesn't care for a woman unless she's a beauty or a wit," he said. "Now, I'm more catholic—I like them all, eh, Pedro?"

"I don't know, I'm sure," said Pedro, laughing. "Madge is the one woman I love at present. I suppose my time will come, however, monsieur."

"Stave it off," said Mr. Phil Dudley, with solemnity, "as I do. 'Merry and free is a bachelor's revelry' when a fellow can't get Madge, that is—— Beg pardon, Mr. Burgoyne. Don't look so serious; though you are my successful rival, you need fear no poisoned daggers or unwholesome entrées at Swan Hall, I assure you.

"Get out, you little scamp," said Pedro. "What a volley of folly! Don't mind him, Tom."

The moon was shining in at them through a solemn arched window as they crossed a corridor to the billiard-room.

A polished cuirass hung directly in its beams, and, mirror-like, caught Tom's eyes. He half-paused, and then swung square round in time to catch Mr. Phil Dudley, who was swaying like a slender tree, his face white as the moon outside.

He placed him on the cushioned window-sill.

"Get wine—water—anything! He has fainted," he said quickly, and Pedro rushed away like a whirlwind.

Phil's eyes opened. He sighed heavily, muttered something to himself in Spanish, and sprang to his feet with a sharp cry, changing to a laugh as he met Burgoyne's eyes. The lawyer stood looking at him in the moonlight with strange intentness.

"I'm subject to these attacks," said Phil, pluckily keeping on his feet. "A dickens of a bore, isn't it, for a fellow as fond of adventure by flood and field as I am? Come, let's go back to Madge; we can see the table afterwards, and christen it with champagne—the dad has got a brand fit for the gods. Where's Pedro? Ran for smelling-salts, I suppose. Hallo! Give me your arm, Burgoyne; I'm shaky yet."

The lawyer silently passed his arm round the lad, and Phil leant against the strong frame quietly for a moment, sighing heavily, evidently sick and faint almost to death. At Pedro's step, ringing along the corridor, he released himself and looked admiringly at Tom.

"I wish I had your stamina, old fellow," he said, sighing; "but any I had is vanishing into thin air. I'm not half the fellow I was six months ago. I'm getting done up. The dad's cantankerous, and there isn't a girl except Madge to flirt with in the neighbourhood. When I'm dead put 'Died of the blues' on my funereal urn. See here, you're not going to take Madge away directly, are you?"

"Next month—next week—if I can induce her to come then," said the lawyer, briefly and coldly.

Phil lifted his rival's sinewy hand, and pressed his lips on it.

"You and she will be very happy," he whispered, tremulously. "In the wide world there is not another like Madge."

Digitized by Google

"Thank you," said the lawyer, not unkindly. "Shall we go to the drawing-room? Here's Pedro."

In the drawing-room Mr. Dudley welcomed them with admirable polish—a lean, elderly man, with a hooked chin and quiet eyes, like grey stones under drooping lids—whom Phil treated with an odd mixture of impertinence and terror.

The evening passed brilliantly, though more than once Madge wondered what made Burgoyne so very silent.

Phil was in wild spirits, and Pedro's brow was clouded as the three walked back to the cottage in the misty, midnight moonlight.

"I'm afraid Phil is ill in mind and body," he said sadly. "There's a screw loose about the boy. He's as cracked as rare old china. No one can fail to see it."

"I fail to see it," said the lawyer, rather curtly.

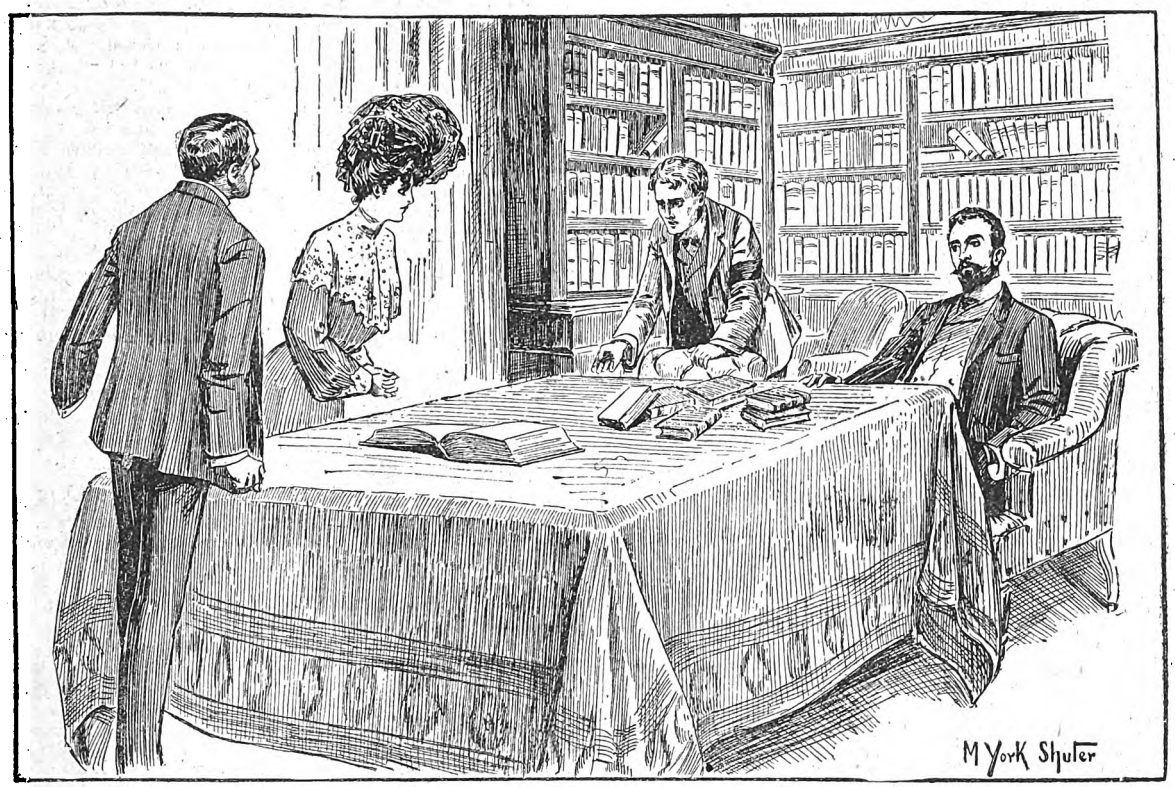
Burgoyne said no more; but early in the dawn he was still sitting in his vine-clad window, smoking and thinking.

At last he laid down his pipe and rose wearily.

"Two years to his majority," he said to himself, summing up the case finally. "There is not much lost by letting things alone until then. He may die in the interim, and Pedro and Madge get their own smoothly and without scandal; and if not—well, I shall know how to act when the time comes. Poor little Phil! poor little Phil!"

He gathered up a heap of documents which he had evidently been examining with great interest and care, replaced them in their envelopes and locked them into his bag, his face still dark and troubled.

"I wish I might confide in Madge," he thought. "But I can't—at least, until we are married. She shall decide the question then. My true woman! my royal Madge! Poor little Phil!"



"I sent for you and your sister," said Phil, "to say that I am not Dudley Courtney's son!"

"Oh, don't come medical jurisprudence over us!" said Pedro sourly. "I know him better than you do, and I say he's ill and cracked, by Jove!"

"His state seems to affect you profoundly, old boy," said Burgoyne, with a level look at Pedro's frank, handsome, dark face, bright in the moonlight.

"Pedro is as nervous about Phil as a hen with a solitary chicken," said Madge, with her soft, happy laugh; "and so am I. We love him dearly, Tom."

"Happy Phil!" said Burgoyne. "By-the-way, if he should die before his majority?"

"We are his heirs," said Pedro, "according to the will. I wish it were not so. To connect our gain with Phil's death seems unbearable. You don't know what a loving, generous, reckless, noble little scamp he is, Tom; but we—Madge and I—do."

But the question was decided before that.

* * * * *

"Apoplexy," was the verdict.

"A good riddance," thought Burgoyne, even as he and Pedro stood looking down at the hooked chin and mean, meagre head, still and heavy as a stone, on its satin pillow in the rosewood coffin.

Courtney Dudley had died alone in the night, even while Burgoyne had sat and smoked and read his documents in the moonlight; and now, after the funeral, Phil sent for them.

He had shut himself up since the death, refusing to see even Madge.

He had not appeared at the grave. He was ill, the servants reported, and Pedro and Madge were in despair, which, however, lightened as they heard his light step crossing the stone floor of the hall to the library, where they and Burgoyne waited.

Digitized by Google

The door opened and the master of Swan Hall came in.

Pedro, nearest the door, strode to meet him. Burgoyne rose, and Madge sprang towards Phil, only to pause in amazement and utter dismay at the change in his appearance.

"Oh, Phil, Phil!" she said, in great compassion, and would have clasped his neck, but he recoiled sharply with a peculiar moan of intense agony, and dashing aside Pedro's strong brown hand, glided to the opposite side of the table, where he stood holding to a chair-back and trembling like a reed.

He was a mere ghastly shadow of the radiant little gentleman Burgoyne had first seen five days before. He was dressed in his usual dark grey Norfolk suit, with a crêpe badge on his arm; the dilated, luminous eyes were fixed and glaring, the oval cheeks hollow, the mouth set in fierce agony.

Burgoyne quietly took a chair so close to him that he could touch him without rising.

Madge again tried to approach him, but he waved her off. Pedro stood staring in blank amazement.

"Phil," he said, tremulously, "dear old fellow, what's this? Don't you know how Madge and I love you? And yet you repel us in this way, and, by Jove, I never thought you cared so much about your governor as all this."

Phil's hand went to his heart, and he dropped his stately golden head heavily on the back of the chair, then lifted it wildly, staring straight at Pedro.

"I sent for you and your sister," he gasped, "to say this to you—I am not Dudley Courtney's son! He had me in his power and forced me into the imposture. Phil Dudley died in Spain."

"Two years ago," added Burgoyne quietly, "in a village in the Spanish Pyrenees, and was buried there by the village priest, Father Antonio Baltro. I know all the details, Pedro. I have all my documents in this wallet. I stumbled against the truth in the tour of Spain from which I have just returned. You and Madge are the owners of Swan Hall. 'Phil,' as you call him, is——"

But with a cry, impossible to dscribe in its horror and intensity, the wretched lad fell at Burgoyne's feet, clasping his knees frantically.

"Oh, Heaven, not to Pedro and Madge! I have confessed all they need know. Oh, Mr. Burgoyne, I felt from the first that I must dread you. I am going away; they will never see me again. I have left a written confession with Pedro's lawyer—of all that is necessary. Let me go without telling them more."

Burgoyne turned his piercing eyes on Pedro, who, livid and breathless, was gazing at the figure writhing in anguish at the lawyer's feet.

"How shall it be, Pedro?" he asked. "It is for you to decide, and Madge."

He smiled. For Madge had already decided. White with horror and amazement, pity and love, she sprang forward and threw her soft, strong arms round the impostor's neck.

"Phil, Phil!" she cried. "I can't learn to unlove in a moment. Oh, my poor little Phil, I don't care what you may have been or done. I don't wish to hear. You shall be as dear as ever to me, indeed you shall, and to Pedro, and stay with us. Pedro, Pedro, tell him so."

Burgoyne drew back with a faint laugh. Pedro had taken Phil bodily from Madge, and was hugging the usurper of his rights cordially.

"You little scoundrel!" he said huskily. "So you were the tool of that courtly old ruffian, were you? And perhaps a pick-pocket beforehand? Well, never mind, old boy, you shall have a chance to be a credit to the name yet. Phil Dudley you are, and Phil Dudley you shall remain, that's fixed as fate. I'm like Madge. I can't learn to unlove, as she says, and now, Tom, when you've done grinning, put your legal brain to work, and help us out of the difficulty. I won't have Phil disgraced, not for twenty Swan Halls—by Jove, I won't! I don't care what he did to leave himself in Courtney Dudley's power. He's naturally an honest fellow and a true gentleman—as good a little rascal as ever breathed."

Pedro made a magnificent and knightly champion, his handsome dark eyes flashing, his chest well thrown out, and one large, long arm round the boyish culprit, but Phil burst from him and rushed to Burgoyne.

"Make them let me go," he whispered, "or I'll kill myself—I swear I will!"

Burgoyne put a heavy hand on the grey shoulder.

"And I swear," he whispered sternly, "to tell the truth on the spot, here to Pedro, in your presence, if you don't obey me. You will not be permitted to rush to ruin, Mr. Phil Dudley, allow me to assure you."

Phil's eyes flashed fire. The library window stood open, and tearing himself from Burgoyne's hand, he sprang on the sill.

Below glimmered the Swans' pool, and before either man could rush forward and prevent him, the light figure shot into the air and alighted magnificently on the opposite slope of green turf.

He reeled, recovered himself, and without one backward glance at the three white faces at the ivy-framed window, fled like the wind across lawn and slope, fled and vanished.

Late that night, as the train thundered into the station, Mr. Phil Dudley crept dejectedly out of the truck — a cattle-truck —in which he had stolen a trip to the city in the uncongenial society of a flock of sheep—and rubbing his dim eyes, looked up—into Burgoyne's face.

"You have had an agreeable trip, sir," said the lawyer grimly. "I trust you found your travelling companions entertaining. I thought I should find you on this train, Mr. Dudley."

Phil leant heavily against a hideous bale of rags awaiting shipment.

"Did—did you tell them—tell Pedro?" he gasped.

"No, sir, I did not. Come this way, if you please."

He led his captive to the telegraph-office and dispatched a curt message:

"Have found Phil all right. Will write to-morrow."

"Now, sir," he remarked drily, "you will come home with me, if you are not afraid to trust yourself with your rival. I believe I have the honour of occupying that position towards you, Mr. Dudley. Much obliged for the honour you do Madge, I'm sure."

Phil hung his head, lifted it royally, and made a last spirited dash for liberty.

He wrenched himself from the kind, compelling hand, and fled into the very thick of the vehicles roaring down the gas-lit street.

Burgoyne plunged after him—a little fierce in the chase—and a policeman headed off the fugitive, who turned sideways, and the next moment was lying in the dust under the wheels of a passing vehicle.

He opened his eyes eagerly as Burgoyne bent over him, and smiled happily.

"It is all over," he whispered, gaily. "I'm smashed to atoms. Swear you'll never tell Pedro—swear, swear!"

"I swear I won't," said Burgoyne, hoarsely. "Poor little Phil!"

Phil smiled contentedly, settling into death.

"He said he loved me—give him my pearl ring—on my finger—and tell him I loved him. Good Heavens! so much!"

* * * * *

"As Phil declines to see me, I have nothing more to say," wrote Pedro, two months later. "I hope he will be more reasonable when I return from America. I am hurt and offended, by Jove! and can't see why I'm treated so scurvily in this affair.

"Tell him I won't mention his name again until he says he's ashamed of treating me in this style.

"I have made over half my share of the Swan Hall property to him. I don't know a little fellow worthier of good luck than Phil, and if he should remain crippled, he will need all the cash he can get to make life endurable.

Digitized by Google

"You and Madge will do the best you can to make him happy, I know that; but I'm going away sad at the reflection that while Madge married you at two hours' notice in order to rush off and nurse his highness, I have been ignored, set aside, snubbed and sat upon. 'Don't come; Phil won't see you,' writes Madge in her last. Well, I won't, having a little spirit left; but tell my little Phil his place in my heart is as well aired as ever, and that his past is less than nothing to me, whatever it may have been. I am certain he was more sinned against than sinning. Be sure and tell him that!"

And so generous Pedro went his sunny way, to wander in the New World, and Phil's eyes grew greyer, larger, deeper, as they followed him in spirit from place to place.

* * * * *

"Hullo, Tim, Hullo!"

"'Tain't never! Well, this is good. So you're back, Pedro Dudley! Well, this is good."

"Yes, I'm back, Tim. I'm bound for Swan Hall to-night. Mr. and Mrs. Burgoyne are there; but they don't expect me till next week. How are all at Swanville?"

"All well," said Tim concisely; he was Pedro's foster-brother. "Want a ride on the engine, like old times, I s'pose. It's a nasty night, though, Pedro."

"Oh, it's all right. I've come back as tough as ever. So here we are, homeward bound."

"It'll be a terrible ride! We're overdue an hour, and the mail is tearing after us—best go as an ordinary passenger, Pedro. Well, if you won't, you won't; so jump on. I fancy she'll do sixty miles in the next hour. We've got a clear track ahead—Heaven be praised for it."

Pedro's quick blood boiled with excitement as the train thundered through the windy moonlight of the December night.

The engine fairly leapt along the track, and the noise was indescribable as its iron pulses beat, and its giant breast hurled itself against the wind.

Tim stood to his work silently, a little grim as he felt the monster bounding under him, but enjoying the danger he was able to control, and Pedro smoked and stared ahead through the glass of the "cab," and pictured Madge's joyous welcome, Tom's hearty handclasp, and Phil's shamefaced delight—poor little Phil, dear little Phil, who had felt his disgrace so keenly that he would not even write a line to him during the two long years of absence.

Pedro smiled at these pleasant visions of home, sweet home.

On one side rose fields white and ghastly in the moonlight; on the other, a wood, black and bare, the boughs clattering in the fierce gusts.

"Down grade!" roared Tim. "We're waltzin', that we are!"

The next moment they thundered round a curve.

The fierce shriek of the engine gave its alarm, and "Down brakes!" rang out, while the burnished giant fairly bounded, maddened by an attempt to control its headlong rush.

Ten seconds—a minute, two—of Titanic struggle between man and machinery, and the engine quivered into stillness, conquered, and lamenting its defeat with wild outcries from its brazen throat.

"So the darned old bridge is bust," said Tim, in an easy, conversational tone. "I say, Mr. Pedro, look ahead!"

Pedro was looking ahead, and so were the other six hundred passengers who had so nearly continued their journey by another route and to another destination.

There was a moment's dead silence in the crowd, which had flocked from the train, and then a vocal thunder beat the air into quick pulses, as cheer after cheer burst from six hundred throats.

The bridge had been swept out of existence, except one gaunt beam projecting from the opposite bank to about the middle of the stream.

On the extreme end of this timber, which shuddered as the water bellowed against it, stood a slight figure in mists of white drapery, which almost seemed a part of the flying foam nearly shrouding the airy form.

She held aloft a carriage-lamp, and its light smote actual flames from her neck and arms as it struck on the jewels binding them.

Her position was one of terrible danger; and on the bank behind was visible a brougham, its driver wringing his hands in terror as he strode up and down, watching her.

There was a sudden blank of silence. She had saved them! Would she perish in the teeth of that hungry torrent?

No. She retraced her steps in safety, and, just as her foot touched the earth, the beam parted, rose erect in the whirlpool, plunged and vanished.

She sprang into the brougham, and while renewed cheers followed her, the carriage dashed away, and the heroine who had saved six hundred disappeared.

* * * * *

"And now for Phil," said Pedro, an hour later, when he had related his adventures to Madge and Tom, and sung songs to the heroine of the bridge.

Madge looked at some distant satin and lace curtains over a bay-window.

"Phil is there—ran and hid when you came striding in so unexpectedly."

"Little donkey!" said Pedro, in high good humour.

"Phil, you rascal, come out; or must I pull you?" he said.

He put in a large, strong hand, groped for masculine broadcloth, and drew back with a very scared face, his fingers full of wet tulle, and in the wet tulle a slim, tall, crocus-haired young beauty, with a white, quivering face, and solemn violet eyes, who plucked herself from his limp grasp, and rushed into Madge's comfortable and beauteous arms.

"Tom," said Mrs. Burgoyne severely, "it is really enough for Phil to have lost her Christmas Eve party at the Blessington's, where she was going when she saw the disaster to the bridge, and to come home drenched to the skin without your heartless grins, Pedro. This is the heroine of the bridge, also Philla Dudley, twin-sister of the real Phil, who died three years ago in Spain. This is Philla, whom her father forced by threatening his life and his own to personate the dead boy.

"She put off telling you this, she was dreadfully ashamed of what was really no crime of hers, and made no promise to remain silent until you would come home. Phil Dudley is supposed to have died in London, and no one is mystified by our loving his twin-sister, who is supposed to have been at school in Spain, very, very dearly. Phil and Philla were never parted until he died, and all Phil knew, Philla, the little wild thing, was taught, from smoking mild cigarettes to playing billiards."

* * * * *

"But you said you loved me—Tom told me that," said Pedro, the very next evening, while Madge sang Christmas carols to her harp, and Tom discreetly turned over her music, ignoring the pair in the distant bay.

"That—that was when I was a—boy, and I thought I was killed and it couldn't matter," protested Philla; "and it was very unkind of Tom to tell you, when he knew I was going to live—very unkind."

But the silent eloquence of the tiny pearl ring in Pedro's brown palm, the peculiar, steady, ardent flame in his brown eyes as he looked at her in the moonlight, broke down her little bit of defence.

She shook her delicate, stately head shyly.

"Couldn't you wait, and ask me again next year, if you really continue to—to feel this way?" she asked tentatively. "I am afraid you may grow sorry—it's too sudden. Ask me next Christmas Day, Pedro."

This, of course, was surrender, and the next minute she was crying softly in his arms.

"Poor papa!" she said, "I hope he knows that his crime has not darkened my life. Pedro, it was not my fault, it was not. It nearly killed me, indeed it did."

"My precious Philla!" said Pedro, "I'm quite willing to hope, however faintly, that your admirable father is tolerably comfortably situated in the Elysian Fields, for, but for his rascality I never should have met my dear little Phil, nor won My Christmas Love!"

Isabella Crawford.

Digitized by Google

That Would Cure Her.

"I suppose," remarked Miss Centimentle, "that since Mr. Bravely saved her life, she will think of him as her hero all the rest of her life?" "Oh, no," replied Mr. Practical, "she married him last week."

A Monotonous Pastime.

"Do you care for fairy stories, Angeline?" "No, Beatrice, no. I've been engaged six times."

Rather Unkind.

"What do you think of Charlie's proposing to me when he hasn't known me a week?" "I think that's the reason."

A Statement of Fact.

Mrs. Peckem: "I wonder if a man ever does get too old to marry." Peckem: "Of course not. Age doesn't always bring wisdom."

The Utterly Unutterable.

He: "I love you, darling, more than words can utter." She: "Utter them just the same, Harry. I like to hear as much as I can."

A Good Squeezer.

Mildred: "I believe Jack Scribley is a member of the Press Club." Millicent: "He must be, to judge by his actions with Mabel in the conservatory last evening."

She was not Giving Herself Away.

Nopurse: "I proposed to Miss Manymillions on Christmas Eve." Gotbills: "Shall I congratulate you?" Nopurse: "I don't know. She told me she wasn't Santa Claus; and that's all she said."

Very Nasty.

"I have such an indulgent husband," said little Mrs. Doll. "Yes, so George says," responded Mrs. Spiteful, quietly. "Sometimes he indulges too much, doesn't he?" They no longer speak to each other.

Can't Get at It.

Annie: "It's a dreadfully cold day, Claude, so you must put on your big coat. I suppose it is hanging where you put it last week?" Claude: "Yes, dear, it is all right and safe; but I have lost the ticket, so I can't get it."

He Was Disappointed.

She laid her cheek on the easy chair against his head, and murmured, "How I do love to rest my head against your head, Augustus!" "Do you?" said he. "Is it because you love me?" "No, because it is so nice and soft."

Did She Get Her Johnet?

Mrs. Phoxy: "I was helping Mrs. de Style to put her winter things away to-day. Oh, she has the loveliest seal johnet possible." Mr. Phoxy: "What? What do you mean by 'johnet,'?" Mrs. Phoxy: "Of course, how silly of me; but then, dear, I'm not familiar enough with one myself to call it a 'jacket.'"

The Little Games they Play.

Young Wife: "What are you going to give your husband for a Christmas present?" Old Matron: "A hundred cigars." Young Wife: "And may I ask what you paid for them?" Old Matron: "Oh, nothing! For the last few months I've taken one or two out of Henry's box every day. He hasn't noticed it, and he'll be so pleased with my little present and the fine quality of the cigars."

A Natural Question.

Mrs. Fowler: "How do you like my new hat?" Mr. Fowler: "What did it cost?"

Very Likely the Case.

She: "Did you say anything to papa about your being too young?" He: "Yes, but he said when I once began to pay your bills I should age rapidly enough."

Where the Rub Comes In.

Ethel: "I think I'd get married, too, if I could find a man I could live with." Carrie: "That isn't so hard, the trouble is to get a man you can't live without."

They're Awfully Good—Really!

Belle: "Would you allow a man to kiss you?" Maude: "Um—well, I think it is our duty to—er—make allowances for the weakness of mankind, you know."

The Way Women Have.

"I wonder why a woman never gives her husband the kind of Christmas present he wants?" "Because she doesn't try to! She gives him the present he ought to want."

And then She Kissed Him.

Wife: "Oh, John, I was shopping at Joblotz's to-day, and I saw the sweetest thing there." Husband: (diplomatically): "Yes, that's a great scheme of Joblotz's to have mirrors all over his shop."

It would be Costly.

Ethel: "I—er—suppose you know next week is Christmas—don't you, Charley?" Charley: "Why, of course I do! Why do you ask?" Ethel: "Why, you look so happy I thought you'd forgotten it!"

An Ambiguous Compliment.

Maud: "I wish I knew whether I ought to feel grateful to Mr. Gaboy or to be angry at him." Irene: "Why?" Maud: "He told me yesterday he didn't know which he most admired—my sparkling eye or my blooming cheek."

Mr. Jones was a Bit of a Flirt.

Blanche: "Did you make any conquests this summer?" Lilian: "Oh, yes, Mr. Jones proposed the day before we came away." Blanche: "Doesn't he pop the question in the most awkward manner imaginable?" They meet now as strangers.

Mistletoe not Necessary.

Doris: "Did you have a mistletoe bough in your house?" Phyllis: "No, I had one ready, but I forgot to put it up." Doris: "Of all things! Forgot it?" Phyllis: "Yes, you see Tom and I somehow or other became engaged the day before."

Would She Marry Him?

"I've thought of a capital nom de plume," said Henry, who sometimes writes for the newspapers. "What is it?" asked Henrietta. "'Will U. Marrimee.'" "Why, of course I will, you goose!" she answered. "Is that what you have been trying to say so long?"

How He Did It.

Old Gentleman (to a very rich old lady at a party): "Who is that handsome young man standing over there?" Old Lady: "That's my son-in-law. He's a very brilliant young man—made a large fortune by the law." Old Gentleman: "Indeed! How's that?" Old Lady: "The law made him my daughter's husband."

An Encouraging Sign.

"I'll tell you a great secret, but you must promise not to give it away." "Of course not." "I believe Miss Birdie M'Ginnis is gone on me. I've almost made up my mind to pop the question." "What did she say to you?" "She didn't say anything to me precisely, but on Tuesday she patted my dog on the head. Isn't that an encouraging sign?" "Yes, that's the next thing to patting you on the head. Your turn will come next."

Digitized by Google

ROBINSON'S CHRISTMAS DINNER.

A Tale of a Wager.

"NONSENSE!" cried Jones. "If you made your face into a regular hedge-row of whiskers, I should recognise your voice at the first word you spoke It is only natural when I've known you so long."

"I don't think so," replied Robinson; "but, look here, to-day is the 21st. I'll come to eat my Christmas dinner in your dining-room on the 25th and you won't know me; I'll bet you a new hat you don't recognise me."

"Right! By the bye, we dine at 7.30 on Christmas Day."

"I don't promise to be there exactly at that time," said Robinson, "but somewhere between seven and ten o'clock."

* * * * *

Punctually at half-past seven, an assorted lot of Joneses—pa, ma, and six others—sat down to a good old English dinner of roast turkey and sausages, to be followed by wedges of plum pudding and mince pies ad indigestib. For five minutes pa Jones slashed and prodded the poor bird, thrust him in several places, and at last left him without "a wing to stand on or a leg to fly with," as the pathetic Irishman said.

Just as he was nearing the end of his task and his patience, there came a brisk rat-tat at the front door. A grim look appeared in the carver's eye as he absent-mindedly dropped a wing of the turkey into the potato dish.

"The Doctor and a gentlemen to see you, sir," said the cook—the housemaid, by the bye, was away on special leave.

"Ask 'em in here," said Jones cheerfully, and in they came accordingly. The Doctor was an intimate friend of the family. As for the other man, whom he introduced as his brother, just arrived from the Colonies, nobody required an introduction. Even the youngest Jones present—he wore a "pinny" over his clothes, so you can guess how young he was,—recognised him at once. Robinson was a clean-shaven man, as are most amateur actors, and the stranger's face was covered with whiskers, overdone, in fact. And then his gruff voice and shy manner—oh, it was too evident.

"I went to Liverpool this morning to meet my brother," said the Doctor, "and when we got home again an hour ago, I found the housekeeper had disappeared, leaving a note to say——"

"Bunkum!" murmured Jones.

The Doctor stared hard but thought his ears must have deceived him.

"To say she had been called away to London soon after my departure—her sister dangerously ill——"

"Awfully sorry," said Jones, trying in vain to chase a broad grin from his face.

"And knowing your kindness," continued the Doctor, "I have ventured to trespass on your hospitality for my brother and myself."

"You want some di-di-dinner?" gasped Jones, whose face was all red and purple like a fine sunset.

"That was my desire," said the Doctor wonderingly, and the next moment he received a tremendous dig in the ribs.

"It's no go," cried Jones with a wild explosion of laughter; "you really mustn't come with a tale like that."

"Sir!"

"I say, it's no go, Doctor. Fancy thinking you could take me in with such a barefaced invention."

"I beg your pardon, sir."

"Oh, you're all right, Doctor——"

"I wish I could say as much for you."

"You're heartily welcome. But I really cannot entertain your—ha! ha! your brother! Good evening, old man, don't wait," and then he suddenly sprang forward and gave a sharp wrench at the stranger's whiskers.

The next moment Jones was lying on his back in order to observe a wonderful constellation of stars that had suddenly appeared on the ceiling. His wife rushed to his assistance, and then with rare presence of mind fainted away at once. As for the little Joneses, they felt indeed that life had its glorious moments and began to clamber from their chairs preparatory to a general scrimmage. But the Doctor dragged his brother from the room and out of the house, and the little warriors trooped back into the dining-room.

"Was that Mr. Robinson, pa?" said one of the boys.

"Silence!" roared pa. "I will not have my friends discussed by you children."

"Will you carve some turkey for Jane, my dear," said his wife meekly.

The manner in which these quiet little women turn the current of a man's wrath is wonderful. Mr. Jones grabbed his carving utensils and made a frightful onslaught, seized the poor bird in several places at once and flung it violently head over heels, and then slashed and banged and battered it until the eyes of the children positively bulged with admiration.

"Now, then," he said at last, panting but happy, "if you will add the vegetables, my dear, Willie can take the plate to Jane. She is alone to-day, eh?"

"Yes, Sarah was sent for——"

"But she ain't alone, pa," murmured a twelve-year-old sentimentally; "she has her policeman there."

"What!" roared Jones.

"And he does love Jane, pa. He comes to supper reg'lar."

"And has she her—her usual policeman to-day?"

"No, pa. He had to go on duty in another district when he didn't expect, and he's sent a friend—another policeman."

"What sort of a man is the friend?"

"He's very tall and he's thin like Rob——"

"Eh?"

"Like Robinson Crusoe in my picture-book. And he's got lovely sideboard whiskers and a beard."

Pa Jones rose thoughtfully from his chair. "Our constables represent the laws of England," he said thoughtfully, "and I don't see why the laws of England should dine in the kitchen. I will take Jane's dinner to her and if the man is presentable, I'll ask him to join our own circle."

He hastily pencilled a few lines on a sheet of paper and, having folded it in triangular shape, propped it up on the mantelpiece.

Then he departed for the kitchen with the fire of ambition seething once more beneath his manly waistcoat. When he presently returned with the Laws of England, seven pairs of eyes threw themselves bodily upon the poor policeman, causing him to blush painfully.

"Will you serve our good friend with a little dinner, my dear," said Jones affably, leading him to a chair. "By the bye, Willie," he added, pointing to the triangular note, "if he doesn't come before ten o'clock, take this note to Mr. Robinson's house."

The policeman's helmet dropped from his nerveless hand. He stared sheepishly at his host, opened his mouth as though to speak, and then pulled himself stubbornly together and sat down to dinner.

Digitized by Google

"You haven't quite such a large family as this," said Jones genially.

"No, sir, I ain't married."

"What a remarkably hoarse voice you have, constable."

"Yessir, wants oiling."

"Boys, be quiet," shouted Jones, "I can scarcely hear myself speak."

"It's the pleeceman's helmet, pa."

"It'll take no harm, sir, don't mind."

"They're playing football with it, pa, under the table——"

"Noisy boys, but very smart at times," said Pa Jones presently. "In fact, that's my motto with boys. If they're not smart, make 'em smart—ha! ha!"

"P'raps the smartness is heredary, sir," said the policeman.

"Hereditary—h'm—did you ever throw a red herring across the road, constable?"

"No, sir, can't afford to play with wittles."

"Ha, ha, very good—by the bye, let me ask you a little riddle I heard the other day. Some mince pie? You know what a riddle is, of course?"

"Yessir, a sieve."

"No, no, I mean a conundrum."

"Oh, you mean whensadoornotadoor?"

"Exactly. Well, if a man robbed his father, what would you call him?"

"Shouldn't call him nothing, sir. The judge is paid to do that."

"But what surname would suit him best? Have a glass of wine? Allow me. What name would suit him best?"

"Dunno, sir."

"Well, I should recommend—Robbin'son!" Pa Jones literally bellowed the last word, thrusting his face suddenly towards that of the policeman, who drew back in alarm.

"You seem nervous, constable."

"Yessir, thought you wos a-going to bite me."

"But what do you think of the name I suggested?"

"Didn't hear it, sir"

"I suggested that a man who robbed his father should be called—Robbin'son!"

The policeman shrunk visibly when he heard the word, and then straightened himself with a homely dignity, in which, however, Pa Jones saw nothing but "red herrings."

"I dunno whether you've some game on, sir, 'cos you keep a-mentioning of Robinson at hevery moment, but, if you have, sir, I don't take it kind of you. O' course, you've a right to report me to the inspector for eating here when I'm supposed to be on duty outside."

"I'm not going to report you."

"Well, wodger keep a-mentioning of his name, sir?"

"Whose name?"

"Inspector Robinson!"

Pa Jones positively roared with laughter at this.

"Splendid!" he cried, "splendid! What a stock of red herrings you must have."

The poor policeman glowered at him in dull resentment. "Haven't got no 'errin's," he answered somewhat sulkily, "and don't want none while there's turkeys 'oppin' about."

The front door bell tinkled at this moment. They heard Jane, whose beauty, by the bye, was not of the Miss Miggs variety, amble massively along the hall and then open the street door.

"Can I see Mr. Jones, please?" said a very gruff voice.

"It's Robinson!" gasped the policeman in terror.

"Whose Robinson?"

"The Inspector! I'm done for now, sir."

Poor Pa Jones was torn by conflicting emotions. He couldn't make up his mind even yet whether the man who sat beside him was his friend in disguise. On the other hand, the man might be himself so to speak, and might have been bribed by the real Robinson to pretend to recognise the last-named as his Inspector. In that case the new arrival would not be himself, but somebody else, and—and—and—there was just a possibility after all that neither the policeman nor Inspector Robinson was Robinson—and——

"Well, who in thunder is he, anyhow?" yelled Jones, tearing his hair furiously.

"He's Robinson, sir."

Next moment the door was opened, and Jane ushered the new-comer into the room. At the noise made by the turning of the handle the policeman groaned feebly and then in a twinkling disappeared from sight beneath the table. The children forsook the helmet to stare open-mouthed at these developments.

"Good evening, sir."

"Good evening," said Jones absent-mindedly. "You're rather taller, I think, and not so good-looking."

"Beg pardon, sir."

"Oh, excuse me," said Jones dreamily, as he stared fixedly at the length of his visitor's legs and the breadth of his shoulders. If Jones' mind was full of red herrings, it is only fair to admit that the Inspector unconsciously found a counter-thought in the subject of straight-waistcoats.

They stared at one another with a strange intensity, whilst the poor policeman, lifting a corner of the tablecloth, stared at them both.

"Much taller and better built," murmured Jones thoughtfully.

"I've knowed all sorts and shapeses go that way," said the Inspector in a stage whisper.

"More whiskers," murmured Jones.

"But less patience," growled the Inspector, raising his voice a little.

"I've got so mixed up," said Jones pathetically.

"So I should imagine, sir."

"That I've almost forgotten what Robinson is like."

This was too much for the Inspector. He seized Pa Jones by the arm and shook him vigorously, in real or pretended indignation. "Wake up, sir, wake up," he cried. "I'm Robinson!'

"Yes, yes, I daresay you are," murmured poor Jones sadly. "They're all Robinsons to-night somehow."

"You've had one of my men to dinner with your cook," said the Inspector gruffly, "and you've taken him off his beat to provide him with the said dinner. It's agin the law to move the property of the Crown without permission——"

"Give him some turkey or he'll report me." These words floated in an agonised whisper from beneath the table. The Inspector stopped suddenly and began to mop his face with a young tablecloth. He had heard the whisper without distinguishing the words, and felt nervous.

"I've stood too near him," he murmured; "it must be catching."

"One of your men, do you say, Inspector? Had dinner here?"

"Yes, sir."

"H'm!—of course—er—is his name Robinson?"

"Give him some turkey," murmured the policeman again.

"Will you have some dinner?" said Jones miserably; "I don't know whether you're Robinson or not—and I don't care so much either. You're welcome to the victory——"

The Inspector, after accepting the invitation to dinner, listened to the rest of Pa Jones' speech in growing amazement. He was still more surprised when a long, blue-clad figure, whom he recognised at once as the very policeman he had mislaid, rose stealthily behind Pa Jones and presently threw an arm round the poor man's neck and then lifted him bodily from the ground.

The next moment poor pa was lying upon the hearthrug for the second time that evening, with a hard, bony knee to hold him down.

"Off his nut," said the policeman laconically. "He's been going wuss all the evening." Before any one could move to the rescue, there was a tap at the door and Jane entered with a telegram.

Mrs. Jones read it aloud to the assembled company:

"Sorry cannot keep appointment to-night. Bet postponed.—Robinson."

Wal Frank.

Digitized by Google

RUNNING RIDDLES COMPETITION.

On this page you will find eight riddles; each riddle is described in the picture.

What you have to do is to find the answers to these riddles. Then write them on a piece of paper, using one side only, and send them in to me.

Address your envelopes The Competition Editor, SHORT STORIES, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., with "Running Riddles" plainly marked in the top, left-hand corner. All letters must reach this office by Thursday, December 31st. No attempts arriving after this date will be considered.

This page, signed in the allotted place, must accompany each list.

You can send in as many lists as you like, but each list must be accompanied by a separate page.

£2 will be awarded to the person who sends in what I considor to be the best list of answers to the riddles, and to each of the senders of what I consider to be the next best five attempts, I will award a splendid hand-camera, with complete photographic outfit. The Editor's decision will be final, and no correspondence can be entered into on the subject.

Name .....

Address .....

Digitized by Google

A Sad Story of a Mother's Grief.

GREAT masses of roses covered the wall and grew in rank profusion along the roadside, and, when I left the pony-cart and climbed the bank, I could see that the yard was filled with them and the little cottage facing the sea almost hidden with their wealth of colour.

Thinking that the owner would not object to my gathering a small bunch from such an abundance I was proceeding to do so, when, from behind a bush, a little old lady appeared, her refined face delicately pink from her exertions, looking as sweet as one of the roses among which she was working.

"Please don't pick them," she said, coming forward a few steps. "Don't think I'm selfish, but they're Dedie's, and I can't let anyone else have them," and with implicit faith in my obedience to her request, she returned to her work.

For a few minutes I stood and watched her deftly loosening the earth around the roots of a young rose-bush, and then, with the guilt of a child discovered in some wrong-doing, I laid the few roses I had plucked upon the wall, and going back to the cart drove to my friend's house, where I was visiting.

A few days later, while we were passing the garden with its rose-covered wall, the sweet old lady appeared from among the bushes, her arms full of cut roses, which she pressed against her breast.

To my friend's greeting she replied with a pleased light of recognition in her eyes.

"Who is she?" I asked, when we had passed out of hearing; and I told the episode of yesterday.

My friend did not answer for a few moments.

"Hers is a sad story. Years ago she came here, a bride, to spend her honeymoon in the little cottage, which belonged to her husband. They were wealthy, and the weeks slipped by until the autumn, when they returned to their city home; but she loved the place so that every summer they returned here to spend a few weeks in the country, within sight of the sea. And here, one July morning, when the roses she had trained over her windows were hanging heavy with dew, a little girl came to bless the household. The husband, going to the open window, plucked a great spray of roses, and, placing them on a stand by the bedside, said, 'This shall be her lucky flower.' And he kissed the baby and the young mother. They named the child Edith, but she always called herself 'Dedie.'

"When the lady appeared among us the second summer after, she was accompanied only by her baby; and instead of the beautiful gowns that had been her husband's delight, she wore a widow's dress, and her dear face was haggard with grief.

"The child had grown into a little lisping tot, who followed her mother about the house and garden, which was the widow's great solace, and where she spent most of her time, only going each day to the high cliff, from which she and her husband used to watch the sun set across the ocean, and the beach where they had walked in the moonlight, two married lovers.

"The flowers that had graced the baby's entry into the world seemed to have possessed some occult charm, for never was anyone more fond of roses than this child. She always carried a bouquet in her chubby hand, or wore a spray-pinned on to her little pinafore, and if, by chance, she dropped one, she always stopped to pick it up.

"She was a strange child, too, with little unchildlike notions and fancies that oppressed one with a feeling of eeriness. The ocean fascinated her, and ofttimes at night, when it roared upon the rocky headland, she would awaken her mother and say, 'Mamma, why does the sea want me? Why does it keep calling to me?' Or she would sit for hours on the sand, laughing and talking to the little waves and ripples that ran up the beach.

"One evening her mother tied a little hood over the curls, and together they went down to the headland, as was their custom, the child carrying a big spray of flowers; a strong wind was blowing out to sea, and the mother shielded the child in front of her. They had stood thus for some minutes, when the roses slipped from the child's hands, and the wind caught and blew them towards the edge of the cliff. She darted forward to save them, and was stooping at the very edge to pick them up, when there came a sudden blast, she tottered on the brink for a moment, and then, grasping the spray of roses in her little hands, pitched forward into the sea.

"Her mother never returned to her city home. Winter and summer she has roses blooming in the cottage or garden, and every evening she goes to the cliff with an offering of flowers for 'Dedie's grave,' as she calls the ocean."

As we returned home that evening, my friend pointed out towards the sea. On a high point overlooking the water a lone figure was outlined against the setting sun. As we looked, she raised her arms and threw a great cluster of roses out into the water, and then sank upon her knees and with clasped hands watched them float out into the pathway of the sun.

So large a grave; so small a child.

George Barnes.

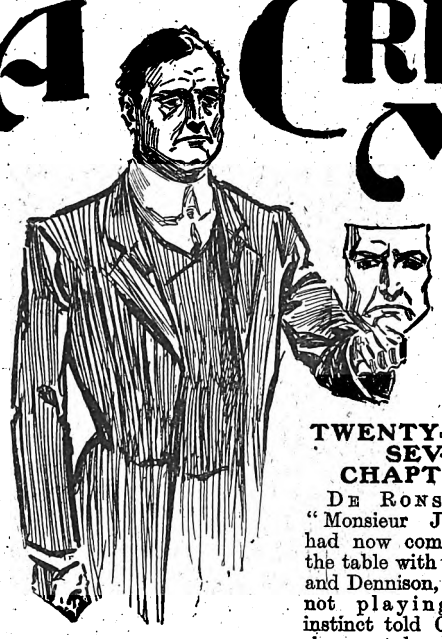
Are You Generous? Are You Clever?
Are You Mean? Are You Dull?

Whatever you are it is as well to know other things concerning yourself, so send a specimen of your handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope to RANEE, 23 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. A reliable delineation of your character will reach you in return—this will give you the required information.

Digitized by Google

POWERFUL ROMANCE.

A CRIMINAL MILLIONAIRE



By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "Olga Romanoff," "The Lake of Gold," etc., etc.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CHAPTER.

De Ronski and "Monsieur Justin" had now come up to the table with the ladies and Dennison, who was not playing. Her instinct told Cora that she must have almost run her luck out. She was perfectly cool, and during the whole game no one had seen the flutter of an eyelid. It would have been difficult to know whether her father or her lover, each in his own way, admired her splendid nerve the more.

She began to experiment. A louis on red-black-red. Lost. Another on black-red-black. Also lost.

"That will do, Duke," she said, pushing the heap of notes and gold towards him. "I don't know how much I've won for you, but I can't play any more. The fire's gone out. You should never play when you find that sort of feeling coming across you."

"Ah, what a player you are!" he said with a look of frank adoration. "With your sang froid and daring you would go far with the bank, and you have learnt the best of all lessons—when to stop. I owe you a thousand thanks, Miss Cora."

He put the gold into his hip-pocket and rolled up the thick sheaf of notes. As they rose Kesteven leant over Darfield's shoulder and said in a low, angry tone:

"I reckon if I were you, I'd quit too. Just come out here. I want a word with you."

Darfield got up, his face pale and his eyes still burning with the frenzy of play. He was not affected by the loss of the money. He could replace that for the asking. It was only the fact of losing, of being beaten in a fight with Fortune, and watching a young girl apparently sway the fickle balance as she liked with every turn of her hand.

He followed Kesteven into the Gardens, whither, after they had received the congratulations of the others, Cora and the Grand Duke followed very shortly. Meanwhile, M. Justin excused himself and went away towards the offices of the Administration.

When the party assembled for supper at Ciro's, Mercedes looked hard at Cora for a moment and smiled. There was no mistaking the answering smile, and so she went beside her and murmured very softly:

"May I congratulate your Highness?"

She nodded and raised the back of her left hand for an instant. One of her rings, set with a single pearl, was gone, and in its place flashed and glowed a half-circlet of diamonds and rubies. Mercedes' right hand closed over it, and a gentle pressure told how happy she was in her friend's happiness.

When they got back to Nice they separated at the station.

Kesteven, the Grand Duke, and Darfield went with the two girls and Janet on board the yacht, where, late as it was, his Highness had a brief but entirely satisfactory conversation with Kesteven, and then, after a yet briefer but still more satisfactory interview with Cora, almost on the same spot on which Mercedes had given herself to her vanished lover, he went ashore to the Cercle, and finished the night at baccarat.

As he told her the next day, there must have been some magic in the money she had won for him, for, plunge as he would, it did not seem possible for him to lose, and when he strolled back to his house, puffing contentedly at a big cigar and glorying in the splendour of the sunrise, he left behind him a score or so of exasperated, and, in some cases, despairing, gamblers the poorer by nearly half a million francs.

Dennison and Justin accompanied the de Ronskis to Cimiez, for the night's work was not quite over for them yet.

The ladies retired as soon as they reached the hotel, and then the three men sat down to business.

"I think," said Mr. Smith, speaking in de Ronski's French for the benefit of his colleague, as he lit a cigar, "that the chain of evidence is now fairly complete. This Mr. Darfield, otherwise Culworth, will be invaluable, provided only that his wife is correct as to his courage and good faith."

"I think we can feel pretty safe as to that if she is prepared to answer for him," said Dennison, "she has enough strength of character herself for a couple of men."

"If my experience of men and women has taught me anything I am fully agreed with you," assented M. Justin. "And now, my friend," he continued, "now that we have got so far, perhaps a little revision would not be out of place. I should be glad to hear you recapitulate the points on which we have to rely."

"That would be useful," said Dennison, "we can't understand each other too completely."

"Very well, then," said Mr. Smith, getting up and standing with his back to the door. "To begin with, we have the fact that Mr. Wilfrid Ellerton did not fall overboard from the Isola. He simply disappeared somewhere into the interior of the yacht, and there we lose sight of him.

"Even Billaud cannot tell us whether he is alive or dead, and it remains to be seen whether Mr. Darfield, as we may call him for the present, can and will throw any more light on the subject. This much, however, is perfectly plain. He cannot have disappeared save by Staunton's orders, and Staunton would not have got rid of him without some very strong reason indeed.

Digitized by Google

"In that reason, probably, lies the clue to the whole mystery.

"As we know Staunton to be a criminal not only of the most desperate type, but also of amazing resource and ability, and, moreover, with the most enormous interests at stake, it is necessary for us to face the conclusion, that, if he had reason to believe young Ellerton's existence dangerous to his own safety and that of his schemes, he would not hesitate for a moment to take his life.

"On the other hand, he may only have safely disposed of him until he has realised this dream of a South American Republic, and raised himself above the reach of the law.

"Now, I think you gentlemen will agree with me that this mysterious trip made by the yacht to the shores of Iceland, when she was ostensibly travelling from Leith to the Riviera, lends some colour to the latter supposition. He would hardly have sent the boat so very far out of her way merely to drop him overboard. He could have done that anywhere."

"To my mind," said Dennison, "that is the strangest part of the whole mysterious business. What did the yacht go there for? It can hardly have been to maroon poor Ellerton on one of those little islands up there. Staunton wouldn't have been such a fool as to run the risk of his being picked up by the first fishing boat that happened to pass. And yet she simply cannot have gone there for nothing. The thing's incredible."

"On the other hand," interposed Monsieur Justin, "since we have now assured ourselves that those counterfeit notes, of which Mr. Darfield passed no fewer than fifteen at the Casino to-night, have been imported by the yacht, may not this strange and secret visit to Iceland have some connection with the hidden manufactory of notes and coin for which the police of the world have beeu hunting in vain for the last five years?"

"It is possible," said Mr. Smith, "though scarcely probable. In that case we should have to look for Mr. Staunton's private mint somewhere among the volcanic caverns of Hekla. For my part I should be more inclined to seek them in some lonely gorge of the Andes. There are too many people in Iceland, and, besides, there are tourists.

"But to continue. Three days ago Staunton entertained a party of gentlemen at lunch on board the Isola. They were supposed to be his financial associates in those great operations in which we know he is the controlling power. So they are, but we know that they are something more. We know their histories, and everyone of them is intimately connected with South American politics. In other words, they are Staunton's political agents, and doubtless also channels through which his manufactured coin and notes get into circulation.

"Staunton went to Mentone this morning. One of our agents went with him. Three of these gentlemen met him there, and with them was a Signor Riccola, whose other name is Andrea Guardino, the head-centre of the Mafia in Southern Italy. What has Mr. Isolo Staunton, the millionaire financier, the friend and helper of statesmen and princes, to do with the Mafia?"

"That," said Dennison drily, "somehow seems to take one's mind back to the London murders. I hope our friend doesn't consider any of our party here inconvenient or superfluous. But surely he can hardly suspect anything queer about us."

"No one can tell with a man like that," said M. Justin gravely. "We have our spies, but depend upon it he has his watching them, and if he does suspect—well, after what our friend has told us, the atmosphere of Nice may soon get rather unhealthy. I should not wonder if there happened a murder or two in the Casino Gardens before long if that is the case.

"But, my dear de Ronski," he went on, suddenly changing his tone, "is not the chief question now what is to be done? Now that we know as much as we do and that we are sure of three good witnesses, I for my part am for immediate action. The French law will permit us to arrest him the moment he sets foot in Nice. Meanwhile, if we secure Billaud and Darfield and put them in safety, they will make statements on oath which will justify us in putting an embargo on the yacht, after which we can search her—and then who knows what we may find? What do you say?"

"I'm afraid I can't agree with you," replied Mr. Smith after a moment's thought. "In the first place, it is too much to do on the evidence we have got. You cannot arrest a man like Staunton as you would an ordinary swindler or thief. He is too big a fish for that net, and if he broke it away goes all our work and a good deal of reputation with it. In the second place some of us would probably die suddenly before the trial, if we got him as far as that, and that would be a waste of useful life.

"Thirdly, you will pardon me if I say that it would be the worst policy to lay Staunton by the heels until we have tracked him or some of his associates to this mysterious money-manufactory of his. If we did someone else would carry on the business just the same, only with greater precautions.

"Fourthly, such a course would destroy all hope of clearing up the fate of Wilfrid Ellerton, which something seems to tell me will somehow prove to be the key to the whole puzzle.

"Fifthly, we must not spoil the prospects of the concert. No, I am quite serious. As I will explain to you later, I hope for other than social and artistic results from that same function. Let us at least wait until that is over till we come to any decision."

"Oh, as to that, most certainly," assented the other, "there can be no harm in waiting that short time, and, besides, now that you have given your reasons, I am inclined to agree with you that caution is the best policy."

"And I am distinctly of the same opinion," added Dennison. "At any rate, for all the ladies' sakes, don't let us spoil the concert. Some of them will have trouble after that, and to spare."

It so chanced that just as this decision was come to, Staunton was saying to Don Ramiero, after a nearly all-night discussion in his room at the Hotel Colline St. Michel at Mentone:

"Very well. It is a desperate step to take, but if it really proves necessary, after the concert will be the time."

There was another man in the room with them. He was the servant who had ushered de Ronski and Dennison into the presence of "Monsieur Justin."

TWENTY-EIGHTH CHAPTER.
On the Yacht Again.

It is scarcely necessary to say that Lady Medcalf-Mears threw herself with all her zeal and energy into the congenial task of helping Mercedes to make the concert on board the Isola the great social event of the season. The original idea had expanded somewhat with consideration, and as it was unlikely that the yacht could get back to her anchorage before morning, it was decided to "make a night of it."

Hence all the guests were to be requested to bring a change of clothing with them, as they would sleep and breakfast on board, and return to Nice in time for lunch.

When the de Ronskis had definitely accepted the invitation, her Ladyship knew that the success of the function was absolutely assured. At least a hundred of the best people in the place were on her visiting list, and on the morning after Cora's triumph at the tables the three were assembled in her drawing-room engaged in the very pleasant occupation of selecting from these the most brilliant company possible—they had fixed the number of invited guests to fifty—when Mercedes received the following telegram from Mentone:

"Keep concert party as far as possible to our own immediate circle. Not more than twenty guests, of whom I shall bring three. Spare no expense to do the thing well.—Staunton."

"Well," exclaimed Mercedes, as she passed the telegram to Lady Medcalf-Mears, "I wonder what on earth papa means by that. We have plenty of room for fifty. What a mercy we had not sent the invitations out. What a lot of enemies we should have made."

Digitized by Google

Yes, indeed it is," replied her ladyship with an undisguised look of disappointment on her handsome, aristocratic features. "Really, my dear, this papa of yours is rather annoying. He does not seem to see that when everyone who is anyone would almost go on their knees for a card, we shall make enemies for life of every man and woman—especially the women—whom we have to leave out, and here he vetoes thirty at one fell swoop. Really it is most difficult."

"I guess Mr. Staunton won't take much stock of that, though," laughed Cora somewhat unfeelingly, for there had already been a rumour that a favoured fifty were to be invited, and the fury of the disappointed ones had its comic side for her.

"It is, of course, a great pity from that point of view, and I quite see what you mean, Lady Medcalf-Mears," said Mercedes with a little chill in her tone. "At the same time I am quite sure that papa would not have told me to do this unless he had some very good reason for it. At any rate, no one can charge him with any lack of hospitality, so it can't be that."

"Oh, of course not, my dear!" exclaimed Lady Medcalf-Mears, who saw at once that she had expressed herself a little too freely, "no one would dream of that. He is the most hospitable and generous man in the world. You must forgive my little outburst. I didn't mean anything.

"But you know all my life I have studied entertaining as an art, and I have never had quite such an opportunity as this. A party of fifty on board that lovely great yacht of yours would have been just perfect. And I could have got such nice people, too. It is just the time."

"Yes, dear Lady Medcalf-Mears," said Mercedes with one of her sweetest smiles, "believe me, I can quite understand your feelings, and if papa cannot give me a very good excuse you can depend upon it that he shall have a thoroughly good scolding. And now let us decide who are to be the favoured twenty—or rather seventeen."

When Mercedes met her father at the station on the morning of the eventful Tuesday, he simply said in reply to her half-reproachful question:

"My dearest, I am sorry if I have disappointed you and the others, especially her Ladyship, as she has been so kind; but, well, in the first place, you know how I hate big parties, particularly on board the yacht, and I never really intended this to be anything more than a little treat to our immediate friends.

"It struck me afterwards that Lady Medcalf-Mears might think she had carte blanche and crowd the ship up as she does her own drawing-room. With ourselves there will be about twenty-five, and that, you must admit, is quite enough, especially if we are to have a little dance on deck afterwards."

Accustomed as she was to obey and trust him in everything, Mercedes at once acquiesced.

"Of course you are perfectly right, father, as you always are," she said, putting her arm through his as they left the station. "Twenty-five will make a perfect party, and we shall know them all well. I have made friends with the de Ronskis, and they are simply delightful—and Paula, she is so lovely that Cora and I are almost ashamed to look in our glasses. Oh, and Cora is engaged to the Grand Duke, and so, of course, he is to be one of the party. She won him nearly a hundred thousand francs at the Casino the other night, and he proposed 'right away,' as Cora would say. They will make a splendid couple, won't they?"

"Splendid," echoed her father somewhat absent-mindedly, for he was thinking many thoughts of far greater import to the world than even the marriage of a Grand Duke, "and from what you tell me he has shown sound financial judgment, as well as excellent taste."

Mercedes went with him on board the yacht to lunch so that she might have a final interview with Dinaud, the head steward, and to satisfy herself that everything was in order for the evening. Staunton went at once to the sanctum, where he found Don Ramiero, who had come on from the station direct, translating some code telegrams.

The Open Door.

A doctor recently received a written request for his professional services, worded thus: "My wife's mother is at death's door. Please come at once, and see if you can pull her through."

Now there are two sides to every door, as there are to every question, and it will be observed that the man with the sick mother-in-law neglected to state to which side of the door he wished the doctor to pull his suffering relative. But we will be charitable, and suppose that he desired to save the patient, though he expressed himself so awkwardly.

When Mrs. Cooper, of 17, York Road, The Hyde, Hendon, was ill about five years ago there was no question as to the anxiety of her friends to save her. Her second child was only a few weeks old, and her life was very essential to her husband and family. It was just then that she became subject to fainting fits, and betrayed great nervousness. The root of the trouble was indigestion—the complaint which only Mother Seigel's Syrup will cure.

"I was sometimes bent double with pain," said Mrs. Cooper on 24th March, 1903, "and was afraid to eat, knowing what the consequence would be. Besides, I had no appetite. Violent headaches, with floating specks before my eyes, assisted to make my life unendurable. Numbness of the hands and feet, and palpitation of the heart, were other bad signs. A doctor who attended me said mine was a case of severe indigestion and nervous debility. He appeared to understand my case, and sent me a great deal of medicine; but the only result of his attention was—bills. Instead of improving, I grew worse. At night I could get no proper sleep, being disturbed by dreams and in constant dread, as of some impending evil.

"It was last Christmas, when I was very ill, that my mother suggested that Seigel's Syrup might benefit me, having proved it to be a splendid thing in other cases. I accordingly tried it, and was greatly astonished at the result. Before I had quite taken one bottle, I felt better. The pain left me, and I improved rapidly. It gave me refreshing sleep, followed by an appetite for breakfast. Soon the headaches and dizziness ceased to trouble me, while my strength increased daily. It is four months since I began to take Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup, and now (thanks to it) I am as well as ever I was in my life."

Of late there has been much contention about the policy of the "open door;" but there can never be contention as to the value of what cured Mrs. Cooper. That was proved 35 years ago, and has been proved every day since.

A Novelist on Marriage.

Thackeray says: "To marry without a competence is dangerous, no doubt; but do not thousands of our fellow-beings commit the crime every year with no other trust but in Heaven, health, and their labour?" Alas, yes! and when (as often happens) the second of these three trusts fails, the third must fail also, and there is a social wreck. Mother Seigel's Syrup is a true friend to the poor and suffering.

Indigestion prevents a man or woman working properly. Its victims easily tire and are always drowsy. Business men cannot afford to employ them. Seigel's Syrup cures indigestion. It removes that load of oppression at the chest after eating, dispels headache, creates appetite, and brightens up the dull sufferer as nothing else will. Mrs. Mary Rogers, Fay Gate, Horsham, Sussex, writing on May 2nd, 1903, says: "I have pleasure in telling you of the benefit I derived from your Seigel's Syrup, when I was suffering from indigestion. My illness began with loss of appetite, and a general low and depressed feeling. I could not eat, and my strength failed rapidly.

"I suffered much from headaches, dizziness, and nervousness, and though I consulted doctors and took quantities of medicine, I got no better until, on the recommendation of a friend, I tried Mother Seigel's Syrup. After taking a few doses I felt myself getting better. My appetite returned, I was again able to sleep soundly, and soon lost the drowsiness, headaches, and dizziness, and was as well as ever. I think Seigel's Syrup is splendid, and shall always recommend it."

Digitized by Google

"Ah," he said, taking one of them up from the table, "then they have replied. All of them?"

"Yes, all," was the reply, "and all say 'yes.' In a month, Señor, the new flag will go up, and we shall have the happiness of saluting you as first President of the United States of South America."

"I hope so, my friend and faithful ally," replied Staunton, flushing slightly, and speaking with a slight tremor of emotion which was not often heard in his voice. "But there is a good deal to be done, and many things may happen in that month. For my part I hold it as little less than a misfortune that our hands should be forced in this ridiculous way just when everything was going on in such perfect order. But some of them shall pay pretty dearly for their treason and their regrettable meddling with affairs which are infinitely above their conceptions."

"It will only be justice," said Don Ramiero, rubbing his hands gently together. "As you say, they have no idea of the great work with which they are interfering. But those who meddle with the machinery of Empire must not be surprised if they get crushed in the wheels. It is too soon to ask you, Señor, how you propose to dispose of—the more inconvenient? Will they become citizens of your other kingdom?"

"It would serve them right to make slaves of the lot," replied the Lord of the Underworld savagely. "As for Billaud, the lake would not be too bad for him, and I should like to make the others watch his last dive. That sham fiddler fellow, too, our old friend Mr. Smith. What an utter fool the idiots must take me for—I, who have the most perfect detective in the world, to be taken in by a childish device like that. Heavens! They shall learn something!"

"I shall be rather sorry for de Ronski, alias Smith," said Don Ramiero reflectively. "He has great genius, and it is a thousand pities that he ruined it by becoming also a policeman. His wife, too, is most charming—and his daughter; was there ever such a perfect union of genius and loveliness?"

"My dear Ramiero, you are getting quite romantic in your old age," said Staunton with a laugh that he would not have liked Mercedes to hear. "I'll tell you what," he went on, taking out a cigar and lighting it, "if it does become necessary to translate these good people to the Underworld, and to abolish friend Smith-de-Ronski, you shall have the reversion of the widow. As for the divine Paula, she will make a delightful diversion from those pale, soulless houris of my little paradise down yonder. How some of them will stare when they open their eyes for the first time after their drug-sleep—as I expect poor Ellerton did. I wonder how he is getting on. Well, I shall be able to pay him a visit, I suppose, before long."

"Ah, I like to see you in those rare moods," laughed Don Ramiero softly, as he rolled a little brown cigarette. "You are a great man, Señor, when you are conquering men by the might of that golden sceptre of yours, but you are most interesting when you let a little of the primeval savage be seen."

"Well, though it is necessary to keep him chained up pretty tightly, the best of us would be poor creatures without him," said Staunton, stretching out his powerful arms and clenching his fists. "But now, my friend," he continued in a changed voice, "let us leave these pleasant themes until we are able to turn them into still more pleasant practice, and get to business. We have a good deal to do before our guests arrive. I think you will find the Señores in the smoking-room. Oblige me by going and telling them that I am ready for them."

Don Ramiero opened the doors and presently returned with the delegates from Chili, Brazil, and the Argentine.

"Now, Señores," said Staunton, when Don Ramiero had closed the doors, "I think you will agree with me that, since we have been compelled to advance our plans so suddenly, there is much to be done and no time to lose, since everything must be in order before we start to-night. Do me the favour of making yourselves comfortable, and then we will get to work."

TWENTY-NINTH CHAPTER.
The Dinner Party.

"Good heavens, how perfectly lovely!" exclaimed Lady Medcalf-Mears as she reached the gangway platform of the Isola a few minutes after seven, the hour for which the guests had been invited. "You naughty girl," she continued, as she shook hands with Mercedes, who, robed and adorned in the very perfection of costly simplicity, was receiving her guests, "then this is why you wouldn't let me come and help you with the final arrangements? Well, if you wanted to give me a surprise, you have done it. I never saw anything so exquisite in my life. You might have had the fairies working for you."

Her ladyship's praises were certainly well merited. The whole stretch of the broad promenade deck from the navigating bridge to the stern had been transformed into such a garden as Eastern romancers never dreamt of. The side rails had disappeared, buried behind sloping banks of the most exquisite flowers that the gardens and hot-houses of Southern France could produce. The Council Chamber, the glass-domed entrance to the saloon, and the smoking-room had vanished also, transformed into mountains of blossom and greenery. An avenue of alternate palms and tree ferns ran down the middle of the main deck. The bridge had become a fairy bower glorious with blooms of every conceivable hue.

Against the after end of the smoking-room and facing a broad stretch of deck, fenced by a semi-circle of palms, was an embowered platform covered like the deck with pale green cloth. At one end of it stood a cream and gold Bechstein grand, and in front a silver, harp-shaped music stand, mute witnesses of pleasures to come.

No more perfect night could have been given even if the weather had been arranged to order. As the sun sank towards the Western horizon behind a veil of mingled amethyst, amber and gold, the full moon rising in the east changed from white to silver, and from silver to pale, burnished gold.

"Ah, how beautiful!" exclaimed Paula, as she came out on deck from the saloon with Mercedes, Cora, and Lady Maud. "Look; look," she continued, gazing from east to west and west to east again.

The dinner was an artistic triumph. Mercedes had taken her father at his word, and there was nothing, solid or liquid, placed on the long broad table in the Isola's saloon which was not of the choicest that taste and skill could select or money buy. Never, even under the blue skies of the Playground of Europe had such a well-pleased company sat down to such an entirely delightful feast.

Thanks mainly to Lady Medcalf-Mears' selective genius the guests harmonised not only with each other but each with all, a result which is admittedly the highest triumph in the gentle art of entertaining. Mercedes, with her youth and her beauty, and her piquante, half foreign manner, suited the circumstances to a marvel, and so she made a perfect hostess. Her father somewhat astonished those of his guests who only knew him as the coldly-calculating, ruthless despot of finance by playing the host with such a modestly genial courtesy that even Kesteven himself began to speculate as to his possible reasons for this new development of character.

Coffee was served on deck about fifteen minutes after the ladies left the table, and when the guests came up they found that yet another transformation had taken place. The little floating fairyland which they had left growing dim in the fading light of the sunset was now glowing in the diffused shimmer of hundreds of tiny electric lights. Chains and wreaths of them hung fore and aft from the great pole-masts and the shrouds. Hundreds more of them glowed half-hidden among the flowers and amidst the gently waving fans of the palm trees. Only about the stage there were no lights visible. It was lit up as though it possessed a luminous atmosphere of its own.

Digitized by Google

The 5 MINUTES PAIN CURE FREE.

THE WIFE OF THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF writes: "Countess Roberts will thank the Lineel Co. to send her another bottle of Lineel Liniment, which is most excellent. She encloses 2/9."

LINEEL LINIMENT

Cures RHEUMATISM	in 5 minutes	Cures TIC	in 5 minutes
Cures NEURALGIA	in 5 minutes	Cures SPRAINS	in 5 minutes
Cures LUMBAGO	in 5 minutes	Cures BRUISES	in 5 minutes
Cures SCIATICA	in 5 minutes	Cures CRAMP	in 5 minutes
Cures GOUT	in 5 minutes	Cures STIFFNESS	in 5 minutes
Cures HEADACHE	in 5 minutes	Cures RHEUMATIC DEAFNESS	in 5 minutes
Cures FACEACHE	in 5 minutes	Cures ALL NEUROTIC And MUSCULAR PAINS	in 5 minute
Cures TOOTHACHE	in 5 minutes
Cures EARACHE	in 5 minutes

Cures COLDS and COUGHS in three or four applications to throat and chest.

LINEEL LINIMENT

Nearly 200 000 Free Bottles of LINEEL LINIMENT have been sent out within the last month, in response to as many letters, which can be seen at the Company's Offices. And in no single instance that has come to our knowledge has it been known to fail in absolutely curing pain in five minutes.

YOU ARE NOT ASKED TO BUY

Simply send a penny stamp for postage, mentioning this paper, and a Free Bottle will be sent by return post. Every day we receive extraordinary and grateful letters, testifying to the efficacy of LINEEL LINIMENT in curing pain. It would cost a lot of money to publish all these, and it is much more convincing and satisfactory to send you a free bottle, so that you may test it yourself.

Sold at all Branches of Boots' Cash Chemists, and by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ and 2/9 per bottle.

LINEEL PILLS Are the best remedy known to Medical Science for INDIGESTION, CONSTIPATION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, and BAD COMPLEXION.

Sold at all Branches of Boots' Cash Chemists and by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ and 2/9 per box.

WRITE FOR MEDICAL LEAFLET

The LINEEL CO. LTD., 16 Bevis Marks, London, E.C.

WOMAN'S DEADLY ENEMIES ARE TOIL & WORRY.

They shorten Life - make it heavy.

WASHING DAY is the day they are active.

THERE'S A REMEDY!!

TRY SAPON THE IDEAL CLEANSER.

NO SCRUBBING! DIRT DROPS OUT"!! CLOTHES UNINJURED! HANDS SMOOTH AND WHITE!!!

"SAPON" DID IT. "IT DOES ITSELF."

FREE PACKET ON RECEIPT OF POSTCARD TO SAPON LTD DEPT. 68 ST SWITHINS CHAMBERS, LONDON.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED).

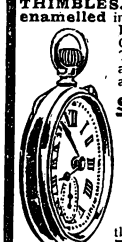
Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil, invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1/4; 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard-Bishop, Devon.

FREE TO ALL.

A Magnificent Lever Watch

Guaranteed for 3 years.

It will not cost you one penny of your own money, and no reader can afford to pass this offer by. We wish to increase the sale of our 1904 Silver Aluminium goods, consisting of the latest Novelty in Real Aluminium FINGER RINGS, and our new IMPROVED THIMBLES. Each Ring and Thimble is beautifully enamelled in Red, Blue, Black, &c., and prettily embossed with the inscriptions: MIZPAH, GOOD LUCK, FORGET-ME-NOT, &c. They are superior to Solid Silver articles at 1/6 each, as they are lighter, stronger, and never tarnish.



SEND NO MONEY.

WE TRUST YOU.

Simply forward your name and address with your promise to sell—or return those unsold—a parcel consisting of 12 Rings and 12 Thimbles at 3d. each (honestly worth three times the money). People rush to buy. When you have sold them send us the 6/-, when you will receive a guaranteed REAL LEVER WATCH (£100 forfeited if not true), or your choice of other splendid prizes from the list we send you. We wish to interest every reader of this paper in our large business, and any further BIG PRIZE offers we may make; so write at once.

Thousands of Testimonials from delighted Home and Colonial Customers.

GOLD & Co., No. 37, The Watch House, Delamere Crescent, London W.

PAWNBROKER'S SALE

Every article in new condition.

SUITABLE FOR PRESENTS.

A full list sent post free on application.

SAVE £ s d

13/6 Gent's magnificent 18-ct. Gold-cased Chronograph Stop Watch, jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper, 10 years' written warranty; also fashionable curb (pocket to pocket) double Albert same quality (stamped and guaranteed), with handsome seal attached; three together.

12/6 Lady's handsome 18-carat gold-cased Keyless Watch, jewelled movement; exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty: also fashionable long watch-guard, same quality (stamped and guaranteed) elegant West-End pattern the two together.

14/9 Furs.—Magnificent Alexandra Dagmar necklet and muff; beautiful real Russian sable hair, worth 4 guineas, not been worn; sacrifice for 14/9; approval willingly.

19/6 Genuine Italian Mandoline, by Stridente, Naples; fine tone; 21 ribbed, real rosewood, pearl and tortoiseshell inlaid, in saddler-made case; approval.

21/- Fine Old Violin, by Pietro Antorious: magnificent rich solo tone; in perfect condition, with fully mounted bow and case; approval.

10/6 Lustrous diamond and ruby Half-hoop Ring, set with 5 matchless doublet rubies and 8 real diamonds; solid gold, hall-marked.

7/6 Curb Chain Bracelet, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case.

6/9 Brooch; very handsome 18-carat rolled gold, 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls in case.

21/- Lady's solid gold Keyless Watch, jewelled in 10 rubies, beautifully engraved case, splendid time-keeper; 10 years' written warranty; week's free trial.

8/6 Fashionable Long Neck-chain; genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished; very choice design.

9/6 Organ Toned Melodeon; magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, and 4 acting stops, including Tremolo and Diapason action; rich powerful tone, perfect order.

9/6 Necklet with Heart Pendant, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern; heart set with pearls and turquoise.

12/6 Magnificent 5-row Pearl Collarette; finest quality, mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case.

Any of the above articles sent on approval willingly.

R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller, 284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

To Asthma Sufferers.

Instant relief is gained in all cases of Asthma, Bronchitis, Croup, and Whooping Cough, by the use of POTTER'S ASTHMA CURE. Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists in Tins at 1/-. Test it free of charge. Send post-card to POTTER & CLARKE, Wholesale Druggists, Artillery Lane, London, E., for Free Sample. Kindly mention this paper.

Ask your grocer for

EPPS'S

(The most nutritious)

COCOA

And take no other.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

Digitized by Google

The land was already fading away into a dim, blue-grey haze, for during dinner the engines had been started at "dead slow" and the Isola had been slipping away seaward for more than a couple of hours without any of the guests being in the least aware of it, so smoothly worked the mighty engines which, at need, were capable of driving her more than forty miles an hour through the water.

Conversation over the coffee and cigarettes was somewhat scrappy and desultory. The subtle spell of a perfect dinner and the magical influence of the almost unearthly surroundings combined against the spoken word and in favour of the unspoken thought.

"No, no," his Highness of Warschaua murmured when he could keep silence no longer, and leaning in his chair towards Cora, "you are right, my dear. This exquisite half hour has not been for talking, no, not even to you. This is not a time to say anything with the lips. It is for the eyes and the souls of men and women to come together in silence—is not that so?"

"Yes," she laughed softly, laying her cheek on her hand and looking into his eyes, "and yet you are talking—but so nicely that I suppose I'll have to forgive you. Ah, see. There's Mr. Staunton taking Madame de Ronski to the piano. We are going to begin. Shall we go and find our seats?"

The stewards had cleared the space in front of the stage and filled it again with low chairs of Russian wicker covered with costly furs and furnished with cushions. Mercedes, as hostess, took the centre chair of the first row. Cora and the Grand Duke sat on her right, and Lady Maud and Iddison on her left. Lady Medcalf-Mears sat between his Highness and Staunton, Kesteven had devoted himself for the time being to Mrs. Corton Vansuyler, a brilliant and wealthy widow hailing from Philadelphia, who would not have had any insuperable objection to joining her millions to his, and the rest of the company arranged themselves according to their convenience and their affinities.

There was, of course, no formal programme. Staunton had decided that it should be an entirely "go as you please" affair. Mercedes and Cora had got a list of promises to "do something" and the order of the doing was left entirely to the performers.

As soon as everyone was seated, Madame de Ronski's fingers rippled over the keys and the Intermezzo from "Cavalleria" instantly hushed the murmur of conversation. There was no applause, as the last chords died away into silence because all the performers had asked Mercedes to let it be understood that none was desired, but people looked at each other and whispered their approval of the perfect rendering.

The hush fell on the company again as de Ronski came out of the smoking-room with his violin and his wife struck the opening chords of the Kreutzer Sonata.

No man with a reputation to keep had ever played before a more cultured and critical audience, and never had an audience heard the diabolical melody made to sound so entirely devilish. Men held their breath and gripped the arms of their chairs hard. Some of the women sat up straight and stared wild-eyed at the magician who was waking such evil echoes in their souls. Others shrank back into the depths of their big chairs and covered their eyes with their hands.

Staunton, to one side of whose nature music spoke as no other form of speech could, listened rigid with clenched teeth, and when the spell was lifted and silence came, he said in his soul:

"I wonder if our friend suspects anything, and whether he means that as a warning. It sounded very like it."

There was then a little interlude. As a matter of fact the audience looked as if they wanted it, so intense had been the strain of following the marvellously interpreted theme.

Then Mercedes answered an inquiring look from Madame de Ronski, who was still seated at the piano, and went on to the stage. She stood in the centre facing the audience but looking up to the sky so that her eyes shone strangely in the moonlight. There came from the piano a sadly plaintive and yet exquisitively sweet melody which only her father and Madame de Ronski had ever heard before, and then she began to sing in Spanish the once famous and now almost forgotten "Lament of the Moor."

As the song drew near to its end, Staunton clenched his teeth tighter and said again in his soul:

"Why did she choose that to sing? It is almost as bad as the Sonata."

He got up from his chair and walked away forward under the bridge.

For the moment even his inflexible purpose seemed to waver and his iron will was almost on the point of melting in that liquid flood of melody which had welled up from the warm depths of his darling's soul.

If she could only have come to his side just then and spoken to him as she had sung, everything might have been changed, but she had gone back to her seat and he heard the opening chords of the Marseillaise ring out from the piano.

He knew what was coming and went back to his seat.

Paula was standing in the middle of the little stage.

She paused for a moment and then the triumphant rhythm of the Marseillaise crashed out from the piano and the soldier's soul spoke again from her lips as she sang, her voice rising clear and high above the exulting tumult of the notes.

As the last defiant notes rang out his melting mood had passed completely away. The magic of the melody which had rung in ears of thousands of dying heroes had hardened his resolve into steel again. He got up and held out his hand to Paula as she came down from the stage and said in French:

"A thousand thanks, mademoiselle. That was magnificent. It was not only music, it was more, if that is possible."

Those of the audience who knew him were rather surprised to see Iddison get up next and borrow Cora's banjo. No one in the company had credited the quiet-spoken, reserved engineer with anything approaching a gift for entertaining, saving only Sister Janet who had heard him tinkle his banjo and half sing, half recite Kipling's "Soldier Ballads" to his accompaniment on the far-away veld.

When he went back to his seat Lady Maud put her hand on his arm and whispered:

"You dear. I had no notion you could do anything of that sort, and you did it perfectly. How did you learn it?"

"Oh, it comes to one out there, you know," he said a little awkwardly. "One has to do something to help the fellows through their troubles, and I thought it might be a bit of a change for them here."

"It was splendid," she replied, getting up, "and now it's my turn."

There was another interlude and then de Ronski came back with his violin.

In a few moments Paula had taken her father's place. Her mother turned away from the keyboard and looked into Mercedes' eyes until as though by some magnetic influence she drew her glance to hers and Paula began singing with all the strength of her soul and the sweetness of her voice:

"When other lips and other hearts——"

As she went on the echoing voices spoke louder and louder, and with ever-increasing insistence until they filled the long vacant chamber in the dwelling-place of Mercedes' soul. She sat still as though the magic of the old-familiar song had turned her into stone, until as the sweet, long-drawn notes of the last refrain—

"Then you'll remember me," went soaring up into the silence from the singer's lips, she started to her feet, clasped her hands over her eyes, and cried with half a sob and half a laugh in her voice:

"Yes, yes, I do remember now. Wilfrid, dearest, where are you?"

And then she fell back on to her chair, covered her face with her hands, and began to sob as though some great sorrow had suddenly fallen upon her.

(Another long instalment of this serial next week.)

Digitized by Google

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

"The Most Perfect Form of Cocoa."—Guy's Hospital Gazette.

"A PERFECT FOOD."

TRY ALSO

FRY'S COCOA AND MILK,

A COMBINATION OF

FRY'S PURE COCOA with the BEST ENGLISH MILK.

Made instantly with Boiling Water. No Milk or Sugar Required.

Hermetically Sealed Tins, 1/- each.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Beware of Friends!

THE old saying, "Don't introduce your donah to a pal," has again proved its truth in the case of "B. C." He was "keeping company" with a girl for nine months, when he introduced her to two of his supposed best friends. On the sly, at different times, they have both asked her to give him up, and go with them. As the young lady likes him, she said she would not. He doesn't know whether or not to pay them out in the old English fashion.

* * * * *

The best way to pay them out, "B. C.," is to let them see that you and the girl are not to be separated by evil speakers. The "old English" method is not to be advised in any case, unless it is provoked by deliberate insult or injury. The best guard against slander is to ignore it, and let facts speak for themselves.

A Hapless Colonial.

"T. A. C." is in a strange position. He is an Australian, and has been in England for two months. In his own Colony he always got on well with the girls, but here he does not seem so fortunate. All the nice girls, he says, seem to be booked. How, he asks, can he get on with British girls?

* * * * *

Your complaint is quite unusual, "T. A. C." My idea is that Colonial men usually attract British girls more than the home variety. Their manners are more open and frank, they are usually sportsmen and manly, and, in appearance, can give the home-bred man many points. If you fail with the girls, it must be very hard luck on your part, or perhaps sheer incapacity to make yourself understood by them. Try again, very hard, in the Colonial fashion, and if it doesn't succeed, well, I fear there must be something a bit wrong about you.

Dances with the Other Girl.

"JESSIE" writes: "A friend of mine is in love with a young fellow. Sometimes he is very attentive to her, but at others he is just the reverse. They meet twice a week at a dancing class, every Monday and Friday. On Tuesday nights he has every other dance with my friend, but on Fridays he does not come near her, but dances all the time with one other girl. What do you understand this to mean?"

* * * * *

I think there is very little doubt that he is more in love with the Friday girl than with your friend, or why should he give himself up entirely to her on that night, whereas he only spares half his dances for your friend on Tuesdays? There is, though, just the bare possibility that the Friday girl dances very well, and that the young man gives her the preference on that account. Off-hand, though, I certainly advise your friend not to give her heart to a young man who is evidently not very deeply in love with her.

Cousins' Love.

"I AM going out with a cousin," writes "A." "Our names are the same, but she is three years older than I My mother does not like my going with her. We have been together for two years. Is there any reason why we should not be lovers?"

* * * * *

Marriages between cousins are not, of course, always wise. But the exception proves the rule, when there is any very strong affection. However, be sure that you have a real love for her, and not merely a feeling of friendship. Companionships between cousins are often very delightful, but should not be mistaken for the affection of lovers.

An Awkward Vow.

"DORIS" writes: "I am eighteen, and a short time ago had two young men friends. I saw a lot of one of them, but he was jealous of the other and used to tease me about him. Once he made me so angry, that I made a vow never to speak to him again, but since then I have grown to like him much better, and he has asked me to walk out with him again. But I do not like to break my vow, so would you kindly tell me the best thing to do?"

* * * * *

Vows are very silly things to make, "DORIS," at eighteen. They are consoling enough at the time, but one regrets them afterwards—and rarely keeps them. If you really do like the young man—and I imagine you do—give him another chance, and go with him again. Perhaps he will have now learnt not to be too much of a tease.

A Quick Lover.

"A SHORT time ago," says "H. M. R.," "I met a widower who told me he wished to meet with a steady, respectable woman, with a view to marriage. A short time after he wrote to me saying he should like me, and wanted me to write to him. I did so, and in reply he said he wished me to become engaged to him. How would you answer the letter? I like him fairly well."

* * * * *

It seems rather sudden to ask a lady to become engaged after one meeting and two letters. He is evidently a man of little ceremony. Perhaps he is the better for that. Anyhow, "H. M. R.," I should not advise you to marry on such slender acquaintance. Tell him you wish to know him better before committing yourself, and then make up your mind after future meetings.

Jack's Predicament.

WHEN "JACK" was in the country during the summer, he met a girl who made herself very agreeable to him. Being of a gallant disposition, "JACK" thought it only right to return the sentiment, so took her out a lot and was generally very nice. But he did not feel anything else towards her than mere amiability. "JACK" however, rather fears she misunderstood his attentions, for she has now written asking him to meet her in London, evidently with a view to developing their friendship. Should "JACK" take any notice of the request, seeing that he does not himself care for her at all?

* * * * *

If "JACK" was amiable and friendly with the girl in the country, I see no reason why he should not be the same in London. I do not see why he need commit himself to seeming to be in love with her. Certainly let him meet the girl in London, and make himself as agreeable as before. She would be offended if he refused to do so.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

FOR A TIME

Constipation and Indigestion may give rise to nothing more serious than a distressed feeling or discomfort due to an overworked or impoverished condition of the Digestive Organs. A dose or two of will easily put this right, but if neglected—if the early symptoms are disregarded—what a burden of illness may be the consequence!

BEECHAM'S PILLS

Biliousness, Sick-Headache, Nervous Debility,

Liver and Kidney Troubles,

are all caused by some important organ or organs failing to do their duty properly. No one who values life can further neglect the warning symptoms.

The best and wisest, as well as the simplest plan, is to take a course of

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

This wonderful medicine is specially suitable for females of all ages. Every woman who values health should read the instructions wrapped round each box.

Sold Everywhere in Boxes, 1s. 1½d. (56 Pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 Pills).

YOU WILL MISS A LOT of really good cheap Music IF YOU ARE NOT IN TIME.

Beecham's Music Folio (Comprising Six Hundred specially selected Songs and Pieces) is now complete in 20 Volumes, and no more books in this familiar form will be issued when the present stock is exhausted, but in due time the proprietor of BEECHAM'S PILLS will have something to offer to supplement his first successful Music publishing. In the meantime, BEFORE IT IS TOO LATE, all lovers of Music should secure a complete set. Each of the 20 volumes contains Thirty Songs and Pieces, either old gems or some of the most popular songs of the day. The Music is printed on stout paper from well engraved plates, perfectly correct, and the songs have all the original symphonies and pianoforte accompaniments in full, and no effort has been spared in the selection and production to make them the cheapest and best collection of music published.

To be had from most Newsagents, Booksellers and Music Dealers for Twopence per Volume, but should any difficulty be experienced in obtaining the Books they will be sent post free by the proprietor for Threepence per Volume. Complete set, post free, 4s. (Stamps or P.O.) Address—The Proprietor of Beecham's Pills, St. Helens, Lancashire. Send half-penny stamped envelope for list of contents.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 782. Week ending December 26, 1903. Price One Penny.

"I THREW MY LOVER THE KEY! WOULD HE BE IN TIME TO SAVE ME?"

(A Dramatic, Thrilling Episode from the Story, "AT THE MERCY OF A MANIAC." See inside.)

Google

VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE

The purest and most efficient Remedy procurable for
COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, CATARRH, WEAK LUNGS, and CHILDREN'S COUGHS.

BRONCHITIS AND ASTHMA

Veno's Lightning Cough Cure Produces its most brilliant effect in Chronic Bronchitis and Asthma. It effects astonishing cures in the worst and most persistent cases.

Rev. W. W. TULLOCH, D.D., Bonar Bridge, Sutherlandshire, writes: "July 22nd, '03.—I have been a martyr to asthma all my life and lately to chronic winter bronchitis. I have found Veno's Lightning Cough Cure a valuable medicine."

CHILDREN'S COUGHS

Mrs. ADA S. BALLIN, 5, Agar Street, London, Editor "Womanhood," and a great authority upon children's diseases, writes:—"Veno's Lightning Cough Cure is an exceedingly successful remedy; it is very pleasant to take and the relief it gives is very rapid. The preparation is perfectly safe for children."

W. LASCELLES-SCOTT, F.R.M.S., in his Certificate of Analysis among other things says:—"I have pleasure in certifying that in my opinion VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH COUGH is an exceptionally pure, safe, and effective preparation

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES 9½d. Regular Sizes, 1/1½ and 2/9.

Ask for VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE at Chemists and Drug Stores, or post free from the VENO DRUG CO., Hulme, Manchester, England.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache and Neuralgia.

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Kaputine is not a single crude drug such as has been condemned as dangerous by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients, having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The SAFE Remedy.

Kaputine is the only preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and infirmaries. Proof positive of its superior and sterling qualities.

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1½; Samples 1d. each.

Kindly mention this paper.

DEATH TO DIRT!

FREE TRIAL PACKET

on receipt of post-card to Sapon Ltd., Dept. 68, St. Swithin's Chambers, London.

'SAPON' makes Washday Playday.

For Woollens, Silks, Laces, Blouses, Delicate Fabrics, and for all Home Washing.

BODLEIAN 23-12-1903 LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

No. 782.] [One Penny.

Week Ending December 26th, 1903.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

AT THE MERCY OF A MANIAC.

The Thrilling Story of how a Young Girl was Rescued.

"Staysails, February 22, 18—.

"Dearest Kate,—'My Kate' you used to be in the old schooldays. You and I have seen too little of each other these last seven years. Whether the fault be mine or yours, let us retrieve ourselves. Come to me on the 26*th and make a charming addition to my Lenten house party. I hear the most delightful things of your music, and that your two years in Leipsic did wonders for you. Come and verify this, as well as all the other nice things I hear said of you. You will if you are the same old Kate you used to be. Let me know your train, for which I enclose a ticket, and I will drive over to meet you at the station.—Yours, with love and the usual hurry,*

"Fanny Colgate-Rives."

"I want you to go, Kate," said my brother after I had finished reading this letter to him. "I want you to go and have the very best time of your life. Heaven knows you do not get any too much pleasure out of your studies and a lot of stupid pupils, confound them! It is a shame that a woman like you should be wasted on such a life."

"But, dear," I cried, with a quick rush from the piano stool over to the lounge on which he lay before the little open grate. "I am not wasted on you, and really and truly, Tom, I am happier with you than with anybody else in the world." Which was quite true, although Tom and I lived in a flat, six flights up, without a lift. The neighbourhood suited us admirably, unfashionable and inexpensive, bordering close upon the confines of Abingdon Square.

Ever since a crushing reversal of fortune had come upon us, Tom and I had tried to make the best of things, and, truth to tell, we had succeeded, he, as an illustrator of magazine stories, and I as a teacher of music. We both worked hard, and I think that the fact that we did so was the secret of our content, that, and not trying to keep up appearances, which is after all the surest way of letting down one's temper, unless it be to live for acquaintances. We dropped all ours. We had had them by hundreds. And, in their stead, we took up such friends as cared for us for ourselves.

With Mrs. Colgate-Rives' letter of invitation still in my hand, I sat down on the rug in front of Tom, and he began to play with my hair and to blow rings from his cigar through its curls.

All rights reserved.]

"Kate," he said, after a little, "I wonder if that last remark of yours is quite true?"

"It is quite true," I said, putting my cheek against his hand, "you are the best and dearest of all, and I am always happy with you."

"Oh, what a blarney stone it is!" answered Tom. "But, do you know, my girl, I only half believe you. I cannot help believing that—that——" and he hesitated, as people who are sensitive do when they are treading on delicate ground.

"That what, dear?" I asked very softly, knowing very well what was coming.

"Well, then, I have sometimes thought about Crawford." Seeing that I made no reply, he went on: "Crawford is just the best fellow I know, and it breaks me all up to think that anything should come between you and him."

"But nothing has," I said.

"Yes, something has," he said. "Something has, Kate, and, by Jove, it's an infernal shame, for if ever two mortals ought to be together, it's you and Doctor Dick Crawford."

No response coming from me he continued: "He doesn't come here any more, and he used to be here every day. And the last time he did come, you were cold to a degree. You barely looked at him; you treated him outrageously, really. And, Kate, now that I look back upon it, you were not attractive, sitting up like an iceberg on the piano-stool, playing classical tunes and boring us both to death. What did you do it for? What on earth did you do it for, Kate?" he repeated, putting his hand on my shoulder with something that came very near being a shake.

"Why I treated Dr. Crawford as I did, is a matter of very little consequence either to him or to me," I flung out with a sudden rising inflection to my voice. "But, since you take it so much to heart, I will tell you. It was," I cried, throwing back my head with a tilt, "it was because you and I have made a mistake. He is not at all the kind of man we thought he was, and," with a throb in my voice which I could not control, "he does not care for me, and I have been a fool, a fool," I continued, crushing back the tears, "and the sooner I am cured of my mistake the better."

But for once the sympathy I looked for was withheld.

"Rot—tommy-rot!" was all my brother said.

"It's like a man to take the part of another man."

Digitized by Google

"But I don't take his part, he doesn't need it."

"Go on, go on!" I retorted, drawing away from him. "Next, I suppose, you'll be taking her part."

"What!" he cried. "Her part? Do you mean to say, Kate, there is a woman in it?"

I nodded my head in sorrowful triumph.

"Well, then, some meddling idiot has been lying to you, Kate. In all the years he has known you, Dick Crawford has never looked at another woman."

"But he has," I asserted sadly, "I've seen it."

"Go on, tell me about it, Kate."

Once more the kind hand was on my shoulder.

"Well," I said, "the first time I noticed it was at the last Military Tournament. It may have been going on before, but that was the first time he made his admiration for another woman apparent to me. You remember, we three went there together. You had left us, and he and I were laughing and talking together, when, all at once, he became silent, preoccupied. I made some trifling remark to him, to which he made no reply. I saw that he was looking away from me over to one of the boxes. In fact, his eyes were fastened upon a woman who sat there. She was a beautiful woman, exquisitely dressed. A crowd of men were about her, and, although she smiled upon them, yet I could see they bored her. Somehow her eyes never seemed to smile with her lips, but flashed with a cold glitter, as though the tenderness of tears was too little known to them. His gaze was so riveted upon this woman that I was obliged to speak twice to him before he heard me.

"'You seem to find her interesting,' I said.

"When he became aware of my existence, he replied: 'I do, overwhelmingly so, more than I thought she could be,' and, with his gaze still resting on her beautiful face, he went on:

"'I came here to-night because I hoped for this opportunity to see her.'

"His frankness made me indignant."

"Naturally so," said Tom.

"Murmuring something about her beauty, I tried not to betray my agitation. I need not have given myself any uneasiness on that score, for his looks, as well as his thoughts, were still on the mysterious stranger.

"'Who is she?' I said at last.

"This time, not because it was I who had asked the question, but because the woman had left the box, he answered me. He drew his hand wearily across his eyes, as though he had been undergoing a severe mental strain. And then he answered in the tone of one awakening from a dream, 'She is a Hungarian, the Countess Czarmay.'"

"What," said Tom, sitting bolt upright on the lounge, "not the woman they call the Countess Lara?"

"Yes, I remember that was her name. Do you know her, Tom?"

"Only by reputation, and that is quite enough. For if all that is said of her temper and her tantrums is true, wildcats are angelic animals in comparison with the Countess. She is as cruel as she is charming, and as shameless as she is wellbred. She is received at every court in Europe. But, to my mind, there is only one court where such ladies should be received, and that is the police court.

"But, Kate," he said, with a vicious dab at the fire with the poker, "it's preposterous that Dr. Dick," falling into our familiar name for him, "should have any other than a passing interest in such a creature. He is too earnest a fellow, too thoroughly a man of the world, and, above all, too much given over to his profession to go mooning about at a blue-eyed wildcat."

"But he does, all the same," I cried. "Why, he goes to the Opera every night she is there, although he gave us the impression that life was too short to spend his time away from his studies, anywhere but here. He goes to the Opera, and, from my seat in the dress circle, I have seen him, night after night, with that same absorbed, intent look with which he regarded her that night at the Tournament."

"So you might see me looking at every smartly dressed subject for my sketches. Why, hang it! I've followed a woman for miles, just to get the proper effect of her skirt."

"Yes, dear, but this is different. I am not fanciful about it. I tell you the Countess has cast her spell over Dr. Dick, and all that I can do is to cure myself of my folly, and so," I said, "I am going to accept Fanny Rives' invitation."

"Well," at last said Tom, "if it is true, but, mind you, Kate, I do not say it is true, Dick Crawford is the fool, not you, and I am glad matters have gone no further between you than they have."

"Tom is right," I said to myself, as I put my braided locks down on my pillow that night. "It certainly is fortunate that I did not commit myself to a formal engagement of marriage to Dr. Richard Crawford."

But just how fervent was my gratitude to Providence it would be hard to say.

"Kate," said Tom, before we were off to our work the next morning, "do you know that you are rather a good-looking girl, but"—looking me over with a critical eye—"yours is the beauty that needs adornment. Here, put this in your purse and buy yourself some swell togs, and you'll be the handsomest woman at Staysails, and, what's more, you will have all the men at your feet."

"Yes, and all the women at my head, pulling my hair. Oh, Tom! Tom!" I cried, with my arms about his neck, "you are the best and most generous, but listen to me, dear. Your money would be wasted. The women whom I shall meet at Fanny Rives' only care for clothes when they are on their own backs, and for a music teacher to approach a millionaire in the smartness of her attire would be put down against her as a crime. If they like me, it will be because they cut a much finer figure than I do. And as for the men, all that they need is appreciation, which costs nothing, poor dears! But you may give me something for tips to the servants. That is all I shall need."

Tom only half acquiesced in my views of the situation, and looked on somewhat disapprovingly the morning of my departure, at the sparse contents of my trunk. As he shut down its lid I said:

"There is one thing I wish I did have, Tom, a tea-gown. I have nothing in that way but that hideous, old, grey atrocity, which you detest so. 'Women at house parties are supposed to chatter in each other's rooms in lovely gowns. I can't chatter in mine with any satisfaction."

But that afternoon, when I unpacked my trunk in my pretty room at Staysails, lo, and behold! what should I come upon but a lovely tea-gown of Liberty silk, heavenly blue, with waves of white lace foaming all over it.

"It looks like that," said Fanny Rives, pointing to the sea outside my window, where the white caps rose and fell upon the blue waves. "What a dear your brother must be. It's very becoming," reverting to the wrapper. "Keep it on for five o'clock tea in the music-room. We dine at eight. You won't see the men till then. The women will be there. Let me see, we have had so much to talk about that I haven't told you who is here. There's Kittie Cruger, and Sallie Neilson, the Lawrence girls, and Belle Wetmore; Constance Cushman, Angelica Bayard, yourself, myself—that makes eleven," running them over on her fingers, "the twelfth is the most extraordinary creature," she said; "she is your next-door neighbour. The other women are all more or less pretty and agreeable, but they are no more like her than a bullet is like a globule of quicksilver. Whilst they are content to sit still, she is here, there, and everywhere. She goes in all directions, each one more charming than the other. She speaks every language, paints, models in clay, is a superb horsewoman, sings divinely. Hush, hear that!" she said, with upraised finger.

It was a woman's voice, singing to herself a melody in a minor key which sounded like a wail from an Irish wake. But I knew it, the air was not Celtic, but Hungarian, an old song of the Tzigane, which Brahms had transcribed for the piano. The voice, sweet and sensuous, fell on my soul with a prescience of evil to come. I looked at the pine trees where there were no birds, and beyond them across the snow to the sca, where there were no ships, and I thought of the friend I had lost, and life's emptiness swept over me, just as that beautiful voice swept over the twilight, and filled its dusk with sadness for things lost and remembered.

Digitized by Google

For a moment a nameless horror made me tremble from head to foot, and then the singer was in the room. I suppose that Fanny presented me to her in due form, but I really don't recollect. I only knew that the Countess Czarmay, a cloud of fluttering pink chiffon, a wealth of lovely fur, golden hair, piled high on the picturesque head, smiles and blue eyes, stood before me, and that both my hands were in hers, with the long, slender fingers, in their turquoise rings, twined about mine, and that, looking into the Madonna-like face, all the ugly tales I had heard about her were forgotten, and I was telling her how glad I was to meet her.

"Come," said Fanny, with a light laugh, "let us go down to the music-room," for I was talking to the Countess of my passion—music—as I had rarely spoken to anyone, "the others are there, and you," turning to me, "will be delighted to play the Countess' accompaniments."

Fanny's music-room was an apartment of so much beauty that I could not keep from commenting upon it. "Ah!" said the Countess, "that is because it is better to love music than to be a musician, for musicians have no sense of the æsthetic. They never feel discords of form, or colour. I sometimes think that all beauty, except that of tone, is wasted upon them."

The only light in the room, which was long and high, fell from tall stands of carved wood, on which were placed branches of silver, whose twisted arms held clusters of wax candles. These stood on either side of the piano. All the rest of the room was shadowy and dim, except when the great logs of wood on the open hearth sent up a flame more ruddy than usual. Then I could see that the faces of the women who reclined on low divans and cushioned chairs, grew soft and tender, as they listened to our music. Between songs I felt like one in a dream. But the Countess busied herself about the tea-table. She was like a child at its first party, making a pretty little comedy over heating the water in the samovar, and putting the tea to steep in its silver urn. That harmonious half hour was the prelude to the days that followed.

I was constantly in the companionship of the Countess.

"I am enthralled by her," as I wrote to Tom. "You ask me if I like her, this enchanting Countess? I can only answer, 'I am fascinated by her.' She leads me round by the nose, as she does all the others. Soon she will have me smoking cigarettes and drinking Sliwitz, a kind of Hungarian brandy distilled from bomb-shells. Her influence is not unlike these two pet indulgences of hers. It stimulates, but does not revivify; so that after I leave her a sort of collapse comes on, where I was buoyant I am depressed. In fact, I go to pieces. But, all the same, I am anxious to get back to her."

I might have added, with truth, that it flattered my vanity that the doctor should have left me to pay court to a being of such incomparable charm as the Countess. But I did not say this, in fact, the doctor's name never passed either my pen, nor my lips, and in the pleasurable ease of my life at Staysails, I was cheating myself into the consolation that he was forgotten.

It was the last day of my visit, but the Countess had been persuaded to stay on a week longer.

She and I were sitting in her room after luncheon, indulging in a "little chat," before her open wood fire.

"Here's a pretty to do," cried Fanny, putting her head in at the door, "Ned" (her husband), "has just had a telegram from an old college friend of his, saying that he will run down to-night on the 9.45 train from town. Ned won't put him off, and I think it's too provoking, when he knows the house is full, and there isn't a place for the man to lay his head."

The Countess took a puff at her cigarette before she spoke. "Let him come, my dear Fanny, it is the unexpected in life that makes it worth living. See!" pointing to a curtained alcove where her maid slept—"there is Ilma's bed. Send her to the servant's quarters, and let Miss Robertson come in here with me, if she will," she said, with a smile to me.

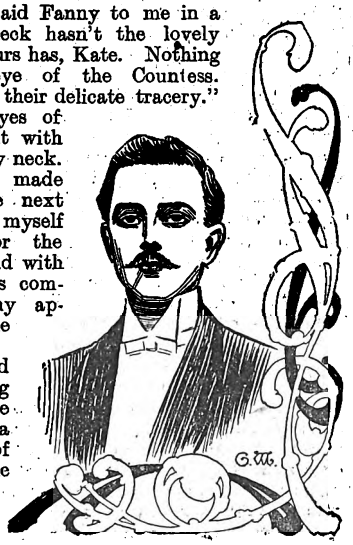
And so matters were settled to Fanny's satisfaction, as well as my own.

A snowstorm had set in that morning, and I gave a commiserating thought to the traveller, who would have to brave the drifts which, by this, were making the roads almost impassable. Fanny had persuaded me to put aside, for our last dinner at Staysails, the high-necked bodice which I usually wore, and, in its stead, to wear a low corsage of jet and lace which she gave me.

"How well you look in it, Kate," she said, when we met just before dinner. "I wish this man whom Ned is precipitating upon me could see you. And that reminds me that I never even asked his name, I was so provoked at Ned."

Here a little stir among Fanny's guests told that the Countess Czarmay was in the room. She was as lovely and fresh as the Spring-time, in a gown of green gossamer, the tint of the earliest buds on the trees. Embroidered on its delicate fabric were garlands of oak leaves and acorns, in glossy shades of brown and green. Bands of Russian sable bordered the low corsage, and set off the creamy tint of her neck and the firm swell of her bust. A court train of green velvet, edged with the fur of the sable, fell in graceful lines from her waist. Her jewels were emeralds. The necklace about her throat was fashioned in the form of a serpent, so flexibly wrought that it moved with every breath its wearer drew. Through the wonderful gold of her glorious hair gleamed the green radiance of still more emeralds, wrought by a cunning artificer, in smaller forms to match the serpent around her throat. The long gloves of Suede that wrinkled over her restless arms, were of a soft wood colour, and at her breast she wore an immense bunch of Parma violets.

"She is a dream," said Fanny to me in a half-tone, "but her neck hasn't the lovely blue veins in it that yours has, Kate. Nothing escapes the artistic eye of the Countess. See how she is admiring their delicate tracery."



True enough, the eyes of the Countess were bent with a peculiar look upon my neck. Something in her gaze made me shudder, but the next moment I called myself morbidly fanciful, for the Countess, in French, and with her sweetest smile, was complimenting me on my appearance, as she led the way in to dinner.

She was the life and soul of that last evening at Staysails. As the storm rose with a mighty crescendo of wind and snow, the recklessness of her mood grew wilder and wilder.

Digitized by Google

The songs she sang were all in praise of wine, and love, and death. "Tokay! Tokay!" She flung the words from between her clenched teeth, as she would defy the gale. "Tokay! Tokay!" she screamed in the face of each fresh blast. Her excitement was infectious, and soon she had all the men and women lifting their glasses high in the air, and shouting the refrain. "Tokay! Tokay!" And then, the fever of her spirits rising still higher, she asked me to play her a Hungarian dance—a gipsy dance.

Whilst the others were clearing a circle on the polished floor of the music-room, she was freeing herself, with impatient hands, from her long train of velvet and sable. At the first bar of the music, she tore it from her, as if glad to be free from its restraining dignity, and flung it roughly aside. Her face was no longer that of a Madonna. She had tossed that off, as a woman does a mask at a revel's height. The whirling figure, with the glittering green serpents writhing about her head, was like a gipsy. I doubt if any of the women, I cannot speak for the men—knew what abandon meant before they saw this dance, as danced that night by the Countess Czarmay. Beholding the lawless grace of her supple body, I could well believe one of the tales I had heard of her—that she was gipsy born. No one but a gipsy could have danced as she did. So fleet were the circles of her flying feet that her skirts curled about her in spiral lines of green. She seemed like a flame licked into life from unholy fires, and had she suddenly darted up the chimney, to disappear into the forces of the storm, which was now at its height, it would have seemed only a fitting fulfilment of Nature's law of restoration.

But nothing of this sort happened. Panting and quivering, with white face and dishevelled hair, the dancer finally flung herself down among the cushions of the divan. Here the men gathered about her, but the women stood aloof in shocked little groups, whispering among themselves.

It was now close upon midnight. The storm had somewhat subsided. Fanny went to the window, and drawing its curtains aside, we saw how white the world was with snow.

"I am looking to see," she said, "if there is a sign of Ned's man. He sent the brougham over to meet the 9.45 train, but I doubt if it gets back to-night. The storm is frightful."

Nobody seemed to care very much whether it did or not, and after a few commonplaces the party broke up, the women going to their rooms, and the men following their host to the smoking-room, to await, over their pipes and toddy, the arrival of his friend.

The Countess and I were at last alone. It became manifest to me that an unusual silence possessed her. But I put this down to a reaction from the gaiety of the evening. As I made my preparations for the night, I could see, from my little room in the alcove, that she had got herself into a loose gown of scarlet silk, in which she sat, with her back turned to me, before the fire.

Her head was bent forward, and her hair fell on either side of her face in great sweeps of gold. She was intent upon something which she held upon her knees. So absorbed was she in this object, whatever it may have been, that she sat like one turned to stone. The rigidity of her attitude made me apprehensive of—I knew not what.

I turned to go to her, but just then, I saw that the long right arm of the Countess was moving back and forth with the mechanical regularity with which one sets out to accomplish some well-defined task. She had once told me that she was an expert maker of lace.

I tried to reassure myself that this was what she was now doing, or, perhaps, polishing the long, shell-like nails of her beautiful hands. But in the motion of that arm, in its hanging red sleeve, there was nothing feminine. The storm had sunk into a stillness as profound as that of the Countess. I am not naturally nervous, but I now felt myself possessed by an unaccountable feeling of terror.

It was with a sensation of security that I heard, far in the distance, the air stirred by the sound of carriage-wheels. I was glad to know that the next room would not be empty, and that its occupant would soon be within reach of my voice. The carriage was slowly approaching the house, but the Countess, still crouching over her task, paid no attention to it. Unable to longer sustain the suspense of a situation which was fast throwing me into a panic, I suddenly cried out:

"What are you doing there, dear Countess Lara?"

"Come here," she said, without turning her head. "Come here, and see for yourself what I am doing."

In my nightdress, and with bare feet, I lightly crossed the room to where she sat. Bending over her, I saw that in her left hand she held a slab of some hard, greyish substance, and in her right hand, the hand which never stayed its motion, she held a long, thin knife. There was something so unlooked for, and, at the same time, so sinister, in the aspect of that blade with the cruel edge, in the delicate, muscular hand, moving backwards and forwards, with diabolical monotony, that, involuntarily, I exclaimed:

"Good Heavens! What are you going to do with that horrible thing?"

"I am going to cut your throat from ear to ear."

The voice in which these words were spoken, more than the words themselves, froze my blood with horror, for it was the voice of the insane. I am gifted with what musicians call the acute ear, and voices to me are character. The voice of the Countess Czarmay, as I now heard it, conveyed to me the intelligence that she was a maniac. The words were nothing. Had she merely wished me a pleasant evening I would have known that the voice which enunciated the words was that of a being from whom reason had fled. I made no reply, trying to think what I could do to save myself. She had locked the door, I remembered, after we had entered the room, and a hurried glance showed me that the key was not in the keyhole.

Meanwhile the carriage had come to a standstill. The men were out on the front steps, giving the belated traveller welcome.

My frenzied thought was to rush to the window beneath which they were laughing and talking, and to cry out to them for help. But to do this would be folly, for before they could have reached me, the knife would have done its work. I realised that my only hope lay in being able to outwit the Countess, and to temporise with her until I could find means to escape. At all events, until the man should be established in the next room. Not that I knew how he could save me, but, somehow, I felt that in him lay the one chance of saving my life.

But he must come swiftly, for I saw certain signs of restlessness that told me the Countess was growing impatient.

Good Heavens! What if he should join the men in the smoking-room? A cold sweat broke out over me. Ten minutes there might be fatal. I could hear the voices growing fainter as the door closed on the men. Fortunately, the Countess was so completely dominated by her mad desire, that none of these sounds had made themselves audible to her. There was but one object in the world of which she was cognisant, the object on which her eyes were fixed with a raving glare, the little blue spot on my neck, where the vein lay under the flesh. With her eyes still fastened there, I saw that she was trying to speak, but she was so rocked by a horrible transport that the words came from her in clotted incoherence.

"Temptress, temptress!" she hissed out. "It's your fault that I am going to do this. I like you, I don't want to kill you, but I have to do it. I never thought of it until I saw that—that—that," she said, pointing with the knife at my neck. "It arouses a craving which nothing can satisfy but blood. I cannot resist it. Once before," and her voice died down to a whisper, "I was tempted in Buda Pesth. She was a pretty creature, and the blood in her veins was young, and when it streamed on my hands," and she softly rubbed her palms together in diabolical reminiscence, "it made me warm, too. Oh, so warm!" and a low laugh gurgled in her throat and was drowned there, with a torrent of words which came from her like a hemorrhage. "They tried to lock me up. They watched me for days—days—days! But I fooled them all. Doctors! Bah! I had money to buy them, and beauty to beguile them. They called me mad, but there was more reason in my madness than in their sanity. Besides, I am not mad. By nature I am gentle, tender, loving, until I see that—that, and the craving comes to make me cruel. When I sung and danced this evening I was a demon and it was you who made me so. You made me so with that. Do you hear, with that?"

Digitized by Google

I did hear the sickening words, but notwithstanding the terror they inspired, I moved nearer to the Countess, for lying, not two steps from me, I saw, half hidden in the long, white fur rug, where she must have dropped it in her preoccupation, the key to the door. I slid my bare foot along very stealthily until it was in such a position as made it easy for me to slip my toe through the handle of the key. If fitted like a ring to a finger, and the folds of my long nightdress fell about it and hid it from view.

My courage rose from the contact of the metal on my instep. Besides, I heard the door of the smoking-room open, and the voices of the men in the hall, bidding good-night to the man who was to be in the next room, and I knew that in a few more moments he would be there. But, until he should get there, it behoved me to successfully divert the Countess. However, before I could speak, she had bounded from her chair, to throw herself roughly in front of me and to hold the knife up to my throat. Had I flinched, that moment would have been my last. By a superhuman effort of my will, I kept under control the overcharged battery of my nerves, and managed, for the first time, to catch and to hold the shifting eyes of the Countess.

"You are too calm—too calm!" she muttered. "Are you trying to fool me? Do you know what I am going to do?"

My words had to pass over the steel of that awful knife when they left my throat, but I kept the tremors from my voice, and my eyes looked straight into the eyes that were trying to get away from mine.

"Yes, I know what you are going to do, dear Countess, but I am not ready yet to die. Let me have a few moments in which to prepare to meet my Maker."

With bursting eardrums I could hear the man's footsteps mounting the long flight of stairs. The conviction that he was coming, this stranger, not alone augmented my courage, but filled me with a mysterious sense of security. As the steps came nearer and nearer my brain grew clearer. I took a rapid reconnoitre of the room. In a flash my course was decided upon. The walls were high, fully sixteen feet, and near the ceiling a transom window was cut, and standing directly under it was an old-fashioned piece of furniture. Its four bowed legs supported drawers which rose, tier upon tier, till they were ten all told, each drawer having at either end a hanging handle of brass. As if to favour my plan, standing in close proximity to this was a prie dieu, of carved ebony and purple velvet.

"Do you want to pray?" she spat out the word as if it were venom.

"Yes," I answered, "I want to pray," pointing as I spoke to the prie dieu, which stood, luckily, behind the tall back of her chair. Slowly, and as if loth to leave my flesh, the knife was withdrawn from my throat. I must gain time, for the steps halted on the top of the stairs. The man was talking in muffled tones to his host. "Are you sure your knife is quite sharp enough, dear Countess? I am a coward, I confess, and I want it over quickly. Look, does it not seem a little blunt? There, near the point. And while I am praying, why will you not take the time to make it sharper?"

To this she agreed, saying: "I will give you five minutes, but if you raise your voice, if you whisper even, if, in any way, you try to call out for help, I shall not wait for you to finish your prayers. Do you promise me?"

"As I hope to save my soul, I promise you. Not a word shall pass my lips."

Just then the little clock on the mantel struck one. "Go! I will leave you to yourself on the conditions I have named. When the time is up I shall come to you." She watched me as a cat does a mouse, as I sank upon my knees upon the prie dieu. My clasped hands, and my eyes raised to Heaven fooled her, as I meant they should. Fooled her so completely that she once more resumed her seat in the great arm-chair, to become absorbed, as I knew she would, in the work of sharpening her knife. I shall for ever believe that the God whose religion she compelled me to travesty that night, heard the prayer I had no time to offer. For, as if to help me in my extremity, a great wind arose and struck the house with a mighty roar which set all the shutters banging and the windows rattling. And in the din, the mad woman, making ready her knife, did not hear, as I did, the door of the next room open and shut. Nor did she hear me when I sprang from my knees to the head rest of the prie dieu. From there to scale the rungs of a ladder which I made by pulling out such of the drawers as I needed for ledges on which to set my feet. With the key between my teeth, I climbed till my hands grasped the fluted woodwork about the front of the piece of furniture. Stealthily I drew myself up over this, to crawl along its dusty top, till I could get a good look through the transom.

When I did so, my promise to the Countess came near to being broken, for my voice well-nigh rang out in the gladness that possessed me, for the man in the next room was Dr. Dick Crawford! Then it was, to the shame of my human woman heart, that this joy receded, leaving in its place a jealousy so fierce and so desolating that it might well have been a question which was the more insane, the Countess or I. He was there, not because of me, but because of the woman for whose madness I would, in all probability, have to die. In the face of that death which was pressing close upon me, the strongest of all human passions had come to rack me, and to usurp all wiser and gentler thoughts.

This aberration was of such duration as is a flash of lightning, gone by the time my eyes, anguished and wild with terror, drew his eyes to mine, looking down upon him from my transomed height. In that one look I saw—but this is not a love story, never mind what I saw. Let it suffice that it made life a thousand times more precious to me than it had ever seemed before. And, if death must be, remembering that look, I could die almost content.

There was no time to lose. I dropped the key from my hand to his. Once more his eyes rested on mine, and then he was gone. The thought that perhaps I should never see him again smote me with despair. If he came in time to save me it must be quickly, for I saw that the mad creature, with the knife in her hand, had risen from her chair and was moving towards the prie dieu. For reasons best known to herself she had not turned up the gas in the room, and the fire had burnt low by this, leaving us in semi-darkness. But the figure gliding towards me in the long, red robe seemed, in my distempered fancy, by her passing through it to turn the air red. When she reached the place of prayer and found me gone she burst into oaths and cries horrible to hear.

Digitized by Google

Crouching down, flat on my face behind the woodwork which only half concealed me, I could feel the piece of furniture rock and tremble beneath the blows she struck it with the knife. She jabbed down deep into its wood, ripping and tearing it in her frenzy. A wild shriek of laughter told me that she had caught sight of me. I heard the brass handles rattling as she clutched them in her maddened hands. She was climbing up after me.

Her breath came in quick gasps, I could hear it. Suddenly she shot a long arm over the railing, and twisted her fingers in my hair until she tore it from my head. But I kept my face pressed close down to the woodwork, knowing it was the little blue spot in my neck she was trying to get at. My strength was no match for hers. With a sudden wrench of the hair, which was bleeding at the roots, she jerked my head back, leaving my throat exposed to the knife which hovered above it.

And then I thought the end had come. But before the blade could descend from where she held it high in air, her arms were seized and pinioned in a grip as strong as that death from which he had saved me. And the Countess Czarmay, snapping, snarling, foaming at the mouth, was powerless in the grasp of Dr. Crawford.

I saw the knife drop from her hand. I saw the others, brought by her shrieks, rushing in at the door. And then, I let myself think of the one being on earth whom I had kept all through that terrible hour from my thoughts, knowing that to think of him would unnerve me—my brother Tom. And thinking of Tom, I burst into a tempest of tears, which ended in a dead faint. How they got me down I never knew. When I opened my eyes it was on the lounge, in Fanny's room, it was now an hour later, and she was with me.

"Only think, dear, I never dreamt that Ned's man was the distinguished Dr. Crawford, the eminent authority on diseases of the brain. It seems that he had imposed secrecy upon Ned, because he wished to come down here incog., so that he might study from personal observation the case of the Countess. All his previous diagnoses had been made simply from watching her at a distance. He has noted every gesture, every expression, every movement; no detail has been too trifling to escape his notice.

"And, do you know, Kate, that the very first time he set eyes on her at the Tournament, he knew that she was possessed by the homicidal mania? Just think what a great diagnostician he must be! Her case has baffled all the specialists of Europe, and such a dance as she has led her poor husband, Count Fedor Czarmay, who, by the way, is an old Heidelberg friend of Dr. Crawford's. And it was only out of sympathy with him that he has devoted himself so untiringly to her case. Poor Countess! How sad it is. So long as she lives, she will have to be caged, like a wild beast! And, only to think, that this is the very first time that Dr. Crawford has met her! How fortunate it was for you, dear, that he came just when he did!" she said, with a smile, for at that moment Dr. Crawford entered the room.

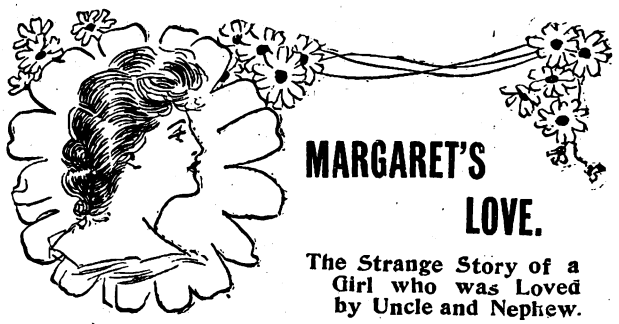
"You were saying something, Mrs. Rives, which I did not quite catch; may I trouble you to repeat it?" he said, coming over to where I lay, and standing quite close to me.

"I was telling Miss Robertson how fortunate it was for her that you came just when you did. It certainly was a night of events in the household of the Colgate-Rives."

Before he answered her, Dr. Crawford stooped down and kissed me on my lips. "More fortunate for me, Mrs. Rives," he said, "than for her."

Harley Gwynn.

"You'll be sorry some day that you didn't get married, if you don't." "Well, I'd rather not be married and be sorry I wasn't, than be married and sorry I was."



MARGARET'S LOVE.

The Strange Story of a Girl who was Loved by Uncle and Nephew.

It was a strange story, though a simple one; but then most of the stories of real life are strange. Margaret Griffiths had loved her husband; that was the one thing in the whole world of which she was sure. When she read stories and poems about love, as she did read them often—for she was a young creature, even in her widowhood—she always felt a little sympathetic thrill at her heart, and said to herself:

"That is how I loved my husband."

Yet the fact that she had loved him at all was a puzzle to the Ryefield people, who speculated about the matter, as country neighbours will. When they were married, Llewelyn Griffiths, as everybody called him, was already forty years old, and Margaret was only seventeen. Her father had left her to "the trusty guardianship of his good friend, Llewelyn Griffiths," as he said in his will.

Mr. Griffiths settled the estate, looked into the girl's affairs a little, as in duty bound, and then rather suddenly asked her to marry him. She had grown up, admiring her guardian. He was tall, handsome, full of strength and power—just the man for a romantic girl to make a hero of; and Margaret Fay was romantic to her very finger-tips. Moreover, she had been brought up by her father since her mother's death, when she was too young to remember; and naturally she shared all his likes and dislikes, and the strongest feeling he had in the world, next to his love for his daughter, was his attachment to his lifelong friend, Llewelyn Griffiths.

Llewelyn had certainly not wooed his bride in any story-book fashion; but then she had felt that she could not expect that—he was so much older and wiser and better than she in every way. He had talked to her very gently about her loneliness, and then he had said that he was lonely too; and if such a thing were possible as that she could make up her mind to come home with him and be his child-wife, and live with him always, he would be very, very good to her. And then he added, with something that would have been shyness had he not been such a self-possessed man:

"You know, Margaret, that I am only two years younger than your father."

"As if that mattered!" she cried, with her brown eyes shining and her cheeks glowing softly. "As if that mattered! You are you!"

"That means that you will come to me?" he said, and then he took the little fluttering hands she held out to him into his own, and gave her a kiss so like the one which her father used to give her at night and morning, that it brought the quick tears of memory into her gentle eyes. And so Margaret believed that she was in love, and that this tall, handsome man, who had been her admiration ever since she could remember, was her heart's lord, her knight, her hero, and a dozen other high-sounding titles, which she had taken out of the story-books.

Her lover had said nothing to her about money, and she did not know whether she had much or little. She supposed it must be a good deal, however, since in her father's time they had always lived freely, and none of her wishes had ever been denied her.

They were married on a lovely morning in early June; and it was past midsummer when they came home from their wedding tour. It was just at twilight when they arrived; and I think there is no hour so full of mystic solemnity as a midsummer twilight in the country. Pretty Margaret felt the strange spell of it as she stepped into the shadow of the elm drive, as the broad path was called which led up to her future home. Her very heart stood still. It seemed to her that her destiny had taken ghostly shape, and stood in front of her; and involuntarily she moved to one side, that she might not brush the phantom with her garments.

Digitized by Google

"This is home, little wife," said the kind, cheery voice of her husband; and the spell was broken. She went on then cheerfully enough into the stately old house, where one Llewelyn Griffiths after another had lived and ruled for generations.

They lived there for one peaceful year—a very happy year to Margaret, though so quiet. She went on dreaming her own dreams, investing her rather silent, yet always tender lord, with all the qualities of the heroes of her books, and honestly believing herself to be the very happiest little wife that the sun shone on. She half wondered sometimes that her happiness was so quiet; there were always tumults of one sort and another in the story-books, but that must be because the course of her true love had run so smoothly, and Llewelyn had none of the faults of temper which the other heroes had.

It was midsummer again when the horse upon which her husband had ridden away came home riderless; and Llewelyn Griffiths was brought in afterwards, by some neighbours, who had found him lying placidly upon the grass, with no sign of injury about him, but a smile upon his face so full of light and joy that at first they thought he must be alive, and then were frightened, as if such a smile on the face of the dead were unseemly.

The doctor came—the old village doctor, whose patients were to him almost like his children; and then it came out that both he and Llewelyn Griffiths himself had known for some years that just this end was sure to come.

The family lawyer came, too—but that was after the funeral—and made Margaret understand that she was a rich young widow, since all her husband's estates were hers, unreservedly; and then she found out for the first time that her father had left no fortune at all behind him—absolutely not enough money to pay his debts.

"What should I have done?" thought the poor little widow, "but for Llewelyn?"

She was scarcely more than eighteen then; and she shivered as if she had felt a cold blast when she asked herself the question—for she had never known a want or a care in her life, and the thought of struggling with the world for her daily bread came to her with a sort of horror. If anything could have made her hero's memory more dear, it was the knowledge that his love had saved her for ever from such a fate.

Her grief for him was not at all passionate, but it was very deep. She felt an intolerable aching want of him in her heart; or was it really the want, not so much of him, as of the love, and tenderness to which he had accustomed her? Sometimes she felt like a little child whom its mother had left in a great desert. The child would stretch out imploring arms for its mother to come back; but those arms would welcome any kindly comer who would take it out of the awful loneliness.

If a thought like that ever crossed Margaret's mind, she rejected it with hot indignation at herself. She always would mourn for Llewelyn—always—always; Llewelyn who had married her when she was utterly poor, utterly alone, and had made her life henceforth like that of a sheltered flower in a perpetual summer. She would be Llewelyn's, and Llewelyn's only, till she died; and then Heaven would be Heaven partly because she would so certainly find Llewelyn there waiting for her.

One day, when her husband had been dead six months, she beguiled the dreariness of a winter afternoon by looking through the contents of an old desk that had been his. She found some things that surprised her—one drawer in which was such a book as she did not know that Llewelyn cared about, an actual novel; and there were passages marked in this book, sometimes heavily, sometimes lightly, as if two people had read it together. And there was a deep, vivid, red rose of long ago, which crumbled when she touched it; and its ghost seemed to come out and fill the room with a passionate, despairing fragrance.

She wondered a little over this rose and this book, which had a drawer all to themselves; but she did not think much about them, because in another drawer she found a letter, and this, too, had a drawer to itself. On the outside of it was written:

"For my child-wife to read on the day when she is twenty-one, if before that time I am dead, as I think will be the case."

Margaret took up the letter, and a strange thrill shook her, and she grew a little cold. It was as if her husband had put forth his hand out of his grave, and touched her. She was so very lonely, that she longed to read this message from him, and she questioned awhile with herself whether she might not do so. But she had an almost superstitious dread of disobeying him in anything; and she shut the drawer hurriedly lest she should be tempted, and went away and sat down in the firelight.

Llyn was always over bold—he bent down his head and kissed her.

She began to think how very young she was—only eighteen and a half now, and it would be two years and a half more before she could even read that letter. Oh, how many, many weary years, if she lived as long as most people do, before she could go to Llewelyn! She must read his words after all; but, no—ten thousand times no! she would do his will now that he was gone even more sacredly than if he were alive.

She got up and went back to the desk. She took one look at the drawer where lay the crumbled red-rose petals, with their dying, despairing scent; and then she looked at the letter—the very last words her husband could speak to her until she, too, was dead. Then resolutely she locked the desk, as one who would hold no further parley with temptation; and, bringing the key away with her, threw it into the very heart of the glowing fire.

When Llewelyn Griffiths had been dead two years, one of his nephews came home from the medical studies he had been completing in French and German hospitals. It was Llewelyn's money that had sent him abroad; but Margaret did not know that until afterwards; and Llewelyn had arranged for him, when his foreign studies were completed, to come home to Ryefield and begin his medical career as partner of the old doctor who had killed and cured so many generations of the Ryefield people, that it seemed almost time he should enter into his rest.

Digitized by Google

The young fellow was another Llewelyn Griffiths, though everyone called him Llyn; and it had been the uncle's dream that this younger Llewelyn Griffiths should live after him in the old place, and keep up the old name there. That dream came to its end, however, when he himself married Margaret, and bequeathed to her all his possessions, as I have said, leaving her absolutely unfettered as to their future disposition.

Naturally, when the young doctor came to Ryefield, he went to see his uncle's widow. She was twenty years old then, and a daintier, sweeter little lady had never been mistress of the stately old house, in all the generations of Griffithses, who had lived and died there.

Dr. Llyn found it impossible to regard her as his uncle's widow, though she still wore her unmitigated widow's mourning.

He looked into her soft, brown eyes, and watched the blush-roses come and go in her fair young face, and he fell, at once and altogether, in love at first sight. He hardly realised just what his own symptoms meant; but he presently "diagnosed" the case, as he said, and he knew it was a mortal wound which his heart had received.

He tried to be very discreet, and not to shock his "rare, pale Margaret" by any too hasty demonstrations; but he actually haunted her in spite of himself. And she rather liked it, and began to think it was very nice to be an aunt by marriage to somebody.

He thought that, in waiting from midsummer until the middle of winter before he asked her to marry him, he had shown himself a model of discretion. He was not prepared for the look of shocked surprise that dilated those soft eyes of hers, when suddenly, one winter evening, he told her that he loved her, and asked her to be his wife. She just looked into his face, with sudden amazement in her own, and said, with an air she tried to make very dignified indeed:

"It seems to me you forget yourself strangely. I have some regard for your uncle's memory, if you have none. I shall be Mrs. Llewelyn Griffiths until I die."

"That is just what I have been hoping," cried wicked Llyn; and then, suddenly, his meaning, and the quiet humour of his cool answer, touched that chord in her that quivers between smiles and tears in all women, and she burst into a laugh that made her, a moment after, hate herself and him.

"I am not laughing because I am pleased," she cried hotly, almost beginning to weep.

"No, I understand," said imperturbable Llyn; "you are laughing because you are displeased."

"Yes, I am displeased, and shocked, and grieved; and I thought you were a real friend and a relative, and now I know——"

"That I love you," put in Llyn, "as I know nobody ever did before, and I don't believe anyone ever will again; and I want you for my wife, to have and to hold, to love and to cherish, until death us do part."

"We will not wait for death to part us," she said, with a quiet strength that astonished Llyn more than any of her charms had ever done; and she rose and walked steadily out of the room, her long black robes trailing behind her.

Llyn stood still for a while in front of the fire. I believe he whistled. Perhaps he thought she would come back again; but, if so, he reckoned without his hostess. She waited quietly in her own room until she heard the front door shut. Then she knelt down, and leant her head against her husband's desk. She longed desperately to open it and read her letter. She thought that to read that letter would be as if her dead love should take her into his arms, and thank and bless her for being true to him when she had been tempted—yes, she owned to herself that she had been tempted just a little. But she had thrown away the key; and, after all, there were only six months to wait, and she must do Llewelyn's will.

The next morning she sent Dr. Llyn a very dignified little letter. It said:

"Dear Llyn,—You will please not come here again until you are ready to forget what you said last night, and to respect your uncle's memory as you should.—Your well-wishing aunt,

"Margaret Griffiths."

His well-wishing aunt! This time Llyn whistled; there was no mistake about it. He put the little letter in his pocket as if it had been a love-token, and went off to make a round of medical visits.

Really it was very lonely for Mistress Margaret all the rest of that winter. But she never had more than a moment's temptation to recall Dr. Llyn.

And somehow the Winter wore away, and Spring went by; and then Summer burst upon the world, all bloom, and pomp, and radiance. And with the June came Margaret's twenty-first birthday.

She dressed swiftly, and then she sent for a locksmith, and in five minutes more Llewelyn's letter was in her hand.

She barred the door of her room. She sat down, and broke the seal, and then she put her hand over her eyes, and said a silent little prayer before she began so read. This was the letter:

"My Little Margaret,—Other husbands have put out a grasp, from the very grave, to draw yet closer the chain by which they held a beloved woman in bondage; I stretch forth mine to set my child-wife wholly free. You have never loved me, my Margaret, with your uttermost love; and perhaps you yourself will have found that out before this letter reaches you. Nor have I ever loved you as those lovers love of whom your girl's heart has dreamt. I did love once, with all the passionate young heart of me; and she whom I loved died.

"I never meant to marry anyone else; but when your father—my best friend—left you in my charge, I knew no other way to care for you so well as to bring you home, my wife. I should not have dared to take this responsibility; but I knew well, as Dr. Leland could tell you, that my life must needs be brief—a matter of months, perhaps—of two or three years at the very most—and so I ventured to take you, and care for you tenderly, knowing that before your girl's heart was ready for the deep love of womanhood, I should have set you free.

"When you read this, you will be twenty-one, young, beautiful, prosperous, with all the world before you where to choose. You have a nature unusually capable of happiness, and I predict for you very great happiness some day. When that day comes, be sure, my little Margaret, that if the happy dead can know the joys and sorrows of those they leave behind them here, we shall look down from our far place, and bless you—she and I.

"Llewelyn Griffiths."

Do you think Margaret's first thought a strange one. It broke from her lips in a happy little cry:

"Thank Heaven, he never really—really loved me!"

I suppose she knew why she thanked Heaven for that.

That afternoon she dressed herself in a soft, simple, white gown, that made her look more lovely and more girlish than ever. Her eyes were bright with some new, dear brightness, and the fitful blush-roses came and went in her cheeks more fitfully than ever. It was no wonder that the maid who answered her summons when she rang the bell, looked at her in surprise when she said:

"I wish you would fetch the doctor. I don't mean the old doctor; bring Dr. Llyn. Say I don't feel very well."

"What is it, dear aunt?" said Llyn, half-an-hour later, pretending to look at her anxiously. "Is it your head?"

"No, Llyn, I think it's my heart. It's—it's this letter."

And, as she spoke, she put his uncle's letter into his hand.

And Llyn read, and then he smiled; and then—for Llyn was always over-bold—he bent down his head, and kissed her.

"Yes," he said quietly, "I see how it is. You will be Mrs. Llewelyn Griffiths until you die.

Marion Montague.

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID NEW SERIAL YOU CAN START TO-DAY.

Dupes of Destiny

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT

By Blanche Eardley, Writer of "The Bond Between."

PROLOGUE.

A YOUTH is in the private room of Messrs. Samuel Sharpe and Quirke, solicitors, awaiting the head of the firm's announcement as to whether he is the heir to the baronetcy of the late Sir Basil Wingate or not.

Mr. Sharpe says:

"You will remember, Mr. Rust, at the reading of the will, the title, which by special remainder he had power to dispose of, and the money were left by Sir Basil Wingate to the elder son of his run-away only daughter, Helen Jerningham, should she have one; and failing a son being born to her, the title and the money with the estate, should go to you, his nephew; afterwards to your son—should you marry, or to the son of your daughter; no child of the feminine sex directly inheriting it."

He then tells Cyprian Rust that, hearing Helen Jerningham went to Australia, he has extensively advertised for her in Australian papers, but with no effect. Therefore he congratulates his listener on becoming Sir Cyprian Rust.

The solicitor is called out of the room, and Cyprian Rust sees on the table an unopened letter with an Australian stamp. The address he recognises as being in the handwriting of his cousin Helen Jerningham!

Is it written to announce the birth of a son and heir? If so it would rob him of the legacy at the eleventh hour!

A step sounds outside the door. Quickly Cyprian Rust thrusts the letter into his pocket. He hurriedly says good-bye to Mr. Sharpe, and when he reaches his hotel he reads the missive. It tells how Helen Jerningham has left Australia, so that the future heir—if a boy—may be born in England!

Sir Cyprian Rust carefully burns the letter that might have dealt the death blow to his ambitions, and mentally resolves to go to any extremes to retain the title.

Meanwhile Helen Jerningham is dying on board an ocean liner in giving birth to twin sons.

From incoherent remarks that she makes, the physician who attends her is led to believe that a secret is attached to the boys' history. But she dies ere she reveals her name or the boys' identity!

Many years later.

MARCELLA RUST, daughter of Sir Cyprian, finds a spade guinea which a mysterious man has hidden underneath the mat outside a certain room which she has been forbidden to enter in their home, Wingate Court, Crawley. Her curiosity is naturally aroused, and she tells her father of the occurrence. He seems annoyed at her alertness.

Sir Cyprian learns, through the Rev. Philip Nullius, that a dying woman wishes to see him.

He goes to see her, and she shows him a later will of Sir Basil Wingate, by which all his property is left to the descendant of Helen Jerningham unconditionally. Sir Cyprian snatches this will from her, and she dies before she can inform anyone else.

Sir Cyprian visits Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox, where he meets Mr. Caleb J. Johnson, millionaire and city magnate, who is in love with the hostess.

The baronet, speaking in private to Lady Violet, and referring to Johnson, says:

"The house of that millionaire chap contains a valuable lot of plate, and you have the entrée to it. When next you visit it there are certain details I wish you to note, and——"

"Not that house!" she gasps. "I cannot, even to you! He will be here to-night, as my guest."

He looked at her curiously. "You either do this for me, or Marcella will know that for a certain sum her—aunt—sold her!"

For one brief moment the woman hesitated, then her answer came, slowly:

"I will do it; for my task-master is a hard one!"

Late in the evening Johnson proposes to Lady Violet. Knowing her position, she, of course, refuses him.

"Why," replies he, "is there any just cause or impediment?"

As he speaks the palms in front of the window part and a man lurches heavily into the room.

Digitized by Google

(continued.)

SIXTH CHAPTER.

An Unbidden Guest.

He was not an ordinary ruffian the man who had so unceremoniously interrupted a prospective engagement between the fashionable Society beauty and a millionaire. He had a rather handsome face of a dissolute type, bold, reckless, blue eyes, well-shaped features, and a dare-devil, sneering mouth. But the demon of Drink had marked him down as its own, and in bloodshot eyes, discoloured skin, and loose lips of a bluish tint there waved the black flag of the fatal vice

His coat was shabby, and his linen not of that hue usually connected with the attire of a gentleman; but he wore his clothes with a certain careless swagger that only a man who has originally been within the magic circle of the "smart set" ever retains through the many vicissitudes that his degradation takes him.

He gazed with an amused smile upon the silent woman in her beauty, who, grasping her fan with one white hand, rested the other on a marble statue of the goddess Pallas Athene.

The financier, Caleb J. Johnson, was the first to break the strange stillness.

"Look here, my fine buccaneer," he said in his curiously-crisp tone, "this kind of entrance into a lady's drawing-room may look very well from the front of a theatre, when you expect a little applause for it, but just now it has fallen sort of flat. Only the presence of this lady prevents me from introducing my foot to you in a way not always agreeable but sometimes effective. And if you retain any sense in your head you will just put those words in your pipe and smoke 'em. D'you hear?" he went on in a slightly-louder key. "You had better get out of this, or I'll call for the police!"

The intruder smiled slowly, his eyes glinting narrowly as he gazed from the face of the speaker back to that of the woman, whose dark eyes seemed to burn like living coals of fire as they met his.

He took a cigarette from his pocket, and poised it jauntily in his mouth.

"Thanks, awfully, for the advice," he said carelessly. "As to going out of the house, much as I dislike appearing disagreeable in interrupting an amorous tête-à-tête, I am afraid I must regretfully decline to leave you to make your proposal again to Lady Violet."

The millionaire flushed darkly, and took a step forward.

"You drunken hound," he said thickly, "you will pay for this insolence dearly!" Then, turning to the white-faced woman at his side, he said: "Forgive me, Lady Violet, but I think it will be better for you to leave the room while I deal with this fellow as he deserves."

A slow smile parted the lips of the stranger as he looked leisurely at the silent woman whose eyes had never left his face.

"I think it will be wiser if you restrain your—friend's martial spirit, Vi. I don't wish to be disagreeable, but if I am forced to assert myself I may surprise him."

As one roused from a dream, she woke to life at his words. With a light touch on the millionaire's arm, she said, with an effort:

"Don't touch him. He is not what you imagine; he has a right to be here."

"A right!" muttered Caleb J. Johnson sarcastically. "Yes, as much as a lackey or a 'boots'! Let me kick him out, Lady Violet; even old servants have not the monopoly to be insolent."

Her face flushed warmly, and she flashed a warning glance at the debonair intruder, who still regarded them with a cynical smile.

"One moment; I want to speak with you alone." She murmured. Then, drawing him aside, she said slowly:

"Mr. Johnson, as a man of the world, you know that there is a skeleton in every family. That man is the skeleton of mine. He is a disgraceful member of it—a creature we would be glad to hear the last of; but, still, when he appears in our midst we are forced to acknowledge him."

She spoke bitterly; but the eyes of the financier were scanning her face keenly, and he noted the ebb and flow of colour on her pale cheeks.

"Who is the fellow?" he said abruptly. "Anyway, relationship is no reason why he should behave like a low-down bounder."

"No," she answered bitterly; "but it is sometimes an excuse." Then she went on rapidly: "I want you to leave me now, Mr. Johnson. If I don't return to him he will only make a scene among my other guests, whom I do not regard in the same light as I do you."

"But I thought Sir Cyprian Rust was your brother-in-law?" said the financier slowly.

"That is no reason why I should make him the recipient of my confidences, Mr. Johnson," Lady Violet answered briefly. "My brother-in-law and myself are quite friends; but there we stop. I do not put my trust in princes."

"No," he replied with an arrogant touch; "but you will in financiers—won't you? Remember, when you have done with that oaf of a hanger-on I shall return for my answer. You nearly gave it me, and I am almost certain what it will be."

She flung a nervous glance behind her, where, standing with his elbow against the statue of the Pallas Athene, was the shabby man who had interrupted their tête-à-tête, waiting with imperturbable patience for her to join him.

"Not to-night" she said hastily, "another time. I—I am not in a mood to be acquiescent, Mr. Johnson. Perhaps I may say what you will not like, through sheer ennui."

"You can never say what I will not like, Lady Violet" he retorted gallantly, "least of all to-night, when your answer will, I am certain, be the one I intend to have, notwithstanding all the undesirable relatives in the world. I have fought and won hard battles in my life, and will not admit of defeat in the most important of all my undertakings."

A sense of being in the grip of a stronger will than her own made Lady Violet wish for a moment that she had not asked the "Gold King" to dine with her that night. His voice was so quiet, his glance so serene, that she feared to come in contact with the iron hand beneath the velvet glove lest she should be bent to his might, even as she was to that of her brother-in-law, Sir Cyprian Rust.

"As you are strong, be merciful!" she smiled faintly. "At present I cannot even consider the question you made to me, let alone decide upon my answer. Now go, please, and let me hear the unfortunate creature who stepped so inopportunely into our conversation."

"I will do your bidding now," said Caleb J. Johnson suavely; "and shall wait near, in case that ruffian grows unpleasant. But before I leave your house, Lady Violet, it will be with the right to protect you from further insult at the hands of ne'er-do-well cousins."

As his enormous figure strolled towards the conservatory she sent a glance of wonder after him. He was so assured of her answer that she felt it would be useless to go contrary to his wishes. If it were not for that—— She bit her lip, and turned back into the drawing-room. She knew she had some moments to herself, as her guests were nearly all visitors in the house and accustomed to being left to their own devices, while Marcella was in the conservatory with Edward Day.

"Well?" she said, in a low, even tone, addressing the languid figure of the man who had prevented her from sending the announcement of her engagement to the Morning Post. "As it is more than eight years since you honoured me with any correspondence or requests for money I naturally deduced that you were dead, since all your allowances during that time were returned to my solicitors."

He stretched himself lazily, and chewed the end of his cigarette.

"Sorry to disappoint you, Vi, old girl, especially as you seemed to be on the verge of forming new ties with that man of opulence and bulk. I suppose you would call me the 'little rift within the lute' of your expectation, eh?" and he laughed softly.

Digitized by Google

She looked at him with quiet contempt.

"It is not my desire to discuss my friends with you. They believe me to be a widow, which I am, God knows, in every sense of the word!" she flashed passionately.

"Except the practical one," he sneered. "And I don't fancy, my Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox, that you will gain your practical widowhood for some time."

"Why have you come here?" she said in a hard voice, ignoring his remark altogether. She was calm again, and nearly as white as the statue against which the man was leaning. "Remember, the conditions upon which I allowed you £300 a year were that you should never return to England or attempt to annoy me in any way. You have after twenty years—during twelve of which you received the money through my solicitors—broken both parts of your compact. Why do you come here, when for eight years you have not applied for the money that was the means of providing you with drink?"

She spoke bitterly, but the shabby intruder only smiled gently as he replied:

"My dear Vi, do keep your temper. I found that it was not so difficult to make money, after all. There were many more ways open to a scamp addicted to drink than to a major in the Army with a reputation to hold together. When I discarded the Army—or, rather, when I was cashiered from it—I was content to make shift on your pittance of £300 while I did nothing——"

"Except drink," she said coldly.

He smiled pleasantly. "Precisely; but I had sufficient sense left to keep drink my slave, than to be the slave myself. Then I suddenly found that there was a good chance of making money at—other things"—and a curious expression crossed his bloated face. "So that explains my reason for letting you revel in the luxury of imagining yourself my widow for eight years."

She turned on him sharply.

"Spare me any more details, please. All I wish to know is what you want here? My solicitors could have dealt with you without you forcing yourself on me. I have no money here—at least, not the amount you would require."

He looked at her narrowly. Her dark, passionate face, alive with bitter contempt, only served to amuse him. He was dead to all other feeling.

"I don't particularly want money, Vi," he answered insolently; "though when I do I shall not hesitate to ask for it. But you seem to have forgotten, my precious wife, that scamp and social pariah as I am, I am still your husband; and Major Richard Frayne-Lennox intends to live with his wife once more, and so scare off would-be suitors to her lily-white hand. That is a masterstroke of policy, isn't it?"

"You would not dare!" she panted, her face flushing hotly. "Even my brother-in-law, Sir Cyprian Rust, believes me a widow; and all my friends think that Major Richard Frayne-Lennox went to South Africa when he was cashiered from the Army, and, enlisting in some Yeomanry company, was killed in action. You won't be such a madman as to dare to do the thing you suggest—to rake up, by your presence in Society, the story of your disgrace?"

He laughed quietly, and stroked the ends of his moustache with long, white fingers.

"Why not? I am not the only Society blackleg that faces the music. And," he sneered, "with the support of my lovely wife, who receives me back, the Society sheep will follow her example and forget the past."

"Never!" she said in a low, tense voice. "You shall never receive any support from me! I will never acknowledge you again!"

"How will you prevent my coming here, then?" he retorted. "What force will you bring to bear upon me?"

"We are joined together by holy matrimony, and only death can break our tie!"

SEVENTH CHAPTER.

Sir Cyprian is Startled.

She leant forward, her dark eyes flashing with suppressed excitement, and her breath coming and going in quick gasps.

"A force you do not think I possess! I have only to furnish a certain person with the knowledge that you are in England again, alive, and you will be arrested on the charge of doctoring the figures on a cheque that was trusted to you! I knew of it, and was always prepared to use this threat should you ever attempt to see me again or annoy me. Now you know that unless within twenty-four hours I receive a telegram to say you have left England I shall acquaint the proper person with the fact that you are still living and in London."

Digitized by Google

While she had been speaking the man's dissolute face had turned to a livid colour and his eyes had sent a furtive glance round the room in case she had been overheard.

"So you knew of that," he muttered. "You would fling your husband into gaol?"

She laughed a chilly laugh. "I have long since ceased to regard you in that light. To me you are a blot on the escutcheon of my happiness, and unless you swear to go away from me I shall do as I have said—and you know best whether you can prove your innocence."

A low imprecation escaped the lips of the man who had once been a major in His Majesty's Army. Then he said sullenly:

"All right, I'll go. You've got the whip-hand this time; but you needn't fancy," he continued, with a savage snarl, "that I shall allow you to receive further proposals of marriage. The moment I hear of your name being coupled with that of any other man I shall return and chance everything. You can't get rid of me, my lady! We are joined together by 'holy matrimony,' and only death can break our tie."

She shivered, and her face grew very pale and icy as she said contemptuously:

"To me you are dead already. But I still retain my self-respect, notwithstanding the fact that I am your wife and, keeping it, I am not likely to commit the crime of bigamy; since I see that I am linked by a chain of hate to the effigy of a husband. Now leave me," she went on; "the window through which you came may be your exit."

He laughed coarsely.

"Then I'm hanged if I don't go through the hall door, as any of your other guests, my lady! Should your well-bred acquaintances question you as to the identity of the shabby loafer who came out of your drawing-room you may acknowledge me as your husband, Major Richard Frayne-Lennox. I shall not object."

With a supercilious gesture towards the silent woman, whose dark eyes sparkled with suppressed loathing, he moved in the direction of the door, and, passing through it, found himself at the top of a wide staircase opening into an alcove, flanked on either side by tall palms, and in the centre was a fairy fountain, half hidden by foliage and tobacco-plants, only the soft sprinkle of the water revealing the fact that there was anything behind them.

As the eyes of the outcast dwelt with a cynical smile at the luxury round him, a man's voice making some laughing remark sent a strange expression into his eyes, and he drew, back with a sudden glide behind a velvet portière.

Three figures had come out of an adjoining room—that of a girl, radiant in white, and two men. They paused with their backs to the portière to gaze at a picture to which the girl had referred.

"Yes," said one of the men—and the listener behind the arras recognised the voice of the man who had threatened a few moments ago to kick him out of his own wife's drawing-room—"it is a very fine picture, Miss Rust, but I fancy that I could show you a better one of the same subject on my own walls. You must come and see it one day with your aunt, if Sir Cyprian will allow you."

The man pressed against the wall strained his ears to catch, not the reply of the girl, but that of the man who had spoken first and had been silent since the three paused before the picture.

"I will be very pleased for Marcella to accompany her aunt," said the suave, aristocratic tones of Sir Cyprian Rust. "I am sorely tempted to plead for an invitation also, Mr. Johnson. I am a collector myself of originals and rare prints, and were I not obliged to return to my hermitage shortly I would love nothing better than to criticise your old master."

"I shall be pleased to submit it to the judgment of so keen a critic," said the financier drily.

He was inwardly amused at the meeting with the wealthy art-collector, who had been a seedy young artist in the days when his cousin had made her unfortunate marriage. He wondered cynically how the baronet would have fared had that cousin put a son in his shoes.

He turned to his companions suddenly. "While you are admiring the beauty of Leonardo di Vinci's masterpiece, Miss Rust, I will go in search of Lady Violet, whom I left in the drawing-room."

Marcella smiled an assent, and as the ponderous figure of Caleb J. Johnson strolled away the eyes of the baronet sparkled with satisfaction.

Inside the drawing-room the financier paused. It was empty save for a motionless figure in a robe of shimmering sequins.

"Now the family scapegoat has departed," he said softly, "we will pick up the thread of our conversation, Lady Violet."

She flung out her hand, with a hard little laugh.

"Ah, Mr. Johnson, a thread once broken can never be cemented together again. We must let the loose strand go now and consider new ones."

"You mean——" he said quietly.

"That I must forget that there was a question to answer," she went on gently. "And you, Mr. Johnson, must forget that there was an answer to your question."

The financier laughed shortly. He had not expected this resistance from the aristocrat whom he had decided would make a fitting mistress of his wealth—like a jewel in a setting of gold. And her sudden change of front piqued him, making her ten thousand times more desirable in his eyes.

"If you go down into the City, Lady Violet," he said quietly, "you will learn that Caleb J. Johnson always sticks to his guns and never gives up what he has set his mind on. And opposition only strengthens his determination to gain his ends. He has conquered where most men have gone under, and—he's going to conquer now. Do you know why?"

She shook her head wearily. His strength was beginning to frighten her.

"Because he has not only thrown his mind into this deal but his heart as well, Lady Violet. And the game must be to him."

"Stop, Mr. Johnson!" she cried. "You don't understand. I can never say 'Yes' to your question. There is a barrier that even your brain and will cannot overlook."

He took a step towards her, and the twinkling, star-like eyes shone with the light of conquest.

"A barrier, eh, Lady Violet? One that concerns that scamp of a—relation, eh? Oh, don't start," he said blandly. "I am quite able to understand that there are wheels within wheels; but a clever man may sometimes stop those wheels from going round, Lady Violet."

She looked at him with startled eyes. "What—what do you mean, Mr. Johnson?"

The financier leant forward, smiling with that exultant expression well known in Wall Street and Capel Court when a crisis had loomed perilously near the impregnable position of the "Gold King."

"I mean that within a very short time, Lady Violet, you will be sending a notice to the Morning Post announcing your engagement to the millionaire, Caleb J. Johnson, of New York City."

* * * * *

In the meantime Marcella and her father, Sir Cyprian Rust, were admiring the pictures in the hall, while the figure behind the portière waited impatiently for them to move.

Digitized by Google

"Marcella," said Sir Cyprian's soft voice, "come here, child; I wish to speak to you."

He drew the girl away from the fountain to a portion of the alcove away from the curtain.

The man seized his chance. Creeping softly from his hiding-place, he quickly concealed himself behind the palms and foliage that hung over the fountain, and peered furtively at the man and his daughter who now faced him.

"Yes, father," said Marcella obediently; "what is it?"

Sir Cyprian turned his head sharply. "What was that noise, child?" he said suddenly. "It sounded as though someone had pushed past the palms."

Marcella laughed. "It's only the wind, father; I heard it too."

"I wish you to observe minutely," continued Sir Cyprian, "the difference between the copy of the 'Mona Lisa' here and the one that Mr. Johnson says he possesses. I am unable to stay in town myself, so wish my little girl to be eyes for me and to learn to discern between the real and the unreal. Besides, Mr. Johnson's Park Lane residence teems with priceless gems in art and jewels."

Marcella looked interested. "I will be so glad to help you, father," she said softly, "and will specially notice all that you point out to me in the future. You are sure I can help you, father?"

Sir Cyprian smiled slowly. "More than you think, my dear. I shall be pleased if my little girl can assist me. You know my weakness for such collections."

The figure behind the palms stifled a chuckle by waving the branches of one of the palms violently to and fro.

"This is a wretchedly draughty place," Sir Cyprian muttered; "you had better join your aunt, my dear."

As the girl obeyed him he looked after her with a curious smile on his blonde, handsome face, unconscious of a pair of keen, blue eyes peering at him through the leaves not far away.

"That is rather a neat idea to use her! Besides, I am not sure that I can rely on the other. She knows too much to be trustworthy."

He drew out a cigar-case, and fingered a cigar with thoughtful fingers, a slow smile still curving his well-cut mouth.

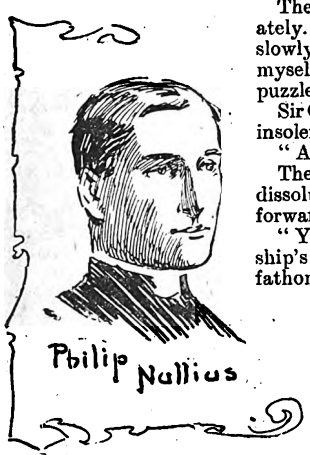
"A very good idea" he muttered—"a very good idea!"

Suddenly the anxious gaze of the man who had once been a gentleman flashed with a strange expression. The cluster of charms that hung from Sir Cyprian's broad gold albert came under the sudden glint of light which danced in particular upon a tiny bright coin, something like a sovereign, hanging among the rest of the baronet's trinkets.

The man drew in his breath with a sibilant sound and made a sudden rush forward.

Quick as lightning the baronet sprang forward and clutched the stranger's collar.

"So, you rascal!" he exclaimed, "that was your little game—was it?"



The man looked at him desperately. "I am no thief," he said slowly; "I only wished to assure myself of a certain thing that had puzzled me."

Sir Cyprian laughed: the fellow's insolence amused him.

"And what was that?"

The shabby outcast with the dissolute, reprobate face leant forward and whispered hoarsely:

"You cannot summon her ladyship's lackeys, Sir Cyprian; I have fathomed something that has baffled and worried me for some very long time. I recognised the sign of one of the secret leaders of a certain society of which I know a little. It is the Sign of the Spade among your other charms, Sir Cyprian. The order is honoured by such a noble member, whose face has been withheld for so long, but whose brain has done such good work for it."

Slowly, and with a curious tightening of his blonde skin, the baronet let go the man's collar.

"You had better make yourself scarce, my good fellow!" he said slowly after a pause. "Others may not look upon you as the harmless crank that I do."

As the man, with a mocking laugh, ran swiftly past the astonished servants out into the street Sir Cyprian fell back into his chair, looking strangely old, and the hand that swept his brow trembled slightly.

"A very awkward meeting," he muttered; "but I shall not allow it to go further! That fellow must not recognise me again. He may become dangerous, and—on the other hand, he may not!"

A gentle sigh fluttered to his lips, and a steel-like gleam flickered in his seraphic eyes as he repeated softly:

"On the other hand, he may not. I must see Debenham to-morrow. There is no time to be lost"

EIGHTH CHAPTER.

Marcella Makes an Enemy.

THE following day Sir Cyprian Rust returned from Crawley, and after spending the whole of the morning in the City, he appeared at lunch looking as though everything had gone well with him, for his smile was gentle, and his voice softly sympathetic as he asked his lovely sister-in-law whether a drive would not do both her headache and Marcella good.

Lady Violet looked at him sharply. "How do you know that I have a headache?" she said wonderingly.

Sir Cyprian smiled deprecatingly. "It does not tax my ingenuity to suppose that the dinner of last night has had the morning effect of making you feel just a little fagged," he answered suavely. "Most women would feel the strain of entertaining a millionaire like Mr. Caleb J. Johnson!"

A faint colour stained Lady Violet's creamy skin, which the baronet's smiling blue eyes were keen to note.

"Mr. Johnson," she said, slowly, "is not so objectionable as his wealth suggests. And as for entertaining him," she smiled slightly, "I think he did that for himself."

"I am glad you constitute yourself such a champion of the Gold King," laughed Sir Cyprian genially, "for he has invited you and Marcella to tea, I believe, one day this week. I trust you will accept it," he went on, gazing steadily at the white, set face. "I particularly desire Marcella to see that original of Leonardo da Vinci's he claims to possess, so take her with you, Violet."

Lady Violet's eyes rested for a moment on the fresh beauty of the girl, who was looking particularly happy and radiant in a gown of simply-made, blue serge that fitted the lithe young figure to perfection, and her lips trembled with a momentary weakness.

"I shall most certainly take Marcella with me," she answered slowly, "but she must curb her impatience until Mr. Johnson invites us, though," she added, her mouth breaking into a sudden smile, "I must warn Marcella that the original 'Mona Lisa' of Leonardo da Vinci hangs in the Louvre! And it would be difficult for even Mr. Johnson's money to buy that! However, his copy may be a very good one!"

Marcella laughed brightly. "I am afraid, Aunt Violet," she said, "that I have not inherited father's taste for originals, and am quite happy with a copy! I have not the artistic temperament. I suppose I am like my mother. Father tells me she was no artist."

Lady Violet did not answer, but under her breath she murmured: "Thank God for it!" Then she raised her eyes to her brother-in-law's face, and after a quick, half-questioning, half-appealing glance into his boyish blue eyes that told her nothing, averted her head.

Digitized by Google

Dupes of Destiny

(continued.)

"By the way," said Edward Day languidly, turning his fair, insipidly handsome face towards Lady Violet, "are you aware, Aunt Vi, that you had a most undesirable guest last night?"

Sir Cyprian, who had entered into a conversation with Marcella, suddenly paused, and watched his sister-in-law's face intently. He had puzzled greatly over the presence of the shabby, swaggering man who had appeared so suddenly from behind the foliage round the fountain, and a brief suspicion had taken root in his mind that perhaps his lovely sister-in-law could throw some light on it.

Lady Violet raised her brows with a puzzled expression.

"An undesirable guest, Edward?" she repeated. "Surely not! We were almost a family party last night."

"Anyway," Edward Day said, with a laugh, "I saw a beggarly-looking chap running down the stairs and out into the hall! It occurred to me at the time that he was discovered in some pilfering in one of the rooms, but as he was allowed to go scot-free, I concluded he must have been admitted in the ordinary way."

"Really, Edward, I am afraid I am not informed of the coming and going of all the inmates or visitors in the house!" Lady Violet laughed. "Possibly it was one of the tradesmen leaving something!"

When Sir Cyprian was saying "good-bye," his sister-in-law drew him aside.

"Is it any use my asking you to let me off taking her with me? Can you not release me from that pain?"

He looked at her with mild reproof.

"My dear Violet, it is my wish that my daughter should accompany you to the house of Mr. Johnson, or to any other friend whom you may be visiting. She is a clever girl, with a marvellous gift of description and assimilation. I shall make her a most useful companion in time!" and a mocking smile curved his fine mouth.

Lady Violet's pale cheeks grew even paler, and her dark eyes flashed with suppressed emotion, as she said pleadingly:

"Don't sully that spotless nature with your diabolical genius! Let her at least keep outside the mire and the gutter that our feet are embedded in! Have you no mercy—no sense of humanity that will deter you from making a tool of that most precious creature?"

Sir Cyprian smiled satirically. "Surely, Violet," he murmured gently, "you are labouring under some mistaken idea? How should I want to do anything that would hurt my own child? I only wish to cultivate in her a love of the beautiful in art! Do you blame me for that?"

With a spurt of sudden courage she replied in the same low voice. "You need not keep up that pretence with me, Cyprian! I know you through and through, and I warn you that if I notice one single change in Marcella that your evil influence may work, I shall brave everything, be hated even, and put her on her guard! Tell her who and what you are! Don't drive me too far; a worm will turn, you know, and I am a desperate woman!"

Sir Cyprian looked at her without replying. She had for so long been passive that he was secretly taken aback by her new attitude. It suggested a stronger influence in her life than his had been, one that undermined the power he had wielded for so many years.

Was it the influence of another man? he wondered, or an even deeper one—the love of a woman of the world for an innocent girl? He was inclined to think it the latter; the one he could stem in its course, but the former would take her for ever out of his reach.

"It rests with yourself entirely, my dear Violet," he answered in a kind tone, "whether Marcella remains a happy girl, ignorant of those things of which you would inform her, or in a very much worse position in life.

"Think," he went on, "how would you improve her prospects by telling her what you threaten? Would she thank you for the information? I think not. Marcella is a proud girl, with a hatred of anything underhand or mercenary. You would lose her altogether then!"

A change passed over the mobile face of the listening woman. She could not but admit the truth of his statement.

"One thing more!" she murmured. "Suppose I were in a position to repay you all the money you had given me—since—since then, would you let me have her? She could come without knowing the worst! I would tell her nothing of the past. I would be so glad to keep her with me on any terms."

The baronet's handsome face hardened. "On no conditions will I ever allow Marcella to remain with you longer than a week—or so long as I desire," he replied curtly. "And, as to repayment, I shall never consent to receive such a thing at your hands! So, my dear sister-in-law, you must consider the subject closed from now! Neither of us can afford to go back! If you play your cards properly you may enjoy Marcella's society as often as you like—with reservation—but so much as hint to her one little thing, and she will be dead to you!"

When the waiting carriage had driven off with Sir Cyprian to the station, Lady Violet went slowly in search of Marcella. She was thinking of the last speech of her task-master, and her expression was a curious one.

As she left the library the butler met her with a telegram on a salver.

She took it up idly, and opening it, read:

"Have left England as promised, shall not worry you again."

With a sense of relief she crushed the orange-tinted envelope into a ball. That episode was finished then. She need no longer live in dread of a scandal. The other portion of the skeleton in her cupboard had kept his word. She began to think kindly of this man she had once married—how many years ago she hardly liked to think. Nothing remained to bring him back to her thoughts—nothing.

A sound fell upon her ear with a sinister mockery. It was the light, sudden laugh of Marcella, ringing and bell-like, innocent of the effect of her mirth.

Lady Violet bit her lip sharply. She realised for the first time that she could never quite forget the man in the shabby clothes.

At the door of her boudoir she paused. Marcella was talking to Edward Day, her nephew, who was also her secretary, and for whom she entertained a kindly pity rather than love.

"Please don't ask me again, Mr. Day," Marcella was saying in her honest, straightforward way. "I could never marry you, because I do not love you! Please let this be final between us! I know you very slightly, and don't think I could ever be anything more than I am to you now—a good friend!"

"But I love you, Marcella!" Edward answered eagerly. "And will teach you to love me! Besides, it is my aunt's dearest wish that we should marry; she has told me so, and I know you love her!"

The girl's voice softened. "Yes, I love Aunt Violet, but I know she would not wish me to sacrifice myself in marrying a man I did not love! It would be unlike her!"

The young man's fair face clouded. He had calculated that with the daughter of the rich Sir Cyprian Rust as his wife he would be able to settle his most pressing debts without letting his aunt know of them. And the knowledge that Marcella was not so pliable as he thought was an awkward awakening.

"Come!" he said, forcing a smile to his lips, "you are naturally startled, as all girls are at their first proposal, and don't know your own mind. But you will think this over, won't you, and see if you can give me any hope?"

Marcella shook her head. She was sorry to hurt him, but her mind was made up for all time

Digitized by Google

"I can never say anything else, Edward," she answered sadly. "I do not love you, and I will not marry you! Please drop the subject."

An ugly look stole into the weak, dissipated face of the man.

"I suppose you have met your future husband already?" he sneered, "among the classic population of the village of Crawley! What is he? The village doctor, or the village curate?"

A sudden wave of colour stained the girl's pale face. "You are impertinent!" she said quietly. "Surely such manners are a drawback to success! Will you kindly leave the room, or shall I?"

"Oh, don't get on the high horse!" he said sullenly. "I suppose I am a fool to speak as I do, but, in spite of my manners, I really love you, Marcella. And considering all I know about you, you ought to be glad that any decent chap should wish to make you his wife. Money's not everything, you know!"

Marcella caught her breath with a sudden gasp, and the silent woman at the door imitated her unconsciously.

"I don't understand," Marcella said haughtily. "Were you not my aunt's nephew I should be inclined to think that her footman was in the room. Explain yourself at once!"

"Will you marry me, Marcella?" said Edward Day. "Will you be my wife?"

An uneasy laugh broke from Edward Day, the craven coward. He had expected tears, not hauteur.

"I mean that you can't have everything," he retorted. "And in spite of being an heiress, you would find most men fight shy of you if they knew what I do, although you are handsome and unlike other girls!"

Marcella eyed him contemptuously. "Say what you have to say, don't suggest. I am quite able to bear it, I can assure you!"

He flushed darkly. "Are you? Then all I will say now is, ask your father, Sir Cyprian, where your mother died, and why there is no headstone to her memory in the churchyard at Crawley! There is something strange about the different reports of her supposed death!" he added maliciously.

There was a silence alive with signs of a coming storm, then Marcella spoke.

"When you asked me to marry you, I was sorry I could not say 'yes,' because I considered that you had done me the greatest honour a man can do a woman, but now that I see you can stoop in your jealous spite to insult not only myself but"—and her voice quivered slightly—"the memory of a dead mother, I have only the most bitter contempt for you."

"And I also!" added another voice in tones of deep indignation, and Lady Violet came forward slowly, gazing with blazing eyes at the crestfallen young bully. Then she said slowly:

"I will speak with you later. I need only mention now that your conduct is the most pitiful and disgraceful exhibition I have ever witnessed. I am only glad that after all you have no blood-tie with myself!"

Muttering an excuse, and with a sullen expression on his weak face, Edward Day left the room, but when he got outside he shook his hand at the door and whispered hoarsely:

"All right, score as much as you like now, I shall have my innings soon, and pay back the snub I have received, my haughty Miss Marcella! I'm not good enough for you, eh? We'll see! I shall never rest now until I find out something that will give me a hold over you. And then," he laughed vindictively, "you will be glad to come off your pedestal when I choose to ask you!"

NINTH CHAPTER.
Fortune's Wheel.

When they were alone, Marcella went up to her aunt with a tremulous laugh.

"You must think me very foolish, dear aunt Violet, to have been so easily annoyed with Edward," she said timidly, "but I do not mind him abusing me, though that was very uncalled-for, but when he suggested fearful things about—about that dear mother whom I do not remember, but whom I love and honour with all my heart, I—I—could not restrain my temper!"

Lady Violet clasped the girl to her tenderly. "Dearest," she said in a low, earnest voice; "I love to see that the memory of the mother you have lost is still fresh and dear to you. I am sure that—that——" her voice faltered, "could she see you now, as I do, and hold you in her arms as I am holding you, she would rejoice in the love of a daughter like you."

"And you are not vexed because I could not give Edward any other answer?" Marcella queried after a pause.

Lady Violet shuddered. "No, darling; I am glad you gave the answer you did. In every respect Edward is no fit husband for you. He is weak, and without any sense of honour or principle. I am sadly disappointed in him, but he shall not annoy you again!"

"And you don't think," Marcella continued in a low voice, "that he meant anything by what he said about my mother and there being no headstone or plate to her memory in the church at Crawley, or even her grave there?"

Lady Violet frowned and her eyes did not meet those of the girl as she answered soothingly:

"Edward was in such a rage, dear child, that you must not heed anything he said. Your dear mother died abroad, so that accounts for her grave not being in Crawley churchyard. It was her wish, I believe, to be buried in the place where she died, and you know how absent-minded Sir Cyprian, your father, is! It would not occur to him that he should put a plate in the church."

Before Marcella could make any comment, Lady Violet continued quickly: "I want you, Marcella, to promise me that you will let me know at once should you ever need a friend in any great trouble, or write to me should you notice anything that puzzles you at the 'Court.' Promise me this, dear, because I shall know then that I may consider myself bound to you in any trouble that should befall you! I can only see you so rarely, dear, that I would be very happy with such an assurance from you!"

Marcella laughed softly. "Dear aunt Violet, why, of course, you are the first person to whom I should fly in any trouble or worry! In fact, I sometimes wish you were always with me," she added impulsively; "you are just the best substitute for the mother I have lost!"

Lady Violet winced, then smiled through sudden tears.

Digitized by Google

(continued.)

"Then that is a bargain, dear," she said gently; "I am your mother by proxy! That will be a secret between us!"

"Why don't you return to the 'Court' with me, aunt Violet?" Marcella asked, with a bewitching smile.

The eyes of the woman of fashion, whose name was being linked with that of a millionaire, contracted suddenly:

"I am a town product, dear," she said lightly, "the country bores me unutterably. But my heart will be with you, and sometimes your father will allow you to come and stay with me."

"I love the 'Court'!" said Marcella thoughtfully; "though it is fearfully dull at times! Even father grew morbid one day," she laughed. "He made his will, leaving everything he had to me, and I made mine making him my heir and sole executor! What I don't know, but it amused us!"

Lady Violet caught her arm suddenly.

"What—what—made him do that?" she stammered; "you have nothing, Marcella, to leave! By Sir Basil Wingate's will that made your father his heir, the money and the title at his death have been willed to an elder son of yours, should you marry—but—but you have no right to make a will, dear! Sir Basil hated women, since his only daughter ran away from him and so left everything that would only benefit male heirs. Had your father had a son he would have been that heir—but as it is, the estate and title with the money will revert to your son!"

Marcella laughed. "What a stupid idea! But I don't want money! I shall be perfectly happy, just having you, aunt Violet!"

The older woman smiled wistfully, as she moved towards the door.

"One day you will marry, dear, a man you love, I hope; and then I shall take a back seat, naturally!"

A slight flush stained the girl's clear skin as the vision of a dark, earnest face with steadfast, grey eyes rose before her—the face of the village curate, Philip Nullius.

Lady Violet noticed the blush, and woman-like, knew that there was a rival already in the field for the love she had so long been deprived of. But when she was alone her thoughts went back to the sentence in which Marcella had said that she and her father had "made their wills in each other's favour!"

What did it mean? she wondered anxiously. That there was an undercurrent of danger she could not but think, knowing the nature of the man who never did the most simple action without one or two powerful motives as the outcome of his simplicity.

"The life of poor Laura was insured!" she murmured, "for twenty thousand pounds, and the child's also! But that was nearly twenty-one years ago! Had he wished to benefit by it surely such a thing would have happened—earlier! It cannot be now—that some diabolical plot has occurred to him!

"No—no—how foolish I am," she muttered with white lips; "that cannot be; it would be too dangerous, and so far he has avoided that measure! No, something fresh has happened to cause him to think of making wills. I must watch carefully without letting him suspect that I am doing so, or I shall only hasten the plan he has in his mind, and be prevented from seeing her."

Still thinking deeply she rang the bell and requested that Mr. Day should be sent to her if he were still in the house.

When, after a few minutes, Edward Day presented himself before the woman who had been his best friend for so many years, he knew that he had lost his one chance of making anything out of the future generosity of Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox.

She looked at him coldly. "I wish to come to the point at once," she said distantly; "I will not touch on the subject of your insult to my niece, Miss Rust, but will inform you that I no longer desire your presence in my house! You are utterly unworthy the name of gentleman, and honour has no place in your vocabulary."

"Aunt Vi," the young man exclaimed incredulously; "don't kick me out like a cur because I fell in love with Marcella like any ordinary man!"

A sneer played about the mouth of Lady Violet.

"Unfortunately, like 'any ordinary man' you could not take your dismissal like a gentleman! But I am serious in telling you that I wish you to leave my house."

"Surely, aunt——" began the fair-faced young coward, "you are just a little hard on a chap!"

"I am not hard," she answered, "and now that you are leaving my house, I wish to tell you something that, had I seen you grow up as a gentleman and man of honour, I would always have kept from you, but your conduct and many extravagances have so disappointed me, that your final insult to Marcella Rust decided me in acquainting you with a fact that may perhaps be the means of making a man of you, though it may lower your vanity to the dust!"

"Tell me," he said hoarsely, "aunt Vi, don't bait me! I am in agony! What can you know about me?"

"To begin with," she went on slowly, "I am not your aunt! I took you out of pity from a fate for which you were probably intended. I was a first-class passenger on board a ship coming home from Australia, and a poor woman among the steerage passengers gave birth to two children. Out of pity I adopted one. That child—intended for a foundling, was yourself! Had you conducted yourself with the slightest sign of gratitude towards me," she finished coldly, "I would have spared you this!"

"And—and—I am a beggar?" he said painfully.

"No! I will allow you £250 a year because you grew up with extravagant ideas, for which I was to blame, and I am also giving you a chance of making a living for yourself. I have here a letter of introduction to Mr. Caleb J. Johnson, the financier. He may find you a post, and if you are steady, there is a good chance of your still doing well."

Unsteadily, and with a livid face, Edward Day found himself in his bedroom, with the letter of introduction to the man whose fellow guest he had been the night before. The change in his fortunes was so great that he could hardly feel it yet. He was only conscious of a deep hatred for the girl who had sent his prospects tottering, and a loathing for the woman who had opened his eyes to his real status! He drew out the letter and read:

DEAR MR. JOHNSON—I am introducing to your kind notice my secretary, Mr. Edward Day, in the hope that you may be able to find him something to do. He is clever, and under an influence like yours, may be a credit to his sex yet, though he is still young and impulsive. Trusting you may oblige me in this, as I am now dispensing with his services, and do not like to throw him aside—I am, very sincerely yours,

VIOLET FRAYNE-LENNOX.

For a few moments the secretary's face was not pleasant to look upon. It was vicious and vindictive.

He put the letter on the table and read it several times, carefully tracing the words with a dry pen over and over again. At last he seemed satisfied, and smiling grimly, he pulled a sheet of paper towards him, stamped with the address of the town house Lady Violet was occupying; and after spoiling several sheets of the paper, he turned out something that appeared to satisfy him.

"A pauper, am I? A nameless brat! All right, my dear 'aunt'! You have kindly turned me adrift, and it will be your letter of 'introduction' that will set me on my feet far above my expectations!"

Then, pulling the blotter towards him again, he began to write carefully a letter that seemed to require a great deal of care and thought.

At last he flung the pen on the table with a satisfied sigh, and laughed softly:

"Here begins my new life! I am armed cap-à-pie!"

(Another long instalment of this splendid serial next week.)

Digitized by Google

The Hidden Rift.

Showing How the Matrimonial Lute Played Out of Tune.

"'Tis ever two persons were destined to be happy together, they are!" was the comment of old Mrs. Wilford, a distant connection of the Marchmont family, as she watched young Leslie Marchmont and his charming bride drive off in the carriage, followed by showers of rice and old slippers, on the way to the railway station, where they were to take tickets for Bournemouth to spend their honeymoon.

The sentiment was echoed very sincerely by the three or four people who chanced to overhear Mrs. Wilford's remark, and if the question had been addressed to all the other guests, "What chance do you think those newly-married people have of being supremely happy?" the answer would most probably have been to the effect that there was no possibility of their being otherwise than gloriously happy.

Leslie Marchmont and his young bride, Myra, had been devoted lovers for two years. Leslie was a fine fellow, with a splendid position as joint partner with his cousin—a much older man—in a firm that did a largo export business and made a lot of money, to say nothing of the very solid private account with which his name was credited at the bank. Myra Lawrence was a charming girl with a sweet face and a lovable disposition. Everyone admired her, and, rare as such a thing is, she had no enemies. Her frank nature disarmed envy, hatred, and all uncharitableness on the part of others, and she was a general favourite.

Leslie looked down at his bride as they rolled along, and he was filled with tenderness and the pride of possession.

"I will take care of you, little girl!" he whispered softly, his voice quivering with love. "You are not afraid to trust yourself to me?"

"Why should I be, Leslie?" she answered in a sweet, low tone, looking up at him with an air of implicit trustfulness. Her long lashes were just tipped with suspicious moisture, but that was due to a combination of joy and sadness, the latter at the thought of leaving home. "I know that I shall be perfectly happy with you, dear!"

"My one thought will be to fill your life with contentment!" he whispered, and, taking advantage of the momentary seclusion, he bent still lower and kissed her.

Who could have supposed that there would be a rift in the lute, making the music of married life lose some of its tunefulness, within the course of a few months? Yet it was so, for Leslie Marchmont made a mistake so often made by young men; he had not sufficiently judged the character of the girl to whom he was so devoted. He was full of love, he imagined that he knew her disposition thoroughly, and could make her life glad, yet he had, in the exuberance of his passion, overlooked one important trait.

Myra looked back with considerable pride over the last five years of her life. She had always been fond of drawing, and at the age of seventeen she had begun to earn a reputation as a black and white artist, making sketches for the illustrated papers and weekly home journals. Her first accepted sketch was published in a ladies' journal, and from that time she went on steadily. It was not necessary for her to work with her pencil in order to maintain herself, for her parents were well-to-do, but it pleased her to devote some of her leisure to this work, and by so doing she earned enough money to keep herself, and to spend in doing good to others. She insisted on paying a certain sum for her board and lodging, and it gratified her to think that she was independent. It was not an obtrusive kind of independence; it was a feeling of dignity, and the parents encouraged it.

To Leslie, when he appeared on the scene and captured her young heart, she was the more attractive on that account, as he knew that she would be the kind of woman to encourage him by her bravery in moments when misfortune threatened, as it might do, however remote it appeared at that moment. Myra looked up to him as a prospective wife should, and thought only of making life pleasant for him. She knew that she would give up her work, but that was not a matter of importance. Her occupations would naturally be different. As to the money earned thereby, why, Leslie would be able to supply all that she needed quite easily.

It was just that spirit of dignified independence which Leslie failed to understand properly, and the result of this failure made itself apparent within the first nine months of their married life.

An attentive observer would have detected a difference in the bearing of these young people towards one another, yet it would have been difficult for him to have defined in what this difference consisted. There seemed to be an invisible barrier raising itself between them. Myra occasionally looked at Leslie as if she were waiting for him to say something, hoping that he would say something, and an expression of disappointment would cross her sweet face as she turned away. He had not uttered the words which she wanted to hear.

It gradually dawned on Leslie that something was amiss, and he could not understand it. Myra had all she wanted, he paid all the bills for the household, almost all their supplies being from firms with whom he ran an account, and settled that account by a monthly cheque, he purchased for her anything she desired in the way of dress, and he gave her money without hesitation when she asked him for some. He had often told her that she could have all she wanted in the way of cash, that she had only to mention the fact and he would write out a cheque or bring the gold home for her. What was it that was ailing her? She was not ill; in fact, he had never seen her in better health!

He resolved to question her on the point, but she was before him.

"Leslie," she said one morning, "I have a request to make."

He gazed at her in some surprise; the tone was just a trifle stiff, and not like that in which she usually made her requests, nor was the style of making the request in any way similar to her usual manner.

It was generally: "Leslie, dear, I want so-and-so; do you really think that you really have enough in the bank to meet such lavish expenditure?" And then would be a bright laugh, he would kiss the charming face, and the money would be transferred from his pocket to hers. Yet, as he heard this formal little speech, it occurred to him that those very informal expressions of their early married life had not been repeated lately.

Digitized by Google

"Certainly, dearest!" he exclaimed. "You know that I am only too pleased to let you have anything you desire!"

"I wish you to give me a separate allowance for my own personal use, Leslie," she said quietly, and if she had raised her hand to strike him he could not have been more surprised.

"I am at a loss to understand the reason of that request, Myra," he said, his own tones becoming rather stiff. "I grudge you nothing, you can have as much money as you desire. To ask me to let you have a private purse is to make a beginning of a system of divided interests which is not at all conducive to our happiness. What I have is yours, you can have it whenever you mention the fact; what more can you ask?"

"I think I ought to have a private purse to which I can go just as I please," she replied coldly. "It is humiliating to compel me to ask for everything I require or desire."

Leslie's mouth grew hard.

"It is entirely against my ideas of mutual confidence," he asserted doggedly. "You can have no need for a separate purse; all the bills are paid, you can have all you desire, I give you all the cash you wish for. Your request presents itself to me as the beginning of a division between us which I will not tolerate! I am willing to do most things for you, but not that! I believe you will see that you have been wrong when you reflect calmly on the subject!"

"I wish it!" she said, looking straight at him.

"And I do not!" he returned, meeting her gaze boldly.

For a few seconds they held one another's eyes; it was like the crossing of two blades, preparatory to a duel. Then Myra turned and passed out of the room.

"H'm!" muttered Leslie, flinging himself down into an easy chair. "What has come over Myra? I would have sworn by all that is good, at one time, that her temper was as sweet as honey, as smooth as oil, yet I have noticed lately, although I couldn't fathom the thing, that her temper was changing. She has been just a little irritable at times, and—— Well, perhaps not irritable," he corrected "but certainly less loving. What nonsense is this about a separate allowance? What can she want with money? Anything she likes to mention ——"

He stopped; after a pause, he added, slowly:

"She cannot want money for something which she is not willing to let me know about? No, it cannot be more than a fad; it will vanish, and she will be sorry!"

However, he looked in vain for any expression of regret from Myra, either in word or manner. He felt awkward when he returned to dinner that evening; he had a sentiment of sheepishness as he opened his front door and let himself into his own house. How would Myra meet him? He told himself that he was quite right to refuse, yet he had a uneasy feeling within him.

He found Myra as usual waiting for him at the table, ready to ring for the dinner to be brought in. She was just the same as ever, and the dinner was perfect. He felt half-ashamed of the thought that had crossed his mind, namely, that she would show her resentment by not ministering to him as in the past, and by neglecting the care of the house which had so materially contributed to their happiness. And by the time the meal was concluded, he was wholly ashamed of the thought.

The days glided past; Myra never mentioned the episode of her formal request. She was the same Myra, he told himself illogically, only—only different!

"Do you want any money, dearest?" he asked her pleasantly, nearly a week later. His geniality was partly assumed for the purpose of hiding his perplexity.

"No, Leslie, thank you!" she replied in the same tone.

"Oh, all right!" he answered, feeling uncomfortable, without exactly understanding why. "I'll write you out a cheque whenever you like, you know!"

"Yes, I know, dear!" she replied, as she raised her face for the parting kiss.

"She is still a little sore about it, I fear," he murmured in a disappointed tone. "She doesn't like to ask me just for a while. I know what I'll do, and that will make it all smooth again."

That evening, after dinner, he stole up to her special room and placed a roll of ten bank notes in the drawer among her gloves and other feminine accessories, as he had smilingly described them.

"She is sure to find them, and then she will be all smiles, and she will come behind my chair, put both hands on my cheeks, draw my head back, and kiss me as she used to do. Ah!" And the memory of those blissful moments raised him to the zenith of delight.

He waited for Myra to speak about that roll of notes; his eyes began to twinkle with pleasure whenever he came home during the next week, but Myra said never a word. Nevertheless, she did not ask for money, and he concluded that she had seen the notes and made use of them.

"She couldn't miss them," he said to himself. "As soon as she put her hand in the drawer she would feel the crisp roll. I expect ——" He meditated for a minute. "Yes, that's it. She is a wee bit awkward about mentioning it, although she has used the money and is glad that I have been so——"

He was at a loss for the proper word; "kind" did not seem to be appropriate, and while he was trying to find the correct adjective, the word "inconsistent" flashed across his brain, and it made him warm.

"No, I don't think it is inconsistency on my part," he objected. "If I place a roll of notes in her drawer to do as she likes with, that is different from a separate allowance. Of course I don't want her to tell me about every penny she spends, but that divided interest notion is—it isn't pleasant!"

He paced the room for a few seconds.

"I'll ask her for a kiss," he muttered. "She only wants a good opportunity for reconciliation, and when I look into her sweet eyes as I see her face raised to mine—why, that will settle it, and we shall be happy again."

"Do you want any cash, Myra?" he asked with assumed innocence, as he was preparing to depart on the following morning.

"No, thank you, dear!"

Leslie repressed a smile.

"You are very economical, dearest!" he remarked meaningly. Then, relapsing into a smile that was intended to be a sign of reconciliation, he said: "Do I not deserve a kiss?"

He bent and kissed her, expecting a warm salute; he had almost felt her arms round his neck, in imagination; but he had the greatest of all disappointments in love—that of a kiss accepted, but not returned. Myra's lips were not responsive, only receptive.

Leslie succeeded in concealing his mortification and went off; when near the front door he pretended to have thought of something upstairs. His real object was to peep into that drawer. He shivered as he did so; the roll of notes lay there untouched.

He was in a moody frame of mind when he entered his private office, where his partner was reclining in an office chair.

Digitized by Google

"Good morning, old chap!" was Harrison's greeting. "Glad to see your wife has not lost her skill as a result of marriage." He pointed to an open copy of the Illustrated Times. "That's a capital sketch."

Like one in a dream, Leslie glanced at the illustration indicated and saw his wife's monogram in the corner. It was fortunate that Harrison was indulging in an extensive yawn and did not pull himself round till Marchmont had regained his wonted coolness.

"Glad you think it's good," replied Leslie, with assumed modesty. "Many letters this morning?"

They then fell to about business and the incident passed. This, then, was his wife's answer to his refusal. In the first flush of vexation, his worse self tried to find some fault with Myra's conduct during the past few days, since that scene; but he was bound to admit that she had been the most careful, the most attentive of wives. And, slowly, he admitted that he had made a mistake.

His better self now conquered. It demands a good deal of courage and nobility of character to confess fully that one is in fault, but Leslie reached that stage before the luncheon hour, and he resolved to leave business for the rest of the day, go home, and take Myra out somewhere. They would have a drive in an open carriage in the rural lanes that were not far from their home; Myra always liked that, and then he would yield and ask for forgiveness.

"I say, dearest," he said, as she looked up in surprise at his return, "things are flat to-day, so I have come home to take you for a drive. I have ordered the fly. It won't take you long to get ready, will it?"

"I am sorry I cannot go this afternoon, Leslie," she replied, paling a little. "I have—something to do."

"Oh, the Illustrated Times can wait," he remarked, with an attempt at gaiety. "I have——"

"I am not doing work for the Times this afternoon," she said, her face flushing slightly. "I have some menu cards to paint for Mrs. Gascoyne's dinner-party, and they must be finished to-day!"

"Myra! You are not working for our friends?" He shrank back in dismay.

"Why not? She would pay someone else to do them, so I may as well take the money from her. What does it matter whether I receive pay from her or from a journal for work done?"

"Why do you do it?" he groaned.

"I grew tired of being compelled to ask whenever I wanted some pocket money," she responded quietly. "As I told you, it was humiliating. I thought that a husband would prefer that his wife should be spared that, and I was surprised that you made no arrangement. Then I asked you to do it, and you declined. I could not humiliate myself further, so I turned to my old work, to create what you ought to have allowed but refused to do."

"Then I ask that, at least, you will not lower my pride by working for friends, as though I kept you without funds," he cried.

Once again their eyes met, and they held one another's gaze for what seemed quite a long time. As they gazed into each other's eyes, the defiant look changed, the hardness died away, and an expression of yearning and repentance took its place.

"I was wrong. I came home to confess it and ask for forgiveness, Myra," cried Leslie, holding out his arms. "I failed to understand."

"I was wrong, too," she cried, a little catch in her voice. "I forgot that I might be humiliating you by working for Mrs. Gascoyne. And I ought to have explained differently when I required a separate allowance. Perhaps I have been too independent!"

"No, no!" he almost shouted, as he took her in his arms. "Oh, Myra, I am so glad that this miserable trouble is ended."

Myra finished the menu cards, according to promise, but she did no more work of that kind, and even for that she requested Mrs. Gascoyne to give the remuneration to a local charity. She did an occasional sketch for the journals, just for amusement, but she always devoted the proceeds to charitable purposes, for her husband allowed her more than enough.

The rift in the matrimonial lute was sealed, and the old tunefulness returned.

G. E. Lingen.

Your Editor Chats.

This is the last number of another volume. In a few days you will be hearing the bells "Ring out the old, ring in the new," and at the same time they will be heralding the first number of our new volume.

On glancing rapidly through the volume which this issue brings to an end, I am struck with the number of improvements that have been made in it over the previous ones, and I feel now that the excellent fiction matter of which it is composed is served up in a very tasty manner. Yet I do not intend to let Short Stories rest on its laurels, but I am going to make a big effort (and it will need it, too!) to bring this little paper a few more rungs up the ladder of Perfection, and some totally new and original features will be introduced.

I often receive cheery and encouraging missives from my readers, and these show that my attempts to please you have not been in vain. I sincerely trust that I shall number all my readers of 1903 amongst the increased clientèle of 1904. You have at this juncture of Short Stories' history a fine opportunity to introduce the paper to your friends, both male and female, as the new serial by Blanche Eardley, that commenced last week, is likely to be very popular. "Dupes of Destiny" is destined to be one of the most popular serials we have ever had. Remind your friends that they can start reading to-day, as the synopsis will give them the complete thread of the story.

"A Criminal Millionaire" is drawing to a conclusion, thrilling and effective. This serial, which has excited great interest among my readers, will be followed by a very powerful series of revelations, told by the chief figure in the series herself. These amazing episodes will be entitled, "Decoyed!" and the heroine will tell of the adventures that befell her at the hands of those who laid their schemes to entrap her. I will tell you more about this coming series next week.

Bolton carries off the guinea that I offered for what I considered the best solution of the Unsolved Love Problem, "The Doubt of Mildred Dalrymple."

The fortunate gentleman is Mr. S. Chorlton, of 227 Spa Road, Bolton, and he expressed his arguments in a very terse but conclusive form.

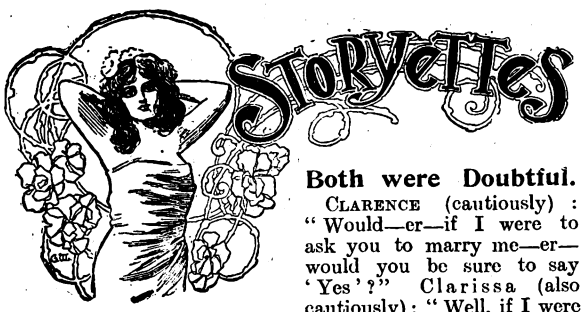
By the number of solutions received from readers I should judge this problem to be one of the most interesting of the series.

Do not forget that next Monday, December 28th, is the very last day on which I can receive letters in reply to "The Duty of Roger Forbes." Full particulars of this problem appeared in our Christmas number.

December 31st is the closing day for the Statue Competition and the Running Riddles Competition announced in our Christmas number.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google



Both were Doubtful.

Clarence (cautiously) : "Would—er—if I were to ask you to marry me—er—would you be sure to say 'Yes'?" Clarissa (also cautiously): "Well, if I were to say 'Yes'—er—would you be sure to ask me—er—to marry you? I'd like to be sure on that point."

Radium v. Gold.

He: "Darling, you are worth your weight in gold!" She: "No, John—I cannot marry any man who doesn't think me worth my weight in radium!"

The Only One Appreciated.

"Madge," said her father, "William asked me for your hand last night, and I consented." "Well, papa, that's the first bill of mine you haven't objected to."

Quite True.

"Don't talk to me," said the lettuce to the turnip; "I have a heart, and you haven't." "I don't see how that can be," replied the turnip, "you never get mashed, and I do."

He Blamed the Cook.

Young Wife (at dinner): "I didn't tell you, Adolphus, I cooked the dinner to-day myself." Husband: "Indeed! Then in my thoughts I have been doing poor Mary Ann a great injustice!"

He was Not so Backward as He Looked.

Ethel (who thinks her country cousin bashful): "Can't you find anything better to squeeze than a felt hat?" Country Cousin: "Wait a bit. I'm only reducin' my energy for fear I might hurt you."

Like Father Like Son.

Stern Father: "What an unearthly hour that fellow stops till every night, Dora! What does your mother say about it?" Daughter: "She says men haven't altered a bit since she was young, pa."

How Comforting!

She: "And you don't find it tiresome, dear, with me? You are sure you don't want to go back to your bachelor life again?" He: "Quite, my darling; indeed, married life is so awfully jolly that if you were to die to-night, I'd get married again to-morrow!"

They're Always at It.

Mrs. Widgers: "Indeed! If you knew half as much as you think you know, you'd know half as much again as you do know." Mr. Widgers: "Thank you! And if you knew twice as much as you don't know, you'd know three times as much as there is to know!"

He Still Keeps His Opinion.

Young Wife (sobbing): "I will not keep still! Before we were married you said I had a charming flow of language." Young Husband: "And so you have, dear. It not only flows, but dashes, leaps, bounds, roars, goes over cataracts and mill-sluices and there is an occasional water-spout as well."

They are Supposed to be Perfect.

He: "So the engagement is broken off?" She: "Yes. He told her he thought she should stop reading novels and read something more substantial, something that would improve her mind." He: "Well?" She: "Well, the idea of a man intimating to his fiancée that she could be improved in any way!"

She was Shocked.

Angelina: "What does the motto on the ring you gave me mean?" Edwin: "'Faithful to the last.'" Angelina: "Monstrous! I thought I was the first!"

Very Much Better.

Gladys: "I was so happy over Fred's letter. I fairly hugged myself." May: "Well, I was happier than you. Reggie called on me, and he did the hugging."

The Hint Direct.

"Would you mind pinning a flower in my coat when I go?" asked young De Borem. "Certainly not," replied Miss Wearyun. "It will afford me pleasure to do it at once."

Both Had Their Hopes.

Malcolm: "After we are married, Marie, you must never hesitate to ask me when you want money." Marie: "No, indeed, Malcolm; and I hope you will never hesitate about giving it to me."

A Successful Wooing.

"How many stars can you see?" she asked. "Two more than you," said he. "How do you make that out?" she asked. "I can see your eyes," said he. And that was the beginning of it all.

A Pleasant Outlook.

Newly-Made Bride: "Mamma says she does not think we will ever quarrel as she and papa do." Groom: "Never, dearest?" Newly-Made Bride: "No; she says you will be much easier to manage than papa was."

Jack Would Like the Favours.

Mabel: "Don't you think Fido is awfully clever?" Jack: "No, I do not." Mabel: "You horrid thing! Why don't you think so?" Jack: "Because he tries to get away when you kiss him. No intelligent being would do that. Just try it on me once."

Overheard at Brighton.

Harry: "Did you notice that lovely girl? What glorious eyes, with an expression like that of a startled fawn." Old Hand (calmly): "If she has that look she's from London." Harry: "Why?" Old Hand: "You see, all the girls there are that way. Dodging 'buses and cabs, you know!"

A Handy Name.

"I hear you are engaged again. What is the name of the fortunate young lady?" "Her name is Lucinda. That's one reason why I engaged myself to her." "Because her name is Lucinda?" "Just so. You see, that's the name of two former sweethearts of mine, and I can use on this present Lucinda the sonnets I used to my previous Lucindas. She is the most convenient fiancée I've had in the last ten years."

A Well-Merited Retort.

Monocle Cadsby (doing his celebrated act of fascination, and speaking to a young lady unescorted): "I think—ah——I have met you before, ah. Glad to see you; might I have the pleasure of accompanying you in your walk?" Young Lady (looking the thing in men's clothes up and down): "I think so, provided you walk about fifteen paces behind, in livery; that is, of course, if the character from your last place is satisfactory."

Verdict of Not Guilty.

"Do you mean to swear," said the foreman of the jury to the witness, "that at the time of the quarrel that constitutes the cause of this action, you saw the prisoner with a coal-scuttle in his hands, making ready to heave it at his wife?" "Not exactly," said the witness, with considerable hesitation. "I mean to swear that I saw the prisoner with a coal-scuttle in his hands." "In what attitude was he then?" asked the presiding judge. "Well, now, since your lordship has asked, I'll tell the truth. The prisoner was lying down with the coal-scuttle over his head, and his wife on the top of it."

Digitized by Google

Reunited at Last.

A Touching Story of Poverty and Kindness.

It was Christmas Eve; dark, cold, and wet, the rain driving in torrents round the corners of the streets, where people ran against each other and scowled under their dripping umbrellas as they received the by no means welcome drops from those of their neighbours.

But in Chancery Lane there was not a creature to be seen, save a slight, thinly-clad girl, who was unprotected both against cold and wet, for she had neither cloak nor umbrella—a pale girl with great eyes which had an appealing, wistful expression in them which made the passer-by turn and look at her again, if he were of an artistic mind, recognising the wonderful possibilities which lay in them.

She crept under an archway presently, and stood looking up and down the long, narrow street with its line of tall, grey, grim buildings, wondering what she was to do. There was not a hansom or four-wheeler to be seen, even if she had had the means with which to pay one to take her home; but that was an extravagance of which she hardly thought, for the shillings which lay in her small, well-worn leather purse were few and painfully earned.

Two gentlemen passed her, comfortable-looking City men, with their great-coats well buttoned up to their ears, and sheltered by capacious umbrellas. They were men of middle-age, prosperous, and self-satisfied, hastening home to good dinners, and they had not a thought to give to the poor girl standing under the archway.

"Dear me!" said one, "that young woman will get very wet." And the thought of ill-clad young women in the street, without umbrellas or cloaks, being unpleasant, he hastened onwards.

She must make an effort to reach the Waterloo Bridge Road, the girl resolved mentally, and from there take the omnibus to Kennington, where she lived. So she began to walk forward as bravely as she could.

Suddenly a pleasant voice in her ear made her start.

"May I offer you the shelter of my umbrella?" it said; "you are getting dreadfully wet."

The London girl who works for her living, if she be respectable, has a horror of being accosted in the streets, and regards gentlemen somewhat in the light of natural enemies.

The colour rushed into the girl's pale cheeks, and she glanced up hastily and proudly enough, but the face which met her gaze was so youthful, frank, and kindly in appearance that her suspicions were disarmed.

The owner of this merry, boyish face and pleasant voice was a gentleman undoubtedly. Why had he thought of offering her such a civility?

Looking down at her dress with a sigh, she accepted his offer, not without some embarrassment, and they walked along side by side for a little way, the young man talking pleasantly and courteously, without any approach to that familiarity which she dreaded.

He learnt that she lived in Kennington with a sister, who was very ill, and almost unable to work; while as for herself, she was not so clever, and had less schooling; but she managed to earn a pound a week as a typine, being engaged from nine in the morning till seven at night.

Her companion regarded her with genuine pity and astonishment.

"What!" he said in a horrified tone, "you work ten hours daily for three shillings and fourpence. It seems very little."

The girl stared.

"Some only get from twelve to fifteen shillings a week for the same hours," she said simply. "So that, you see, I am well off."

Their ways now parted.

"How will you get home?" he asked concernedly, looking up and down the wet, dismal street. "I say, you won't get the 'bus just directly, and it does not put you down at your door, you said, so won't you let me lend you my umbrella? We fellows don't mind a little wetting, but you have no cloak or anything, and will get soaked through. Do permit me. It won't inconvenience me in the least."

She paused and hesitated.

It was certainly very wet, and she would be drenched, she knew, but still she could not make up her mind to take it. She declined the proffered loan, and moved away, but the rain beat upon her so fiercely that she paused for a second and looked back.

He saw it, and was at her side in a minute. This time she did not refuse, though she felt half ashamed of herself for yielding; but, after all, creature comforts are very dear to us, and we naturally hate unpleasant or hard things, and accept the smooth when we can get it.

"Here is my card," said the young man, fumbling in his pocket. "But you have not told me your name; would you mind doing so?"

"My name is Frances Montgomery," she answered, looking at him quickly. "Are you not afraid to lend me your umbrella? You do not know who I am. I might not return it to you, you know."

He looked at her and smiled.

"I am not afraid of that," he answered pleasantly, and, raising his hat, walked quickly away.

The girl looked after him with a strange feeling stirring at her heart. She was not accustomed to meet with consideration or kindness in her daily walk; there were few who stopped to think of her. It surprised her that anyone should do so.

But the young man who had stopped to pity and consider her was very young, very impulsive, and very generous. If he had lived a few more years in the world he would probably have passed on like the rest, but youth is strangely indiscreet, strangely warm-hearted sometimes, and he had not learnt caution or discretion yet. Moreover, the girl was young and pleasing to look upon, and he was young likewise, therefore open to impressions.

If she had been old, ugly, and wrinkled, we cannot venture to assert that he would have done precisely the same thing.

When the girl had reached the narrow, dingy street in Kennington where she and her sister lived, she rang the bell quickly, and ran up the steps with more alacrity than she was wont to do.

The tall, thin, sharp-featured woman who opened the door and took the umbrella from her hand eyed it somewhat sharply. It was a large silk one of excellent quality, and the handle was handsomely mounted with silver.

Digitized by Google

"Lawk-a-day, Miss Frances!" she remarked with a grim smile. "Where did this 'ere fine piece o' goods come from, I'd like to know?"

"It was lent me," the girl answered, blushing guiltily.

The woman shook her head gravely.

"Look here, miss," she said, catching hold of Frances' arm. "Don't go for to take up with any smooth-spoken gentleman as wants to keep company with you in the streets. There's no good as ever comes of it, my dear, and for the sake of the darling upstairs I wouldn't have no harm come to you."

"Thank you, Mrs. Hogg," Frances answered somewhat coldly. "I think I can take care of myself."

"There now, I didn't want to offend you," the landlady said kindly. "But, you see, you're pretty, my love; and it's always the pretty ones as gets tempted; and this is a wicked, cruel world, as you'll find to your sorrow when you've lived a few years more in it."

"Are you very wet, Frances?" asked a faint voice, as the girl opened the door of a small room which served its occupants both as bed and sitting room. "I have been so anxious about you, my dear."'

The speaker was a thin, wasted-looking girl, with hollow cheeks and big eyes, with that dull, patient look in them peculiar to those who suffer continually. She sat up in bed working at a gay, plush smoking-cap, which she was bordering with forget-me-nots in silk, and her fingers were so slender that their appearance was almost skeleton-like.

"How are you, Maggie?" Frances asked, bending to kiss her.

"Not much better, I am afraid," sighed the invalid, working on. "You don't know how tired I am, and perhaps, after all, they may not take this."

She held up her work as she spoke, and surveyed it with mournful regret.

"What will they give you for it?" demanded her sister abruptly, hanging up her hat on a peg behind the door.

"Five shillings if they take it," Maggie replied slowly. "And I have been four days working at it. I can't work as well as I used to, I am so easily tired, you know."

Frances sighed heavily, and made no answer.

"Were the shops very gay for Christmas?" asked the invalid presently. "Did you see many pretty things, Frances?"

They talked on quietly while they ate the meal which was both tea and supper, and consisted of toast and weak tea. The elder girl went back to earlier and happier days of which she had still some vague remembrance, and told of Christmas as she had known it long ago.

"I wonder," she said, looking somewhat dreamily into the fire, "if our brother is dead. You know we had a brother when dear papa was alive, Frances—a step-brother, I mean, who went away to America when you were a baby. I don't remember very clearly, because I was only a little girl at the time, but I think someone told me—it may have been Aunt Mary—that papa had to pay away a great deal of money for him, and so became quite poor. It may not be true, though."

"If he did," responded Frances hotly, "our brother, if he were alive, ought to find us out and try to help us. But perhaps he is dead, or rich, and has forgotten all about us. You see we are only his half-sisters, and rich people hate their poor relations."

She laughed half-scornfully, half defiantly.

"My dear," said her sister gently, "you must not say so. They do not know how much the poor suffer. They have so much that they cannot understand our sufferings and struggles—that is all."

"We won't say any more about it," cried Frances. "Tell me about the Select Academy."

This was their favourite theme of conversation, and one on which the invalid was never tired of discoursing.

For five years during her father's lifetime, she had attended daily a select academy for young ladies in St. John's Wood, and the remembrance of that faded gentility had never left her.

There she had learnt to paint flowers, draw unnatural heads and fanciful landscapes, play the piano, sing, and dance, and had picked up some superficial smattering of French, German, and Italian. It was a poor enough school, but she had been abundantly satisfied with it; and the oily-headed professors, with their shabby coats, tall hats, and sweeping bows, filled her soul with delight. It is wonderful to think that five years of such schooling had only enabled the possessor of such unexceptional advantages to go out as a daily governness in a like academy of indisputable selectness, for the large sum of thirty pounds a year. She had a younger sister to care for; and a pinching struggle with narrow means, together with false economy in essentials, had broken down the poor girl's health, so that she was reduced to earn what trifle she could by fancy-work and sewing, badly-enough paid. The aunt who had taken them after their father's death had been poor herself, and had now been dead several years, leaving them entirely dependent on their own exertions.

They had scarcely finished their meal when the door opened, and in bounced the landlady, flourishing the umbrella.

"I wouldn't be worrying you for nothing, Miss Montgomery, bless your heart!" she cried indignantly. "But when a young woman comes home with the likes of this," surveying the silver-mounted handle with contempt, "given to her or lent by goodness knows who, it's time someone should speak. P'raps Miss Frances has told you about it herself, though."

The invalid turned a sad, reproachful glance upon her sister, who sank down at her bedside, crying:

"Don't look like that, Maggie. I'll tell you all about it, dear. Don't you believe me?"

She poured out her story breathlessly and incoherently enough, and drew out the card the gentleman had given her as a corroboration.

Maggie took it in her hand and read it slowly: "Frederic Delany, 18 Cavendish Square, W." Then she took the umbrella into her hand and looked at it doubtfully.

"My dear," she said gently, laying her thin hand on her sister's, "this is a gentleman—a grand gentleman, perhaps. You ought not to speak to gentlemen in the streets. Promise me you will never do it again, for when I am gone I want you to remember always that if you are only a typine and work for your living, you are also a lady—that our father was a gentleman, and you must do nothing he would be ashamed to think of his daughter doing."

She could say no more, for Frances burst out sobbing, and clung round her neck in a passion of tears.

* * * *

In the large and handsomely-furnished dining-room at No. 18 Cavendish Square, Frederick Delany sat at dinner.

Extremely youthful in appearance and even boyish in manner, he presented a striking contrast to his vis-à-vis, a tall, dark man of marked appearance, whose face was unusually serious, and his hair slightly silvered. No one knew very much about him, but he had a curious charm of manner underlying a certain reservedness and austerity, which made him a favourite in Society, and he was reputed to be enormously rich—a fact which, after all, was probably the more attractive of the two. He was unmarried—another reason for his popularity—and rented a small but elegantly-furnished house in Green Street, bordering on Park Lane. Some nine or ten years ago he had suddenly appeared in London—come home from America, he said—and had settled down quietly. He appeared to have no relations, and what he had done in America nobody inquired, since, probably, nobody very greatly cared. Some people, whom Society believed in, took him up, and the rest obediently followed their example. Report said he was secretly in love with the eldest Miss Delany. Be that as it may, he was frequently to be found at their pleasant house in Cavendish Square.

"You surely did not go out without your umbrella to-day, Fred?" said Miss Delany during dinner, turning to her brother. "I saw you come in without it, did I not?"

"No," he answered, blushing. "I did not forget it, but I—I lent it."

"Indeed!" said his father, smiling at the young man's embarrassment. "And to whom did you lend it?"

Digitized by Google

"To—to a young lady," he replied, stammering, and looking slightly confused. "At least, she looked and spoke like one, though she said she was a typine, and worked ten hours a day for a pound a week."

"Dear me!" murmured his mother, in tones of geniune pity. "How does she manage to live? What was her name? Did you ask?"

"Curiously enough," Frederick replied, looking at his friend across the table, "her name was the same as Will's—Montgomery—Frances Montgomery. She has an invalid sister—Maggie, I think her name is—who is almost unable to work, and they live at Kennington."

A long, silent chord in Will Montgomery's memory was evidently touched by this statement. The expression of his face was painfully, intensely eager as he leant across the table, and, looking the younger man straight in the face, gasped out:

"Tell me about this girl—tell me again."

Briefly Frederick related what he knew of her, speaking with much pity of her poor and inadequate clothing, and dwelling upon her refinement of manner and bearing.

"Listen," said Mr. Montgomery, in a low voice of suppressed emotion, when he had finished. "I have something to tell you. Years ago there was a young man who was both wicked and extravagant. He ran into many excesses, and incurred heavy liabilities which he was utterly unable to meet. His father, who could not bear that his name should be disgraced, paid those liabilities to the amount of ten thousand pounds, and, thereby, from having been a comparatively rich man, became a poor one. The young man then went abroad to begin his life over again in a new world, leaving his father and two little half-sisters behind. He worked early and late to amass money and redeem the past. During those years of engrossing toil he learnt that his father was dead. He also heard that his half-sisters had been taken by an aunt, but of them he thought little, and gradually almost forgot their existence. When he returned to England, a young man no longer, he made one or two inquiries after the aunt with whom they had gone to live, but could hear nothing of her. He then, in the pleasures and cares of his daily life, thought no more of his sisters, and gave himself up to the enjoyment of the wealth which he had so hardly won. What do you think such a man deserves?"

There was a silence.

Then Miss Delany spoke.

"He ought," she said, leaning forward, and looking gravely at Mr. Montgomery, "to go to his sisters, and not be ashamed to confess how grievously he has sinned in neglecting them, and beg their forgiveness if they have suffered through his so doing."

"I am the man," he said solemnly. "This poor girl whom your brother met to-day is my half sister—my father's child. Her name, I remember, was Frances. Frances was the younger, and Maggie the elder. God only knows the cruel want these poor girls have suffered all these years while I have lived in ease and luxury. I ought to have made every effort to find them out, for the sake of their father and mine. But it is not too late to repair my fault. I will do as you say, and they shall never know want any more."

When he left Cavendish Square, Mr. Delany, senior, remarked:

"I never liked the fellow so well as I did to-night, wife. He has good stuff in him."

Christmas morning dawned bright and clear, and at an early hour Mr. Montgomery hastened to Kennington to the address which Frederick Delany had given him, to find his long-lost sisters.

As he stood at the door of the small and dingy lodging-house they inhabited, and knocked, a burning blush mounted his brow as he thought of the want and poverty which he could so easily have relieved had he known it.

The landlady eyed him questioningly, and on his inquiry for Miss Montgomery, replied tartly:

"You ain't a-goin' to see her, sir. She've been took very bad in the night, and lies dyin' upstairs as anyone may see must have been the end of her sufferings, poor dear thing, as come on all along o'wearing bad boots as didn't ought to have been on a young lady's feet, but there weren't the money to buy a new pair with, bless her! And who may be you as comes axin' after Miss Montgomery, and what right have you to come intrudin' at a time like this?" she demanded somewhat fiercely.

"The best of rights," he answered quietly. "I am her brother."

Mrs. Hogg stared, ejaculated, and murmuring profuse apologies, conducted him upstairs.

The sight of the wretched room, with its miserable furniture, so shabby and so poor, cut him to the heart.

Maggie lay back in bed, her face as white as death, her eyes half-closed, while her breath came gaspingly as if she were in pain. By her side knelt Frances, her arms clasped round her sister in the very attitude of despair. A tiny fire flickered in the grate; there was nothing in the room save the bare necessities of life, and a few worn volumes on a shelf above the dying girl's bed; everything proclaimed the children of poverty.

A lump rose in Mr. Montgomery's throat, and he could not speak for a moment.

Frances turned her head, and, seeing a stranger, an exclamation of surprise broke from her lips.

The dying girl opened her eyes.

Mr. Montgomery stepped forward, and took her hand.

"I am your brother," he said slowly and distinctly, bending over the bed that she might catch every word; "I have cruelly neglected you. Can you ever forgive me for having left you in want so long?"

She seemed scarcely surprised, and a little wandering in her mind.

"We had a brother," she murmured. "Did I not tell you so, Frances? Aunt Mary told me a long time ago. We were very little when he went away, and so he forgot us—that is all."

She sighed.

"When he comes back—if he is alive and remembers—he will take care of you, Frances, my dear; but—— It is very cold."

She shivered, sighed, and, turning her head, went out for ever from the world's coldness and pain.

Frances, in an abandonment of grief, threw herself face downwards on the bed, but she could not weep, her sorrow was too great.

"Little sister," said her brother, gently raising her, "I have only you, and you have only me now. God helping me, I will do my best to make up to you for what you have lost; and I would give half of what I have to bring her back to life and health if I could."

He looked sadly at the dead girl as he spoke.

"Poor Maggie!" murmured Frances, and fell sobbing on his breast.

A year later, Fred Delany, the good Samaritan, and Frances Montgomery, the lady typine, were quietly married.

W. Hills.

Digitized by Google

SYLVIA.

Telling How a Girl was Misjudged.

It was a calm summer evening, but a faint breeze was blowing; very pleasant after the great heat of the day. So thought two young men as they sauntered to and fro on the promenade of a fashionable watering-place. In the distance they heard the not unmusical strain of the town band.

"That is rather a pretty thing they are playing," remarked one of the men, Frank Leslie, referring to the band; "what is it called?"

"I believe it is a gavotte, called 'Sylvia,'" replied Stuart Harcourt, his companion.

What a host of bitter, sweet memories surged through Frank's mind at the mention of that name. He saw a winsome, merry face, framed in glorious masses of bright, brown hair; soft, violet eyes that had so often gazed at him with a tender lovelight shining in them. A long sigh broke from him, which caused his friend to turn to him and say:

"What is it, Leslie, old chap? Anything the matter? By-the-by, Sylvia is the name you were always shouting out when you had brain fever so badly in India. Is there anything connected with it?"

A pause ensued, during which time Frank Leslie seemed to be engaged in a mental struggle. At last he exclaimed:

"You have been a good friend to me, Stuart, and nursed me like a brother when I had the fever, so I will tell you what I would impart to no other person living, that is, my love story. Light a cigarette, old fellow, let us sit down on this bench, and here goes:

"When I was quartered at Marford, a horrid little country town, I made the acquaintance of Mr. Barns, vicar of the country parish of Wartham. He was very kind, and invited me to his house. I went, and met his daughter, Sylvia Barns. Oh, Stuart! I can never tell you how I loved that girl, and fully did I believe she loved me in return. I was always looking for opportunities to go to Wartham Vicarage, until Mark Barns, her brother, came home from Oxford, and it was comparatively easy, for he and I became inseparable companions. At last the day came when I received my orders for India. I went straight to Wartham, saw Sylvia, told her of my love, and asked if there was any hope for me?

"'I have never cared for anyone save you, Frank, and never shall.'"

"Those were her very words, Harcourt, but how false they proved! I then went to Mr. Barns, to tell him of what had taken place between his daughter and myself.

"'You are both too poor to be married,' he replied. 'I don't approve of long engagements, but if you both think the same when you come home, Leslie, I will give my sanction to the marriage. If in the meantime either of you should change your mind, write and apprise the other of the fact, but no other correspondence will I allow; in this I trust to your honour.'

"Not being able to make better terms than this, I consented.

"I had been in India about a year, when I received a note in Sylvia's handwriting, which ran as follows:

"'I have changed my name to Durnford;' and by the same mail a newspaper arrived, on opening which, my eye caught a paragraph commencing thus:

"'The little village of Wartham was en fête on Tuesday, on the occasion of the marriage of Mr. Durnford with Miss Barns.'

"I read no further. It was indeed insult added to injury. Not only had Sylvia proved false in the little space of time, but she had also sent me a newspaper account of her baseness. You know the rest. How I got brain fever, and how on my recovery we both obtained leave and came home."

* * * * *

A few evenings after Frank's confession, he and Stuart attended the Infirmary ball. Whilst walking round the room criticising different belles, Stuart's attention was suddenly attracted by an exceedingly pretty girl, who was gazing at his friend with earnest attention. He saw Frank glance at her with a look of sudden scorn, then the fair face paled, and she shrank behind a lady who was standing near. Later in the evening, Frank, who had not danced many times, was accosted by one of the stewards whom he knew slightly.

"There is a lady friend of mine here who hardly knows anybody, so do come and dance with her."

So saying, he took Frank's arm, led him up to a group near the door, murmured a few indistinct words of introduction, and hurried away to another non-dancing man, leaving Frank face to face with his false love, Sylvia Barns.

"Why have you not spoken to me all the evening?" she asked in an appealing voice. "What have I done to offend you?"

"Need you ask," replied Frank sternly; "when you think of your treachery and baseness."

"Treachery and baseness!" Sylvia faltered. "Frank, I I don't understand you."

"This is no place for a discussion; come into the conservatory," said Frank.

The conservatory was empty. On arriving there Frank turned to Sylvia, and said in a scornful tone:

"You don't understand, Mrs. Durnford, what I mean by treachery? Do you not call promising to marry one man and then jilting him for another, base?"

"Yes, Frank, I should call it so; but what has it to do with me? And why do you call me Mrs. Durnford? I am Miss Durnford!"

"Miss Durnford!" ejaculated Frank, in amazement. "How so?"

"Why, poor old Aunt Durnford died when you had been away a year, leaving us her money, providing we should take her surname. Did you not receive the paper with an account of Mark's wedding in it, which beautifully explained it all? My father said I wasn't to write a letter. I wrote a note, though, letting you know of my change of name."

A light flashed across Frank's mind.

"Then it was Mark who was married, and of course, I remember, he always was in love with his cousin, Bessie Barns. Oh, my darling, my darling, can you ever forgive me for doubting you?" murmured Frank passionately, when he had explained his fears.

What Sylvia answered I know not; suffice it to say that the little village of Wartham was again en fête shortly afterwards, on the occasion of Miss Durnford's marriage with Captain Leslie of the Royal Heavies.

May Harvey.

HANDWRITING DENOTES YOUR CHARACTER,
And if you wish to learn what this is send a specimen of your handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope to Ranee, 23 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. A reliable delineation of your character will be sent in return.

Digitized by Google

POWERFUL ROMANCE.

A CRIMINAL MILLIONAIRE

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "Olga Romanoff," "The Lake of Gold," etc., etc.

THIRTIETH CHAPTER.

The Doom of a Traitor.

"Look here, Staunton, what sort of a game is this you are playing on us? I'm talking business, strict business understand, and there's my pile on the table. Don't let us misunderstand one another."

"Yes, and there's mine, and now what have you got to say?"

It was four o'clock of the morning after the concert, and Derrick Kesteven and Isolo Staunton stood facing each other from opposite sides of the table in the Council Chamber. Kesteven had taken a five-chambered .38 Smith and Wesson out of his hip-pocket and laid it on the table in front of him, and Staunton had answered the challenge by doing the same.

As though by tacit consent they put their hands behind their backs and looked at each other eye to eye across the table. Each knew perfectly well that if he put a hand out towards his weapon he would be shot the next moment.

"Can't you see what it means? Surely you know enough of what you and I have been working through together for the last fifteen years or so——

"Look here, Staunton, you just remember what I told you after your talk here with those Spaniards. This is no funeral of mine. I resigned right then and I want to know how it happens that we started out from the Bay of Nice last evening for a sort of al fresco sea-concert-picnic business, and some of us who didn't want to go to sleep after what happened, find ourselves out of sight of land on board this craft of yours ripping through the water faster than a destroyer. Where are we?"

Staunton took out his watch and looked at it for about half a minute.

"I should say that we cleared the Straits of Gibraltar about an hour ago, and we are now heading about South-West—well, we will say, across the Atlantic."

"And our destination?"

"Is at present undecided."

"In other words, you've somehow fixed the thing up so that you've enticed the whole lot of us on board this infernal craft of yours to dine and have a concert and so on, and you think that you've got the whole lot of us, not only our own personal friends, but your guests as well, absolutely at your mercy. That's so, isn't it?"

"My dear Kesteven," replied Staunton, pulling a chair up to the table and sitting down well within reach of his revolver, "you have hit off the situation to perfection. Just take up your gun and put it in your pocket, and let us talk like reasonable beings. Put yours away first. Shoot me if you like, and if you want everybody on board to find trouble. As it is I am standing right on the sharp edge of eternity, and one way or another it doesn't, after all, matter very much. Just a few years more or less, that's all."

"You're grit, Solly. Grit right through, darn you," replied Kesteven, in just the same voice in which he had spoken; nearly fifteen years before, on the verandah of the house in San Francisco, when they had shaken hands over their partnership.

He took up his pistol and balanced it for a moment in his hand. Staunton, sitting back in his chair, with his hands in his trousers pockets, looked at him eye to eye, and said:

"Well, if you mean business, why don't you shoot?"

"No!" said Kesteven, putting his pistol back in his pocket and sitting down. "Let it go at that. I know a stronger man than myself when I see him, and we've both got daughters on board this hooker of yours. Now, suppose you shoot."

"Not much," laughed Staunton, throwing his own revolver across the table. "This isn't a sort of time for dog to eat dog anyhow."

It was curious how these two men, multi-millionaires both of them, with the world at their feet like a football, reverted, in this supreme hour of conflict, to the old poker language of the days when they were both adventurers, with only a few thousand dollars between themselves and poverty—or prison.

"O. K.," said Kesteven, throwing Staunton's revolver back across the table. "We'll play the cards face up. And now I suppose I can call the game. What is it?"

"It's a longish story," said Staunton. "You see, it's this way. We'll count you out of the business, as you wanted to be, but I'm in it right up to the ears. I made a bad mistake getting here so quickly—not myself, I mean, but the yacht, after leaving Leith and going to the anchorage."

"Yes," interrupted Kesteven, "but who in thunder could have known that except yourself and the skipper?"

"My dear Derrick, it seems to me as if you'd been seeing nothing since you shut down on the partnership. You were talking to me the other day about our friend Mr. Dennison and his colleague Mr. Smith. Well, do you happen to know who Mr. Smith is?"

"Eh, Smith, well I guess he's just Mr. Smith, chief of the International Police in London. Anything more?"

"Yes," replied Staunton, taking a sip at his whisky and soda, "Mr. Smith is also the Monsieur de Ronski, who——"

"What do you say!" exclaimed Kesteven, jumping to his feet. "What, that man and his wife and his daughter, that lovely girl, that incomparable singer? Look here, Solly, are you really sure of this?"

Digitized by Google

"We've been through a few pretty tight places, Derrick, since you and I started to work together," replied Staunton, also getting up, "but this is about the tightest that I ever tried to get through, and if you'll sit down for a minute I'll just show you how I mean to do it if the Fates won't look sideways on me. You'd hardly think that we had a traitor on board this boat would you, a man that we both trusted rather too much or too little, maybe too little perhaps?"

"What, not Valdez?" exclaimed Kesteven.

"No, no," replied Staunton, "he has his limitations, and he makes his mistakes, as he did with young Ellerton, and made all this trouble with poor Mercedes, but there's nothing of the traitor about him. I'll introduce you to the traitor in a minute or two, and then you shall see."

'Yes," said Kesteven, as he emptied his glass. "Of course, if it's a case of treason, I don't want you to tell me what's necessary. Heave ahead! I'm with you there. You won't hurt my feelings."

"I thought not," laughed Staunton, going to the telephone and taking the transmitter down.

"Have you got him there? Yes. Very well. Send him here at once. Put him in the sleeping bag, and don't let anyone see him. Have you got everything arranged below? Very well. That will do. Send him aft."

Staunton hung up the transmitter and opened the double door.

"Say, what in thunder are you doing, Staunton? Is there going to be any murder and sudden death about this business?"

"Murder? No!" replied Staunton quietly. "Sudden death? Probably. In short, if you wish to see it, you can assist at an execution, but anyhow it's going to take place within the next ten minutes."

"Well," replied Kesteven, "taking your word for it that it is a traitor, I reckon I'm with you. Bring him right along."

The telephone bell tinkled again, and the next moment a couple of stalwart quarter-masters came in, carrying a long, shapeless bundle between them.

"Put it down," said Staunton, "and go forward and tell Mr. Darfield that I should be glad if he would come here."

The men laid their burden on the floor, touched their caps, and went out without a word. Staunton closed the doors and came back and touched the bundle, inside which something was moving, with his foot, and said:

"This is it. What do you think it is?"

"It looks something like a man," said Kesteven slowly, and then suddenly he continued more anxiously, "look here, Solly, don't prolong the agony, it isn't a woman, is it?"

A smothered groan came from within the sleeping bag. Staunton leant down and unbuttoned the flap. "Take hold of that end, Derrick."

Kesteven took hold of the bottom of the bag with both hands. There was another shuddering movement inside it and he heard another gasping moan. Then Staunton put his hand in, and, with a wrench, dragged out Doctor Billaud, grey-white with fear, his eyes rolling in their sockets. His lower jaw was working convulsively, rattling his teeth together, his hands were clenched, and his legs were trembling and knocking against each other.

"Stand up, you dirty traitor, stand up and tell us what you think of yourself. Confound you!"

It was not often that Isolo Staunton let the savage that was in him loose, but it was loose now. He took Billaud by the jaw and the back of his head and lifted him up as though he had been a child. Then he let him go, and Billaud dropped into a huddled heap on the floor, gasping out between his sobs:

"What? Mercy for a thing like you," laughed Staunton, rolling him over with his foot, "look at it, Derrick. That's the sort of thing that thought it could give us away. What do you think of it?"

"Looks very mean, anyhow," said Kesteven, somewhat uneasily, for he had never seen anything quite so terrible as his late partner was now, vibrating in every nerve with strongly suppressed passion.

"What are you going to do with it?"

"You'll see soon," said Staunton shortly, and then the telephone bell tinkled twice. He opened the doors again and the first officer came in, pale, but quite steady and self-possessed. He knew already the part that he was going to be called upon to play. Billaud's life was nothing to him in comparison with the work which he had set himself to do. He had had a long talk with Janet in her own room after the concert and she had given him enough of her strength to enable him to bear himself like a man.

"Mr. Darfield," said Staunton, touching Billaud's shuddering body with his foot again, "it seems that our friend the doctor has been foolish enough to feel jealous because he has not been allowed to learn quite all about the inner workings of the Isola, and so he has thought fit to take a stupid, womanish sort of revenge by trying to betray me and therefore, of course, all of those who work with me to the police.

"Therefore, I have decided to reward his zeal in the cause of law and order by admitting him to a full knowledge of the secrets which he seems to have been so anxious to learn. Is everything ready below?"

"Yes, sir," replied Darfield, "everything."

"Very well, then," said Staunton, "then we can initiate our friend at once."

Billaud moaned again inarticulately, dragged himself to his knees, clasped his hands, and then rolled forward at Staunton's feet and tried to put his arms round his legs, sobbing again:

"Mercy, mercy, sir; have pity, have pity. I have sinned but I will atone. Do not kill me now, I am not fit to die; pity, pity!"

Staunton lifted his foot and kicked him away.

"Pity for a thing like you," he laughed; "a thing that doesn't even think itself fit to die. Really, my dear doctor, that is nothing whatever to do with me. You should have thought of that before. As it is, I am afraid you will have to arrange that little difficulty as best you can in the next world. You won't have time to do it in this one."

Billaud uttered another gasping moan and dropped prone, his forehead hitting the carpet with a soft sound, which to Kesteven's ears had something sickening in it.

"The man's fainted," he said roughly. "Say, I don't see any particular sport in this. I know you can't let him live, but don't play with the poor fellow like that. You're a man, not a cat."

His tone of disgust rather than his words cooled Staunton's frenzy of revenge. He shrugged his shoulders and said half apologetically:

"Well, perhaps you're right; the thing isn't worth playing with."

He took the brandy decanter and poured out half a glass, straightened Billaud out, lifted his head, and poured some into his mouth. He shuddered and gasped and opened his eyes.

Digitized by Google

"Ah, where am I? What has happened? Ah, yes, yes, I remember. God help me! I am lost!"

"Not quite, my friend, but you soon will be," laughed Staunton, picking him up by the shoulders and dropping him on to a chair. "Just oblige me by tieing him up, Mr. Darfield, in case he falls down again and hurts himself. You will find a bit of line there on the sofa. I thought we might want it."

Darfield picked up a little coil of thin rope from the sofa, and in a couple of minutes had fastened the shrinking, trembling form of the doomed man to the chair. Meanwhile Staunton had pulled the corner of the carpet aside and tapped four times on the floor with the toe of his boot. Three taps answered him from below. He went to the chair and said to Darfield:

"Give me a hand."

They lifted the chair and placed it on the square in the corner, and as they did so Billaud recovered sense enough from his paralysis of fear to remember how he had helped to put Wilfrid Ellerton in the same position after he had administered the drug to him.

"Come along, Kesteven," said Staunton, "and you, too, Mr. Darfield."

He went and stood behind the huge chair. Two others took their places on either side. Billaud's head dropped forward and a gasping sob gurgled in his throat. Staunton tapped with his toe again and the platform sank. It came to rest on the floor of the lower chamber.

"Come, now, rouse up, doctor," said Staunton, with a savage laugh, as he caught his chin and turned his face up. "If you want to have just another look about you, this is the time to do it."

"Oh, for Heaven's sake put the man out of his misery and be done with it," exclaimed Kesteven, with a gesture of disgust. "I didn't think you were as mean as that, Solly. Get it over. Just think what Mer——"

The next instant he was looking into the muzzle of Staunton's revolver.

"Another syllable and by all that's holy you'll go down with him."

"Then I guess Mr. Darfield might as well put us away together," replied Kesteven quietly.

Staunton looked down and saw the barrel of his partner's pistol pointing straight at his heart.

"I've seen you, Solly, and I guess the hands are about even. I've got fours and one over and so have you. All the same I was wrong and I apologise."

"Good enough," said Staunton, putting his revolver back into his pocket, "but you ought to know better than risk sudden death like that twice in half an hour." Then he turned to his first officer and said:

"Mr. Darfield, you will be good enough to forget this little incident. I have no reason for losing a good officer and a faithful servant—you see what I mean, I suppose?"

"Yes, sir," replied Darfield, "I understand you."

"Ah, pity, pity on me, monsieur; pity for the love of Heaven. I will be faithful again, truly I will. I will tell you everything, and then I will be silent, indeed I will."

Billaud had come to himself again and straightened his head up, the only part of his body he could move, and as he gasped the words out he looked at him with a glance which even Staunton did not wish to see again.

He turned away without making any reply and touched the button in the end wall of the chamber. The steel panel fell back, disclosing the sloping passage down which Ellerton had been carried on his way to the Underworld. At the end was the diving chamber with the electric bulb shining in the roof.

"Lend a hand, Mr. Darfield," said Staunton, taking hold of the back of the chair. "This is part of the secret the doctor wanted to learn, and he'll learn a bigger one very soon."

They lifted the chair and carried Billaud whimpering hopeless, half-inarticulate pleas for mercy, down the passage and planted the chair in the middle of the diving chamber.

"Thank you, Mr. Darfield, that will do; I don't want you to have any more share in this business than you've got to have. I'll do the rest."

"Thank you, sir," replied the first officer, with a very evident note of relief in his voice. He went out into the passage and Staunton, apparently deaf to the hardly human cries which came sobbing and gasping from his victim's lips, took up a coil of rope lying on the floor of the chamber beside a couple of fifty kilogramme weights, and lashed it round his body and framework of the chair. Then he laughed again:

"Good-bye, doctor, see you in the next world perhaps," and followed Darfield into the passage.

He took hold of one of the levers on the wall.

A hoarse scream of despairing agony burst from Billaud's white and trembling lips, and the next moment the sheet of steel slid down and quenched it into silence.

Staunton pulled the second lever.

There was a faint gurgling sound of inrushing water. He pulled out his watch and counted a hundred and twenty seconds, then he pushed back the second lever and then a minute later the first. The sheet of steel rose again, and Kesteven, who had come half way down the sloping passage, looked into the chamber. It was drenched with water and empty.

THIRTY-FIRST CHAPTER.

Plans for the Future.

Kesteven had seen as much as most men have done but when he and Staunton and Darfield found themselves back in the Council Chamber, and Staunton had kicked the corner of the carpet over the sinking platform, he went to the table and took hold of the brandy decanter.

Darfield's face was grey-white and his eyes were beginning to wander. They moved from Kesteven's face to Staunton's, and back again aimlessly. He caught hold of the back of a chair, swayed to and fro for a moment, and then dropped into it.

"I thought so," said Staunton, "and it's just as well."

He went to the little cabinet on the left-hand side of the doors and unlocked it. Kesteven saw a row of little bottles, with blue labels on them. Staunton took one of them out and let ten drops fall into a minim glass, which he had taken up with his left hand. He jumped to his feet, and said:

"Look here, Solly. I'm full of this. If you're going to fix up another funeral this morning I'm going to bed."

"My dear Derrick, it's nothing of the sort," replied Staunton, taking a hypodermic syringe out of its case and filling it from the glass. "Mr. Darfield wants a sedative tonic as he has just said, and if he likes I will give it to him."

"No, sir, I thank you,"

Digitized by Google

exclaimed Darfield, getting up. "If you will allow me—if I have done all that you require, I will only ask that you will give me a couple of hours' sleep. Really, sir, that is all I want."

"Are you frightened, Mr. Darfield?" said Staunton, going towards him with the syringe balanced between the thumb and forefinger of his right hand. "Surely you don't think that I want to do you any harm—you—look here!"—he went on pulling up his sleeve and running the needle under the skin of his arm. "I want a sedative as you do, and I am not going to commit suicide."

He pressed the piston and the skin puffed up above the puncture. "There is half of it," he said, "will you have the other? I think it will do you good."

"Thank you, sir," said Darfield, pulling up his sleeve. "I would give a good deal for three hours' sleep just now."

"And you shall have it, because you have earned it," said Staunton, gripping him by the wrist and thrusting the needle into the flesh of his forearm. He pressed the piston until the last drop of the drug had gone in. He took the needle out, opened the doors, and said:

"Now, the sooner you get to bed the better, and it will be as well for you to forget everything that has happened to-night."

"Yes, sir, I will forget everything except what you have just said," replied Darfield, as he stepped haltingly over the combing of the doorway and disappeared into the grey mingling of the dying night and the dawning day.

Staunton closed the doors, went to the cabinet, opened a drawer, and took out a lancet, he bared his arm again, and ripped the flesh open where the swelling was still visible. A stream of blood, mingled with a whitish fluid, ran down towards his wrist. He took out his pocket handkerchief and pressed it over the wound.

"Just go to that cabinet, Derrick, will you, and get me the collodion and a bandage. The collodion is on the second shelf to the left hand, and the bandages are in the bottom drawer to the right."

"You are pretty hard shell, Solly. Grit all through," said Kesteven, "and if I could only sympathise with you in that South American scheme of yours, I'd like to help you to be Emperor and make myself your Prime Minister or Chancellor or whatever it is."

"You can do it now, Derrick, if you like," replied Staunton, as Kesteven poured the collodion over the wound and then wrapped the bandage over it.

"Not me, Solly," he replied, shaking his head as he finished the bandage and pinned the end. "I've got Cora to think about, to say nothing about the Grand Duke, and I reckon I should feel pretty mean if she didn't become a Grand Duchess in due course, and, incidentally, I might ask what you might intend doing with the lot of us on board here. I suppose you haven't forgotten you have about forty people on board this boat who will be pretty well astonished when they wake up later on this morning and find themselves skimming over the wide Atlantic at thirty or forty miles an hour, instead of running into moorings in the Bay of Nice. What are you going to do about them?"

"Well," said Staunton, pulling his coat sleeves down, "that is a matter that wants thinking about, isn't it? If you don't mind being partners again for a few hours, Derrick, I think you can help me out of one of the tightest places I have been in for some time, and at the same time go home with all your feathers flying."

"As regards the superfluous guests, I reckon. Is that it?" asked Kesteven, looking at him from under his half-lowered eyelids.

"You've got it in once, as we used to say out West," said Staunton. "You see it's this way, I've got this crowd of people on board, I've had to bring them away, but I don't want them, and I don't wish any evil to them."

"With exceptions, I suppose?" said Kesteven, sitting up and looking hard at him.

"Yes, naturally there are certain exceptions. If there hadn't been the yacht wouldn't be where she is now. A man with all I have to risk doesn't get outside the four corners of the law for nothing."

"And the exceptions?" asked Kesteven.

"Well," said Staunton, poising himself on the edge of the table, "to begin with, there's our mutual friend, Smith—de Ronski. I can't let him go, and his wife and daughter—no, no, don't worry about your gun. I see what you're thinking, and I quite appreciate——"

"Rats, Solly, don't give me any of that stuff. Put it in plain figures, and let's be done with it."

"Exactly what I was going to do, if you hadn't weighed in with that chivalrous interruption," said Staunton, with a sneering laugh running through his words. "It comes to this. For my safety, to say nothing about Mercedes and you and Cora, these people have got to stop on board for the present. You don't want me to tell you what would happen if I landed them at the end of the cable——"

"Do they all know?" Kesteven interrupted, sitting straight up in his chair. In his eyes was a strange gleam.

"If my information is worth anything, my dear Derrick," said Staunton, flicking the ash off his cigar—"his women-folk, charming and all as they are, are rather more dangerous to our interests than Mr. Smith himself. I know pretty well what he knows and what he wants to do, but when you get women taking a hand in a game like this you don't know what to play."

"That's so," said Kesteven. "Quite right. If they're in it with Smith, well charming and all as they are I suppose they've got to take their chance with him. Anyone else? Dennison, I suppose?"

"Yes," replied Staunton slowly, "I think I'll have to prolong his holiday for a few weeks, but if you'll just do what I am going to ask you to do, Derrick, I'll give you my word as one white man to another, that no harm shall come to any of them unless it's absolutely necessary. By that, of course, I mean that none of them shall find trouble unless he or she goes and deliberately looks for it."

"Good enough," replied Kesteven. "I'll take it at that; and now what do you want me to do?"

"Just this," said Staunton, taking out his watch. "If we have been keeping our speed, we shall be within twenty miles of Madeira about an hour after breakfast. The de Ronskis and Mr. Dennison will not appear at breakfast. They will have it in their own rooms if they want it. When breakfast is over the two steam pinnaces will be at your service. You will explain to our guests that it has become impossible for me to take them back to Nice, and they will take a trip with you in the two pinnaces to Funchal, where you will be able to get back to Europe by the first South African liner that comes along. I shall not appear myself, because I hate explanations. When they get back to Southampton they can talk as much as they please. The Isola will take a good deal of finding by then."

"And Mercedes and Cora?"

"They will of course go with you, and so will Miss Yuill. I'll have a talk with Mercedes before breakfast. Under all the circumstances it will be for you to hand her, and, of course, Miss Yuill, over to the care of my old friend, José Martinez at Funchal. I'll explain the matter to Miss Yuill.

"She will see that after the shock the poor girl has had with this sudden return of memory, the best thing that could happen to her would be a few weeks of perfect rest and quiet

Digitized by Google

Gifts Worth £25,969

to users of Soap. You use it. Get some of the money. Save your wrappers of

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER.

THE BEST SOAP FOR ALL PURPOSES.

Equally good for Bath, Toilet, and Nursery, as well as for Household and Laundry. Made from the Purest Materials and has

THE LARGEST SALE IN THE WORLD OF ONE POUND TABLETS.

ANOTHER GREAT PRIZE COMPETITION

120,419 PRIZES.

FULL PARTICULARS ACCOMPANY EACH TABLET.
Send Wrappers of Watson's Matchless Cleanser, Watson's Sparkla or Watson's Nubolic Soap to the address below—

VALUE £25,969

JOSEPH WATSON & SONS LTD., WHITEHALL SOAP WORKS, LEEDS.

Every competitor in the previous competition received a prize.

THOUSANDS OF COSTLY AND USEFUL ARTICLES.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED); absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1s. 4d., 1lb. 2s. 4d; 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free. Supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

Home Rupture Cure.

Marvellous Blessing to Those who are Ruptured. Proofs so Positive and From Such Reliable Sources as to be Free From All Doubt.

Dr. W. S. Rice (Dept. 431), 8 and 9, Stonecutter Street, London, E.C., has the distinction of perfectly curing even the most difficult ruptures of long standing. He does this without causing the patient one bit of pain, absolutely without danger and without the loss of a moment's time from work. He does not use the knife, and sends his method and treatment direct to the sufferer's home, where it can be used without assistance, and brings immediate relief. Dr. Rice has cured hundreds of old men who have been ruptured 30 and 40 years. Never before have such letters of testimony been received as Dr. Rice receives every day. Mr. James Cole, 13, Holdick Street, Midland Road, Peterborough, was cured at the age of 66 years. He writes Dr. Rice as follows:—"I had a bad rupture, and when I saw your method of cure advertised I was rather doubtful as to permanent cure; but I am thankful I tried it, for I do not feel anything of the rupture now. It was just the treatment I required to effect a cure." It will pay anyone who is ruptured to write to Dr. Rice for a sample of his method, which will be sent free by return of post. Investigate fully his method of cure. Do this at once. Don't delay in a matter of such importance Write to-day. Thousands of cases cured.

Mr. JAS. COLE.
From a Photo.

The 5 MINUTES PAIN CURE FREE.

THE WIFE OF THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF writes: "Countess Roberts will thank the Lineel Co. to send her another bottle of Lineel Liniment, which is most excellent. She encloses 2/9."

LINEEL LINIMENT

Cures RHEUMATISM	in 5 minutes	Cures TIC	in 5 minutes
Cures NEURALGIA	in 5 minutes	Cures SPRAINS	in 5 minutes
Cures LUMBAGO	in 5 minutes	Cures BRUISES	in 5 minutes
Cures SCIATICA	in 5 minutes	Cures CRAMP	in 5 minutes
Cures GOUT	in 5 minutes	Cures STIFFNESS	in 5 minutes
Cures HEADACHE	in 5 minutes	Cures RHEUMATIC DEAFNESS	in 5 minutes
Cures FACEACHE	in 5 minutes	Cures ALL NEUROTIC
Cures TOOTHACHE	in 5 minutes	And MUSCULAR PAINS	in 5 minute
Cures EARACHE	in 5 minutes

Cures COLDS and COUGHS in three or four applications to throat and chest.

LINEEL LINIMENT

Nearly 200,000 Free Bottles of LINEEL LINIMENT have been sent out within the last month, in response to as many letters, which can be seen at the Company's Offices. And in no single instance that has come to our knowledge has it been known to fail in absolutely curing pain in five minutes.

YOU ARE NOT ASKED TO BUY

Simply send a penny stamp for postage, mentioning this paper, and a Free Bottle will be sent by return post. Every day we receive extraordinary and grateful letters, testifying to the efficacy of LINEEL LINIMENT in curing pain. It would cost a lot of money to publish all these, and it is much more convincing and satisfactory to send you a free bottle, so that you may test it yourself.

Sold at all Branches of Boots' Cash Chemists, and by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ and 2/9 per bottle.

LINEEL PILLS Are the best remedy known to Medical Science for INDIGESTION, CONSTIPATION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, and BAD COMPLEXION.

Sold at all Branches of Boots' Cash Chemists and by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ and 2/9 per box.

WRITE FOR MEDICAL LEAFLET

The LINEEL CO. LTD., 16 Bevis Marks, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

in that little paradise which Martinez has up in the mountains.

"I shall tell Miss Yuill that for the present, at least, no disturbing news of any sort must be allowed to reach Mercedes, and I'll give you a letter to Martinez to the same effect. Cora will, of course, go with you and the Grand Duke wherever you like to take her. How does that fit in?"

"Couldn't be better as far as I can see," replied Kesteven, "although it doesn't look as if you'd given me any too little to do. The sort of circus that I'm going to have with Lady Medcalf-Mears and the rest of them, promises to be a bit more exciting than amusing, still I reckon I shall be able to worry through somehow, and as long as I can depend on that promise you've given about Madame de Ronski and Miss Paula, you can depend on me to help you all I can inside the four-square of the law, but you mustn't expect anything outside of it. I have resigned, and you know my reasons for doing it."

"Yes," replied Staunton. "that's so, old man. I'm quite satisfied. I should have done just the same in your place, and if I hadn't set myself to make something more than a few millions—well, well, we won't argue that old question out again. You can trust me anyhow, if it's only for Mercedes' sake. She's my hostage to fortune and to you."

"That's so," said Kesteven, getting up and holding out his hand. "Whatever happens you can trust me to look after her just as if she was Cora's sister."

"Then we'll let it go at that, Derrick, and if I do go under as, of course, may happen, you'll go to my lawyers in London, and they'll hand you over on proof of my death or disappearance a million pounds, which is as clean money as a Quaker might want to handle."

"Good enough, Solly," said Kesteven, and the hands which twice within the last hour had held the threat of sudden death grasped each other, it might be for the last time, in honest faith and friendship.

THIRTY-SECOND CHAPTER.

Proclaimed as President.

It would be impossible to attempt to describe the feelings of the guests of the Isola when, after Kesteven had made the necessary explanations at breakfast, they found themselves with their baggage loaded up into two big steam pinnaces running into the Bay of Funchal, watching the white-painted, graceful shape of the Isola fading rapidly away into the grey distance to the south-westward, until in an incredibly short space of time it became a white spot of sunlight on the surface of the shimmering sea, and then vanished.

A week later the Union-Castle liner Saxon dropped anchor in the bay and picked up the forty astounded and more or less angry passengers.

Three days later the Saxon tied up at Ocean Quay, Southampton. On the other side of the Customs' shed there was a special train standing in front of the ordinary boat train. Kesteven had cabled for it from Madeira. It consisted of an engine, two saloon carriages, the baggage waggon, and the guard's van. The late guests of the Isola, in common with a good many of their fellow passengers on the Saxon, were still of the belief that some serious outrage was in course of perpetration against themselves, but Kesteven, who had taken the Grand Duke and Iddison into his confidence as far as was necessary, managed everything with such infinite tact that they were easily persuaded to take the advantage of the other passengers and get up to London an hour or so before them.

As the big engine, hissing and panting after its seventy-miles spin, pulled up at Waterloo, half-a-dozen newsboys came running along, screaming out:

"United States of South America proclaimed this morning. President Staunton's letter to the Powers. War expected. Here you are, sir. St. James's, Globe, or Westminster?"

"Well," laughed Kesteven, as he took a handful of papers through the window and threw the boy a shilling, "I reckon that's pretty quick. Our late host hasn't lost much time getting out there and having himself made President, but, anyhow, that will keep for the present. And now, ladies and gentlemen," he went on, taking his hat down from the rack, "you will find the omnibuses ready for your servants and your baggage and carriages for yourselves. Let us dine at the Carlton."

What all London was discussing with wonder was tersely but sufficiently described in the following cable in the St. James's Gazette, which Kesteven read aloud to Cora and the Grand Duke and Lady Medcalf-Mears, as they drove along York Road on their way to the Carlton:

"A NEW WORLD POWER.

"The United States of South America."

(From our own Correspondent.)

"Buenos Aires, Tuesday, 12.50 p.m.

"An amazing occurrence has happened. Soon after six o'clock this morning the yacht Isola, belonging to the well-known financier and millionaire, Mr. Isolo Staunton, who is the son of Mr. Staunton Zuarez, the late President of Peru, entered the harbour flying the flag of the newly-created United States of South America.

"Cables have come to hand during the morning which inform us that from Panama to Cape Horn and from Caracas to Monte Video, the same flag has been hoisted in every capital of the Continent.

"It is reported that there are hundreds of thousands of men under arms, and that no fewer than seven fleets of warships, the most up-to-date products of European shipyards, are already patrolling the entrances to every river and harbour which gives access to the New World Power which has so suddenly and so mysteriously sprung into being.

"From the best information that I have been able to gather here, I feel that I am justified in saying that this miracle of empire-making has been the work of one man."

"Well, upon my word," said Lady Medcalf-Mears. "What an extraordinary character the man must be, although, of course, no one could be surprised at anything he has done, or may do, after the amazing way in which he behaved to us. It was as extraordinary as it was scandalous."

"Certainly," said the Grand Duke, who had taken the paper from Kesteven and run his eye over the momentous paragraph.

"It is distinctly a dangerous situation, and from what I have been able to see of the character of our late host, he would be a desperate man if he found himself in a desperate position."

"There's not much doubt about that," laughed Cora, leaning back on the soft, springy cushions. "I reckon that if trouble has to be made, he would make it about as thoroughly as any man on earth."

"But surely," exclaimed Lady Medcalf-Mears, almost angrily, "it would be a perfectly disgraceful thing, a scandal to humanity as well as a disaster to the whole world, if this man's wicked ambitions led to war. The Great Powers ought to combine and crush him and his new Republic at once before he has time to do any mischief," she added somewhat inconsistently.

"But my dear lady," replied the Grand Duke, smiling at her fervour, "surely you do not see anything wicked in forming a new State, if it be done by lawful means. If that were so you would condemn every State and Empire on earth, and especially your own British Empire. For my part I confess that I have not a small admiration for the man who could make so great a coup d'état as that so secretly and so suddenly. No doubt he will behave himself peacefully, so that the Powers shall recognise him and the Constitution of his Republic. If he does not, then his quarrel with the world will be settled by war."

Here the carriage drew up at the Carlton, and the discussion perforce ended for the present.

(Another long instalment of this serial next week.)

Digitized by Google

TO CURE SICK HEADACHE.

Sick headache means an overtaxed stomach and a derangement of the digestive organs.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

have proved themselves a boon for removing that distressed feeling and discomfort. A dose will remove the immediate cause, and if repeated for a few days will enable your system to work normally.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

ESTABLISHED 851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%

repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

An admirable Food of the

EPPS'S

Finest quality and flavour.

COCOA

Nutritious and Economical.

THE Daily Express

Is London's Best, Brightest, and Most Readable Halfpenny Morning Paper. It is always Brimful of News.

Of all Newsagents and Bookstalls throughout the Country.

Beauty.

ICILMA FLUOR CREAM is unrivalled for the Complexion, Bust, and Hands. Preserves the Skin from the effects of hard water, sunburn, or cold winds, keeping it soft and clean. Price 1s. Send 2d. stamps for two samples (different scents). Icilma (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Rd., Lond., W.C.

TRIUMPH Cycles

£10 10 to £19 19

or by Deferred Payment System.

"The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce."

CATALOGUES GRATIS.

TRIUMPH CYCLE CO. Ltd., COVENTRY.

4 and 5, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

80 Deansgate Arcade, Manchester. 4 King Edward St. Leeds

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1¾d. tins everywhere.

PAWNBROKER'S SALE

Every article in new condition.

SUITABLE FOR PRESENTS.

A full list sent post free on application.

13/6 Gent's magnificent 18-ct. Gold-cased Chronograph Stop Watch, jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper, 10 years' written warranty; also fashionable curb (pocket to pocket) double Albert same quality (stamped and guaranteed), with handsome seal attached; three together.

12/6 Lady's handsome 18-carat gold-cased Keyless Watch, jewelled movement; exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also fashionable long watch-guard, same quality (stamped and guaranteed) elegant West-End pattern the two together.

14/9 Furs.—Magnificent Alexandra Dagmar necklet and muff; beautiful real Russian sable hair, worth 4 guineas, not been worn; sacrifice for 14.9; approval willingly.

19/6 Genuine Italian Mandoline, by Stridente, Naples; fine tone; 21 ribbed, real rosewood, pearl and tortoiseshell inlaid, in sadd:er-made case; approval.

21/- Fine Old Violin, by Pietro Antorious; magnificent rich solo tone; in perfect condition, with fully mounted bow and case; approval.

10/6 Lustrous diamond and ruby Half-hoop Ring, set with 5 matchless doublet rubies and 8 real diamonds; solid gold, hall-marked.

7/6 Curb Chain Bracelet, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case.

6/9 Brooch; very handsome 18-carat rolled gold, 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls in case.

21/- Lady's solid gold Keyless Watch, jewelled in 10 rubies, beautifully engraved case, splendid time-keeper; 10 years' written warranty; week's free trial.

8/6 Fashionable Long Neck-chain; genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished; very choice design.

9/6 Organ Toned Melodeon; magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, and 4 acting stops, including Tremolo and Diapason action; rich powerful tone, perfect order.

9/6 Necklet with Heart Pendant, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern; heart set with pearls and turquoise.

12/6 Magnificent 5-row Pearl Collarette; finest quality, mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case.

Any of the above articles sent on approval willingly.

R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller, 284 Brixton Road, Lord.n, S.W.

FREE TO YOU.

To advertise S.L.S. Records we are giving away our noted Phonographs for a limited time. Absolutely not a penny to pay for one. Write, giving full address and nearest railway station; enclose stamp. Mention this paper.

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128 CITY ROAD, LONDON.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

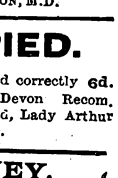
Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Stores, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly 6d. page. MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

TIME IS MONEY.



3/-

Our new "Times" Watch, Crystal Glass, Steel Hands, White Dial, Lever movement, protective dust-excluding cap, accurate Timekeeper, sent to any address with guarantee for three years on receipt of P.O. or stamps value 3/- and three stamps for postage, &c. Ladies small size 6d. extra. Recommendations solicited.

THE "TIMES" WATCH Company, 89 Pimlico Road, Belgravia, S.W.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Writing on Photos.

"Is it correct, on a gentleman presenting his photo to a young lady to whom he is engaged, for him to put his inscription on it? In the event of writing on the photo, would it be permissible to put 'with fondest love'?"—"LOVESICK."

* * * * *

I do not know that it is correct to write on a photo. It is a matter of taste. Many people insist that all their photos should be signed—it is a little fad—while others prefer the photo without writing. Ask your sweetheart if she would like you to write on the photo, and if she agrees, you might use the words you mention. Above all, don't be too keen on being "correct." Be natural, that is the important point.

Nine Years, and Not Engaged.

DEAR, dear, "DOROTHY"! You have been going out with a young man for nine years and he has never uttered a word about marriage. Well, though nine-year friendships are very nice, certainly you have a right to expect him to say one way or the other if he has serious intentions. You say he is always affectionate and kind, that you have spent holidays together, and that everybody thinks you are properly engaged, and that he is quite in a position to marry. Well, one of these days, I certainly should gently point out to him that your friends are making inquiries about the matter, and leave him to say the needed word. A nine-years' engagement is bad enough, but nine years and no engagement is a bit too much of a good thing.

Sweethearts Who Are Not In Love.

"WHAT is a girl to do when she feels that she no longer loves her fiancé, but has a decided preference for somebody else?" Several correspondents lately have put me this question, so I will answer them together. They will not, I am sure, be offended if I do not deal with each one separately, and thus cover the same ground several times over.

* * * * *

If a girl no longer loves the man to whom she is engaged, it is her duty to tell him so. To enter into marriage, knowing well all the time that your affection lies elsewhere, is almost as serious an offence as being untrue to your husband after marriage—and it often means the same thing. Remember that one of the marriage vows is "love." This reminds me of a very charming play I saw recently. An engaged young couple both discovered that they no longer cared for each other but preferred others. But because they were engaged, they solemnly kept up the pretence of continued love, all the time hoping for some reason for a breach. Fortunately for their happiness the breach took place, and instead of either of them being broken-hearted, both were exceedingly pleased. In the case of my correspondents, who knows but that the young men they are engaged to are not every bit as anxious to end the affair as they themselves? Certainly nothing would be lost by telling the plain truth.

Whereabouts Wanted.

"E. S." asks if I know of a lady who used to write under the name of "Cynthia" in 1899, and who used to often go to South Africa. No, I do not, but if I should hear of her, I will place a paragraph on this page against your initials. If she should see this, she might communicate with me, and I will notify you of her whereabouts, if she wishes to disclose them.

Should She Receive Letters?

YOU got friendly with a young man while on your summer holiday, did you, "RAB"? Since his return he has been sending little remembrances. But you are now "keeping company" with somebody else, and want to know if you should still receive letters from the other.

* * * * *

You can receive letters from anybody if you are on friendly terms with them. But if he writes love letters to you, I think you had better just tell him that you are "keeping company" with another. That would be only fair to him, would it not. For if you continued to receive letters and presents he might very rightly think that he was the only one.

Secret Marriages.

"I AM privately engaged to a girl of eighteen, but her parents are against our marriage," writes "BOB." "We are determined to marry in a year's time. How can this be done?"

* * * * *

I never advise young couples to marry against the wishes of either parents. Instead of conspiring for a runaway match, it would be far better for you to spend the next year in convincing her parents of your fitness to become her husband. Runaway matches are, no doubt, very romantic, but somebody suffers from them after the rapture is over. So I am sorry, "BOB," that I cannot help you with any suggestion.

Unanswered Letters.

SOME troubled lovers seek my advice on very slende grounds, but I suppose they are seriously worried, or they would not write. For instance, "A. E. W." got very friendly with a certain young lady a month ago, and they went for long walks together, after which she went away to her home. She promised to write to "A. E. W." if he wrote first. Three days after "A. E. W." wrote, but received no reply. Three weeks have now elapsed, but nothing has come from her.

* * * * *

Write again, "A. E. W." If she doesn't write back then, it will be very rude indeed of her, and I should consider the affair closed. But give her one more chance. Every young man in love should persevere.

Engaged to Another Fellow.

"KRUGER" (South Africa), writes: "A young lady I am very fond of writes to me weekly. I know she is engaged to another fellow, but she tells me in her letters from England that she is also very fond of me. I should much like to become engaged to her, although I don't want to injure the other man."

* * * * *

Of course you cannot suggest any engagement to her, so long as she belongs to another. She ought not to worry you by writing in the way she does. That kind of girl seems to be playing a double game. Cannot you find out from other people whether or not she is likely to continue engaged to the other man? Perhaps there has been a breach, and she is writing to you in this strain because she anticipates that she will soon be in need of a new lover. I would find out definitely before even thinking about an engagement.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"From thoughtless Youth to ruminating Age."—COWPER.

"There is no Better Food."

—Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

PURE CONCENTRATED

300 Gold Medals, &c.

Cocoa.

"The Most Perfect Form of Cocoa."

—GUY'S HOSPITAL GAZETTE.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

RUST NEVER GETS A START IF YOU USE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH.

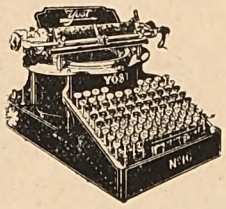
BRITISH ALL THROUGH

Guaranteed free from acid.
Produces quickly a lasting brilliancy.

Manufacturers—The "Matchless" Metal Polish Co. Ltd., Liverpool.

The Light-Running
YŌST Typewriter

Noted for Beautiful Work.



YŌST Fountain Pen

For Rapid Shorthand. 10/6.

33 1-3% off Gold Mounted Pens. Send for Price List.

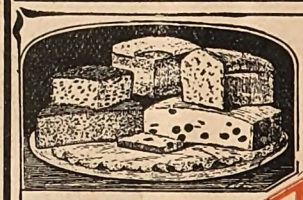
EMPLOYMENT

SITUATIONS found for Competent Operators and Shorthand Writers. No Fees.

MACHINES lent ON HIRE for Practice at 7/6 per week.

50 HOLBORN VIADUCT, E.C.



DELICIOUS WHOLESOME PURE

16 GOLD MEDALS & HIGHEST AWARDS

JOHN HILL & SONS

SEND 3D.

THE "TUDNO" CAKE.

Splendid for daily family use, of choicest quality and Genoa character,

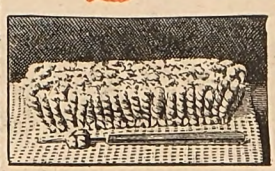
8d. per lb.

"ROTHESAY" RICE.

A delightful plain cake, rich and fragrant. A ½lb. sample sent free on receipt of 3d. in stamps to cover postage.

The "TUDNO" Cake & Biscuit Factories, Ashton under-Lyne.

THE "SIRDAR" RUG-WOOL



FIRST & BEST FOR RUG & MAT MAKING

ENDLESS WEAR.

BRIGHT IN FINISH! OF SUPERIOR QUALITY!

May be had in 30 Art Shades from the principal dealers. Insist on having the "SIRDAR" & TAKE NO SUBSTITUTE.

PLAIN DIRECTIONS FOR RUG & MAT MAKING FREE.

WHOLESALE ONLY FROM:—

HARRAP BROS., BEGTIVE MILLS, WAKEFIELD.

80,504 PAIRS

Represents the Increase in the Sale of

"OCEANIC" BOOTS

During the Last Six Months.

Half-a-Guinea Everywhere.

TRY THEM!

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 783.] Week Ending January 2nd, 1904. [Price One Penny.

"She was to marry the one who reached her first!
Would it be the man she loved or the man she hated!"

Digitized by Google

VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE

The purest and most efficient Remedy procurable for
COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, CATARRH, WEAK LUNGS, and CHILDREN'S COUGHS.

BRONCHITIS AND ASTHMA

Veno's Lightning Cough Cure

Produces its most brilliant effect in Chronic Bronchitis and Asthma. It effects astonishing cures in the worst and most persistent cases.

Rev. W. W. TULLOCH, D.D., Bonar Bridge, Sutherlandshire, writes: "July 22nd, '03.—I have been a martyr to asthma all my life and lately to chronic winter bronchitis. I have found Veno's Lightning Cough Cure a valuable medicine."

CHILDREN'S COUGHS

Mrs. ADA S. BALLIN, 5, Agar Street, London, Editor "Womanhood," and a great authority upon children's diseases. writes:—"Veno's Lightning Cough Cure is an exceedingly successful remedy; it is very pleasant to take and the relief it gives is very rapid. The preparation is perfectly safe for children."

W. LASCELLES-SCOTT, F.R.M.S., in his Certificate of Analysis among other things says:—"I have pleasure in certifying that in my opinion VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH COUGH is an exceptionally pure, safe, and effective preparation

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES 9½d. Regular Sizes, 1/1½ and 2/9.

Ask for VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE at Chemists and Drug Stores, or post free from the VENO DRUG CO., Hulme, Manchester, England.

The 5 MINUTES PAIN CURE FREE.

THE WIFE OF THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF writes: "Countess Roberts will thank the Lineel Co. to send her another bottle of Lineel Liniment, which is most excellent. She encloses 2/9."

LINEEL LINIMENT

Cures RHEUMATISM	in 5 minutes	Cures TIC	in 5 minutes
Cures NEURALGIA	in 5 minutes	Cures SPRAINS	in 5 minutes
Cures LUMBAGO	in 5 minutes	Cures BRUISES	in 5 minutes
Cures SCIATICA	in 5 minutes	Cures CRAMP	in 5 minutes
Cures GOUT	in 5 minutes	Cures STIFFNESS	in 5 minutes
Cures HEADACHE	in 5 minutes	Cures RHEUMATIC DEAFNESS	in 5 minutes
Cures FACEACHE	in 5 minutes
Cures TOOTHACHE	in 5 minutes	Cures ALL NEUROTIC And MUSCULAR PAINS	in 5 minute
Cures EARACHE	in 5 minutes

Cures COLDS and COUGHS in three or four applications to throat and chest.

LINEEL LINIMENT

Nearly 200,000 Free Bottles of LINEEL LINIMENT have been sent out within the last month, in response to as many letters, which can be seen at the Company's Offices. And in no single instance that has come to our knowledge has it been known to fail in absolutely curing pain in five minutes.

YOU ARE NOT ASKED TO BUY

Simply send a penny stamp for postage, mentioning this paper, and a Free Bottle will be sent by return post. Every day we receive extraordinary and grateful letters, testifying to the efficacy of LINEEL LINIMENT in curing pain. It would cost a lot of money to publish all these, and it is much more convincing and satisfactory to send you a free bottle, so that you may test it yourself.

Sold at all Branches of Boots' Cash Chemists, and by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ and 2/9 per bottle.

LINEEL PILLS

Are the best remedy known to Medical Science for INDIGESTION, CONSTIPATION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, and BAD COMPLEXION.

Sold at all Branches of Boots' Cash Chemists and by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ and 2/9 per box.

WRITE FOR MEDICAL LEAFLET

The LINEEL CO. LTD., 16 Bevis Marks, London, E.C.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache and Neuralgia.

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Kaputine is not a single crude drug such as has been condemned as dangerous by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients, having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The SAFE Remedy.

Kaputine is the only preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and infirmaries. Proof positive of its superior and sterling qualities.

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1½;

Samples 1d. each.

Kindly mention this paper.

If you wish to SLEEP WELL

—TAKE—

BEECHAM'S PILLS

You will SLEEP WELL,

because BEECHAM'S PILLS gently calm irritation of the Nervous system, while by their stimulative and cleansing action upon the Liver and Kidneys, Digestion proceeds with normal regularity, so that at night the tranquillised mind and body are prepared for "Nature's sweet restorer"—peaceful slumber. Should one feel restless after an exciting or convivial evening a dose of BEECHAM'S PILLS will quickly induce refreshing sleep.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills), and 2/9 (168 Pills).

BODLEIAN 30 JAN 1904

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 783.] Week Ending January 2nd, 1904. [One Penny.

A SPORT OF THE GODS.

The Strange Story of a Girl, her Two Lovers, and an Eccentric Will.

"It comes to this, Kendrick, that I will give you a thousand pounds if you promise to discontinue your love-making with Dolly Meredith."

The other leapt to his feet. In his eyes was a strange glitter, his right hand was clenched.

"The words could only have been uttered by an incorrigible cad," he cried. "Please remember, Martin Walbrook, that whatever your standard of honour may be, mine is unimpeachable. I do not care to discuss this matter any further, for your very offer tells me that you consider your suit with Miss Meredith likely to be doomed to failure."

A sneer played round Walbrook's lips. He rose, took up his hat, and said:

"The deductions of a briefless barrister are likely to be correct! Anyway, I have no fear. Though the affections of the lady upon whom you have set your heart may not be directed towards me, still, I think that I stand better with her father than do you, Mr. Rupert Kendrick. He is more likely to encourage the suit of Martin Walbrook, gentleman and well-to-do, than that of a barrister struggling hopelessly for fame. You have missed a very good chance of making a thou., and I wish you a very 'Good-day'!"

The door slammed behind him, and the other was left alone with his thoughts.

They were not very pleasant ones, it may be presumed. Here he was, young, handsome, clean-shaven, a veritable Apollo, fairly optimistic of his future in life, but with a present that was sickening.

Strive as he would, he could not convert the tide of briefs into his channel. His sole income consisted of two hundred pounds a year left him by his father, and he had fallen hopelessly in love.

Before he had met Dolly Meredith, life with him had been the reverse of serious. At his club everyone had deemed him a jolly good fellow. Athletically inclined, he had joined the Harriers. There he met Martin Walbrook, and an acquaintanceship had sprung up between them, though this had not ripened into anything very much deeper. Through him he had been introduced to Miss Meredith. He came, he saw, and was conquered.

For the course that he took he had every excuse.

All rights reserved.]

Dolly Meredith was a girl to whom any mortal man might have lost his heart. Tall, fair, with a face like an angel's, she combined her outward beauty with a heavenly grace. Sympathetic to a degree, she was the very opposite of the usual Society girl.

The only child of Maurice Meredith, successful City financier, whose wife had died when Dolly was but a child, she had been petted to a degree. Her smallest whim was satisfied, yet her nature was not spoilt. Between daughter and father there reigned a bond of the purest love, and she returned his little acts of kindness and thoughtfulness by obeying his every wish.

Lucky the man who won her for a wife!

There was but one flaw in the character of Mr. Meredith, her father. That flaw was a love of Mammon. Money was his idol, he could never make enough. If ever anyone suggested that it was time he should retire from business, his answer was a scowl. To all he made the same reply:

"It is for the sake of Dorothy!"

He could not see the beam in his eye; he could not see that the fortune he had amassed was twenty times as ample as the most ambitious girl could expect.

And so the glitter of Martin Walbrook's gold had attracted him. Whenever Walbrook had visited his house, he had always been the acme of studied politeness, and Mr. Meredith had always looked upon him as the ideal husband for his darling daughter.

But man proposes, the Fates dispose, and Cupid is an agent upon whom there is no reckoning.

As soon as Rupert Kendrick had been introduced to Miss Meredith, his visits to "The Berries" became more and more frequent. He could spare the time well enough—he only wished he could not.

Gradually Dolly Meredith became entangled in Love's cunningly-spread net. Who could resist the charms, the little courtesies that showed debonair Rupert Kendrick to be an inborn gentleman?

She realised this fact and tried to resist it. She had good reason for doing so. Her father, she knew, had set his heart on her marrying Walbrook, and her training forbade her going against her parent's wishes. And yet—she loved another! What should she do—what could she do?

Digitized by Google

Martin Walbrook fully understood the state of affairs. He hated the day he had ever met Kendrick; he blamed himself for ever introducing a possible rival.

He loved Dolly with all the love of which he was capable. Her father's thousands, possibly millions, afforded a fitting background to her own accomplishments.

And he was being cut out by a well-nigh penniless barrister. Ah! there was the key to the difficulty. He would buy Rupert's love. The bait of a thousand pounds dangled before his rival's eyes would be sure to be effective. A thousand to him was little—especially if with it he could buy Meredith's inheritance.

He called on Kendrick at his chambers, made the offer, and obtained the answer you have read at the beginning of this story.

When Walbrook had left, a strange, restless feeling came over the young barrister. He tried to study, but failed miserably. His thoughts were such a curious jumble of Dolly, money, Walbrook, law, and love that he could not work.

A sense of uneasiness prevailed in him; something that he could not understand kept whispering: "Go and propose to Dolly; now or never. He who hesitates is lost."

"Confound it all, I will," he cried; then added gloomily: "May as well get knocked out of the running as soon as possible, I suppose."

The Merediths lived in Holland Park. In none too happy a frame of mind, Kendrick walked briskly up Chancery Lane on this sharp, cold, January afternoon and then took the Tube to the neighbourhood of his destination.

When he arrived at "The Berries" he rang the bell and inquired of the servant who answered it if Miss Meredith were at home.

"She is, sir," the domestic replied, "but she is engaged."

"Engaged?" echoed Rupert. "May I ask with whom?"

"Oh, yes, sir. It's only Mr. Martin Walbrook."

Only Mr. Martin Walbrook! Ye gods, only Mr. Martin Walbrook! Kendrick had to decide swiftly what to do. Should he go boldly in and interrupt their tête-à-tête, taking the bull by the horns, or should he await a more favourable opportunity to see his beloved one?

He decided on the former course.

"Will you please take this card in to Miss Meredith and ask her if I may see her?" said he to the servant.

In a few minutes the maid returned with the message that her mistress would be delighted to see him.

He was ushered into the drawing-room.

With a sweet smile Dolly rose to greet him.

"How do you do, Mr. Kendrick?" she exclaimed. "I am so pleased to see you. Mr. Walbrook and I were just talking about you."

"Yes," put in Martin. "Speak of the—gentleman—and he appears. Whatever brings you here this time of day, Kendrick?"

Rupert did not reply. He was thinking—thinking hard. Why was that radiant look on Dolly's face? Had Walbrook proposed—had he been accepted?

"Can she possibly love this—thing?" muttered Rupert between his teeth.

Suddenly he returned to his senses. His hostess was speaking to him.

"I beg your pardon," he said.

"Really, Mr. Kendrick, you seem strangely preoccupied," pouted Dolly. "You've scarcely spoken to me yet. And, by the way, won't you sit down?"

Rupert mumbled an apology, and took the proffered seat.

The clock on the mantelpiece chimed four.

"Mr. Walbrook was just saying 'Good-bye' when you came in. He says he has a most important engagement at half-past four," said Dolly.

"Really," hastily interposed Walbrook, "I do not think that it is quite so important after all. If you will allow me——"

"Oh, no! Mr. Walbrook, I cannot allow you to break your appointments for me. I am sure that your friend will excuse you."

Rupert could not suppress a triumphant smile at the discomfiture of his rival. Surely the Fates were propitious; the other could not get round this very broad hint for his departure.

He rose, not too graciously, and said:

"If that's the case, all well and good. Certainly, I should—that is, it would be inconvenient for me to miss my engagement. So, au revoir for the present, Miss Meredith." Then, with a quick glance at Rupert, he added, "I shall call in and see your father to-morrow. I trust that he will do as I wish."

Kendrick paled. So he had proposed!

The other held out his hand to him. With a slight gesture as if of accident, Rupert knocked over a small pile of papers that were on the table by his side. He stooped to pick them up, and, purposely fumbling in the action took some time in doing so. Meanwhile the maid had appeared to show Walbrook out, and so he had avoided shaking hands.

As soon as Walbrook had gone, Rupert spoke, practically for the first time.

"Am I to congratulate you?" he said.

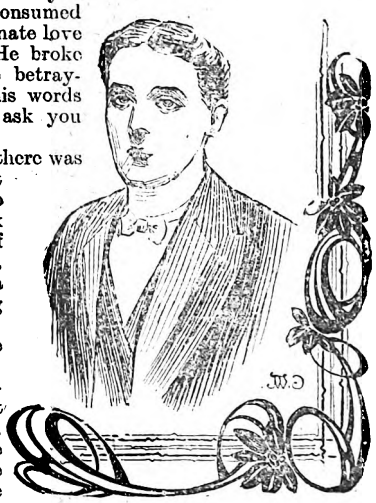
Dolly's face was a study—it blanched and flushed alternately.

"Sir," she stammered, "your question is capable of only one meaning. It is rather impertinent, and I refuse to answer you."

Rupert noticed that in the girl's beautiful blue eyes there was something akin to tears and he made haste to apologise.

"I beg your pardon. As a matter of fact, I came here this afternoon to ask you a very important question. I feared that Walbrook had forestalled me.

"Miss Meredith, let us come to the point at once. Ever since I saw you, now nearly a year ago, I have been consumed with a burning, passionate love for you and——" He broke off suddenly, his voice betraying the eagerness of his words—"Dolly, I came to ask you if you'd be my wife."



For a few seconds there was silence—a silence that was purgatory to both. Kendrick gripped the arms of his chair ferociously, in his eyes was a look of convincing appeal.

At last she spoke falteringly:

"Mr. Meredith-Rupert. I—you must not be disappointed. I thank you for the honour you have done me, but——" She stopped.

Digitized by Google

"But," he cried, "say, he did propose?"

"Yes, he did. And——"

"You accepted him?"

"No!" she cried, "because I do not love him. Rupert, do you not see, can you not see; the position I am placed in? Martin proposed and I could not refuse! Could not, because of my father's wishes; but I did not accept him, because I loved—you! I prevaricated, I——"

But Rupert had sprung up and had caught her in his arms, and was raining kisses on her upturned, unresisting face. When he released her, she continued:

"I refused to give a decision and referred him to my father."

"Dolly, Dolly, won't you marry me? I know I am not rich, but I can work, work like a demon. Things will turn out all right. Dolly, give me your answer, now, do."

"I cannot decide!" she urged, almost startled. "I cannot decide!"

"Promise me then you will not marry Walbrook. Nobody can say that I am fond of telling tales out of school, but a little interview I had with him early this afternoon gave me an insight into his character. He visited me to offer me £1,000 to cease from seeing you again!"

Dolly Meredith jumped to her feet, her eyes blazing with anger. Her bosom heaved, and she was quivering with emotion.

"Did he stoop so low as that?" she asked. "Rupert, I can scarcely believe you. I have never liked the man. I have tolerated him solely for my father's sake, but I did not think he was quite such a scoundrel! How I hate him, how I loathe him, if that is true!"

"It is true, I am sorry to say it is true," said Rupert. "I did not intend to tell you yet, but in my anxiety the truth came out. Tell me—is your father prejudiced against me?"

He sat by her side on the couch and softly stole his arm round her waist.

"No," she said gently, "he likes you, I know he does. He admires you for your manliness, as I admire you. But he knows that you——"

"Poverty is no disgrace," interpolated Kendrick.

"You cannot convince father of that. Rupert, I love you dearly, as much as, nay, more than, I hate Martin. But I must abide by my father's decision; I will do anything he wishes."

Just then the maid brought in afternoon tea. Having had a cup, Rupert prepared to go.

"Do not go yet," said Dolly, "my father will be back from the City in a few minutes. Why not stay and ask him if—if he will consent to our engagement?"

"Darling," he replied, as once more he took her in his arms, "you are right. There is no time like the present."

The minutes that elapsed between then and the time when they heard the latch-key inserted in the front door was occupied in a manner of which only lovers know.

However, when Mr. Meredith entered the room, the sight he saw was nothing unusual. Like wise young people, they had discreetly separated. Mr. Meredith was a gentleman of some sixty years of age. He was forty when he fell in love with little Kitty MacMahon, and married her. He was forty-eight when the great grief of his life overtook him—the death of his wife.

Dolly went up to him, and, putting two soft hands round his neck, kissed him. An unwarrantable pang of jealousy smote Rupert. "Father," said Dolly, almost in a whisper, "Mr. Kendrick has something very, very important to say to you. I will run upstairs for a few minutes."

When she reached the door, she flashed a reassuring smile of hope to Rupert. Then she fled, and left him to his fate.

"Well, my boy," said the kindly tones of Mr. Meredith, "what is it you want?"

Kendrick replied, in a well-controlled voice:

"I have had the great fortune, sir, to win your daughter's love. I remained here this evening to ask your consent to our engagement. I trust that you see no material obstacles in the way, or have any personal object ion to me as a son-in-law?"

The elder man's face hardened. He did not speak for a few minutes. When he did, he said in grave, stern tones:

"Kendrick, I have expected this. You place me in an awkward position, for though I believe my daughter has an affectionate regard for you, yet I think she could make a better marriage. You are a shrewd enough man, Kendrick, to know that there is another Douglas in the field. Putting aside altogether the question of means—I do not for an instant believe that you are courting my daughter for her dowry—I owe Martin Walbrook a debt of gratitude. Seven years ago he assisted me financially when I was hard pressed. The great name of Meredith was in imminent danger of being dishonoured, on account of a great reversal I then sustained. Thanks to your rival, I came out of the fray successfully. Maurice Meredith, as they say in the City, is the man who never forgets. Do you follow me, Kendrick?" he added with a quick glance.

The other nodded. There was a despondent look on his face.

"Well," continued the old man, "the time has come when I can repay. I know Martin loves my daughter dearly. She may love you, but I firmly believe she would learn to love Martin. Yet I do not wish to have Dolly lose her happiness. I must have time to decide. In a week or two you will know whether I will sanction your engagement or not. Dolly will, in any case, I am certain, do as I wish. That is all. Good-night!"

Thus abruptly ending, Mr. Meredith escorted Rupert to the door. He was denied the pleasure of seeing Dolly again that night.

* * * * *

As Rupert was leaving his chambers the next evening he received a telegram.

This is what it said:

"Come at once. Father dying.—DOLLY."

"Heavens!" cried Rupert. "What can have happened?" Post-haste he hurried to "The Berries." When he reached there all the blinds were drawn. Mr. Meredith was dead!

He went in to console Dolly. Tearfully she told him what had happened.

Digitized by Google

"In the morning my father felt unwell, so remained in bed. About noon he felt pains in the region of his heart. I sent for the doctor, and when he came his news was appalling.

"He can live but for a few hours," was the verdict.

"Father bore up strongly when he heard the statement.

"'Send for my solicitors,' were his first words.

"As quickly as possible Mr. Drudge, of Messrs. Giddy and Drudge, arrived.

"While he made his will he was alone with the solicitor.

"The last words he said to me were:

"'Dolly, promise—me—that—you—will—abide—by—the—dictates—of—my—will?'

"Of course I gave him my promise, and, as he died, he muttered: 'May the gods decide for the best.'

"What could he mean? What could he mean?"

Presently Martin Walbrook called and was unfeignedly shocked to learn of Mr. Meredith's death.

As soon as possible they both left together.

When outside, Martin sneered:

"I suppose you consider Mr. Meredith's death a stroke of luck for you, eh?"

"You insufferable cad!" was Rupert's only comment.

* * * * *

The day on which Mr. Meredith's sudden death took place was a Friday.

He was buried on the following Tuesday.

After the funeral, those interested in the will returned to "The Berries" to hear it read.

There were only six persons present.

They were Mr. Drudge, the solicitor, Mr. Richmond and Mr. Weston, the two gentlemen who had been appointed executors, and Dolly, Martin, and Rupert.

"I am about to read," began the solicitor, "a will that is the essence of eccentricity. I hope that you will all give your closest attention to it."

And then he read this most strange and curious of wills. It set forth how he had been unable to decide which of the two, Rupert Kendrick and Martin Walbrook, should become the husband of Dolly. Therefore he had left it for the gods to decide. His whole fortune, with the exception of £1,000 each for his executors, was left to the one who married Dolly. The fortunate man was to be decided upon in a remarkable manner! A special marriage licence was to be obtained, and, a month from the date of the reading of the will, she was to proceed to the little village of Smalldeane, a hamlet five miles midway between the stations of Tongberry and Hazelwood, in Sussex.

She was to wait, in bridal robes, at the door of the church there, until her husband-to-be appeared.

Rupert and Martin were to depart from the Central Station, Brighton, by the 11.30 train that called at Tongberry and Hazelwood, accompanied by the executors.

One was to get out at Tongberry, the first station, and the other at Hazelwood. They were to draw lots to decide which shall have the five-minute advantage this entails.

The will stated that the competitors must travel the whole distance to Smalldeane on their feet. They were at liberty either to run or walk, but when they reached the church they must be immaculately clad, and not in a slovenly state.

The one who reached Dolly first was to marry her!

When they heard the provisions of the will the audience was thunderstruck.

"Are you," gasped Walbrook to Dolly, "are you going to offer yourself as a prize in this manner? If you do not, the money will come to you in the ordinary way, and you can marry whom you will."

"I promised," replied the brave girl, in measured tones—"I promised my father to abide by his will!"

* * * * *

The weeks slipped by. Dolly prepared for the eventful day. She knew the locality well, and so did the others. The little village of Smalldeane was Mr. Meredith's favourite country place, and every year they used to spend a month there. Last summer both Walbrook and Kendrick had visited them, so the conditions were equal.

She refused to meet either of her lovers till she was married! But every day, and every hour of the day, she prayed to the God Almighty to give wings to Rupert's feet.

Tuesday, February 19th, came round at last. The day before Dolly had gone to the little inn at Smalldeane in order to be ready. There was a heavy fall of snow during the night, and in the morning the ground was covered.

In a first-class carriage there sat, as the 11.30 train steamed out of the Brighton Central Station, Rupert and Walbrook, with the two executors.

"We had better decide," said Mr. Weston, "who is to get out at Tongberry."

As he spoke he folded up two pieces of paper; on each of them was written the name of a station.

He put them in his silk hat, shook them up and held it out to Walbrook. He drew; it was marked Tongberry.

"Your luck has begun early," remarked Rupert bitterly.

Soon the train stopped at Tongberry, and Walbrook got out, accompanied by Mr. Weston. A set look was on his face, and he pulled his moustache vindictively.

To Rupert the train seemed hours going to Hazelwood. When it did reach the platform, he was out ere it stopped.

Turning his trousers well up to avoid the splash of the thick mud he covered with long strides the road that lay beween him and his love. He soon left Mr. Richmond far behind.

How slow his progress seemed! Where, he wondered, had Martin got to? Would he win or would he lose? Every thought to him was an agony.

Smalldeane lies in a valley midst the Sussex Downs. At last he reached the hill that overlooks the village. Straight in front of him was the opposite hill down which Martin Walbrook must come.

He was not in sight. Could he have already reached the goal! Surely not. In Heaven's name, no!

Rupert stopped to turn down his trousers and to flick off one or two specks of mud on his clothes.

He looked up and suddenly saw a figure tearing down the opposite hill at full speed. Something told him it was his rival!

Madly he started racing down the incline. Kind Providence directed his steps in the clean places. The church lay at the very foot of both the hills. Blindly he ran on, rushing heedlessly past the amazed villagers.

Thirty yards more to go! Walbrook was coming at lightning speed. Ten yards more to the lych-gate. The same difference separated it from Walbrook.

Now they were through.

Side by side they raced up the path; their hats had been discarded long before.

In front of them was their prize—Dolly, and nigh on a million pounds!

She stood there in an agony of suspense. Which would reach her first—the man she loved or the man she hated?

Now they were almost on her, Rupert, thank God an inch ahead. The other, in a frenzied moment, put forth his hand to push aside his rival.

In doing so he lost his footing, slipped, and fell ignominiously in the slush of the snow.

With a faint cry, Dolly sank fainting in her lover's arms. When she recovered, Rupert Kendrick's name was filled in the blank space of the marriage license, and they were wed.

Of Martin Walbrook, nothing need be said.

P. Reeves Shaw.

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID NEW SERIAL YOU CAN START TO-DAY.

Dupes of Destiny

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT

By Blanche Eardley, Writer of "The Bond Between."

PROLOGUE.

A YOUTH is in the private room of Messrs. Samuel Sharpe and Quirke, solicitors, awaiting the head of the firm's announcement as to whether he is the heir to the baronetcy of the late Sir Basil Wingate or not.

Mr. Sharpe says:

"You will remember, Mr. Rust, at the reading of the will, the title, which by special remainder he had power to dispose of, and the money were left by Sir Basil Wingate to the elder son of his run-away only daughter, Helen Jerningham, should she have one; and failing a son being born to her, the title and the money with the estate, should go to you, his nephew; afterwards to your son—should you marry, or to the son of your daughter; no child of the feminine sex directly inheriting it."

He then tells Cyprian Rust that, hearing Helen Jerningham went to Australia, he has extensively advertised for her in Australian papers, but with no effect. Therefore he congratulates his listener on becoming Sir Cyprian Rust.

The solicitor is called out of the room, and Cyprian Rust sees on the table an unopened letter with an Australian stamp. The address he recognises as being in the handwriting of his cousin, Helen Jerningham!

Is it written to announce the birth of a son and heir? If so it would rob him of the legacy at the eleventh hour!

A step sounds outside the door. Quickly Cyprian Rust thrusts the letter into his pocket. He hurriedly says good-bye to Mr. Sharpe, and when he reaches his hotel he reads the missive. It tells how Helen Jerningham has left Australia, so that the future heir—if a boy—may be born in England!

Sir Cyprian Rust carefully burns the letter that might have dealt the death blow to his ambitions, and mentally resolves to go to any extremes to retain the title.

Meanwhile Helen Jerningham is dying on board an ocean liner in giving birth to twin sons.

From incoherent remarks that she makes, the physician who attends her is led to believe that a secret is attached to the boys' history. But she dies ere she reveals her name or the boys' identity!

Many years later.

MARCELLA RUST, daughter of Sir Cyprian, finds a spade guinea which a mysterious man has hidden underneath the mat outside a certain room which she has been forbidden to enter in their home, Wingate Court, Crawley. Her curiosity is naturally aroused, and she tells her father of the occurrence. He seems annoyed at her alertness.

Sir Cyprian learns, through the Rev. Philip Nullius, that a dying woman wishes to see him.

He goes to see her, and she shows him a later will of Sir Basil Wingate, by which all his property is left to the descendant of Helen Jerningham unconditionally. Sir Cyprian snatches this will from her, and she dies before she can inform anyone else.

Sir Cyprian visits Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox, where he meets Mr. Caleb J. Johnson, millionaire and City magnate, who is in love with the hostess. The baronet, who has Lady Violet in his coils, forces her to swear to take particulars of the millionaire's house and property.

Late in the evening Johnson proposes to Lady Violet. Knowing her position, she, of course, refuses him. As she does so, the palms in front of the window part and a man lurches heavily into the room.

Lady Violet recognises him as her husband—a former Major in the Army, who has been separated from her for many years. Hastily she requests Johnson to leave; then turning on her unwelcome visitor, she by threats prevails upon him to go.

In the corridor this Society ruffian encounters Sir Cyprian, and sees upon his watch-chain the Sign of the Spade.

Edward Day proposes to Marcella. Being refused, he angrily lets fall an allusion to Marcella's dead mother.

Lady Violet overhears this, and, with blazing eyes, dismisses Day, who acts as her secretary, from her service.

She makes him an allowance of £250 a year, and gives him a letter of introduction to the millionaire, Caleb J. Johnson.

Digitized by Google

TENTH CHAPTER.

"The Ruby Duncoran Company."

"A THREAD once broken can never be cemented together again! We must let the loose strands go now and consider new ones."

The words of Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox reiterated in the brain of the millionaire Caleb J. Johnson, as he strolled to and fro in the room he had set apart as an office in the suite he occupied at the Dovermarle Hotel in Piccadilly.

It was a few days after the dinner party at Lady Violet's, and the financier's strangely impassive countenance grew exultant as he murmured softly:

"There is no thread on earth, my lady, that Caleb J. Johnson cannot pick up and fix as he wants! I have put you before me as the one possession desirable to complete my success socially, and I mean to have you—in spite of your fears, and the unfortunate contretemps of undesirable male relatives cropping up to intervene. Fate intended you to be mine, my beauty, and had I met you earlier in my life—well, the hands of Caleb J. Johnson may have been a little cleaner, his life a little less seared by mistakes."

Something like a sigh escaped the millionaire's lips as he opened a drawer in his desk and took out a faded photograph, at which he gazed intently.

"You were my millstone!" he muttered. "I tied you round my neck and you pulled me down, until I took the plunge that rid me of you. Your romantic ideas bored me, and your houri-like beauty was a constant reminder of the folly I had committed in marrying you before I made myself the master of your father's will!

"A rich woman would have been my saving, or even a clever one—but a beautiful doll was less than useless! I only congratulate myself that our ill-fated marriage had no aftermath of revengeful children to rise up and slay me! You are dead—at least I hope so—and I am free to woo my lady with the proud eyes and the shabby relative!"

He replaced the photo, and closed the drawer, then turned suddenly to see that there was someone standing in the doorway. It was a man with a dark, livid face of an uncommon type, and he was dressed in the garb of a clergyman.

Caleb J. Johnson looked at him angrily. "You have made a mistake, sir," he said curtly; "this suite of rooms belongs to me! Who allowed you to enter them?"

The stranger bowed apologetically.

"Forgive my intrusion," he began, in a rich, resonant voice, "but I told the servant I would come and see you without the formality of being announced. You will remember, Mr. Johnson, that I wrote you about the rebuilding of some almshouses in my parish at Crawley. They are sadly needed, and I thought you might be able to help me, since I saw that you had never refused a donation for the poor; and passing through town on my way back I dared to personally attempt to see you!"

A dry smile flickered across the lips of the financier. The terse, straightforward speech of the impecunious curate tickled his sense of humour.

"Ah!" he said slowly, "I recollect now; you are that parson who wrote to me from Crawley—Philipsomething or other."

"Philip Nullius," replied the younger man gravely.

The financier laughed. "Nullius signifies 'no one,' if I recollect my school-days. An ominous title for a man who wants to get money out of people. They don't like throwing it away, you know! By the way, can't the Squire of your parish help you?"

"Sir Cyprian Rust has been good in the past," said the curate, with a slight flush. "We cannot always be asking him; but I won't trespass upon your time any longer, sir. I will bid you good-day."

"Stop!" And Caleb J. Johnson's large white hand arrested the departure of the curate. "Before I help you I have a right to ask questions. Is Sir Cyprian popular in the parish? I have known of him some years, and would like to hear something about his home life."

The curate hesitated.

"I think he is," he said slowly. "But not so much as his daughter, Miss Marcella Rust."

"Ah!" murmured the financier, with twinkling eyes. "She is Sir Cyprian's heiress, is she not?"

Philip Nullius drew himself up stiffly.

"I am afraid I am not in a position to discuss Miss Rust's affairs," he said coldly.

The financier looked at him oddly. "I am interested, not curious," he replied drily. "I knew the daughter of Sir Basil Wingate, the former owner of the Court, rather well in bygone years, the present owner interests me also."

"I am sorry I spoke hastily," explained the curate. "But I know very little about the Court; I am only a recent comer to Crawley, and have only heard that Sir Cyprian is a great collector of rare pictures and curios, and Miss Rust is our Lady Bountiful."

Then, after receiving a substantial cheque for the almshouses from the blunt millionaire, Philip Nullius took his leave. Outside the hotel he passed a hansom, ignorant that the face of the girl seated beside an older woman lit with a sudden flush as he walked past.

"Who was that, Marcella?" said Lady Violet quickly, noting the blush and drawing her own conclusions.

"Mr. Nullius, the curate at Crawley," the girl answered. "I wonder what he is doing in town?"

Lady Violet sighed. The curate was handsome certainly, but hardly the sort of man about whom Marcella should blush, and she wondered in what view Sir Cyprian would regard it.

In the meantime Caleb J. Johnson was thinking in his office at the Dovermarle Hotel.

The face of the obscure young curate attracted him strangely. It reminded him vaguely of one of those shadowy memories that he kept on a back shelf in his mind.

"A great collector of rare pictures," he murmured thoughtfully. "I should like to see those pictures—they must be worth viewing since Sir Cyprian retires from the vanities of the world to collect them!" He laughed suddenly. "So the curate, Mr. Nullius, seems to be attracted by the winsome Marcella, who is the nearest approach to her aunt in beauty I have ever seen."

Then moving to his desk he picked up a paper, and cast his eyes over it.

"The best names in the kingdom," he mused thoughtfully. "We will send this through with a swing. Bailey has prospected the mine, and the name of a mining engineer like Bailey stands to insure confidence at once. Within ten days we will float it, and I prophesy that the rise of the shares in the Ruby Duncoran Company will send a flutter through the heart of both shareholders and brokers alike." He laughed softly. "Then, when I have seen it fairly launched, I shall take a well-earned holiday and marry Lady Violet."

As he seated himself in an armchair there was a knock at the door, followed by the appearance of a hotel servant.

"A gentleman to see, you, sir."

Caleb J. Johnson looked at the card in the man's hand, then turned to the papers on the desk.

"Show him in," he said curtly; "and I am engaged while this gentleman is with me."

The servant bowed and left the room, to re-enter again followed by a quiet-looking man, well dressed, almost too carefully so, with an alert expression in his eyes that suggested a journalist on the look-out for "copy." His manner was deferential, but not obsequious, and there was no trace in his appearance of that flurried nervousness common to most people in the presence of a multi-millionaire, probably for the first time in their lives.

Digitized by Google

"Ah," said Caleb J. Johnson, slowly, "you have news for me, Mr. Hewett?"

Mr. Hewett, of the firm of Hewett and Hewett, Private Inquiry Agents, bowed.

"Yes, Mr. Johnson," he answered. "I think I have traced your man."

The financier twisted a piece of paper in his hand with an absent look.

"Ah, that's well," he murmured; "you must understand, of course, that I wish the man no harm, personally; but I wish to prevent his doing any to my friends; and his manner of entering a lady's drawing-room was not exactly one warranted to inspire unbounded confidence in him. I am merely obtaining this knowledge so that I may frighten him and assist the lady he annoyed. Women can never manage these things. They are a prey to every disreputable relation that comes along."

Mr. Hewett bowed. Being a man with a very fair knowledge of human nature, he understood the index that prefaced this prologue of the financier.

"I quite see, sir," he answered politely. "Of course my inquiry naturally began with the lady herself; for we always learn what we can about the friends or relations of a person we wish to trace. And as you could only describe him without giving me his name, I had to make a careful note of her ladyship's friends during the last few years. And at last I discovered the identity of the man in whom you are interested."

"Yes," queried Caleb J. Johnson, carelessly, "and who is he?"

"Her ladyship made an unfortunate marriage when a girl." Mr. Hewett continued; "the man was by birth and education a gentleman, but by inclination a scoundrel. He drank to such an extent that he was cashiered from the Army, and went abroad, her ladyship pensioning him off on the condition that he never returned. His allowance was paid regularly by the solicitors of her ladyship until about eight years ago, when the man ceased to apply for it, common report getting about that he had been killed in some skirmish out in South Africa."

The financier carefully unrolled the piece of paper he had twisted, then looked at the man opposite to him.

"I see," he murmured, "the fellow I have deputed you to discover, Mr. Hewett, is the 'late' husband of Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox?"

"Yes; Major Frayne-Lennox is the gentleman you saw coming through her ladyship's window."

The financier slowly folded up the scrap of paper in his hand once more. It seemed to require a great deal of thought, for it was some time before he spoke. When he did his voice was a trifle more conciliatory in tone.

"And that is all you found out, Mr. Hewett? I would be prepared to pay well for any detail regarding that gentleman's life."

Mr. Hewett smiled. "I think I can oblige you, Mr. Johnson," he said. "I discovered that just before he left the Army he had altered the figures of a cheque given to him to pay some expenses of his brother officers. It had been a private cheque belonging to the Colonel, and when the crash came the matter was not brought forward, entirely on Lady Violet's account, as everyone sympathised with her."

Yet again the financier's fingers played with the piece of paper.

"Did you hear the name of the officer who had given the cheque?"

"Yes. It was Colonel Lyster—now a General, retired. He lives in chambers in Pall Mall."

Caleb J. Johnson drew his cheque book towards him deliberately, then jotted down a few figures on a blank cheque.

"For the information you have given me, Mr. Hewett, I will double your fee," he said slowly. "I suppose you did not find out whether Major Frayne-Lennox had left England?"

"He is still in London," replied the inquiry agent. "I could not discover his address, though; but I will try if you like. I will do so with pleasure."

The financier rose and handed the cheque to him.

"Oh, it really is not important," he said carelessly; "but you might call round here between eleven and twelve in the morning, should you have fresh news. I am quite content with what you have told me."

When the well-dressed agent had disappeared, the financier sat down and wrote a letter. It was to a man to whom he had often given good tips, and who was under some obligation to him. His name was Corbett—the Honourable Jim Corbett, and he knew everyone in Society worth knowing.

The financier began his letter by mentioning that he had a few private shares to dispose of in the new company he was promoting—the Ruby Duncoran Mine—and suggested that the Honourable Jim should buy some; then he went on to say:

"I shall be dining at the Carlton on Thursday; can you join me? Oh, by the way, there is a chap I want to meet, rather. I suppose you know him—General Lyster. You might mention that you are dining with me, and suggest that if he wished to know a good thing, he might accompany you. Anyway, get him to come along with you. I am interested in someone he knows very well."

The following day a telegram was sent to the financier's suite of apartments. He was out, but when he returned later, the contents of the telegram appeared to please him. They were:

"Thanks dinner. Delighted. Lyster coming.—CORBETT."

On Thursday evening the table the millionaire had had reserved for him was to be seen occupied, about half-past eight. The figure of Caleb J. Johnson was as well-known as Nelson's column, and many were the envious glances sent after him.

His guests were two men of entirely different types. One was the Society moth, the Honourable Jim Corbett, languid, aristocratic, and with a will like pulp. The other was a tall, military-looking man, with white hair and an aggressive moustache. His eyes were fierce, and his chin receded.

Caleb J. Johnson knew how to entertain, and his wonderful tact and natural magnetism drew out the latent powers of conversation in the old General.

He led him into a money market discussion, and concealed a covert smile at the old soldier's ignorance of the City jargon.

"I can arrange to let you have those shares, General," he said slowly; "they are a few private ones I am not throwing on the market, but letting my friends have a look in. The 'Ruby Duncorans' will make a 'corner' in rubies soon. This is your chance. It's a slap-up concern."

"I shall be most happy to avail myself of your offer, Mr. Johnson," said the courtly old soldier; "I am not too richly endowed with this world's goods to refuse such a chance."

"That will be all right," the financier said carelessly; then added: "Do you ever remember to have heard of a friend of mine, General—Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox?"

Digitized by Google

(continued.)

The eyes of the old man sparkled with a sudden fire.

"Remember? I should think it impossible to do otherwise. That scamp of a husband made it impossible to ever forget her—poor lady. Her only happiness must be in remembering he is dead."

Caleb J. Johnson made a gesture to the waiter to fill the liquor glasses again.

"Yes; it was very sad," he said slowly. "By-the-way, didn't you suffer at the scoundrel's hands?"

General Lyster started, then laughed bitterly.

"Yes; I did. I gave into his care a cheque for the amount of fifty pounds for some sports a few of us were getting up, and the beggar added two 'noughts,' making it five thousand. Certainly the cheque was carelessly filled in; in fact we were all in a state of hilarity bordering on horseplay, and to my shame I could never swear that I had filled in the amount in writing. Anyway, I was the loser."

The financier leant forward; the Honourable Jim had gone to chat with a friend; they were alone.

"I say, General," he began, "you will think me an odd fellow, but I want you to sell me that cheque. You can't use it now the poor wretch is dead, and as I am shortly announcing my engagement to Lady Violet, it would please her that I should destroy it. I am prepared to pay you the amount it is forged for—five thousand pounds; that's a fair offer."

"But—but," murmured the General, dubiously, "it hardly seems a right thing to do, Mr. Johnson. I swore to hand the cheque over to the police should that scoundrel put his foot in London. But when I heard he was dead, I forgot the incident."

The financier took his cheque-book from his pocket.

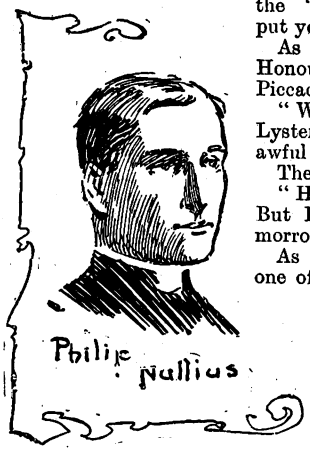
"Here is the cheque for the five thousand," he said slowly. "You will be a wise man, General, to close with the bargain. I can afford it, and Lady Violet—my future wife—will be pleased. May I expect the cheque by return?"

The lean, old hand closed on the piece of coloured paper. The money was a much-needed item in his household, and the fear of offending the financier even a worse terror than the debt.

"Yes," he said slowly; "I will send the cheque by return. I would hesitate to do it, only I am sure it is all right, since you are to marry Lady Violet, Mr. Johnson. As her future husband you have the right to receive the dishonoured cheque and to destroy it in her presence."

Caleb J. Johnson laughed softly.

"It shall be destroyed in her ladyship's presence, General. She wishes it. Don't forget those three hundred shares in the 'Ruby Duncoran.' I will put your name down for them."



As the financier and the Honourable Jim were strolling up Piccadilly, the latter said curiously:

"What did you want with old Lyster, Johnson? He is an awful old bore."

The financier smiled.

"He did not bore me to-night. But I can't answer for him to-morrow."

As he was giving directions to one of his clerks the next morning an express letter was brought in to him. He opened it, and smiled quietly as he saw the cheque that some years ago had been dishonoured through the conduct of Lady Violet's husband.

"Now I hold the trump card!" he laughed. "The rest will be easy; Lady Violet shall begin to order her trousseau."

When, during lunch—which he took alone—an interruption came in the shape of another card, Caleb J. Johnson was not annoyed.

He looked at it and smiled slightly. "Ask the gentleman to wait," he said, and then went on with his lunch thoughtfully.

The name of the man on the card was that of Edward Day, the nephew of the woman whom Mr. Johnson intended to marry.

ELEVENTH CHAPTER.
Married in Haste.

HALF an hour later Edward Day left the Dovermarle Hotel with a pleased expression on his face. His interview with the great financier had been more successful than he had anticipated, and the letter of introduction which he had presented from Lady Violet had sent his ship straight into port.

He had been treated with interest and an almost personal kindliness by the millionaire that had flattered his wounded self-esteem.

After a few leading questions the financier had held out a promise of seeing his way to giving Lady Violet's nephew the post of confidential secretary, and he would hear definitely in a day or two.

As he turned into Bond Street, Edward hailed a hansom, and telling the driver to go to No. 19 Guilford street, Bloomsbury, settled himself back with a sigh of relief.

"That's pretty nearly certain, anyway!" he muttered; "and the screw will be a good one. A man like old Johnson won't dream of giving less than at least a thousand a year. Lady Violet's letter seemed to strike him. Let me read it again. It's just as well to keep copies of letters—especially some that may be useful."

He took out his pocket-book, and, unfolding a piece of paper, read the duplicate of the letter he had given to the financier:

"DEAR MR. JOHNSON,—Will you do me a great favour? My dear nephew, Edward Day, wishes for a post of some kind, and I wondered whether you could help him to one. He is brilliantly clever, and not without expectations. As I am particularly fond of him—he being the child of a dear younger sister who died, I will be greatly indebted to you if you can help him. I would ask no one else this favour but yourself, for I feel that I may rely on you to do what you can for him. I have told him that I am speaking for him to you, but have not told him the contents of this letter, so please do not let him know all I have said to you. I shall know, if you assist him, that you have given my letter the only answer I wish for.—Always yours sincerely,—VIOLET FRAYNE-LENNOX."

"That was a jolly improvement on the original!" the young man laughed. "I fancy dear aunt Violet's eyes would open if she could know how successfully it went down! And if I play my cards well, I shall get back a little of what I have lost. Then that haughty young Marcella shall learn that it is not always wise to kick those at your feet!"

His face grew savage, and he swore softly under his breath, as the scene of a few days ago came back to him.

"Yes; the ship's foundling shall get his own back one day, and then I shall be in a position to make them smart. But I must pacify Lottie, and not let her guess anything, except that I have quarrelled with Lady Violet; that will be enough for her to know."

As he got out of the hansom, a fair, anxious face pressed against the window of the house it had stopped at, lit up with an expression of relief and joy, then vanished into the room.

He rang the bell, and after an instant's pause, it was opened by the owner of the face at the window. The door closed behind him, then two clinging young arms were flung round his neck, and a high clear voice, cautiously lowered, cried gladly:

"At last, dear old boy! I was afraid something had happened to you, and was imagining all sorts of awful things about inquests and mortuaries! It is just lovely to know that you are safe and well, though a naughty, late boy!"

Digitized by Google

"For goodness' sake, Lottie!" he whispered pettishy, "don't let the whole house know the depth and breadth of your feelings. If you have no respect for the common conventionalities, you might at least refrain from making me look ridiculous. And," he continued, "I wish you would let the servant come and open the door; I am always telling you about these little things. I hate exhibitions of this kind! And you will persist in doing what you know I hate!"

By this time they had reached the drawing-room on the first floor, and the girl, whose exuberance had suddenly evaporated, shut the door, then turned a coaxing, roguish face to him.

"I'm always offending you now somehow, Edward!" she said wistfully, "but it is because I love you, old boy, that I must rush down to meet you. You have come so seldom lately that the time drags from day to day. Then, when I got your letter saying you would be here this afternoon, a whirlwind seemed to get into my heart, and I longed to see you and tell you that I did not care how poor you got, or what poverty we had to face, so long as we faced it together, darling. For you are all I have now, Edward, and my love has grown stronger with each heart beat!"

The young man submitted with a perfunctory air to the warm, loving caresses of the girl, whose brilliant loveliness was touched by a deep emotion. Yet she was not of the type from whom most men would turn.

She was of medium height, slenderly made, but her face lacked depth of expression by reason of its extreme prettiness. Her blue eyes of a deep sapphire hue were as easily turned to mirth as tears, and the full, red lips lacked decision, although the wealth of tenderness in the generous curves repaid any lingering regrets for the wanted strength of character.

"There," he said, disengaging himself from her arms. "I am very glad to see you, dear, of course, but I wish you would learn a little more repose of manner. You are too exuberant, too loud. If only you could see the perfect self-possession of my cousin, Marcella Rust!"

A change crept into the weak, lovable face, a certain metallic hardness into the tone of her voice when she spoke, that made Edward Day deplore the slip he had made in mentioning his cousin, for his vanity caused him still to claim kinship with the proud girl who had repulsed his advances.

"Your cousin, Marcella Rust," she repeated slowly. "You have often said that I was the most perfect creature in the world. That was when you wished to please me for the furthering of your own ends. Now you hold up your cousin, Marcella Rust, to me—me," she exclaimed in a louder key, "the woman whom, in spite of her want of manners, you made your lawful, legal wife; and now you are ashamed of me!

"Oh, Edward," she exclaimed passionately, "don't be so cruel to me! I have submitted to a great deal—to a secret marriage until you had come into the money you were expecting on your twenty-fifth birthday. You promised to take me to your aunt, to make me known to your people, to acknowledge me as your wife."

Edward Day bit his lip savagely. In a moment of quixotic chivalry he had married the fascinating chorus girl some months ago, binding her to secrecy.

And now the tie was beginning to jar on him, as he realised that he, a future man of wealth, was married to a woman of whose doll-like prettiness he was already tired. But he saw the expediency of pacifying the slumbering jealousy he had carelessly kindled in her towards Marcella Rust.

"Don't be a little goose," he said, drawing her to him with a careless gesture. "You are my wife, so why be jealous of Marcella Rust? It was on your account that I quarrelled with my aunt, and was in turn ordered out of her house for ever."

"I am your wife!" she cried passionately. "I should come first with you, as you do with me."

"On my account?" murmured the girl, her face lighting with a gleam of happiness. "Oh, darling, did—did you tell her you had a wife?"

He pressed her head on his shoulder, so that she should not see the sneer on his mouth, as he answered glibly:

"Not exactly, sweetheart. But she wished—nay, ordered me, to propose to Marcella Rust, and when I refused—because I already had the dearest little wife in the world—she disowned me, and told me to leave her house for ever."

"But why did you not explain, darling?" murmured

Digitized by Google

Lottie timidly. "If your aunt had known that you were already married, she would have understood?"

"Yes," he said with a short laugh, "and immediately have cut off the pittance she is allowing me now. She would never have forgiven me if she had learnt that I had contracted a marriage with an actress. She is awfully proud of our family name—and all that rot!" he finished airily.

Lottie slowly withdrew herself from his arms, and faced him with a curiously-strained expression on her delicate face.

"So you were ashamed of me," she said in a lower voice, "Is it possible for a man to be ashamed of the woman who is his wife, and who has proved her love for him by leaving the profession she was happy in in order to fit herself for the position she would occupy as his wife? You can't mean me to understand such a cruelty, Edward?" she cried passionately.

"I am your wife, and should come first with you, as you do with me! As you have left your aunt's house, then you intend that we shall take a flat together and live openly as husband and wife. Oh, my dear, I shall be so careful of your money, and our home will be a nest of peace and joy!"

"For goodness' sake, Lottie," he exclaimed angrily, "don't romance! I don't intend anything of the sort—at least, not for some time," he added quickly, seeing a white look on her face. "We can't possibly live together on £250 a year, and I don't mean to try.

"What I suggest is that you return to the stage, it will be quite easy as you are pretty well known, and I try to get a post that will help me to make a decent income before we join forces. Now, don't begin to howl!" he said wearily. "When I am thinking out the best way for us both, you hinder me by weeping! Why can't you look at things in the same light as I do?"

A forced smile fluttered across her mouth. "Because I am still in love with you, I suppose," she said simply, "and commonsense and love never walked hand in hand. I will try to understand that you wish me still to keep up the farce of being a single woman; to wear my wedding-ring hung around my neck instead of on my finger. To laugh and act as though I had nothing to worry me, or any regrets in my life."

"Well, yes," he said uneasily. "I want you to help me by keeping our marriage a secret until I get the money that will be mine soon, and make an income that will insure a beautiful home for you, my darling. It would kill me to see you working about a house like a servant. Come, smile, and say you understand I am doing all for the best—for us both!"

Her face softened. "It is hard to have always to live a lie, Edward, but of course you know best, and it is only because I love you so that I resent being kept away from you. I have lost all interest in the stage since we married, but will soon get back into it, and will save all I can, so that I can help, you when we get into our own home, dearest.

"But," and she flashed a sudden glance into the careless handsome face looking down into her own, "you will not let that cousin with the perfect repose of manner come between us? I hate her! I feel that I should be conscious of her presence near me in a crowd, if Marcella Rust were there."

He laughed lightly, his vanity pleased at the show of jealousy.

"Silly girl! Marcella is older than you, and dark and stately. She has not the pretty ways of my fluffy kitten. So you must not be a little goose. I am going out of town for some days, so you must not expect to see me until I stand before you. You had better get out of these rooms into cheaper ones, and see at once about an engagement

"I will leave ten pounds with you now, and send more soon. Address me at 20A Northumberland Avenue, if you want to write, and I will write you care of the Era. Now," he continued quickly, "I must be off, dear. Don't mope, I will do all I can to get a good billet, so that you can come to me."

He took her in his arms and kissed the yellow hair and red mouth carelessly. He did not notice her strange chilliness as she responded mechanically to his caresses.

He released her gently, and put an envelope in her hands.

"That will help you, dear. I will send more soon. Good-bye!"

"Good-bye," she said quietly, gazing at him with tearless eyes. "I shall be all right, don't worry about me, Edward. Write when you can."

As he whistled up a hansom he looked back to wave a last farewell to the girl whose heart he had wounded. But the window was vacant, and he laughed uneasily as he muttered:

"Perhaps it will be just as well if she does forget me. I have a career to carve into which I want no woman to intrude now that Marcella has failed me, and this girl is only a dead weight. Fool that I was to have put such a noose round my neck! I mean to cut off the old life from the new! Poor Lottie will feel it at first, but she will soon buck up when she is back on the stage."

He lit a cigarette and smiled at his reflection in the mirror on the side of the hansom. As he turned his head he did not notice another hansom passing his with a man in it, who looked at him curiously, then at the house he had just left.

"Well," muttered the man with a slight Yankee accent, "what is Lady Violet's nephew doing at a house like that? He has some little secret in that shanty, I saw it in his face. I shall keep my optic on that particularly smart young man. Knowledge is power—to financiers!" And with a chuckle he relapsed into other thoughts as he went on his journey to Euston, en route to spend a week-end at the house of a certain peer whose name he was eager to place as a director on the board of the Ruby Duncoran Company.

In the meantime the girl Edward Day had said "good-bye" to was standing in the middle of the room with a pale, set face and gleaming eyes.

"He has gone," she muttered. "I felt that he was deserting me—leaving me a wife, and no wife! And the reason of his strange conduct is not so much the desire to make a home for me as to shake me off like an old glove." She laughed hysterically. "Me! Lottie Haste! Who threw up good chances on the stage to marry him secretly. And now he has deserted me!

"I felt it. All the time he was speaking I knew he was lying to me! His eyes, his voice, all told me that I was listening to a liar, and that liar was my husband!" She clenched her hands passionately. "The cause of his cruelty to me is another woman—the woman he held up to me as a paragon of perfection—his beautiful, stately cousin, Marcella Rust! She has changed him, won his love; and now I am nothing to him!"

She flung herself down by a chair and buried her head with its confusion of corn-coloured hair in a cushion.

"And I loved him so!" she sobbed. "I loved him so!"

TWELFTH CHAPTER.

"Danger Point."

MARCELLA was back at the Court. Her brief visit to London had been all too swiftly spent; the days with Lady Violet had whirled by in a succession of breathless sunrises and sunsets, a panorama of vivid life pictures had held her fresh imagination captive; and from that restless, buoyant existence her father's word of command had drawn her back to the white patch of monotony at the Court.

Life at the Court meant what? The daily, common round of country duties, a drive or walk into the village, a ramble in the woods on a cold day when the wind nipped her face into a tender red; a dull dinner at houses where she had no possible sympathy for or with the tedious guests, and afterwards tea, where she met the same commonplace faces that she saw week in, week out. And on Sundays the stroll to the village parish church, where she listened to the lessons and sermons preached by the Rev. Philip Nullius, the curate.

Digitized by Google

Those Sundays compensated for a lot with Marcella. Unconsciously she looked forward to them, and counted the days, and as the end of the week drew nearer, her eyes would glow more deeply with anticipation, and her mouth become softly dimpled with the knowledge that after the service the handsome curate would, by some strange, wonderful accident happen to catch her up, and then, for a brief, flashing moment, she would live in another world—a world made up of radiant, glowing colours, ranging from deep sapphire to a rich, gorgeous purple and sea green, a medley of tints that seemed to make a rainbow in her heart when the curate's dark, wistful eyes met hers in a sudden glance. So life at the Court was not all drab.

"Marcella," said Sir Cyprian one morning at breakfast, "I have a friend coming to see me this evening, an old college chum, now a doctor. His name is Slade—Dr. William Slade, of Harley Street. He will be here for a few days."

"That will be nice for you, father," Marcella answered absently. "I often wonder why you have so few friends down here; you must feel fearfully bored at times."

Sir Cyprian smiled. "A man with a hobby like mine, that of art collecting, and finding old, rare pictures in the world of art, has little or no time for boredom, my dear."

"Oh, that reminds me father!" she said quickly. "I read in yesterday's Telegraph, that the house of the financier, Mr. Caleb J. Johnson, has been broken into by thieves, and among other beautiful things stolen was the wonderful double of the picture, 'Mona Lisa,' of Leonardo da Vinci's. The one like Aunt Violet's copy, and you told me to tell you all about it! You remember? I saw it in the second hall; it just faced the dining-room.

"At first you would hardly know it was there, because of a heavy portière that was nearly always drawn to prevent it attracting thieves, at least, that was Mr. Johnson's idea. He said he made an exception in revealing to me the secret place of his precious picture.

"He valued it more than all the other things in his house so he told me. And I had the distinction of being shown the hiding-place! Only he and a devoted man-servant knew where it hung. Mr. Johnson told me all about it, and said he would not trust it alone in a drawing-room full of friends unless he or his servant were on guard. And now it has gone! I am so sorry! I trust the thief will be caught."

Sir Cyprian laughed. "That is one of the penalites of being a great man—everyone wants to rob you! I recollect you telling me all about the 'Mona Lisa,' my dear, and was interested at the time. I wonder whether they have caught the thief! It must be difficult to dispose of the picture."

Marcella rose from the table. "Wermen," she said, "bring me this morning's Telegraph, there is sure to be an account of it."

The old servant hesitated, and sent an anxious look in the direction of the master of the Court.

"Yes, yes, bring the paper, Wermen," smiled the baronet. "Miss Marcella is interested in the subject, having been the last person privileged to see it. Besides, the thief may have been caught."

Marcella's eyes sparkled. She was not a cruel girl, her heart was very tender, but she loved to see wrong vindicated, and having a personal knowledge of the affair made her especially eager.

"How sorry Aunt Violet must be to hear of it!" she said, while they waited for the paper. "She was almost angry with Mr. Johnson for showing it to me! In fact, she was quite upset when he said he always kept his word, and had promised to show it to me. She refused to go with us, although he begged her to."

Sir Cyprian's eyes gleamed with a strange expression as

Suddenly an exclamation made them turn quickly. The butler, Wermen, was leaning against the sideboard with a livid face and quivering lips.

Digitized by Google

(continued.)

they glanced over the girl's head at the old servitor who re-entered the room with a paper in his hand.

"Your aunt is foolish," he said slowly, "she is almost quixotic in her sense of duty; one would imagine that she feared to be mistaken for the thief!"

Marcella laughed. "Aunt Violet is a darling! I love everything she does. Ah, here's the paper! I will read the account, father."

Before Wermen could reach the baronet, Marcella had taken the paper from his hand. The eyes of the old man met those of his master with a frightened expression.

"Miss Marcella is old enough now to read even such cases as robberies, Wermen," said Sir Cyprian softly, and Wermen fell back silently.

"Here it is!" cried Marcella excitedly. "The police, after due investigation of the robbery at the house of the financier, Mr. Caleb J. Johnson, have come to the conclusion that the work is that of no novice, and in several details they strongly suspect that the subtle cleverness of the whole thing is due to the master mind of a notorious criminal, whose deep, uncommon method in planning out each separate 'crib' is not unknown to Scotland Yard; though the man's personality is yet unknown to them, they have strong reason to suspect that it is the work of a master-brain in the high art of robbery, who does credit to the sobriquet bestowed upon him by the police—that of the "Spade"—a very apt name for so brilliant a thief, who digs for his lesser brethren in the art to work upon the plans he lays. One thing puzzles the police—that is, that owing to the secrecy regarding the picture, only an inmate of the house, or a particular friend could have betrayed the hiding-place!"

Marcella laid down the paper thoughtfully. "No friend could be such a worm," she said heatedly. "I hope they will catch that horrid man they call the 'Spade.' I shall follow this up with great interest, because of Mr. Johnson."

Suddenly an exclamation made them turn quickly. The butler, Wermen, was leaning against the sideboard with a livid face and quivering lips.

"Father!" Marcella cried. "What's the matter with Wermen?"

Sir Cyprian rose and took the old man by the arm.

"Don't be anxious, child," he said slowly. "Wermen is sometimes taken like this. He suffers from fits."

Gently, and with great care, Sir Cyprian led the butler into the hall, and closed the door behind them.

"What's the meaning of this piece of folly?" he said sharply. "Can a girl frighten you now? Good Heavens, man! I've a great mind to send you off, and let you go to the dogs! You are ceasing to be a help, and becoming a nuisance!"

The old face quivered; then Wermen said painfully, "I'm very sorry, sir, but—but something strange came over me, and the young mistress' words sounded prophetic-like, and I could not keep back the feeling that our luck was at an end!"

Sir Cyprian shook him roughly. "You old idiot! I wonder that any luck stays while I keep on such a doddering old idiot as yourself! Let me warn you again, that if I see any more nonsense, you shall go—bag and baggage! I want men round me, not old women! You understand?"

Wermen nodded. "Yes, sir, I'll try, but the pain in my 'eart gets bad sometimes and I can't 'elp giving way; but don't turn me off, sir; I—I—couldn't stand that!"

"Couldn't you? Well, it rests with yourself whether you go or stay! If you are sensible you may keep on in a good house till you die, but if you go on rousing curiosity, and finally suspicion by your rotten conduct, I shall chuck you out once and for ever!"

A curious look stole into the old man's face.

"If you send me down, sir, you come too!"

Sir Cyprian's face hardened. "I fancy you will find it hard to pull me down, my good fellow; I am no fool, I warn you, and you had better remember that. Don't let me hear such language again—or you will be sorry!"

As the bent figure shuffled off, Sir Cyprian went back into the breakfast-room.

"Wermen had a heart attack," he said slowly, "I told him to go and lie down."

Marcella was standing near the window, and the baronet's eyes flashed suddenly as they rested upon the coils of dark brown hair and the slender shaped figure of his daughter.

"By-the-way, my dear," he said slowly, "have you been that walk to Danger Point yet? The view is particularly lovely—especially at this time of the year, when the bay is nearly always caught in a hurricane of wind and storm. They say there are no women left in Crawley who will go there because of the strength of the gales, but it is worth risking one's comfort for to stand on Danger Point during this weather."

"I've heard of it," she said brightly, "and will prove that there is one woman left in Crawley who is not afraid of the elements nor of the lonely Danger Point. I will be a credit to you, father, dear! Will you come too?"

Sir Cyprian shook his handsome, fair head. "No, my dear; I am an old man nearly. I would be crippled with rheumatism if I climbed Danger Point."

She laughed lightly. "Why, you are quite handsome, father, in spite of having a grown-up daughter! I wonder," she went on softly, "whether your love for mother was so deep that you could never marry again?"

A paleness crept into the rich colouring of the baronet's face. "Don't talk to me about your mother, my child. It is a subject I cannot bear, even now!"

"Dear father!" she whispered tenderly, holding her face up to his; "I will try by love and care to fill the void in your heart! I sometimes want mother as much as you do!"

When she had left the room, a curious expression stole into Sir Cyprian's eyes. "You're a clever, nice girl, my dear; but I am afraid that Fate may rob me of you! You are too good and sweet for this world, and it is truly said that, 'whom the gods love die young.' I am glad I let that insurance go!" he muttered. "What is £20,000 compared with two country seats, a town-house and £15,000 a year? No! It was just as well that Destiny took matters out of my hands just then.

"She is a gold mine to me—now. Violet dare not speak; and no one but myself knows of the later will the woman wanted to give the curate, in charge for the children of my dear cousin Helen! Marcella is my daughter—none can dispute that; and—Marcella has made her will in her father's favour! Should anything—happen at any time to Marcella—the other document can be found in some casual way—afterwards, and then my child's will can prove that I was innocent of such knowledge before!"

He smiled as he gazed out of the window. The sky looked lowering and a storm hung about the atmosphere, and the wind howled dismally through the trees.

"Danger Point is unpleasant at any time!" he murmured thoughtfully, "and to-day, of all days, Danger Point may prove fatal to anyone risky enough to climb it in the gale! I wonder how Violet would feel if she were here! I owe her one for her disobedience which my daughter innocently frustrated! She would not like her niece to be out on Danger Point to-day!"

Then, with a silent laugh, he went to the door of the forbidden corridor, and opening it, disappeared into the darkness, while the door closed noiselessly behind him.

THIRTEENTH CHAPTER.

In the Heart of the Storm.

"WELL, Rust—this is a change from the old college days of economy and anxiety about ways and means, eh?" laughed the genial man of medicine, Sir William Slade, of Harley Street fame.

He had a good face, shrewd and full of kindly humour that had won him more patients than he knew how to manage. He had long promised to pay a visit to his old friend, Cyprian Rust, and, after many years, he had torn himself away from London and foregone a Continental visit to please the fascinating friend of his youth.

Digitized by Google

They eyed each other curiously. Twenty odd years had wrought a change in the doctor, one that tinted his hair with grey and lined his face with a network of wrinkles. But Sir Cyprian had retained his fair, boyish curls and laughing blue eyes; only in the expression of his mouth did the doctor note the ravages of Time.

"Yes," said Sir Cyprian, "we have both improved our prospects, Slade; you are a useful member of Society, I only a drone, living on the fat of the land!"

"But where is your daughter? I have heard a lot about her!"

"Oh, Marcella has gone out for a walk. She is fond of outdoor rambling," answered his host carelessly; "she will be in to lunch."

But at lunch Miss Marcella had not arrived, and after a short time spent in waiting for her, Sir Cyprian and his guest sat down without her.

"There's going to be a storm!" remarked the doctor, "I hope Miss Rust will not suffer!"

Sir Cyprian smiled. "Oh, no; she is accustomed to the weather signs here, and will seek some shelter."

"I am rather fond of a storm at sea," said Dr. Slade. "In the early days of my career, after I had left the hospital, I was a ship's doctor on a liner running between England and Australia—one of the P. and O. vessels—a very fine one, too, And I shall always remember my last voyage home, because a very pathetic incident happened that had a dramatic finish."

Sir Cyprian looked interested. He was in high spirits; as the storm rose so did his good humour.

"Tell me," he said pleasantly; "I wish Marcella were here to listen to it also; your yarns are bound to be worth hearing."

"Oh, its only merit is its truth," replied the other. "It is a human story, and I always remembered it. A poor soul among the third-class passengers died giving birth to two boys. Before she went she tried to say something that would affect the after-life of the boys. But in the middle of the sentence, in giving the surname, she died. I always guessed that those two children were concerned in some family mystery, but there was no clue to anything, so they went the way of all unknown waifs. And at the time of their birth a similar storm to this one was raging. It's odd that I should think of it now!"

A fine champagne glass in Sir Cyprian's hand snapped sharply, and the sparkling, foamy liquor made a patch on the cloth.

"What became of them?" he asked.

"Oh, the woman was buried at sea, and the boys flourished; one was taken up by a philanthropic lady on board, the other no one wanted, so I believe he was sent to the workhouse. Anyway, it was a strange thing, and was the talk of everyone on board at the time."

The baronet tilted his chair back and looked at his old friend through lazily closed eyes.

"And you never heard any more about her? No one inquired?"

The doctor shook his head. "No; the whole thing was speedily forgotten—a nine days' wonder, no more. But the poor creature had a beautiful face! It's a strange world!"

Sir Cyprian rose quickly and faced the window, without speaking. His mind was made up. Those waifs must be found! He must ascertain how and where they were living, or whether Fate had removed them from their inheritance by death. He had considered the story of the woman who had sent for him to Digges Row to be the fantasy of imagination; but the cool, unemotional Harley Street doctor would not have related a romance for the sake of creating an effect.

It was the first time that he was forced to acknowledge the possibilities of the sea story being true, and if true, then dangerous to himself, and—and Marcella! Yes, he must know where to lay his hands upon those sons of the dead woman whose name he fancied he could tell. He did not like to imagine that a surprise might lurk in the shadowy future, putting him out of court and robbing him of that title and honour dear to him through years of association.

He turned from the window just as a flash of lightning played among the silver on the table.

"The storm is beginning," the doctor said; "I'm sorry for anyone out in the open. Are you sure there is no cause for alarm about Miss Marcella?"

Sir Cyprian smiled. "No," he answered; "she knows her way about blindfold, and rain has no terror for Marcella; her hair curls naturally!"

A low, fierce rumble followed by a crash that reverberated among the hills lying close round, shook the room.

The baronet lit a cigar and puffed silently at it. In the rings of smoke that rose after a while, he saw a bleak promontory, storm-beaten on either side. Sir Cyprian knew that it was as much as a man could do to keep his feet on that rock in the gale.

He laughed suddenly. "Come, Slade! Let us go to the library. Marcella is beyond our care! We can just hope!"

* * * * *

When, after breakfast, Marcella started for the walk her father had mentioned, the sky was clear and there was a pleasant freshness in the air. After a sharp walk of about an hour's duration, she came upon the gaunt rock on the coast-line known locally as "Danger Point." Even in the brightness of a wintry sun it had a sinister look, and, gazing down from the heights she had climbed, Marcella shivered.

"I did not think I had reached such a giddy eminence!" she thought; "but now I am here, I will make a tour of this rocky headland; the name is suggestive of weird possibilities! And to make my visit more uncomfortable, I see a storm breaking. The gulls are flying very low!"

She struggled and panted with the exertion of battling with fallen pieces of rock and the rising wind. Finally, she reached the furthermost extremity of Danger Point, and for a moment stood wrapped in involuntary wonder and admiration at the scene that lay below her.

The sea, like an angry giant roused from slumber, showed its white-crested waves in snarling contempt, and dashed with heavy booms against the massive rock.

After a while Marcella turned to retrace her steps. She felt awed and curiously afraid. The wind had risen suddenly, and shrieked a chorus of mocking laughter in her ears.

The descent was more difficult than she had imagined. Three times she fell, spraining her wrist against a piece of boulder and grazing her ankle.

For a time she was forced to rest; her hat had gone, and the wind had torn the hairpins from her head.

She staggered to her feet and brushed the wisp of wet hair from her eyes. A sudden flash of lightning, followed by a roar of thunder, made her cower in fear of her life. "Father! He will think I am lost!" she cried aloud. "It will break his heart! And Aunt Violet's! Oh, I must not die! I will cling to this piece of rock until the storm has passed. I dare not stand again; I shall be swept off my feet over the Point!"

Suddenly, while she lay in a partial stupor, a sound like a faint echo reached her. She dragged herself into a sitting posture and listened. Again she heard it, and this time her heart bounded with relief.

"There is someone below; perhaps father has sent a servant or come himself!"

With an effort she gave one loud, piercing shriek, that seemed to be carried seawards, then turned her face towards the steep, rocky way she had traversed earlier. After a time, a low sob burst from her lips. The voice had not answered!

As she flung herself down again, to save herself from another gust of furious wind, a man's face rose above the lower rock.

Their eyes met; the man smiled, and scrambling over the rock, made his way to her side.

(Another long instalment of this serial next week.)

Digitized by Google

THE NARROW ESCAPE OF J. STONE, BACHELOR.

It lacked five minutes of the time for the departure of the 6.30 express from Euston station, and the carriages were rapidly filling up. Jared Stone, a well-dressed, meek-looking little gentleman, had just got comfortably settled down in a corner of a first class compartment, when he heard a familiar voice addressing him.

"Why, hello, Stone; how are you? I'm right in luck to-day. I was just looking for someone to take charge of Aunt Martha's bundles and assist her out of the train with them when she reaches Manchester. You're going through, of course?"

"Y—yes," answered Stone, faintly, as he glanced up and recognised his friend Raemond, with his arms full of bundles of all shapes and sizes, and "Aunt Martha" grimly looking up behind him like one of Napoleon's Grenadiers.

Now Jared Stone was of a decidedly shy and retiring disposition, besides being a fossil of an old bachelor (Stone was fifty, still single, and not only willing, but anxious to remain so), and if he could have had his choice he would sooner lead a bayonet charge, face a gang of mutineers or a midnight burglar, or encounter almost any other trifle in that line rather than take charge of a woman and her luggage during a railway journey. Therefore the reader will kindly imagine the remarks (they will hardly do for print) that Stone made under his breath as he got up and, with forced politeness, bowed the waiting female to the seat next to the window.

"Thank you," said Raemond, as he began piling bundles on Stone's feet and into his lap, which ever came the handiest; "I knew you'd just as soon do me the favour to take charge of Aunt Martha as not, and I'm glad I happened to run across you. She is a trifle hard of hearing, and—er—a little eccentric in some respects, but you'll find her first-rate company when you get acquainted with her. By the way, I came near forgetting to introduce you to each other. Mr. Stone, this is my aunt, Miss Martha Eakins." Then, raising his voice, he shouted: "Aunt Martha, allow me to present my bachelor friend, Mr. Stone, who will look after you and see you safely off the train with your luggage when you reach Manchester."

"So good of him, I'm sure. Happy to meet you, Mr. Stone," responded Miss Eakins, with what was meant to be a winsome smile in Stone's direction.

At this moment the starter's bell rang, the train began slowly moving out of the station, and with a hurried "good-bye," Raemond dashed out of the compartment, leaving Stone alone to face the responsibility of delivering Miss Eakins and her collection of luggage safely at Manchester station—a responsibility which even the bravest of Stone's sex might well have hesitated to face.

Now, Stone, as I have previously intimated, was not cast in a heroic mould. He was a timid little gentleman, measuring probably five feet two in his patent leathers, and his great aim in life, so far as the so-called gentler sex was concerned, was to leave them severely alone and quietly flock by himself, as Lord Dundreary used to express it.

Miss Martha Eakins, on the contrary, though she had chiefly flocked by herself through five-and-forty simmering summers and the same number of dreary winters, had done so unwillingly and under protest, as it were.

For a full quarter of a century the tall and stately Miss Eakins (who loomed nearly a foot above Stone, and looked every inch a Grenadier, as I believe I have before hinted) had been on the matrimonial bargain counter—she had a snug little fortune in her own right—waiting patiently for some enterprising and appreciative gentleman to appear on the scene and take possession of her willing heart and other personal property. But, alas! Thus far her waiting had been in vain. Among her list of acquaintances other maidens, young and old, attractive or otherwise, some with fortunes and some without, had been taken, and she alone had been left to mourn over the perverseness of mankind.

Much brooding on the subject, coupled with her infirmity of hearing, had at last resulted in the harmless delusion that every man who treated her at all politely was desperately in love with her, and as Stone had not been warned of this fact, it can readily be surmised that his present position was one of extreme peril—that is, so far as his peace of mind was concerned, at least.

After several tunnels had been passed and the train had emerged once more into daylight, Stone transferred most of the bundles from his lap to the rack overhead, and presently ventured upon the remark that it was a fine day.

"Beg pardon, sir!" said the female Grenadier, suddenly straightening up and glancing inquiringly at Stone.

"I said it's a fine day," explained Stone, raising his voice to a shout.

"Gay? Oh, well I try to be, but it's rather hard sometimes for a lonely female to keep up her spir——"

A clammy perspiration broke out on Stone. "Excuse me," he interrupted, hastily, "I said a fine day; not gay, but day; d-a-y, day!"

"Say? Let them say what they've a mind to. I fancy Martha Eakins has got money enough, so she doesn't ask any odds of anybody—present company excepted. Of course it is different with you. The minute my nephew introduced us to each other I felt that we were going to be friends—intimate friends, as I may say."

Stone's face was now the colour of an Italian sunset, and he was earnestly longing for the bottom to drop out of the carriage and let him through, or for some other catastrophe to come to his rescue, but as usual in such cases his longings were in vain.

Digitized by Google

"Yes, Mr. Scone, the very instant I set my eyes on you I said to myself, here is a congenial soul, a man that I can trust; and I hope we shall have no secrets from each other. I am rich, but wealth is not all that is worth living for. You may be poor, Mr. Scone——"

"My name is Stone, madam, not Scone," shouted the embarrassed bachelor, "and if you will change the subject to something less personal I shall be greatly obliged to you."

"Obliged to me? Not at all, Mr. Spone. No obligation whatever. I am only too happy——"

"Great Heavens!" groaned Stone; "what on earth is the old lady driving at, I wonder?" And then raising his voice, he fairly howled: "Madam, your nephew expects me to see you safely out of the train at Manchester, and I'll do it, but in the meantime I propose——"

"To read my papers in quiet until we reach your station," Stone was about to say, but Miss Eakins was too quick for him. Her ear caught the word propose, and that was enough for her. The supreme moment of her life had arrived at last—or at least she thought it had—and with a cry of joy she flopped over on Stone's shoulder, knocking his hat off and sending it spinning on to the floor, and nearly smashing in his ribs against the side of the carriage.

"Oh, you dear, good man, I felt sure right from the start that you were going to propose! I knew the symptoms well, and—— What's the matter, lovey? Haven't been taken ill all of a sudden, have you?"

But Stone, who had wriggled out of her embrace, leapt to the other side of the compartment, and, fortunately for him, the train was just slowing up at the first stop. He tore open the door, and slammed it to. Then dashed down the platform to the guard's compartment. The stop was brief, and as the guard signalled the driver to go ahead and turned to enter the train, he noticed Stone for the first time. There was no time for explanations, and both leapt into the carriage.

"Great Scott!" cried Stone, puffing hard to get his breath. "That was a narrow escape. If I hadn't got away when I did I should have found myself a married man before we arrive at our destination. Do you want to earn a five-pound note?"

The guard was not quite sure of the man's sanity, but keeping a sharp eye on him, he intimated that a bank-note of that denomination had its charms.

Then Stone told his story.

"If you'll go to about the fifth carriage when we make another stop, you'll find in one of the compartments a six-foot female, all alone. You might tell her that I am dead, and that the remains would like their hat."

"Yes, sir."

"And then, when you have done that, if you will see that she doesn't find where I am and keep her from coming here to slobber over me, and help her out at Manchester with all her goods and chattels, and get her away from the station so that I may go on my way in safety, I'll put another note on top of the first one."

"All right, sir; leave it to me," responded the guard with a smile.

And all the rest of that journey Jared Stone rode in the guard's van. And fearfully he peered from the window and watched every movement of the dangerous and gigantic female when at last the station was reached and the passengers poured out upon the platform.

Not until he saw the cab into which she had been deposited with all her luggage disappear out of the station, did he emerge from the train, and then only to leap into a closed carriage, which the guard had secured for him.

He vowed to himself that that ten pounds was the best investment he had ever made in his life.

M. Williams.

MOTHER: "I am surprised that you would suffer a man to kiss you." Daughter: "But, mamma, I wasn't suffering."

Your Editor Chats.

THIS is the first number of a volume in which I intend to surpass all my previous efforts to keep Short Stories at the head of all papers of its class, and to maintain the position it has ever held—that of first and foremost. None of my contemporaries can boast of such an array of renowned contributors as I can. Blanche Eardley, R. Norman Silver, Louis Tracy, George Griffith, to mention but a quartette of favourite authors, all write regularly for the paper. The illustrations are drawn by well-known and gifted artists. My staff are always on the look-out for new and original features, and readers can testify to the result of their vigilance. Week by week the popularity and circulation of Short Stories are increasing, and I enter upon this new volume with a light heart, because I know that I carry with me the confidence and esteem of all those that regularly subscribe to this journal.

I HAVE an excellent programme for the new volume already mapped out. I have serials ready for you by your most-admired authors, and an abundance of splendid short stories. Next week will commence our new series, and in the same issue "A Criminal Millionaire" will conclude.

"Decoyed!" is the title of the new series.

"Decoyed?" you will naturally exclaim. "Who were decoyed, and by whom were they decoyed?" This you will learn by reading the instalments, each one of which is thrilling to a degree. It would be unfair to let you into the secret beforehand, so I will simply say that additional interest is lent to the series by the fact that they are written by the decoy herself, who actually underwent the experiences she relates.

Don't forget that "Decoyed!" commences next week. Let your newsagent know that you want a copy of Short Stories, and ask him to reserve you one. Otherwise you may have great difficulty in obtaining one.

ON page 19 there appears the sixth Unsolved Love Problem. Gerald Dacre is in imminent danger of forfeiting his honour, so I am offering a prize of one guinea to go to the reader who sends in what I consider to be the best course for him to pursue.

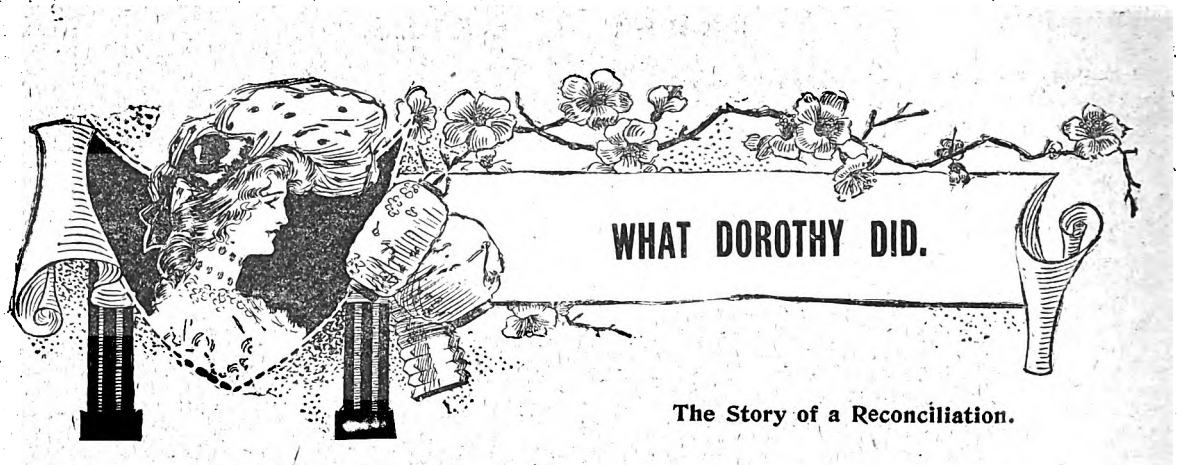
Your arguments should not exceed one hundred words, and should be written on one side of the paper only. State as clearly as possible the reasons why you consider the course you advocate is the right and honourable thing for him to do, and send in your replies to reach these offices not later than Friday, January 10th. None arriving after this date will be considered, and my decision as to the winner will be final.

Mark your envelopes "Sixth Love Problem" in the top left-hand corner, and address them to "The Editor," Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

MY heartiest thanks are due to all those readers who sent me Christmas greetings and congratulations on the Christmas number.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google



WHAT DOROTHY DID.

The Story of a Reconciliation.

"WHAT are we to do?"

It was Lily the practical who put the question. Barbara the beautiful only heaved a portentous sigh, and said nothing.

"Let apartments!" Dorothy said bluntly.

"Oh!" exclaimed Barbara.

"Dorothy!" chimed in Lily.

"Well, and why not? We've this big barn of a house on our hands, and half of it we never use. Why not turn part of it into profit? Luckily, it's our own. The only sensible thing the dad did was to buy it. You are lucky, Lil, you earn a little money. Poor Barbara, I am afraid you never will! Between us we can just manage to exist in decent comfort. If we could find a nice elderly gentleman, or a married couple to take the drawing-room floor, we could afford ourselves occasional luxuries, new songs, a theatre sometimes."

"How," said the beauty of the family, "will you set about it?"

"Advertise, of course, or reply to an advertisement."

"It seems so dreadful!"

"Nonsense! Besides, it won't affect you. Anna Maria will wait on them, and I can do the cooking. Lily will be away all day, and you, Barbara, can sit in the morning-room just as you do now, and forget that there are lodgers in the house."

"Lodgers!" murmured Barbara.

"Yes, lodgers," said Dorothy. "May as well call a spade a spade while you are about it! I'm going to get a newspaper and answer some advertisements."

As Dorothy West had said, it was indeed very lucky that their father had invested his money in the house he lived in. For when he died, it was found that little, if anything, was left for his widow and three daughters.

Dorothy, the eldest, had a small annuity left her by a godmother; Lily, who was the youngest of the trio, promptly obtained a situation, and avowed her intention to earn her own living. But Barbara—beautiful Barbara—remained to ornament the home, while Lily toiled, and Dorothy found some music pupils.

Six months previous to the conversation here chronicled, their mother had gently faded out of life, her one regret being that she was leaving her dear ones to fight the battle of life alone.

They were far more fitted to do so than she, poor, pretty, fragile little thing, had ever been! And now the question was, what were the three girls to do?

Dorothy's determined attitude, while it paralysed Barbara, was backed up enthusiastically by the practical Lily. For the next few days the pages of advertisements were eagerly scanned in the hope of discovering a pleasant and elderly couple, who required two charming furnished rooms with every attendance (Anna Maria, in a smart cap and apron—Anna Maria, who, if small and cockney of tongue, would have worked her fingers to the bone for the sake of her three mistresses) and good cooking! Many letters were written in answer to such as seemed suitable.

"We can afford to pick and choose," said Barbara.

But a fortnight elapsed, and only one applicant had responded, and he proved to be a young man of rather too prepossessing appearance who was not willing to pay the week in advance that Dorothy the businesslike demanded.

But one September afternoon a treble knock and ring startled the door of the big house in the Camden Road, and, all in a flutter, Anna Maria, arrayed in snowy cap and apron, fled to open it.

The callers were a young man of thirty and a pretty, fragile-looking girl of ten years younger, and Anna Maria ushered them into the drawing-room with some trepidation.

"Oh, she is pretty, miss!" whispered she to Dorothy. "But, oh, so sad-looking! And he's—oh, he's a gentleman, I know! Why, he actually took off his hat, and he wiped his feet on the mat, and we ain't had any rain for a week!"

Dorothy West put on her most businesslike manner and went to the drawing-room. Anna Maria was right, she was very pretty, the fragile-looking wife. Dorothy noticed she had drawn off her glove, and was wearing a wedding-ring that had not been long on the finger.

Ten minutes later all was settled, and even the first week's rent had been paid. Dorothy noticed how pleasant the husband's voice was, and how tenderly he spoke to the girl beside him.

"Name?" he remarked, in reply to Dorothy's question. "Oh, yes!" But he hesitated slightly and turned to his wife in a manner that Dorothy afterwards remembered. "Oh, yes, Chesterton, please! And we will come in in an hour's time. Dearest, I think you will be happy here."

"With you, Walter," murmured the wife, in so low a voice that Dorothy only just caught the words.

"Lily, we're let!" was her greeting to the youngest sister on her return home that evening.

"And Dorothy is as excited as—as I don't know what!" said Barbara, looking up from her book.

"Oh, nothing ever excites you!" said Dorothy with a laugh.

"Are they nice?" asked Lily, pausing in the act of taking off her hat. "Old or young? Pair of old frumps, I suppose."

"She is the prettiest woman, except Barbara, I have ever seen, and he looks like a nobleman in disguise."

"Thanks!" said Barbara.

"Good gracious!" was Lily's comment.

"There they are," exclaimed Dorothy, "coming in at the gate."

Lily peeped cautiously from behind the curtain.

"Now, wasn't I right? Isn't she lovely?"

"And they paid a week in advance!" cried Barbara, quite animatedly for her.

"That's satisfactory!" said practical Lily.

A fortnight later the entire household in the Camden Road were metaphorically in love with Mr. and Mrs. Chesterton. Anna Maria vowed that it was a delight and a joy to wait upon her, she was so gentle and so thoughtful. Dorothy had succumbed completely to her charm. In fact, the three girls were enchanted with Eunice Chesterton. And the husband was so essentially a gentleman that Barbara at once suggested that there was quite a mystery about them.

Digitized by Google

"Rubbish!" cried Dorothy, using her pet expression. But all the same she felt that Barbara, who had the happy knack of hitting the right nail on the head, was not altogether wrong in her surmise. Why was the girl-wife in the drawing-room so pale, and why did Dorothy more than once or twice catch her in tears? Mr. Chesterton went out but little, and his devotion to his pretty, pale wife was unbounded, but Dorothy noticed that she never allowed him to see or know of those times when her white face was buried in sofa cushion or pillow, and Dorothy, passing upstairs, caught the sound of sobs and tears.

Another strange thing was that no letters ever came for husband or wife. The former appeared to have plenty of money, for he lavished hats, and gowns, and trinkets, on the wife he so plainly and manifestly adored. The rent was forthcoming to the moment.

"It is most curious," said Dorothy, when the Chestertons had been there about two months, "and I must confess it puzzles me."

"What matters it?" said practical Lily. "It's no affair of ours."

"Yes, but it makes me miserable to see her miserable face. And she ought to be the happiest woman in London."

The very next day, hearing Eunice Chesterton weeping, Dorothy took the bull by the horns, and boldly walked into the room.

"My dear!" she cried. "This will never do!"

Mrs. Chesterton sat up with a look of deep trouble on her white face.

"Don't tell Walter!" she exclaimed.

"Of course I shall not, but I think you are making yourself ill. Let me help you, dear," and Dorothy put her girlish arms round the slight figure and drew it close to her own.

"Tell me the trouble," she said.

Dorothy took the bull by the horns, and boldly walked into the room.

"No, I cannot—I cannot. I am weak and foolish, and I have dragged him down in the world, ruined his life for ever! Oh, why did I do it?"

"Rubbish!" exclaimed Dorothy with emphasis. "Why, you couldn't do such a thing if you tried, you poor pale, pretty child!"

"But I have!"

Dorothy West, moved by an irresistible impulse, kissed her tenderly.

"Nonsense!" she said, as Eunice Chesterton clung to her broken-heartedly. "Dry your eyes and come and have tea with Barbara and me. I shall have to be very angry with you. You are alone up here. Now, don't say no, I won't let you. You must come—Eunice."

"Oh, I knew how good and kind you were," said the unhappy little woman, "the first moment I saw you. Please call me that. Except Walter, I haven't a friend in the world."

"Oh, yes you have—four, in this very house. Come along with me!"

And the masterful Dorothy carried her off, tearful cheeks and all, downstairs.

"Promise me," said Eunice at the door, "you will not tell Walter!"

And Dorothy promised. Tea and toast, a bright fire, and Dorothy's chatter brought a smile and even a touch of colour to the pale face before long. When her husband returned, she ran out to meet him with a bright laugh.

"How good of you, Miss West," he said brightly. "Why, little woman, you look a different girl. I am so glad."

She clung to him like a child, and slipped her arm through his in a tender manner.

"It was Dorothy," she said shyly, but looking up lovingly into his handsome face.

After that day Dorothy and Eunice became firm friends. But, do what she would, the former could not penetrate the evident mystery that surrounded the Chestertons. That there was a mystery was perfectly plain.

"I feel sure," said Barbara, "that it is a romance of some kind," when she heard what Eunice Chesterton had said. "He has married beneath him, and she——"

"Rubbish! Why she is a lady from head to foot."

"What does that matter? He may be the heir to a title, and she—well—a poor nobody."

"Reading too much fiction," said Dorothy bluntly, "has turned your brain, Bab."

"Truth is stranger than fiction," said Barbara, oracularly. "And this is not fiction, it's a copy of Tittle Tattle."

"More fictitious than some novels, my dear," said Dorothy. "Let me see it," and she took up the paper.

"Listen to this!" she cried.

"'Strange rumours are current in Society concerning the mysterious disappearance of Lord Walter Chesterton, the only son of Viscount Chesterton, who has not been heard of for some weeks. Family disagreement is hinted at in some quarters, in others a mésalliance. Whatever the reason, Society is discussing the topic with much——'"

"Dorothy!" exclaimed Barbara.

"Bab!" cried Dorothy.

The two sisters faced each other in silent amazement.

"Can it be?" said Bab at last.

"Impossible!"

"He is handsome enough to be a lord."

Dorothy laughed.

"My dear, good looks are not essentially the qualification to be a peer, or own a title!"

"I know that," said Barbara, "but——"

And it was "but," and a very big "but," too. Bab was certain, Dorothy was doubtful, Lily laughed in scorn.

"If I thought it were true," said Dorothy, "I should dearly love to bring about a reconciliation between them. I wish I could find out."

Digitized by Google

"Ask Eunice."
"No, I daren't do that."
"Ask him."
"Worse still!"
"Then it seems to me you are in a cul de sac."
"Oh, no, I'm not! Not yet. I have an idea."
"What is it?"
"Wait and see," said Dorothy.

The next morning, leaving Anna Maria in charge, with Barbara as a refuge in the event of anything going wrong, Dorothy put on her hat and jacket and wended her way to a bookseller's. Here she asked for and obtained permission to refer to "Who's Who."

There it was, staring her in the face in plain print: "Walter, Lord Chesterton, only son of Viscount Chesterton," &c., &c. Turning up Viscount Chesterton, Dorothy found that his town house was 30 De Vere Square, and his country house Upton Grange, Bucks. Then she trudged through the rain back to Camden Road.

"I'm going to make that dear little girl a happy woman," she said to herself with determination, and added as an afterthought, "if I can."

"Where are you going in all this rain?" asked Barbara early that afternoon.

"Tell you when I come home," said Dorothy.

"You've got some mischief in your head."

"Oh, no! Wait a while, and you shall know everything!"

With which Dorothy went out. But when she knocked at the big front door of No. 30 De Vere Square, there was a certain amount of trepidation in her heart. You see, she had never faced a real live viscount before, nor had she ever gone on such a strange errand. But she pulled all her pluck to her assistance, and faced the gorgeous flunkey who opened the door with as much assurance as she could muster.

"His lordship is in," said the footman. "What name?"

Dorothy had provided herself with a card, and handed it to the man.

"Please say it is on particular business concerning his son."

This was quite at a venture, but our little curly-headed heroine was quite desperate by now. In a few moments the footman returned and somewhat contemptuously ushered her into a morning room, with the air of a man who disdained to wait upon anyone less than a duchess. Presently a little elderly man, looking, thought Dorothy, more like a tradesman than a peer of the realm, entered.

"I am Lord Chesterton," he said quietly. "What can I do for you?"

Dorothy trembled. Now she was actually face to face with her task, she could recognise its difficulty. And what would she do if Lord Chesterton thought it impertinence? However, she made a plunge.

"I wanted to speak to you," she said, "of your son."

The old man frowned.

"Do you know him?" Then he drew a step or two nearer to her. "Are you," he demanded sternly, "his wife?"

Try as she would, Dorothy could not resist a smile.

"Oh, no!"

"Then——"

"But I have met her, and, oh, she is the sweetest and prettiest woman in the world! I have come to plead to you to forgive your son."

"Did he send you?"

"No, no!" said Dorothy in haste.

"You are interested in them, then?"

"We are great friends, and she is fretting herself ill because she feels she has dragged the man she loves down in the world."

"So she has."

"You would not say that if you knew her," said Dorothy.

"You're a very enthusiastic advocate, young lady."

"I want you to see her," continued Dorothy, "and you will forgive her and him at once."

"You appear to know all about it."

"I know nothing but that she is in great misery. There is nothing about her for you to be ashamed of, Lord Chesterton. She is beautiful enough to grace a palace."

"She was a governess!" interrupted the old man, with half a sneer.

"What of that? Whatever she was, she is a lady in every sense of the word."

"Pooh!"

"Judge for yourself," said Dorothy, showing him a photograph which before coming out she had calmly abstracted from the drawing-room. Lord Chesterton took it from her hand, and studied it gravely.

"She is very lovely," he said at last.

"She is very unhappy! Lord Chesterton, make them both happy with your forgiveness. You must miss your son very much!"

"I do."

Dorothy felt that she had touched the right chord at last.

"Then take him back! What has he done that is so unforgivable? Married a good and beautiful woman—that is all his crime."

"I do miss him. But I am a proud man, young lady."

"Pride can be carried too far, Lord Chesterton."

"Where are they?"

Dorothy gave the address.

"Tell him to come and see me."

"No, you should come and see her. You will forgive him then."

"You plead very earnestly."

"My lord, I love her, and have done this to make her happy." Dorothy paused with clasped hands. The old man looked long and steadily at her eager, flushed face. Then he spoke.

"You are a very pretty and charming girl yourself," he said, "and will make a man very happy some day."

Dorothy's cheeks went rosy at this. She thought of a certain someone to whom a little word from her would mean bliss indeed. But that was another story.

"Supposing I do as you wish, what reward will you get?"

"None," said Dorothy. "You will come?"

"This afternoon, at four."

"I don't know how to thank you!" cried Dorothy, tremblingly, yet exultant that her mission had succeeded. The old man stooped over her hand and kissed it with old-fashioned courtesy.

* * * * *

"Whatever are you so excited about, Dorothy? What have you done, and what is going to happen?"

"Wait and see, Bab, wait and see," was all Dorothy said. On her return from De Vere Square she had almost frightened Eunice by throwing her arms round her with unwonted vehemence. Barbara was alternately annoyed and perplexed at her excitement.

Punctually at four o'clock Lord Chesterton arrived. Dorothy, who had been on the look-out, admitted him herself, and preceded him to the drawing-room. Throwing open the door with a beating heart, she announced him. Then running downstairs she startled Barbara by putting her head on her shoulder and breaking into a flood of tears.

"Father!" exclaimed Walter Chesterton.

Eunice, pale and frightened, rose unsteadily from the chair she sat in.

"My son!" said the old man, advancing into the room, "and—my daughter!"

The next moment Eunice was crying in his arms.

"Hush!" he said. "I have been wrong. Forgive me."

"But how did you come, and——" began his son, gripping the old man's hand in his own.

"You had better ask Miss Dorothy!" he said.

"Dorothy!" exclaimed the two in a breath. Then Eunice, with the quicker wit of a woman, guessed it all, and, slipping from her father-in-law's arms, fled downstairs to find Dorothy.

Clifton Bingham.

Digitized by Google

Unsolved Love Problems.

A Prize of One Guinea is offered to the reader who sends in the most Satisfactory Solution to the Problem. Replies should not exceed one hundred words. See "Your Editor Chats."

VI.—THE HONOUR OF GERALD DACRE.

UNDER the yellowing chestnuts and ruddy beeches a slight, fair-haired girl, looking scarcely more than a child, lay sobbing in a man's arms.

"I cannot, I dare not, meet you again, Gerald. Father has forbidden it, and next week I am to go to Aunt Helen's to stay for two months."

A spasm of pain contracted the brow of the man who held her so tenderly in his arms: he knew she was being sent away to separate her from him.

"God knows how hard it is for me to say it," he replied, "but your father is quite right. I am not worthy of love—you must try to forget me."

"Oh," she cried, lifting her head and looking at him with childish, trusting blue eyes, "I shall always love you, whatever happens! Father said dreadful things about you yesterday; but I shall not believe them. I can and ought to obey him; but I shall always love you, and know you for an upright and honourable——"

"Hush!" said Gerald, putting his hand lightly on her lips. "You will hear worse things said of me soon. Men will mock at the idea of Gerald Dacre being 'honourable.'"

"Oh, Gerald!" she cried, her eyes opening wide with horror. "What have you done?"

"Sit down, Eva, and I will tell you all about it."

The girl obediently sat down on a fallen tree, raising her eyes to the face of the tall man before her.

He was dark and very handsome; but there were lines on his face that should not have been there at his age, and a haggard look in his eyes that told of sleepless nights, and a care that would not be gainsaid.

"I suppose your father told you I had been gambling"—she nodded—"and that, knowing how my father and grandfather had got rid of all their property by that means, he did not intend to give you into the hands of an hereditary gambler?"

She cast down her eyes, and a blush of shame that such things should be said of her chosen lover flooded her delicate skin. He saw that she had heard strongly-expressed opinions about him, and he continued in a hard tone:

"Well, all that is true. I have been in the company of notorious gamblers, and I have played, and—I have lost—a large sum."

"Oh, Gerald!" she cried, starting up, and throwing her arms round his neck, "But you do love me—don't you?"

Poor child! Overwhelmed with shame and horror at this confession of—to her mind—deadly sin, she clung desperately to her sheet-anchor of faith in this man's truth.

"Love you?" he cried passionately—"more than my life—more than anything on earth. Oh, Eva, if you knew what your pure, trusting love has saved me from—what utter despair and sin! Listen. I must excuse myself to you, though I had intended honestly to put it all in its worst before you that I might alienate your heart from me. It would be best for you, dear, but," he added with a groan, "I can't go through with it."

Eva put up a gentle hand, and caressed his face. She knew not what to say—all this was beyond her ken and her experience of life.

Brought up with the greatest love and care in a country rectory, she was, at the age of eighteen, singularly childlike and simple. Life had hitherto presented no problems; all had been open and uneventful till the wondrous thing happened and she became engaged to Gerald Dacre—clever and of good family, but earning only a precarious livelihood as a journalist.

"Before God," he said solemnly, taking her hands in his, "I am no gambler! Cards and speculation have no fascination for me. The evil has arisen in that I thought I could touch pitch and not be defiled. Sir Noel Paton, though a gambler of not a good reputation, is the owner of one of the great morning papers, and I tried to make myself agreeable to him in the hope of getting an appointment on the staff, which would have brought our marriage to the verge of possibility. Well, he asked me to play a game of bridge, and I dared not refuse. We sat down laughing, and I rose up ruined. I had no idea how much I was losing with the frequent "doubling," and now I owe him £1,000—and this is all my wealth"—and he thrust his hand into his pocket, and brought out a handful of silver with a rare gleam of gold.

"What will you do?" cried Eva, looking at him with terror-struck gaze at the idea of such an enormous sum, as it seemed to her.

"Do?" he cried bitterly, "Nothing! What can I do? I have not the money nor any possible means of raising it. When the date comes at which it is payable I shall be declared a defaulter and a man without honour."

"Oh, Gerald," she murmured—"just for a game of cards? I know gambling is wicked; but if you can't pay you can't help it. It is not as if you had bought something and refused to pay for it. You could explain, and ask him to let you off."

In spite of his trouble Gerald could not help smiling at her ignorance of the unwritten law of men's honour, but answered shortly:

"No, my dear girl, that is impossible. Even your father's sermons must have taught you who plays must pay."

"But what will you do?"

"I don't know—go away, I suppose, where I am not known and live as best I can. But for you and your sweet love I believe I should have killed myself."

Digitized by Google

Eva shrank from the wild words.

"But that would have been wicked."

She was more than a little shocked at all these wicked things which seemed suddenly to have come so near to her, and, though she loved him dearly, she was shaken and spent with crying, and felt she could bear no more, so she held out to him the little turquoise ring he had given her, and said with a sob:

"Then it is really good-bye? Good-bye, my dear love. I shall never forget you. May God bless you and lead you to happiness wherever you go."

Gerald strained her to his heart, with a passion she did not understand, and partly feared, and said with emotion:

"All I have ever known of God, or of happiness, has come through you. Good-bye, my little love! This ring, with stones not half so blue as your eyes, shall be my talisman in the dark life before me."

Then he released her, and stood watching her slight figure as she passed slowly down the narrow woodland path, the ruddy brown beech trees dropping their leaves about her. At the bend she turned and waved a last farewell, and, with her handkerchief to her eyes, went out of sight—and out of his life, he thought.

Naturally, all the village knew more or less what had happened; and what they did not know they imagined, so that the tale, with varied embellishments, was soon going round the parish.

Marion Transome's smart London maid was brushing her hair and regaling her with this, the latest scandal, only a few days after Gerald and Eva had bade farewell in the wood.

Marion was a stylish-looking girl, though not quite of the best style. Her father, who "had made money in the City" (be it whispered low, in a tailor's shop), had built for himself a palatial barrack on the hill overlooking the little village in the valley below, and called it "Transome Hall." She was his only child, and had had a very expensive education, and when not over-dressed might have been taken for the real thing. She was not remarkably handsome, but many people admired her; and it goes without saying that she had received many offers, though she had not thought fit to accept any one of them.

"And so poor little Miss Burton has gone to London to be out of the way of that good-for-nothing Mr. Dacre—— "

"Sarah," cried Marion sharply, "you forget yourself! Pray don't presume to speak in such a manner of visitors to this house."

Sarah bit her lip, and was silent—her mistress was not wont to be so particular.

Truth to tell, Marion was suffering keenly for the sake of Gerald Dacre. Surrounded as she always was by flatterers and fortune-hunters, she had been much attracted by this poor, handsome young man, who paid her no compliments, and even appeared not to see when she made it plain that attentions from him would be very acceptable. She had not resented his becoming engaged to the pretty but equally penniless daughter of the rector; in an odd sort of way she respected him for choosing love and good birth to money; but she suffered all the same, and now especially the thought that he was in trouble gave her pain.

Having dismissed her maid early, she sat by the window, looking down into the valley, and pondered long and deeply.

"They say he has disgraced himself in some way, and the old rector has forbidden him the house and broken off the engagement; and she, the good, obedient child obeys. I would not. Had I been in her place and he in trouble no one should have parted us. Ah—if it had been I—— "

The next day she sent down a little note to Gerald:—

"DEAR MR. DACRE,—Father wants to ask your opinion about a picture he has bought. Will you come up to-morrow afternoon and see it?—Yours sincerely, M. TRANSOME."

Mr. Transome had more than once put money in Gerald's pockets in one way or another; and, disinclined as Gerald felt to see anyone, he did not like to refuse

"I shall have few enough people to speak to next month when all is known," he said to himself somewhat morbidly; "I need not anticipate my troubles."

So he went; and Marion received him in her most-becoming and quietest frock. "Father will be in directly; sit down and talk," she said in the frank, friendly manner that was her greatest charm.

It then struck Gerald that the picture was an excuse, for an autumn afternoon is not the time to wait about before seeing a picture. The idea that he had been brought there to be made to talk rendered him morose, and the conversation languished.

On her side Marion was too deeply shocked by the havoc trouble had wrought in his appearance to be able to keep away from the subject. It was a very real and deep sympathy that made her speak, though perhaps a more delicately-sensitive mind would have felt instinctively that it would be kindest so appear ignorant of anything out of the common.

"Mr. Dacre," she said impulsively, "I must speak. You are in trouble—can I help you?"

Gerald winced, but he said to himself, "After all it is pure kindness of heart, and not vulgar curiosity"—so he replied:

"I am afraid no one can help me, Miss Transome. I have lost money that I cannot pay, and next month I shall be known as a man who does not pay his debts of honour."

After all, there was a certain relief in stating the ugly fact in the crudest manner—and she was a woman of the world, not an innocent child.

Pity stirred within Marion, and her eyes filled with tears as she realised dimly what this descendant of an honourable—if dissipated—race would suffer at being unable to meet his engagements.

"But your friends—can they not help you?"

"My friends!" he cried. "They are not wealthy. The whole of my possessions, if sold, would not bring in a ten-pound note, and my friends are in the same condition. It would be an impossibility for them to raise £100 between them—how then £1,000?"

A sudden courage came to her.

"And why did you not ask me?"

A dark flush rose in Gerald's face.

"I am not yet sunk so low as to beg from a woman," he said with concentrated scorn.

"Oh, Mr. Dacre," she cried eagerly, "I was not thinking what I said. I was only sensible of how glad I should be if I were allowed to help as one of your friends might have done. The money is there, if you would take it, till you could pay it back."

"That might be years," said he. "No, Miss Transome, these things are not done by a man with a shred of self-respect."

"You would have taken it from Miss Burton had she had it," she burst out in a wrath born of the pain she felt and her inability to help the man she loved in his trouble.

"That would have been a very different matter," he said coldly.

She felt she had said more than was allowable, and, cut to the heart at his displeasure, and deeply humiliated by the knowledge of what she wished him to say, she sank sobbing into a chair.

Gerald was at a loss to know what to do; but he slowly crossed the room, and stood by her side.

"Pardon me for my rudeness, Miss Transome—I am not quite myself at present—I should have thanked you for your most kind and generous offer."

She raised her tear-stained face, and said:

"I want no thanks."

What Gerald saw in her eyes flashed a sudden thought into his mind.

After all, why not?

As her promised husband, he could take the money and save his honour before men, Then, he promised himself, he would slave night and day till he had paid it back and regained his own self-respect. It was only the time he wanted.

And Eva was lost to him in any case!

Should he or should he not?

L. Hughes.

Digitized by Google

She Had Had Experience of Him.

HE: "My motto is, 'Always think before you speak.'" She: "You must find it very hard to carry on an animated conversation."

A Pressing Invitation.

HE: "You have a very bad cold." She: "Yes; and I'm glad of it." He: "Why, pray?" She: "Because I'm too hoarse to scream if you should attempt to kiss me."

A Momentous Decision.

MAUDIE: "Oh, Gertie, what a lovely engagement-ring! How I envy you!" Gertie: "You needn't, dear. When it comes to the point, I've either got to marry him or give it back."

A Possible Method.

MISS WITHERS: "I presume Mr. Flipp made his usual weekly call on you last night?" Miss Callow: "Yes; and I must say that he made a fool of himself." Miss Withers: "Proposed to you, eh?"

What She Believed.

BOREM (11.57 p.m.): "When I was a child my nurse made me afraid of the dark." Miss Cutting: "Oh, that accounts for it." Borem: "Accounts for what?" Miss Cutting: "You are waiting for daylight so you can go home."

Fanny was Old for Her Years.

UNCLE: "Well, Fanny, aren't you going to kiss your uncle?" Fanny (aged seven): "No, indeed." Uncle: "And why not, little darling?" Fanny: "Because there's your wife looking on, and I don't want to make any trouble in the family."

She Wasn't to be Caught.

MR. LAWHEAD: "Why do you treat me so coldly? Why didn't you answer the note I wrote you last Thursday?" Miss Brushley: "Sir, I don't wish to have anything more to say to you. You began your note by saying you 'thought you would drop me a line.' I want you to understand that I'm not a fish."

Food for Thought.

"YOU say you want to marry my daughter. Have you spoken to her?" "Yes, sir," replied the young man, "and have gained her consent." "Well, if she has said 'Yes,' that settles it. Anything I might say or do wouldn't have the slightest influence." Then the young man went home and wondered if he were not too young to marry such a girl.

Convincing Signs.

CLARA: "I don't know what to make of your brother. For three months after we met, he did nothing but write poetry to me." Dora: "Has he stopped that?" "Yes. Since then he has made me some nice presents, but he has even stopped that." "H'm! Let—me—see. I have it. The household pages of our newspapers have been clipped terribly of late. No doubt he is making a collection of cooking recipes. He's in earnest."

Rather Cutting.

HE: "Won't your fiancé be jealous at this interview?" She: "Not when he sees whom I'm with."

Vindictive.

MAY: "She said she would never forgive him." Ethel: "But she afterwards married him." May: "That merely shows that she meant what she said."

He Thought Her Rather Plain.

MRS. PASSAY: "Everybody says my daughter got her beauty from me. What do you say to that?" Mr. Witts: "Well, I think it was very unkind of her to take it from you."

A Lover's Quarrel.

"HALLO, Fitzy! where did you get that black eye?" "Oh, it was only a lover's quarrel!" "Lover's quarrel! Why, your girl didn't give you that, did she?" "No, it was her other lover."

Oh! What a Story!

HER father (coming suddenly into the room): "Eh, what is this?" Her lover: "I was telling Miss Budd a story." Her father: "With your arm round her waist?" Her lover: "Er—yes, sir. It was a love story."

Accounted for the Number.

HE: "Miss Flipp says she had nearly one hundred proposals at the seaside this summer." She: "That is true." He: "She must be very popular." She: "Oh, I don't know. You see, Mr. Softly proposed to her every day for three months."

A Hint that Succeeded.

SHE was inclined to be sentimental. He was nothing if not practical. "Would that you could tell me how to mend a broken heart," she said. "I have known of cases where it has been done by splicing," he replied. That was the remedy tried in this case.

A Successful Appeal.

JUDGE: "Was that young Mr. Smith I saw leaving the house as I entered?" Daughter: "Yes, papa." Judge: "And didn't I prohibit him coming here any more?" Daughter: "Yes, papa, but he appealed to a higher court, and mamma has removed the injunction."

She Knew the Pattern.

LANDLADY: "I'll have to request you to pay in advance, Mr. Shortleigh." Shortleigh: "Why, isn't my trunk good for a week's lodging?" Landlady: "No; it looks like one of those emotional trunks." Shortleigh: "Emotional?" Landlady: "Yes; one that is easily moved."

A Sensible Rejoinder.

"Don't you think," asked the young man with the long nose, "that Miss Quickstep dresses as much like a man as possible in order to get herself talked about?" "On the supposition that she does," replied the other young man, with a frosty glitter in his eye, "I suggest that we defeat her purpose by not talking about her. Understand?"

It Couldn't be True.

"THERE is some money, my love," said the husband, "I don't want any," replied the wife. "Come now, darling, take this £5 note and go out shopping." "Thank you, dearest, but I really don't care to. I would rather stay at home and see to the housework." Then the husband awoke and found, as the reader has already suspected, that he had been dreaming.

A Thrilling Scene.

SHE had marked the huskiness in his voice for the past ten minutes, and the nervous manner in which he fidgeted in his chair spoke volumes to her. She knew what was coming, and hoped it would. "Clara," he said finally, and his throat seemed dry and parched, "would you—that is, could you—do you think that you——" "Go on, George," she murmured encouragingly, "I am listening." "Would you—er—do you think you could—er—get me a drink of water, Clara? I am as dry as a fish."

Digitized by Google

THE AMATEUR UMBRELLA MENDER.

The Tale of a Curious Mistake.

GILBERT REYNOLDS glanced at his reflection in the office mirror and laughed. He was a tall young fellow, with bushy brown hair, a Roman nose, and a very determined-looking mouth and chin. Just now he had buttoned himself up in an old ulster, and pulled a soft felt hat down over his eyes, and with his brother-in-law's umbrella and his sister Amy's parasol under one arm, and his own umbrella under the other, he cut very much the same figure as the man who went the rounds of the City crying "Umbrellas to mend!"

It was just six o'clock and beginning to grow dark, when Gilbert left the office. Some grey clouds were scurrying across the autumn sky, and a few chilly raindrops splashed on the pavement.

Gilbert started briskly in the direction of home, busy with his own thoughts, until his attention was attracted by a sudden tap on one of the windows of an old-fashioned dwelling-house which he passed every day.

Looking up he saw to his astonishment a very pretty girl beckoning to him. Her hair was fair, and curled about her forehead and neck in loose ringlets; and a roguish-looking dimple kept guard at the corner of her smiling mouth.

Now Gilbert was too gallant a young fellow to pass on unheeding, while a pretty girl like that beckoned to him. He paused, smiled, and would have raised his hat had he not been, as I have already told you, burdened with umbrellas.

The young girl threw up the window and called to him in a sweet, clear voice:

"Wait a minute, please! I have an umbrella for you!"

And immediately she vanished.

Gilbert stood for an instant quite dumbfounded, and then, as the ludicrousness of the affair rushed over him, he burst into a little laugh of amusement, calming himself, however, when the front door opened.

She had mistaken him for the umbrella man.

Gilbert was young, and of course admired a pretty girl; so he at once decided to accept the situation, as it promised further opportunity of seeing this charming creature.

So, when she appeared with a black silk umbrella in her hands, he turned to her with grave attention.

"The handle is broken, you see," she said, "and the spring," partially opening the umbrella and shaking out the dark folds with her fair little hands. "I have been watching for you all day," she added naïvely; and Gilbert's heart leapt into his throat.

How nice it must be to have that dear little thing watching for a fellow every day!

The young lady turned a little anxious look upon him from a pair of wide, blue eyes.

"Do you suppose it can be mended?" she asked, confidingly.

"Oh, yes, indeed!" was Gilbert's reckless answer, although he knew no more about it than she did.

"And when can I have it?"

"To-morrow," said Gilbert, promptly, congratulating himself on the prospect.

"So soon? Very well."

She nodded her bright little head at him and ran up the steps while Gilbert passed on with an additional umbrella in his hand and visions of golden curls, blue eyes, and rosy lips mingling in delightful confusion in his brain.

That evening he sat down to supper with a dreamy and abstracted air. His sister tried to rally him.

"Gil," she said, "your future wife is in town."

"Eh—what?" said Gilbert.

"The girl whom I have decided upon for my sister-in-law," pursued Amy, laughingly. "She was in the same class as I at school. The family have just moved to town, and next week you must call with me."

"Well, I'll see about it," said Gilbert dreamily, as he put a teaspoonful of salt into his second cup of tea.

Amy looked at him with wide-eyed amazement.

"What has come over the boy?" she ejaculated. "Gil, dear," leaning across the table, "you have not been gambling or robbing the bank, have you?"

Gilbert shook his head as a reply.

The next morning on his way to the City, he rang the bell of the house which contained his unknown beauty.

The young lady opened the door.

"I shall not be able to return your umbrella to-day," he explained, glibly. "It will take longer to repair than I expected. To-morrow, without fail, I will bring it."

(Gilbert had left the umbrella with an old man, whose sole employment consisted in mending chairs, umbrellas, and musical instruments.)

"Oh, very well," said the little lady, as she cast a smiling look at the clear sky, and another at the young man, who, in his neat business suit, presented a different aspect from the rather rough-looking figure of the previous evening. "There is no particular hurry about it, so long as the weather is fine."

And then, as he went striding away, she looked after him.

"What a very respectable-looking person he is for one in his position," she murmured.

The next day Gilbert was prompt with the umbrella, and the young lady as prompt with her purse. She looked her property over with a little nod of satisfaction.

"That looks very well," she said. "And now, how much am I to pay you?"

Gilbert hesitated, faltered, and flushed, and finally stammered, like the man whom Dickens has made famous:

"It's of no consequence."

But the amused surprise in the girl's face brought him to his senses, and he coolly named the price which he had that morning paid to the old man. It is safe to say that the silver coin which passed from the girl's hand into his was put sacredly away; for by this time Gilbert was very far gone. The bright eyes and sweet voice had quite bewitched him.

On the following week Amy insisted upon Gilbert calling with her on the young lady whom she declared he should marry.

"She is the dearest girl in the world," said Amy enthusiastically, "and the very prettiest. You will be sure to like her."

"Oh, yes, I know," drawled Gilbert; "a tall, dashing girl, with flashing black eyes, and an awful temper. Of course, I must go with you, sis; but don't build any matrimonial air-castles, for my heart is no longer in my own keeping."

And he straightened his tie with a sentimental sigh, and took his silk hat in one neatly-gloved hand.

Amy looked at him sharply as they started off together. Was her pet brother really in love with some strange girl?

"What a goose you are, Gil!" she said, half provoked. "Claire doesn't answer to your description at all—wait until you see her."

Great was Gilbert's surprise when his sister led him up the steps of the identical house which contained his unknown divinity; and great was the unknown divinity's surprise when her old friend, Mrs. Ross, introduced as her brother the tall young man who had taken her umbrella to mend!

Gil smiled into the wide blue eyes of Miss Claire Edmonds, and bowed low before her, while she, after one swift, bewildered glance, burst into a merry peal of laughter, in which she was joined by Gilbert.

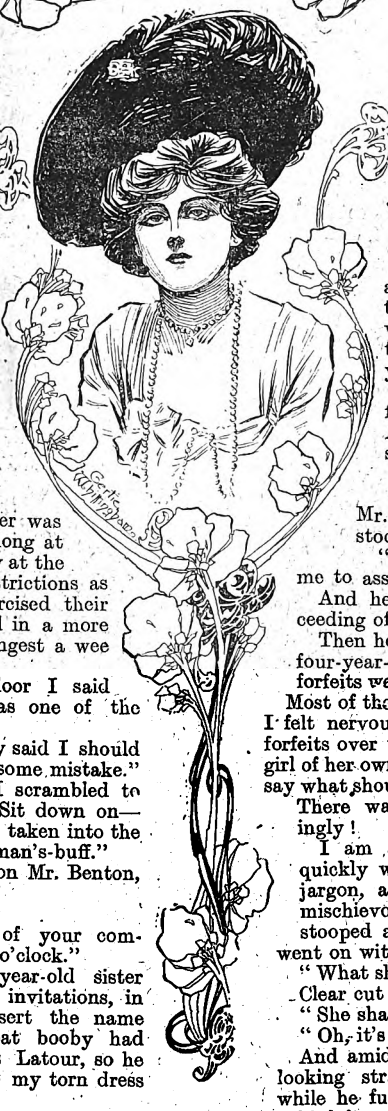
"Why, it's the umbrella man!" she exclaimed; and Amy looked on in blank amazement, wondering if her brother and her friend had taken leave of their senses.

Explanations followed. Of course my readers may imagine that Gilbert's first call was not his last one, and that Amy's matrimonial air-castles were built of substantial material; for Gilbert Reynolds and the pretty fair-haired girl are happiest when sharing one umbrella, and they are soon to be married.

Stanley Hammond.

Digitized by Google

BASHFUL, YET FEARLESS.



How a Shy Man Won a Bride.

If I had been caught in such a situation by anybody but John Benton I should have been terribly annoyed.

There I was sitting on the floor of the nursery, with hair tumbled, my face red, and a great rent across the front of my skirt, where it had been caught by a nail a few minutes before during a fierce blind-man's-buff scrimmage.

My little sister Alice was having a Christmas party, and of course I had to assist in entertaining the guests. There were just twelve, seven boys and five girls. Supper was over—everybody was too excited to sit long at the table—and we all retired to the nursery at the top of the house, where there were no restrictions as to noise, and where the seven boys exercised their shouting franchise to the utmost, assisted in a more subdued way by the five girls, the youngest a wee little girl of four years.

When John Benton tapped at the door I said "Come in" carelessly, supposing it was one of the servants.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Latour. They said I should find you here. But perhaps I have made some mistake."

"Not at all, Mr. Benton," said I, as I scrambled to my feet. "We are pleased to see you. Sit down on—on the piano stool. The chairs have been taken into the other room. We have been playing blind-man's-buff."

"I—I received this invitation," went on Mr. Benton, taking an envelope from his pocket.

The gilt-edged card within read:

"Miss Latour requests the pleasure of your company on Tuesday, December 29th, at five o'clock."

I looked reproachfully at my seven-year-old sister Alice. She had sent one of her printed invitations, in which the printer had neglected to insert the name "Alice," to John Benton, and the great booby had taken it for granted, that I was the Miss Latour, so he had come in full dress—a nice contrast to my torn dress and dishevelled hair.

"Well, I am glad you have come, though I suppose this is not exactly the kind of gathering you expected to find, is it?"

I did not care much what I said to John Benton. Ever since I had met him at the Warrens' ball, three months ago, my brothers all declared that he was in love with me, but was too bashful to tell me so. I met him often, and though I am sure I am not an awe-inspiring personage, I could not help seeing that he was never at ease in my presence.

Not that he was backward where men were concerned. My brother Will took me to the Stock Exchange one morning, and I saw John Benton, with his hat on the back of his head, grasping a brass railing with one hand and shaking the other, holding some papers in the face of a savage-looking man, and shouting at him at the top of his voice in the most defiant manner. Will said the savage-looking man was a bear, and that Mr. Benton was a bull. Then Mr. Benton caught sight of me, and came and stuttered and stayed with me for ten minutes.

But Mr. Benton was not thinking about the market as he walked over to the piano-stool in his dress coat and white necktie, and sat there with one of the most sheepish smiles I ever saw on a young man's face.

"Now, Lou, you must sit down on the floor again so that we can play forfeits. And you, too, Mr. Benton. Come on," said Alice.

John Benton blushed and looked at me.

"We shall have to obey, I am afraid, Mr. Benton. But you can sit on the piano stool if you prefer it," I said.

"Oh, but I don't, Miss Latour! Allow me to assist you to sit down."

And he actually tried to make a courtly proceeding of depositing me on the floor.

Then he sat down himself, with little Stella, the four-year-old mite, between us, and the game of forfeits went on.

Most of the penalties were in the shape of kisses, and I felt nervous until my turn came. Alice held the forfeits over the head of a particular friend of hers, a girl of her own age, and it was the duty of the latter to say what should be done with the owner of the article.

There was my handkerchief held up threateningly!

I am ashamed to say that my heart beat quickly when Alice repeated the familiar nursery jargon, and it fairly jumped when she, with a mischievous glance at Mr. Benton and myself, stooped and whispered to her friend. Then she went on with the question:

"What shall be done with the owner?"

Clear cut and distinct came the answer:

"She shall kiss Mr. Benton."

"Oh, it's Lou—it's Lou!" shouted Alice.

And amid the tempest of laughter, Mr. Benton sat looking straight before him with a crimson face, while he fumbled at his white necktie until the bow was under his left ear.

There was a silence, as everybody except Mr. Benton looked at me to see the operation performed, when a baby voice at my side said:

"I'll tiss him for you, Lou."

So Stella climbed up to Mr. Benton's neck, with one of her hands on his white shirt front, and, as she said herself—

"I tissed him right on the mouf, and it tittled my nose!"

I did not want to play at forfeits any longer—it was too dangerous; so I proposed that we should all sing.

"Ess, I tan sing. I know lots of songs," said Stella.

She did not feel at all abashed over the fact that she had left a dark, sticky impression of her fingers on Mr. Benton's starched shirt front, and as for him he seemed to feel flattered at her evident preference for him.

I sat down at the piano and played accompaniments for school songs, while the children stood around me and bawled the words into my ears with the excruciating, flat intonation peculiar to the untrained voice.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Benton was sitting near the window, with little Stella on his knee, apparently enjoying the noise, and with his eyes fixed on me in a blank stare of admiration that I could not help seeing whenever my face was half turned in his direction.

"Now let me sing a song all by myself," said Stella.

Mr. Benton looked inquiringly at me, and I answered:

"Yes, Stella, let us hear you sing one all by yourself."

So she commenced deliberately:

"Little bir-die, on—the—tree! (a long breath) on—the—tree! (another long breath) on—the—tree!"

Then she stopped, and with a haughty disregard of the desires or opinions of her audience that would have been worthy of a petted prima donna, turned carelessly round on Mr. Benton's knee and looked out of the window, while the company awaited her pleasure.

"Oh, loot—loot at the big birdie on the tree out of the window," she said, suddenly pointing downward towards where I knew a tall tree grew close to the house.

Mr. Benton was apparently startled by this evidence of Stella's keen vision, for I saw him jump as his eyes followed the direction of her finger. He controlled himself at once, however, as he replied quickly:

"I think that is the shadow of a cloud in the moonlight, and not a birdie, Stella."

"No, no, I saw a birdie on the tree," she persisted.

He put her down and she ran over to me. As I took her on my lap I heard the door close, and saw that John Benton had disappeared.

"That is rather unceremonious. I wonder whether he is coming back? Well, I don't care whether he is or not," I thought, as I made up my mind that the festivities could proceed without him.

I sat Stella on the end of the piano and played a lively polka for the children, with Stella's assistance, she drumming on two or three of the keys in the bass at intervals, with a very weird, if not harmonious, effect.

"I want some more sugar-candy," announced Stella imperiously.

"I shall have to go downstairs for it, Stella. It is all in the dining-room," I said.

"Well, do down. I'll be dood."

Of course I had to go. I left Stella in Alice's charge, and ran swiftly down the stairs. The nursery was on the third floor. I do not know what induced me to open the door of my parents' bedroom as I passed it. I did so, however. It was quite dark save for one narrow bar of moonlight forcing its way through the branches of the poplar outside the window.

I glanced carelessly into the room, with my hand on the handle of the door, and was about to continue my journey to the dining-room when I felt a current of air from an open window, and saw something white gleaming in the moonlight for an instant, and then disappear.

"What is that? It looked like a hand," I thought, as an indescribable feeling of terror passed over me and left me shivering.

There was not a sound to be heard in the room save the rustling of the curtains as the light wintry breeze blew them from the window, but I was certain someone was there.

What was that?

Surely a man climbing in through the window! Yes, I was not mistaken. My eyes had become accustomed to the darkness by this time, and I could plainly see the outline of his figure defined against the window.

In that terrible instant all I had ever heard or read about burglars and their desperate actions when brought to bay passed through my mind. I remembered half a dozen stories wherein a young girl had successfully outwitted expert midnight thieves, and captured them alone and unaided.

The man, with his round head covered by some kind of closely-fitting cap, was cautiously creeping through the window, and I saw the tree shake, as if just relieved of a burden. He had evidently climbed the tree to reach the room, and I remembered hearing my brother Will say only the day before that it was a favourite plan of thieves in robbing a house to get up to the second storey by means of a porch or tree, while the family were gathered in the lower rooms in the early evening.

I could not move! There was no light in the passage outside the room, and I could not be seen by the intruder, as I stood with my hand on the door-handle, watching him, and listening in a dreamy way to the noise of the children in the nursery overhead.

He was inside the room by this time, and I noticed that his footsteps were noiseless, as if he had no shoes on, as he moved across the bar of moonlight towards the bureau where my mother always keeps her jewellery. I saw a round patch of bright yellow fall on the keyhole of the top drawer, and then heard a metallic rattling. The thief was picking the lock.

If I could only scream or call Will!

The drawer opened; the man was fumbling at its contents, when—crash! The yellow patch of light disappeared and, with a fearful word, I saw the man fall, another man holding him! Then a pistol shot rang through the room, and echoed up and down the stairs, and the room was flooded in light. Somebody had switched on the light.

For a few seconds my eyes were so dazzled that I could not see anything. Then I saw two men rolling on the floor in a desperate struggle, while a pistol lay just out of their reach. The man underneath, with his closely-fitting plush cap, was scowling at me as he tried to release himself, and I thought I could see murder written on his thin lips and short, turned-up nose so plainly that I should have been in favour of hanging him on the spot.

But who was the other man, holding the thief with a grip of iron, as each tugged and writhed in the attempt to subdue the other? Surely that was the bow of a white necktie at the back of his neck! That was a dress coat with the tails spread out like the wings of an eagle, or I was much mistaken!

In the battle, just as Will and my father reached the room and rushed past me, the combatants rolled over, and a very red face, which, however, was anything but sheepish now, was turned toward me. The face of—John Benton!

Will had the thief by the arm in a minute, while John Benton lay panting on the floor. Then it was I saw a great red stain on the white shirt front. It was blood!

Somehow, I forgot all about the thief, Will, my father—everything, as I threw myself down by the side of John Benton and pressed my handkerchief over the red stain.

"John, John! What is it? Where are you hurt? Oh, father, he is killed!" I screamed. "What shall I do?"

I will never believe again that John Benton was ever bashful, for he just put one of his hands on the back of my head, pulled my face down to his, and whispered:

"Do just what you are doing now, and as you have commenced to call me John, do it all the rest of your life, and let me call you Lou."

There was a sudden disturbance! The thief had broken away from Will! The tree shook violently, and Will said, as he put his head out of the window:

"Well, let the rascal go. It will save a good deal of trouble. Ah, there is his pal, who was on guard. They are both running as if the whole detective force were at their heels." Then, turning to John: "How are you hurt, Mr. Benton? You don't look as if it was very serious."

"It is not serious," said John, sitting up. "That fellow cut his hand in some way while opening the bureau, and he rubbed the blood all over my shirt; that's all."

I bit my lip and gave John a look that should have frozen him. It did not have the proper effect, however, for he followed me upstairs to the nursery, where the racket of play had rendered the children oblivious to the disturbance below.

As he took Stella on his knee he said:

"You must sing 'Birdie on a Tree' for us again, will you?"

"Ess, I will sing it for you, but you must tiss Lou for me now. She has diven me lots and lots of tandy."

"Yes, I think so," said John. "And I'll tiss her for you."

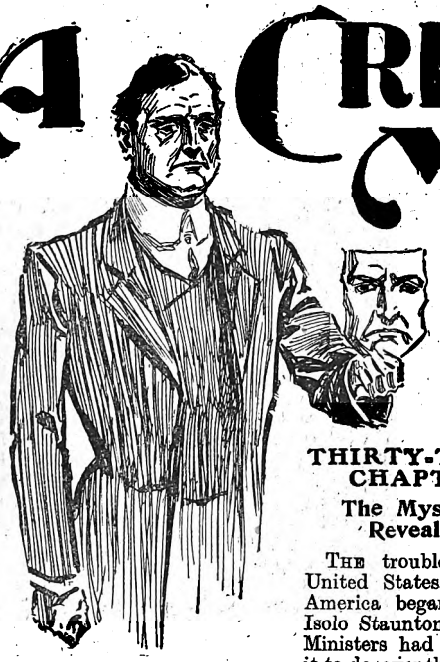
And he actually did it. Moreover, he says now that it is his privilege, and I suppose, under the circumstances, he is right.

John Mandeville.

Digitized by Google

POWERFUL ROMANCE.

A CRIMINAL MILLIONAIRE



By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "Olga Romanoff," "The Lake of Gold," etc., etc.

THIRTY-THIRD CHAPTER.

The Mystery Revealed.

THE trouble in the United States of South America began just as Isolo Staunton and his Ministers had intended it to do, over the making of the Inter-Oceanic Canal. Columbia had finally rejected the treaty for the concession of ten miles of territory on either side of the Panama Canal, and Panama had also started business as a Sovereign State.

The powerful group of financiers, who had been working to make the Nicaraguan Canal a fact, got to work at once, and had almost engineered the scheme through Congress when the Washington Government was faced with a Note from the Sovereign State of Nicaragua, informing all whom it might concern that the said Sovereign State had merged its identity into that of the United States of South America and that Nicaraguan territory was no longer available for the making of the canal.

"I guessed he'd do that, Mr. President," said Kesteven to his host in the bungalow at Oyster Bay nearly a month after the Isola vanished from the Bay of Funchal. "You'll find that Staunton is a hard man to deal with. He's got all the fire of the Spaniard and the grit of the Anglo-Saxon in him, and I can tell you for your own information, and it may be for the safety of the United States up here, that you haven't got to take the United States down there as any sort of a joke. If my late partner means fight, there'll be war such as you have never known!"

"I can't help it," replied the President. "The point is that, if we can't have both of these canals, we've got to have one of them. Don't you see what it means? We'll have the American continents cut in half in two places, and when that's done there's nothing to prevent these United States of South America, as they call themselves, allowing Russia, China, and Japan to send their warships right through from the Pacific to the Atlantic and—well, just knocking the Monroe doctrine kite high, and you know as well as I do that the United States can't stand that. The American people would fight the world first."

"And, my dear Mr. President," replied Kesteven, getting up from his chair, thrusting his hands into his trousers pockets, and walking with long, slow strides, up and down the room, "you'll have to forgive me if I tell you, speaking as a loyal and patriotic citizen of this Republic, that under those circumstances we shall get the most almighty hiding that a country ever asked for."

"That, Mr. Kesteven, is impossible," exclaimed the President, jumping to his feet. "There is no power that could conquer a country of this size, with seventy millions of Americans in it."

"They wouldn't want to, Mr. President," replied Kesteven; "you have just got to look at the map to see that. The other United States have ships enough now to clear the seas of this half of the world, shut up every port we have, and leave a couple of millions of very angry American soldiers marching up and down the country from Maine to Texas, looking for something to shoot at and not finding it. That's the trouble."

"Then I suppose I am to understand," replied the President, facing him, his hands also thrust into his pockets and his legs wide apart, "that from what you know—and you'll excuse me if I say that you seem to know a lot more than you've told me—you think that I should ask this late partner of yours, this President of the other United States, round to afternoon tea, and talk matters over."

"That's it, Mr. President," replied Kesteven. "I have told you everything I can tell you, except just this: You'll have to negotiate about those canals. You can't fight the question. You may take it from me that Isolo Staunton has resources behind him which are quite too big a proposition even for the United States to get a grip of. He has every power on earth behind him except two."

"And those?" asked the President.

"Great Britain and Japan. They were the only two he couldn't buy."

The President lit his cigar, blew a cloud of smoke towards the ceiling, and said:

"Good enough, Mr. Kesteven! I don't want to inquire into the private concerns of yourself and your friend Staunton, but as far as the Nicaragua proposition concerns this country, you can cable to him right away that if the United States of South America makes the Nicaraguan Canal, the United States of North America will make the Panama Canal, whether his new United States likes it or not. That territory is part of this continent, and I reckon that my good friend Diaz of Mexico will also have something to say on that subject. He's not having any back door of that sort left open. What he doesn't know about those greasers down yonder isn't worth forgetting, and I reckon he'll agree with me that if your friend wants war right away, he has only got to ask for it."

"I don't know, Mr. President, that he wants war, as such, any more than you want it. Still, he's about as ready for it as you are, and if he found that you weren't quite as ready—"

Kesteven heard a low buzzing sound under the President's desk.

"You'll excuse me a moment, won't you, Mr. Kesteven? There is something I have to attend to right now in the next room."

"Why, certainly. Please don't let me make any trouble about that, Mr. President. In fact, I don't think I have much more to say, anyhow."

Digitized by Google

When the President left the room Kesteven got up and began to walk up and down, pulling hard at his cigar and digging his heels into the carpet.

"It looks as if he'd got hold of some of it somehow. I wonder how much? I hope Staunton hasn't made that old mistake again, trusting a man too little—and if that man happens to be myself, he's just going the shortest possible way to find trouble. We've been partners long enough now for him not to play the——"

The door opened at this moment, and the President came back with a piece of grey paper in his hand. He closed the door behind him and locked it.

"What do you make of that?" he said.

Kesteven took the piece of paper and looked at it.

"Receiving Station, Cape Breton. October 13th. Message picked up in mid-ocean from Minnesota en route to Boston, says: 'Aerogram received from unknown source stating Wilfrid Ellerton, son of Sir Wilfrid Ellerton, well-known manufacturer and millionaire of Ellerton Manor, Yorkshire, assaulted and drugged on yacht Isola, belonging to Isolo Staunton, now alleged President of United States of South America. Transferred by unknown means to subterranean regions somewhere near Iceland. Location believed to to be near intersection of twentieth meridian of west longitude with 62½ north latitude in south-western line of Hekla's volcanic activity. Possible connection, Teneriffe. Submarine manufactory, money. Silver especially. Also gold. Large production notes of all countries having coinage on gold basis. Only possible communication, yacht Isola. Find if possible and catch. Great revelations may then be expected. WILFRID ELLERTON.'"

"Well, Mr. Kesteven," said the President, when his guest had read the message and was looking at him eye to eye with a note of interrogation in each of his own, "I should like your opinion on that."

"It is just about a month ago, Mr. President," said Kesteven, sitting down again and taking a long pull at his cigar, "that I had a conversation on board the Isola with my late friend and partner Staunton, during which conversation I resigned."

"Your late partner, Mr. Kesteven?" echoed the President; "then am I to understand that you had a share in the world-wide fraud which this mysterious message tells us about?"

"That's as it may be, Mr. President," said Kesteven, getting up from his seat and facing squarely. "But, anyhow, I am doing neither the United States nor any other power or community of people any harm just now, and I don't propose to, chiefly because my girl Cora is going to become a Grand Duchess within the next month. That is why I want to give you my word as a man and an American citizen that at present I have no hand in this game. Further, under certain conditions, I am ready to do all I can to convince Staunton that he must let up on this Nicaraguan business. How will that do for the present?"

"We may as well let it go at that, I guess. I think you were wrong, very wrong, but Bryan and the silver people call what you've been doing sound finance. I'm not making any friends with coiners and counterfeiters; but if the son of my old friend Kesteven tells me that he has cut this business and will help in what may be necessary to get this thing straightened out, we'll shake."

Kesteven at once held out his hand and said:

"My word of honour on that, sir. I'll help all I can but you must let me do it in the way that I think best."

"Very well," replied the President. "I shall trust you implicitly, but we haven't got to forget that other vessels, warships of half a dozen nations, maybe, have most likely picked up this message by now."

"That's so, sir," replied Kesteven, "and that, it appears at present, is just where my late partner is going to find trouble."

"Yes," said the President. "If you'll excuse me saying so, there's a heap of difference between a man who creates a new world-power on ordinary political lines and a common swindler who finances the racket on bogus coin and bad notes—a man, in short, who has cheated pretty well all the civilised nations of the world. That man, it seems to me, isn't going to find much recognition, except as an enemy of Society. When this gets known, as it probably is now, the United States of South America won't have a friend on earth."

"That's so, sir. I tried to tell him what kind of fool he was to do that with Ellerton, but he wouldn't have it. Now, I guess, he's going to have it somewhere about where the turkey got the axe."

THIRTY-FOURTH CHAPTER.

On the "Isola" Again.

"WELL, Ramiero, it seems that you were right after all When one begins empire-making, half measures are worse than useless. In this case it looks very much as though they were going to be something like ruinous.

"What luck!" continued Staunton. "Here I am, or at least a few hours ago I was, President of the United States of South America with a million men, the best fighters on earth, behind me, and a hundred and fifty warships ready to go anywhere, do anything if I gave the word. And what am I now? Why, in a few hours I shall be nothing better than a hunted criminal—for that's all the world will think me now. It's hard, Ramiero, most fearfully hard. Twenty-four hours ago I had realised the ideal of my life. I had made a whole continent full of warring little states what might have been the nucleus of one of the most splendid empires on earth, and here, just at the twelfth hour, the whole fabric of my life's work tumbles into ruins——"

"Yes, Señor," replied Don Ramiero, his voice shaking with real sorrow, "it would seem that that is so. And yet, if I may say so, at present this is not quite the question. The real question is, what is to be done? Are you absolutely convinced that you cannot trust these people?"

"Trust them?" cried Staunton with a savage laugh. "About as much as I ought to have trusted Billaud, and that was not at all. As long as I could supply them with unlimited money, they would work for me and never ask where it came from, but now that these infernal messages of Ellerton's have exposed me as a coiner and a counterfeiter from one end of civilisation to the other, all is different!"

"No, my friend, as far as I'm concerned, the game is up. I can't fight the fleets of the world with an unarmed yacht, whatever I could have done with the armies and fleets of the late South American Republic. No, that dream is over, and done with—an empire lost by a single mistake. I have a few millions left, which may not be much good to me now, but I would give all them to go back to that day when you advised me to kill Ellerton—and take your advice."

"Alas, Señor!" said Valdez, shaking his head slowly. "The mill will never grind with the water that is past, and it is no use talking about that. What is lost, is lost. The only question now is, how much can be saved? You have still an empire left, unapproachable and impregnable—and you have a vessel which nothing afloat can catch."

Digitized by Google

Staunton leant back in his chair with his eyes closed, taking long pulls at his cigar, and there was silence for a few minutes, during which he saw the most crucial events of his life pass in swift procession before the windows of his soul.

He saw himself, the convict labourer, working in the Chincha Islands. Then came the whale-boat, and that stroke of the axe which had proved so fateful.

Then the scene shifted from the Pacific to Lady Medcalf-Mears' drawing-room, and from there to the lanes about Cricklewood—then back again to where he was sitting now, and he heard Don Ramiero's voice suggesting that Wilfrid Ellerton should be abolished. If he had only taken that advice! He had taken the wrong turn and he had lost everything. That was all.

The swiftly flitting visions passed. He raised his eyelids and said slowly:

"Yes, I see what you mean, and, after all, the Underworld would be better for us than penal servitude, or a quick transition to another world—which I suppose it would come to in the end. We could also find out how Master Ellerton has managed to make these mysterious signals, and, yes, the possibilities are almost infinite. Yes, friend Ramiero, you are right."

"That, Señor," replied Valdez slowly, "is most true. If, as you say, life in the over-world becomes either impossible or too unpleasant to be supported, why should you not make, as you might do, a paradise of that other world which is wholly yours?"

"Is it?" replied Staunton, lifting his eyelids again. "Do you feel quite sure of that? I don't see myself how there is going to be any certainty on that score until we know how Ellerton has managed to get those messages of his into this world. Can't you see that it must have been either a miracle or a conspiracy, and—well—there you are. If it's a miracle we have another difficulty, and perhaps other dangers to face, but if it is a conspiracy may the Fates do so to me and more also if a man of them escapes the Lake."

"It would be nothing less than their deserts, Señor," replied Valdez, looking at his master's face, and picturing him standing on the ledge above the boiling sulphurous waters, watching each of the culprits brought up, and pronouncing sentence of death.

"Very well, then," said Staunton getting up again, "this time I will take your advice, my friend, and I think the sooner we get out the better. I hope you didn't forget about the coal and the oil fuel."

"No, Señor, the vessel is filled to the decks with them."

"Very well," said Staunton, ringing the telephone bell, "then we may as well start at once."

"Ask Captain Durtal to come aft at once," he said, "as soon as he can."

"He will be with you in a moment, sir," replied Darfield's voice over the wire.

Then a few minutes later there came a rap at the outside door, and Don Ramiero pulled the lever. The Captain came in as the doors opened.

"Captain," said Staunton, "it appears that we have got into a rather bad place, and so I have decided to get out of it as quickly as possible. How are you provided with fuel?"

"I have obeyed your instructions, sir," replied the captain. "The coal bunkers are full to the last pound, and so are the oil tanks."

"Then up-anchor as quietly as you can, put every light out, and get outside as soon as you can. As soon as you get under weigh, see that the guns are in order, and that there's plenty of ammunition at hand. I don't want to have trouble with anyone, but you may as well be prepared. Besides, we shall probably have to pick up some coal on the way home, but just now the principal thing is for you to get out of Rio Bay as quick as your luck will let you."

"But the fleet, sir!" exclaimed the captain, his eyes opening wide with amazement.

"It is quite possible, my dear Durtal," replied Staunton, biting off the end of a cigar, "that if we are not outside within half an hour, not only the fleet, but the forts as well, will open fire, and smash the Isola into scrap-iron. I will explain things more fully afterwards, for the present it will be enough if I tell you that Mr. Ellerton has somehow found the means of giving away part of the secret of the Underworld, and that the Bay of Rio, with all these warships and forts about us, is just as unhealthy a place as we can be in."

The Captain's eyes widened again for a moment, then he pulled himself up, saluted, and said:

"It is not for me to ask questions, sir; your orders shall be obeyed. In an hour the Isola shall be twenty miles away in the Atlantic."

"Very well," replied Staunton, and the sooner the better."

The Isola was lying in the lower part of the harbour of Rio de Janeiro, about half way between Point Calhabouco on the Rio side, and Fort Gravata on the Nitheroy side; in front of her was the fortified island of Villegayon. A couple of miles ahead was the Island of Lage, also fortified, which forms a triangle with Fort San Joao to the west, and Fort Santa Cruz to the east. Four battleships, ten cruisers, and fifteen destroyers were ranged in three long lines on the Rio side, with the exception of a couple of destroyers, which were prowling to and fro across the bay, and down towards the forts to the southward. Altogether, granting that Staunton's suspicions were correct, and that the news from the Underworld had changed his late friends and subjects into enemies, it was a particularly tight place to get out of.

"Well, friend Ramiero, I suppose we may as well go and see the fun, if there's going to be any," he said, throwing the doors open. "The probability is that some of them will begin to shoot when the lights go out, so I think I'd better go and take command."

"As for me, Señor," said Valdez, following him, "where you go I go, and if it is a case of sinking, my place should be by your side."

"And so it shall be, my father's friend—and mine," replied Staunton, laying his hand on his shoulder, with a rare gesture of emotion. "Come up on to the bridge with me—and—yes, why should not our guests come and see the fun as well? Our good friend Smith-de-Ronski might bring his fiddle up and play us an accompaniment to the music of the guns. Suppose you were to go below and present the invitation with my compliments."

"Ah, Señor," murmured Valdez, laying his hand on Staunton's arm with an inimitably Spanish gesture, "that is how I love to see you best. Even as your father was always greatest in the darkest hour and the deadliest danger. But, if I may advise, do not entertain our guests until we are safe outside. The men would do anything to have us caught, and the women, as we know, have nerves of steel, and, remember, that a single shout, even the striking of a match, might ruin everything. No, no, let them stop in their cabins until we are once more free on the Atlantic. Think only what a single shell might do."

Digitized by Google

"It might not be a very bad way out of the trouble after all," laughed Staunton as they went forward; "but, still, I think you are right, and I'm not going to risk ignoring your advice again."

When they reached the bridge they found Captain Durtal in charge, with Darfield forward in the bows, and the second officer aft. It was now almost midnight. The sky was covered with a dense curtain of clouds which had been gathering during the afternoon and evening, and already a few drops of rain were splashing heavily on the decks.

"Excellent! Could not have been better! The best thing that could happen to us would be a regular deluge. I don't care so much for their guns as long as they can't use their searchlights. Are you ready to let go?"

"Everything is ready, sir," replied the captain. "The men are at the guns in case it is necessary to shoot back, we have a full head of steam on, and I can give you thirty knots within ten minutes, and thirty-five within fifteen."

"Very good," said Staunton, going to the engine telegraph and taking hold of the handle. "Slip your cables, and then out lights. Ah, here comes the rain; now catch us who can!"

As he spoke the bottom seemed to fall out of the firmament. A blast of wind burst out of the north-east and came howling across the bay, driving the rain in hissing sheets before them. Instantly the lights of the city, and the electric sparks which showed where the warships lay, were blotted out, and at the same moment those of the Isola disappeared, and the cable was slipped.

"Come and take the wheel, Durtal," commanded Staunton shortly; "keep her due south, if we don't get out in this squall we never will, but as long as they can't see us they daren't shoot for fear of hitting each other or the town."

Captain Durtal touched his dripping cap and went into the wheel-house. Staunton swung the telegraph-handle over at full speed. The bell tinkled its answer, a broad sheet of foam sprang out from under the Isola's stern, only to be beaten down the next instant by the wind-driven floods of rain. The beautiful fabric of the yacht shuddered for a moment, and then, as the thrill of the engine woke her into life, she leapt away into the darkness and the storm, heading due south for the entrance to the bay.

The rapidly blurring lines of light on either hand and behind were suddenly drowned in a flood of white, misty light, which seemed to take the form of luminous clouds flung up from the sea into the sky. In an instant they were all round the Isola, and she was flying through them, a white, swiftly-gliding, ghostly shape, her propellers flinging the water far astern until she was flying at nearly forty miles an hour through the screaming, pelting storm.

"I thought so," laughed Staunton to Valdez, who was clinging, drenched and shivering, to the bridge rail. "Just in time. My luck again, Ramiero, if we had waited till to-morrow morning we'd have had them all round us, and it would have been a case of sinking or surrender, and that, of course would be quite impossible, considering that we have got nearly all the witnesses for the prosecution on board with us. No, it's neck or nothing now; in the morning it would have been nothing. We have the advantage of the alternative now."

Bang—bang—bang—thrurraddud—dudd—dud—deraud, dud-a-duud.

"Yes, I thought so," he shouted through the storm into Ramiero's ear, "there's proof positive that we were right in getting out, I wonder what they think they are shooting at?"

The crash of the big guns, and the thudding roar of the smaller artillery, were already mingling with the howling of the storm as Staunton said this. He had again pulled up the handle of the telegraph, and rammed it down to full speed, and a quarter-master had been sent below to order the engine-room staff to do their best if they wanted to get out of a very tight place. The fire grates were kept heaped with coals, and from the tops of the furnaces the spray pipes poured an incessant shower of vapourised oil. The boilers throbbed and panted as though they were living organisms, working to the extremity of their power. The steam roared through the turbines, and the three propellers whirled faster and faster until the dim white shape was tearing through the waters at more than forty miles an hour, the crash of the guns and the screaming of the shells growing ever fainter and fainter astern."

"Ah, look, look, Señor!" yelled Valdez, pointing ahead. "There is a destroyer crossing our bows!"

Staunton looked up, and saw a dimly outlined black shape, with four flaming funnels, shooting out from Fort San Joao.

"Well, if he wants it, I suppose he'll have to have it," he shouted shrilly, for the ecstasy of battle had got hold of him now.

He took a whistle out of his pocket, flung open the door of the wheel-house, and shouted:

"Three degrees starboard, run her down."

He ran back to the rail, bending down, fighting against the hurricane that was sweeping across the bridge, pulled his revolver out of his hip pocket, and fired three shots in the air. They cracked out distinctly through the dull roar of the storm, and the next instant the two twelve-pounder quick firing guns, which had been mounted on either side of the Isola's forecastle, and a couple of Maxims on either side of the short bowsprit, began to roar, and rattle, and thump, pouring their seven hundred shots a minute at the black shape looming up ahead.

One or two white flashes gleamed out from her decks, contrasting strangely with the red glare of her funnels. Two silvery shapes leapt from her deck, plunged into the water, and just as Captain Durtal screwed his wheel over and the Isola's head came round, the two torpedoes passed harmlessly to right and left. The next moment the over-arching prow of the thousand-ton yacht hit the destroyer amidships. There was a slight check lasting only for an instant, and the Isola, travelling now at nearly forty-five miles an hour, passed over the divided hull of the destroyer amidst clouds of steam from her broken boilers, grated over the fragments of the wreck, and vanished into the storm and darkness to the southward.

Digitized by Google

THIRTY-FIFTH CHAPTER.
Another Consignment for the Underworld.

THE next day all the world knew that the Isola, thanks to the foresight, the almost miraculous intuition of her owner, and a marvellously fortunate combination of atmospheric conditions, had escaped from the Bay of Rio de Janeiro shortly after midnight; in other words, on the morning of the day on which he and his fellow-criminals manning the yacht were to have been captured and handed over to the tender mercies of that society which for the last ten years they had fleeced with such consummate skill, that they had only just come to be suspected.

Everything had been arranged to perfection, at least so those who made the arrangements thought.

The President of the United States of North America had been proved to be perfectly right when he said to Kesteven that, although the Great Powers might recognise the maker of a New World Power created by legitimate means, they would not have anything to do with the man who had made the necessary millions by utterly illegal means. And so the President of the United States of South America had become an outlaw.

The question which the civilised world began to ask itself as soon as the cables had conveyed the news of the escape from Rio to the capitals of Europe and America, was: "What is he going to do with the yacht?"

It was generally admitted by this time that she possessed powers of speed and apparently of coal endurance which put her capture, even by the fastest warships, out of the question. She might keep the fleets of the world on a chase for years, and then not get caught, and yet until she was caught there was no chance of solving the mystery of that Underworld, from which Wilfrid Ellerton's messages had been received by nearly every ship in the northern hemisphere which was fitted with the Marconi apparatus. If he could only have given the exact latitude and longitude, the matter would have been simplified to a certain extent, but even then the problem of communication would remain unsolved until the Isola was caught. She was the only possible link between the two worlds, and it was, therefore, obviously necessary to catch her, which was about as difficult a task as the united navies of the world could have set themselves to do.

At six o'clock on the morning after her escape the Isola was steaming north-eastward from Rio about five hundred miles from the coast. It was a lovely morning, and as Staunton came up on deck he felt in quite a good humour with himself and the world, in spite of the fact that forty-eight hours ago he had had an empire, and that now he was an outlaw. His guests, who had not been allowed to appear on deck since the arrival at Rio, had now been given the freedom of the ship, and Dennison and Mr. Smith, who had now dispensed with his disguise, lost no time in availing themselves of it. In fact, Staunton had not been many minutes on deck before they came towards him on the promenade deck.

"Good-morning," said Dennison, flicking the ash of his cigarette overboard. "I am so sorry you didn't let us see the fun last night. We heard the guns going, and there was something in the way of a collision, wasn't there? We felt down in our cabins a nasty shock."

"Yes, Mr. Dennison, I suppose you did, and I must apologise for not being able to give you what I have no doubt would have been a very pleasurable experience. M. de Ronski might also have enjoyed it."

"I think we may as well drop that alias now, Mr. Isolo Staunton, otherwise Zuarez, since it appears that we have found each other out," replied Mr. Smith, "but I don't think that even you ought to forget that I've got a wife and daughter on board this precious craft of yours. Don't you think that even you are playing the game pretty low down?"

Staunton leant back against the rail and laughed.

"And what should I say in answer to that to a detective who accepted my hospitality and brought the said wife and daughter on board my ship to take part in a concert with the purpose of trapping me—me. Really, Mr. Smith, and

(Continued on page 30)

Hidden Treasure.

FOR a thing to be very difficult to obtain is to many people a great incentive to go in pursuit of it. Some clever brains have worn themselves out, and capitalists have been known to waste their fortunes, in the vain endeavour to discover perpetual motion. There are men in the world who will dig industriously for long periods in hope to unearth buried treasure, of the whereabouts of which there exists no certain knowledge, who cannot be induced to move one clod of earth for purposes of agriculture. It is a strange fallacy, this preference for what is speculative. Minds so constituted are generally neglectful of what they have while seeking for what they have not, like the Cornish peasant, who searched the road near Launceston all night in a drenching rain for a purse that had been lost. The peasant found the purse, was rewarded with £5, and caught such a chill that he died three weeks later.

Of all treasures, whether hidden or apparent, health is out of all proportion greatest. He who has it not wants everything. Its happy possessor is more than anyone a person to be envied. By preventing or curing indigestion (the first sign of many physical wrecks), Mother Seigel's Syrup has more than anything conferred the blessing of health upon the people of England. "Five years ago, when I was living at Grimsby," writes Mrs. Epton, of Bridge Street, Burgh-in-Marsh, Lincs., on August 18th, 1903, "I had the misfortune to take a chill. That was the beginning of my troubles. My appetite fell away until I could hardly look at food, and I used to eat barely sufficient to keep me alive. I had always a pain at the stomach, and sometimes between the shoulders, which food seemed to make worse. This, and a violent cough, prevented me sleeping at night, so that I became extremely weak. My doctor could do nothing for me but advise rest.

"Such was my condition for two months, when my husband, observing that I made no progress towards recovery, advised me to obtain a bottle of Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. He had recently read of some remarkable cures effected by that medicine. Though I had tried many patent medicines without avail, I agreed to buy a bottle, and my health began to improve from the first dose I took. I could now sleep soundly and awake refreshed. Five bottles were sufficient to complete my cure. My lost weight returned, and my health has since been excellent. My husband believes that it saved my life."

Mr. Epton was right. Instead of recommending to his wife new and doubtful preparations, he wisely advised resort to what has long been an acknowledged household treasure.

A Case for a Higher Court.

IN Paris in 1764 occurred one of those dramatic tragedies such as only take place in France. A young and beautiful lady publicly accused an officer of doing her a grievous wrong; but the court dismissed the case. A few minutes afterwards the lady, remarking that the case should now be tried by a higher tribunal, shot first the officer and then herself. The remedy is indeed a desperate one where they who apply it must needs succumb. Yet that is what often takes place as a result of using improper medicines. "About five years ago I began to suffer from Indigestion and Biliousness, and for eighteen months my life was a misery. My illness began with flatulence and pains in the stomach. I was hardly free from drowsiness and a sick, bilious feeling, and suffered acutely from headaches and dizziness. Nothing I tried did me any real good, until I commenced taking Mother Seigel's Syrup. Then I began to mend. The medicine seemed to put new life into me, and in an astonishingly short time I was quite restored to health. Nurse Douglass, 3 Cromwell Road, Redhill, Surrey."

Digitized by Google

you too, Mr. Dennison, surely if you did know as much as you thought you did about your host, you would hardly have walked open-eyed into such a simple little trap as that. To put it quite plainly, you two gentlemen and possibly Madame de Ronski and Mademoiselle Paula, with the assistance of your friend Monsieur Trapané, and my late assistant, Doctor Billaud, thought that you had caught me in the Bay of Nice. You did not. We have since been in the Bay of Funchal, and we have lately left the Bay of Rio de Janeiro, and, you see, I am not caught yet."

"And we are," replied Mr. Smith, with a coolness of manner which Staunton did not quite understand.

Dennison strolled over to the other side of the deck and threw the end of his cigarette overboard. When he came back he said, with a nonchalance which Staunton liked even less than the sangfroid of Mr. Smith:

"Would it be trespassing too far on your hospitality, Mr. Staunton, if I were to ask you whether it isn't about first drink time? I should like a cocktail, and I shouldn't wonder if my colleague could also do with one. We seem travelling pretty fast, and the breeze, which this wonderful craft of yours makes, is just a trifle chilly."

"Ah," exclaimed Staunton, with a genuine admiration, "what I could have done if I had only had a couple of iron-nerved men like you to help me, but, of course, that is impossible now. Come to the smoking-room and we'll have our cocktails."

If a stranger had been present that morning at breakfast in the saloon of the Isola, he or she would not have had the slightest notion of the tragedies which were working underneath the surface of the pleasant, easy manners of host and guests. It would have been impossible to guess that the host was the jailor and that the guests were prisoners, over whom he held absolute power of life and death.

For all that such a stranger would have seen, the flight of the Isola from Rio to the Underworld was nothing more than a yachting trip under the most pleasant conditions. Everybody on board appeared to be the best of friends with everyone else, so much so indeed that one night, after a most charming dinner, Staunton had been intoxicated by his prisoners with the magic of sweet sounds. Don Ramiero said to him over their last cigar in the Council Chamber:

"Does it not seem to you, Señor, that these guests of yours take their present circumstances a little too easily?"

"By which you mean, my friend—"

"That there may be something," replied Don Ramiero, very slowly between the puffs of his cigar, "that neither you nor I may know anything about. On the other hand, of course, I am obliged to admit that they may be people of such perfect sense that they're able to accept the circumstances of their present condition as though they were quite normal. That, of course, is only a suggestion, Señor."

"And not at all a bad suggestion either," replied Staunton. "They may be resigned to their fates and awaiting developments, or they may be gambling on the impossible, but as long as the one essential is impossible for them—as long as they can't get weapons, what does it matter what they are thinking about? I could strangle both the men at once, and, as for the women, of course they wouldn't count in any trouble of that sort. And once we have the lot down in the Underworld—well, those who live will see.

It so happened that while this conversation was taking place in the Council Chamber, and while Captain Durtal was on the bridge, Darfield went into Dennison's state-room, and, after closing the door carefully, put a brown leather hand-bag on the sofa, and said:

"Well, sir, there's my part of the contract. Five Mauser pistols, and two-hundred rounds of ammunition; you understand that I'm doing this for my wife's sake, not my own."

"I quite see what you mean," replied Dennison, taking an envelope out of the inside pocket of his dress-jacket. "It is very curious how this affair has got mixed up. This man Staunton, a sort of world-wide swindler, and until just now our jailor, holding our lives in his hands. On the other side, Mercedes in love, and as it would seem, desperately so, with the man whom he meant to either murder or abolish. Your wife chosen among all the nurses of Edinburgh to nurse her through the illness which was caused by the disappearance. She becomes devoted to her patient, and therefore our friend Staunton has got to disappear in such fashion that the world will never know what has become of him. That, I take it, about the situation."

"It is," replied Darfield, almost in a whisper, "it is, I have promised Janet, and, as you know, I could not break my word to her. From now until the end, whatever it may be, I am under the orders of yourself and Mr. Smith."

"Very well, then," said Dennison, giving him the envelope. "You can leave the rest to us. If we put this little adventure through successfully, we guarantee that you shall be a free man, as soon as you land on civilised soil. We are not going to distrust the man who is the husband of such a woman as your wife, whatever blunder he may have made a few years ago. You know just as well as I do that we are just now in a mess that none of us may get out of alive, and so it's just a case of trusting life for life."

"And I, sir," replied Darfield, taking a little glass tube full of white pellets out of his waistcoat pocket, "am the last man on board this ship to mistake your meaning. If you see any sign of me turning traitor, shoot me, and if our adventure, as you call it, does not come off all right, and I have no chance of going back to the old life with Janet, I have got these, and I shall use them."

"That's quite enough, Mr. Darfield," said Dennison, holding out his hand. "I entirely believe you, and so does Mr. Smith. You stand by us, and if we worry through this business alive, you shall find yourself as good a man as ever you were. Perhaps a better one."

"I hope so, sir," said the other one humbly, as he gripped his hand, "if not, I should have no hope of being worthy to be her husband again."

"Keep that thought in your mind," said Dennison, returning his grip, "and we shall get through all right. But, anyhow, living or dead, you will be found worthy of her, when the general balance-sheet is struck, and we all get what we have earned."

"Those are the best words I've heard since Janet spoke to me last. Good night, sir. It wouldn't do for me to be in your room too long," replied Darfield, opening the door, and closing it behind him, without a sound.

(The conclusion of this splendid serial will appear next week.)

THE BOOK OF INDOOR GAMES.

By J. K. BENSON.

Square Crown 8vo, cloth. 400 Illustrations. Price 5s.

"No rainy or snowy day need be regarded as a misfortune by the boy or girl who is lucky enough to possess 'The Book of Indoor Games.'"—World.

"Days and weeks of pleasure lie bound within the covers of 'The Book of Indoor Games.'"—Daily Telegraph.

"The games and amusements are so surprisingly ingenious and so lucidly explained, that no home can be dull during the long winter nights into which this handsome volume finds an entrance."—Glasgow Herald.

At all Booksellers, or Post Free for 5s. from

C. ARTHUR PEARSON Ltd., 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

To Asthma Sufferers.

Instant relief is gained in all cases of Asthma, Bronchitis, Croup, and Whooping Cough, by the use of POTTER'S ASTHMA CURE. Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists in Tins at 1/-. Test it free of charge. Send post-card to POTTER & CLARKE, Wholesale Druggists, Artillery Lane, London, E., for Free Sample Kindly mention this paper.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%

repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

SULPHOLINE LOTION

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED).

Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil, invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1/4; 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard-Bishop, Devon.

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 13½d. tins everywhere.

Ask your grocer for

EPPS'S

(The most nutritious)

COCOA

And take no other.

GIVEN AWAY

with this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 521).

A PAPER PATTERN OF THIS BOY'S TUNIC

Of all Bookstalls & Newsagents.

PRICE 1d.

A Library and Picture Gallery for 4d.

When you buy the JANUARY . . .

ROYAL MAGAZINE

be sure you read the following items:

"FIVE O'CLOCK TEA."

If you wish to become a social success, study this article. It is crammed with splendid tips for making your "At Homes" the talk of the neighbourhood.

"THE STRANGE ERRANDS OF A MESSENGER BOY."

One of Mr. Allen Upward's masterpieces of fiction. His boy hero, David David, goes through a most perilous and thrilling adventure and narrowly escapes with his life.

"EATABLE INSECTS."

Perhaps you didn't know that insects make excellent food. This article tell you that butterflies, ants, grubs, spiders, and other insects makes delicious dishes.

"HOW THE PYJAMA KIDS SCALPED THE BUTLER."

You must positively read the story. It is one o the most charming and funny stories that has as yet appeared in the "Royal."

These are a few of the many items. You will find out all about them if you hurry to the nearest Bookstall and get the ROYAL,

FOURPENCE.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Kissing Cousins.

"WHAT is the law about kissing cousins?" asks "ARTHUR," who has several very charming girl relations, whom he often visits.

* * * * *

There is no law about it, "ARTHUR." It depends so much on the cousins. If you have known each other since childhood, the kiss seems a harmless enough thing. If you have only got intimate with them of late years, then kissing should go by instinct. You are not in duty bound to kiss a girl-cousin, neither are you prevented from doing so. It entirely depends on how much you know each other, and if the desire to kiss is mutual and harmless.

Cure for Shyness.

"WHAT is the best cure for shyness in a girl?" asks "MABEL," who is very awkward in the presence of the opposite sex, so doesn't make very much progress in securing a lover.

* * * * *

You'll grow out of it, "MABEL." You would be surprised how a few years change shy girls. Some of the boldest young ladies of twenty-two were very shy at sixteen or seventeen. A very good cure for serious shyness is to keep the mind well occupied at all times, and to read a good deal. If you meet a man, and find it awkward to keep a conversation going, it is always a good idea to know something about books, or other subjects, so that you are not at a loss for a topic.

Returning a Ring.

"FIVE and a half years ago," writes "BEREAVED," "I was engaged to a girl, to whom I gave, of course, a ring, and some other small presents, including—a locket. Six months after our engagement she died, and as her 'intended' I expected something to be sent me as a memento. This I never got, though I remained on the best terms with her parents. They have now gone to another town, since when I have not seen them. I would like your advice as to whether the ring and locket ought not to be returned to me. There are still two or three sisters in the family, and I believe they are using the articles themselves."

* * * * *

I certainly think the parents ought to have sent you a memento. As to returning the ring, I suppose that is for them to decide. It would seem a very natural thing to do, but perhaps the sisters you speak of may only have kept it themselves because they valued it as a token. If that is so, you can scarcely formally demand its return. If you can see them, you might gently hint that you expected to have the ring back, but it is a thing that requires delicate handling.

The Girl Slanderer.

"WHAT am I to do in the following case?" asks "C. V." "I met a girl some years ago, who always seemed very friendly to me. I did not admire her in any serious way, it is true, but always made myself agreeable. Some time ago, I heard from a friend that she had been making the most slanderous statements about me, without cause. Yet when I met her afterwards she seemed as amiable as ever. How should one treat a girl like that?"

* * * * *

Of course you do not know definitely what statements she made about you. Perhaps somebody misunderstood her, or she merely said something in a frivolous way, without intending to do you injury. Your best course would be to continue being as amiable as possible. If she dislikes you, or wishes to do you an injury, you can only cure the feeling by showing her that she has misjudged you.

From the Far West.

I AM always glad to hear from Colonial correspondents. "PRAIRIE FLOWER" writes me from Winnipeg, Canada: "Is it unusual for a young woman to marry a man three years younger than herself? A young man I am very fond of wants me to become his wife, but I am twenty-seven, and he is only twenty-four. Would it be right to marry one so much younger?" The second question is: "How can I get rid of superfluous hair on my face without hurting my complexion?"

* * * * *

In answer to your first question, I do not think the difference in your ages need affect your marriage. Three years is not a great deal under the circumstances, and I advise you to marry the man you love. As to your other question, "Isobel," of Pearson's Weekly, tells me that she thinks the only permanent cure for superfluous hair is the operation of electrolysis, which I imagine would not be very possible in so far away a place as yours. I am, however, sending you by post the name of a treatment which is recommended, and can be prescribed for those at a distance. These questions, of course, do not come into my sphere, but in the case of so far away a reader, I am pleased to make a departure.

An Extravagant Youth.

"REFORMER" writes, "I am twenty-two, of good parentage, and in a good profession. But, unfortunately, I am rather extravagant and too fond of pleasure and do not value money as I should. I feel that if I made the acquaintance of a young lady of similar age, of an affectionate and thoughtful disposition, it would be a turning-point in my life, and that I should not feel the desire for pleasure and extravagance. Would you advise me to advertise for such a girl?"

* * * * *

When a man's tastes are extravagant, love affairs are not usually very economical. It simply means that you will have more cause for extravagance. If you met a girl of the very economical type you might be cured; but, somehow, I don't think that kind of girl does often reform an extravagant man. In any case, nobody can do himself harm by meeting the right sort of girl. I don't recommend your advertising, as I always think a young man ought to be able to meet a girl socially. The girl who answers matrimonial advertisements may not be quite all that is to be desired. I advise you to wait until you get to know some nice girl in the ordinary way. As to your extravagance, I think I should try a little strength of mind and common sense, and not look to a girl to keep you from the habit.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c., lecturing on Foods, says: "The chief text in the Gospel of Nutrition is that Tea and Coffee are not Foods at all, while Cocoa is an admirable and sustaining diet. Than

Fry's

PURE CONCENTRATED

Cocoa

no better food product of this nature can be obtained or used."

"A PERFECT FOOD."

TRY ALSO

FRY'S COCOA AND MILK,

A COMBINATION OF

FRY'S PURE COCOA with the BEST ENGLISH MILK.

Made instantly with Boiling Water. No Milk or Sugar Required.

"REFRESHING AND NUTRITIVE."—Lancet.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London. W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE MEDICINE FOR THE MILLION.

A SOLDIER'S WIDOW CURED OF INDIGESTION & BILIOUSNESS.

"SEVEN years ago I began to suffer from Indigestion and Biliousness," is the statement made by Mrs. Howells, 53 Hampton Street, Harrow Road, London, W., to a Weekly Budget reporter.

"I am a soldier's widow," she continued, "but at that time my husband was alive, and we were living in barracks at Gibraltar. I used to suffer continually from headache and sickness, especially in the mornings. I always felt more asleep than awake, and my sight was blurred. If I stooped to pick anything from the floor I fell in a faint. I grew constantly worse, all energy seemed to leave me. My food did me no good, and I longed for rest, but could find none."

Space will not permit of giving all the details of Mrs. Howells' illness and cure, how she came home to England still suffering and growing worse from day to day, went first into St. Mary's Hospital, then Marylebone Infirmary, and later to Paddington Infirmary, without any beneficial results. Her closing words are, however, worth recording.

"I believe I quite gave up hope, the treatment of doctors for years having been useless, but a friend, Miss Campbell—who had derived great benefit from Bile Beans—suggested that they might also cure me. I decided to give them a trial, and sent for a box. After I had been taking them a little while I began to gain strength. My appetite returned, and my food seemed to do me good. The bilious sensation gradually disappeared, the headaches became less frequent, and finally ceased. The feeling of heaviness and dullness left me, and best of all I felt my energy returning. Gradually from being completely run down, I grew well and strong again. I am now completely restored, can eat anything and enjoy life thoroughly. I have no hesitation in saying that Bile Beans have completely cured me of a long and serious illness."

To any sufferers from the above ailments the Proprietors will be pleased to send the full particulars of Mrs. Howells' case on receipt of a post-card to the Bile Beans Co., Leeds, England.

BILE BEANS FOR BILIOUSNESS are the safest Family Medicine, and a speedy and permanent cure for Headache, Colds, Liver Chill, Influenza, Rheumatism, Constipation, Piles, Liver Troubles, Bad Breath, Indigestion, Flatulence, Loss of Appetite, Dizziness, Sleeplessness, Buzzing in the Head, Debility, Anæmia, and all Female Ailments. Of all Medicine Vendors throughout the world.

ONE BEAN ONE DOSE.

BILE BEANS FOR BILIOUSNESS

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 784.] Week ending January 9, 1904. [Price One Penny.

"THE CARDS FORETELL YOUR DEATH IS IMMINENT."

(A Striking Incident from the Story, "JUST IN TIME." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE

The purest and most efficient Remedy procurable for
COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, CATARRH, WEAK LUNGS, and CHILDREN'S COUGHS.

BRONCHITIS AND ASTHMA

Veno's Lightning Cough Cure

Produces its most brilliant effect in Chronic Bronchitis and Asthma. It effects astonishing cures in the worst and most persistent cases.

Rev. W. W. TULLOCH, D.D., Bonar Bridge, Sutherlandshire, writes: "July 22nd, '03.—I have been a martyr to asthma all my life and lately to chronic winter bronchitis. I have found Veno's Lightning Cough Cure a valuable medicine."

CHILDREN'S COUGHS

Mrs. ADA S. BALLIN, 5, Agar Street, London, Editor "Womanhood," and a great authority upon children's diseases, writes:—"Veno's Lightning Cough Cure is an exceedingly successful remedy; it is very pleasant to take and the relief it gives is very rapid. The preparation is perfectly safe for children."

W. LASCELLES-SCOTT, F.R.M.S., in his Certificate of Analysis mong other things says:—"I have pleasure in certifying that in my opinion VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH COUGH is an exceptionally pure, safe, and effective preparation

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES 9½d. Regular Sizes, 1/1½ and 2/9.

Ask for VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE at Chemists and Drug Stores, or post free from the VENO DRUG CO., Hulme, Manchester, England.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache and Neuralgia.

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Kaputine is not a single crude drug such as has been condemned as dangerous by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients, having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The SAFE Remedy.

Kaputine is the only preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and infirmaries. Proof positive of its superior and sterling qualities.

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1½; Samples 1d. each.

Kindly mention this paper.

J. G. GRAVES'

CUTLERY

Direct from the Factory to the Home.

THE "ENTERPRISE" PARCEL is the finest Cutlery Value in the World. A complete outfit of Table Knives, Forks, Spoons, etc., made in my own factories in Sheffield.

51 Articles for 25/-

Sent on receipt of order with deposit of 2/6 and your promise to complete the purchase in nine more monthly payments of 2/6. Discount Advantages to Cash Purchasers.

Catalogue of Sheffield Cutlery and Plate, post free.

AGENTS WANTED. WRITE FOR PARTICULARS.

J. G. GRAVES. 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

Home Rupture Cure.

Marvellous Blessing to Those who are Ruptured. Proofs so Positive and From Such Reliable Sources as to be Free From All Doubt.

Dr. W. S. Rice (Dept. 431), 8 and 9, Stonecutter Street, London, E.C., has the distinction of perfectly curing even the most difficult ruptures of long standing. He does this without causing the patient one bit of pain, absolutely without danger and without the loss of a moment's time from work. He does not use the knife, and sends his method and treatment direct to the sufferer's home, where it can be used without assistance, and brings immediate relief. Dr. Rice has cured hundreds of old men who have been ruptured 30 and 40 years. Never before have such letters of testimony been received as Dr. Rice receives every day. Mr. James Cole, 13, Holdick Street, Midland Road, Peterborough, was cured at the age of 66 years. He writes Dr. Rice as follows:—"I had a bad rupture, and when I saw your method of cure advertised I was rather doubtful as to permanent cure; but I am thankful I tried it, for I do not feel anything of the rupture now. It was just the treatment I required to effect a cure." It will pay anyone who is ruptured to write to Dr. Rice for a sample of his method, which will be sent free by return of post. Investigate fully his method of cure. Do this at once. Don't delay in a matter of such importance. Write to-day. Thousands of cases cured.

MR. JAS. COLE.
From a Photo.

An admirable Food of the

EPPS'S

Finest quality and flavour.

COCOA

Nutritious and Economical.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%
repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

BODLEIAN 16.1.1904

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

No. 784.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending January 9th, 1904.

JUST IN TIME.

Telling How a Fortune-Teller Saved Her Lover From Death.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

"You can't do better than have Laurence Wilding for the mural paintings."

Lady Blanche Hargreaves spoke with her usual decision, and looked so convinced of her own infallibility that it required some strength of mind to differ from her. She was a pretty little widow of eight or nine-and-twenty, whose soft, wildflower face concealed an iron will.

"He did you very well, certainly," replied her visitor thoughtfully. "I know you recommend him everywhere."

"I've taken him up," proclaimed Lady Blanche. "He's doing Lord Warner's house now, and making a grand success of it. You try him, Florence, or, rather, get your husband to try him."

Lady Blanche had rather a contempt for women hampered with husbands, and seemed to regard her own early widowhood as a proof of sagacity.

"I think I can manage it," returned Mrs. Deering. "There is another thing I wanted to ask you, Blanche. I want some special attraction for my garden-party next month. Can you suggest anything?"

"Have Stella. She's coming to the front as a fortune-teller of the old-fashioned sort. She isn't a crystal-gazer or a palmist or medium, she just "lays the cards" as the gipsies call it. She's very clever, really. My maid, Parry, first told me of her. It seems she had been to her and had heard of wonderful things. I sent for Stella and she really told me some most extraordinary truths."

"That she had heard from Parry," interpolated the sceptical Mrs. Deering.

"No, indeed, things Parry knew nothing about. So I've taken Stella up, and I've introduced her to lots of people and got her heaps of engagements. You'll try her, won't you, Florrie?"

"Let me have her proper name and address later on, and I'll write to her. But I want to know more about Laurence Wilding. How did you pick him up?"

Lady Blanche blushed a sudden vivid scarlet.

"I heard of him as a clever artist," she replied somewhat evasively, "and I wrote to him about the mural paintings for my dining-room. He was so successful that I recommended him everywhere, and now he is very well known."

"Yes, I've heard him called 'Lady Blanche Hargreaves' tame artist,'" observed Mrs. Deering drily. "Isn't he awfully handsome?"

The door was thrown open at this moment with the announcement: "Mr. Wilding"—and a young man, not so much handsome as distinguished in appearance, advanced eagerly to greet Lady Blanche.

"We were talking of Stella, the fortune-teller," observed Lady Blanche, after greetings and introductions were over. "Mrs. Deering thinks of engaging her for her garden-party."

"Have you, too, consulted Stella, Mr. Wilding?" laughed Mrs. Deering.

The young man shook his head.

"I'm afraid I'm a thorough sceptic in those matters," he replied.

"Yes, you won't even investigate," cried Lady Blanche. "Now, why won't you go and interview Stella and test her for yourself? Then you could let Mrs. Deering know if you thought she ought to try Stella at her entertainment or not."

"Oh, do, Mr. Wilding," chimed in Mrs. Deering. "I could so rely on your report. Dear Lady Blanche is perhaps rather easily carried away in such matters, but a keen, cool unbeliever like yourself is not to be deluded. Do promise me to go at once and let me have a full, true, and particular account."

"You can't go at once," said Lady Blanche. "You must first write and make an appointment. She has a room in Tottenham Court Road, where she meets people, and where her letters are sent, but she doesn't live there."

"You will write at once and make an appointment, won't you?" cried Mrs. Deering impulsively.

Laurence promised, and the conversation drifted into other channels. Now that Mrs. Deering had seen the young artist, she was anxious to secure his services for the decoration of her drawing-room, but Laurence was unable to undertake any more commissions for some time to come. He was not dependent on his art for a livelihood, as he possessed a very comfortable fortune of his own; therefore the fact that he was rapidly becoming the fashion, and could command what prices he liked for his work, was of less importance to him than it would have been to many men. He looked a thoroughly happy, contented, prosperous young fellow, as, having secured an appointment with Stella, he strode along to the fateful interview with the fortune-teller.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

He was in excellent spirits. Everything was going well with him, and his prospects were rosy. He was not in love with Lady Blanche Hargreaves, but he admired her very much, and he felt that he could make her an excellent husband. Without being a coxcomb, he could not help seeing that she was very fond of him, and if he chose to ask her to marry him, there would be no difficulties.

She was a widow and absolutely her own mistress; he had no near relations to interfere. Her fortune was not a temptation to him, for his own means were ample, but he was an ardent lover of beauty, and Lady Blanche was exquisitely pretty, with her fair curls and blush-rose face, lit up by velvety brown eyes.

He had no belief or even interest in any method of foretelling the future, and there was a very supercilious smile on his lips as he entered the bare little room where the sorceress awaited him.

He was going through this farce to oblige Lady Blanche and her friend, and he cared little how obvious was his disdain of the folly.

A tall, slender woman came forward at his entrance. She was robed in a black silk garment, which fell in graceful folds from her throat to her feet. Her face was almost startling in its beauty and the weird intensity of expression.

She hardly noticed his greeting and explanatory remark, and making no response beyond a slight inclination of her head, moved behind a small table strewn with cards, which she took up and shuffled.

"The usual business," thought Laurence scornfully, as he watched the cards slip through the slim, white fingers. "Now for the inevitable 'a fair lady loves you,' 'You will receive a legacy,' and all the rest of the humbug."

"The cards foretell your death is imminent," said Stella suddenly, in her full, musical, but slightly trembling tones.

"What! My death?" exclaimed Laurence, startled against his will. Then recovering himself, he added smiling: "That is rather unnerving. Tell me some details, please. My death is imminent, you say; from an accident, perhaps? No?" as she shook her head. "Sudden illness, then? Not that either? Violence?" She made a sign in the affirmative. "This grows interesting. Who seeks my death?"

"Your enemy."

"Don't believe I've an enemy in the world," observed Laurence brusquely. "You are mistaken there."

"I am not mistaken," she said, still looking at the cards, as they fell from her hands to the table. "You have an enemy—a man—whom you have baulked in some wish of his three times. He has vowed vengeance. He will have your life, and that shortly."

"How melodramatic! I'm afraid you are on the wrong track, Miss Stella. I can't follow you a bit."

"This man is young, very handsome in a dark Italian style, with—let me see—yes, with a scar on his left cheek. Do you know such a man?"

"By Jove, yes," answered Laurence, interested in spite of himself. "I should say I do. But he's not my enemy; the man I mean, the man with the scar on his cheek is my best friend."

"You have been his successful rival twice in a competition of some kind—painting I should think."

"Well, that's true, but he wasn't unpleasant about it. No one congratulated me more heartily than he did."

"And now you are his rival again, and this time there is a lady in the case. She is very fair and pretty, and he loves beauty; rich, too, and he wants money; she has position and influence, and he would like to be a power in Society. She prefers you, but if you were out of the way, she would, he thinks, turn to him again, for she liked him first. He introduced you to her, and he thinks——"

"Thinks I cut him out," broke in Laurence, laughing. "There is more than witchcraft in this, Miss Stella. You didn't get all that out of the cards, you know. Now, who posted you in my affairs? Tell me honestly?"

"I tell you what the cards tell me," she persisted. "Am I to warn you that you are in serious danger?"

"From good old Pinto? He isn't Italian, by the way, but of Spanish blood, though born and brought up in England. I simply can't believe that he is my enemy or that there is any truth whatever in anything that the cards have told you."

Stella sighed heavily.

"I have done my best," she murmured. "I made this appointment with you that I might get a chance to warn you. I thought perhaps you would believe me."

Laurence had been looking at her steadily for some minutes.

"I thought I had seen you before," he said, "and now I know where it was. It was not you but your portrait. You sat for the girl in that last picture of Pinto's, 'Rest at Eventide,' did you not?"

"Yes, he is a distant relative of mine, and I have acted as his model several times."

Laurence could not have told the reason, but his heart suddenly melted towards this girl with the pale, beautiful face and the pathetic, dark eyes. Something in her appealed to him more strongly than ever Lady Blanche's gay, triumphant beauty had done. He altered his tone.

"I'm sure you really mean kindly towards me," he said. "I suppose you heard Pinto make some nasty remarks about my luck, and, being sensitive and imaginative, you have jumped to the conclusion that he meant to murder me. Rather far-fetched, perhaps, but you are evidently highly strung and nervous. It is good of you to take so much interest in the fate of a complete stranger."

"A complete stranger," she repeated, and for the first time a faint smile parted her lovely lips. "Do you remember the name of Marsden?"

"Marsden? Why, of course I do; my dear old tutor. Can you possibly be—— You must be little Essie Marsden. No wonder I seemed to know your face," and Laurence seized her hand and shook it heartily.

"Yes, I am Esther Marsden, who used to ride on your shoulder, years ago when you were a boy reading with her father, and she was a tiny baby-girl."

"But how is your father? I fancied—— Did I not hear——" Laurence hesitated and stopped.

"Yes, he is dead. He died three years ago, leaving my mother and me almost penniless. She is in such delicate health that I could not leave her to take a situation of any kind, and so I have had to make money as best I could. I have sat as model to Mr. Pinto, taken in art needlework, gone out by the day to do mending, and given lessons on the piano at a shilling an hour. I used often to 'lay the cards' for the amusement of my girl-friends, so one day I thought of doing it for At Homes, bazaars, and so on. I was very successful, and then Lady Blanche Hargreaves was interested in me, and since then I have done very well."

"Poor little Essie," was all Laurence could say, as his thoughts went back to the days of his boyhood, when his tutor's little daughter had been such a cherished household pet, and his own little plaything. How bravely the girl was fighting the battle of life, handicapped as she was by the helpless, invalid mother.

"You will not forget my warning," said Esther, after a pause. "Indeed, indeed I have a reason for what I say. Mr.

Digitized by Google

Pinto hates you. He thinks Lady Blanche Hargreaves would have accepted him if it had not been for you, and since he has heard of your engagement to her he has been like a madman."

"I am not engaged to Lady Blanche Hargreaves," said Laurence, almost sternly, "nor have I any intention of asking her to be my wife. At the same time, Essie—I may call you Essie, may I not?—I will accept your warning so far that I will be on my guard against Pinto. Not that I believe he would really attempt my life; still, I will be on my guard. Now, dear Essie, I will go, but you will permit me to see you again, won't you? I want to call and see your mother."

Esther hesitated; but knowing the pleasure it would give her mother to see one of the friends of her prosperous days again, she gave the required permission, and, noting the address in his pocket-book, Laurence withdrew.

* * * * * * *

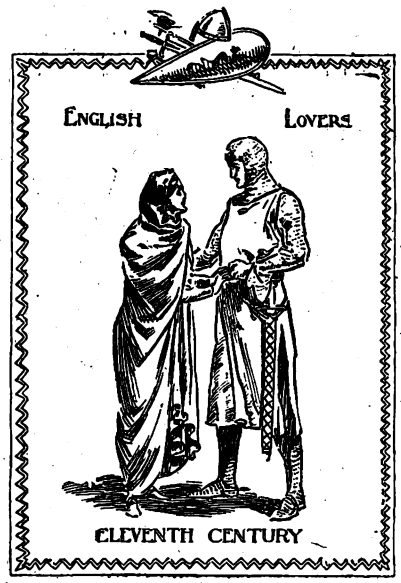
Lady Blanche Hargreaves was in a state of thorough dissatisfaction. The world was decidedly out of joint, and she did not see her way clear to setting it right. Her "tame artist" had deserted her. For weeks she had seen nothing of him, and her friends were beginning to ask questions which she found very disagreeable.

"Stella," too, had turned out most unsatisfactory. The young fortune-teller had refused to attend Mrs. Deering's garden party, and had also declined several other offers of engagements which her would-be patroness had obtained for her, explaining in a brief but courteous note that she no longer attended entertainments or received clients.

"Stella" had, in short, retired into private life, and, angry as that fact made Lady Blanche, she would have been much more wrathful had she had the slightest idea that the unaccountable behaviour of both the recalcitrants was indirectly caused by herself. Had she not joined Mrs. Deering in urging Laurence to consult "Stella," the young artist would never have met his old tutor's daughter again and fallen in love with her.

For Laurence loved Esther with a real, true love, such as he had never felt for Blanche.

He had called on Mrs. Marsden in her dreary lodgings, and been cordially received, for he had been a great favourite in his tutor's household, and the poor invalid was glad to see a friendly face from the happy past.



She confided her troubles to him, and Laurence, who was, though an artist, a keen business man, at once suspected dishonesty on the part of her lawyer. Mrs. Marsden gave him her authority to investigate matters, and he soon found out that she was being cheated by the man who had her small affairs in charge.

Laurence acted with vigour and wisdom, and managed to secure to the widow a yearly income, which, if small, was sufficient to live on in modest comfort.

Thus Esther was enabled to give up her uncongenial work, and devote herself to nursing her mother.

While Laurence was arranging the widow's money matters it was of course necessary, or he thought so, that he should call every day, and every visit deepened his love for Esther.

His heart had never been touched by Blanche. He had admired her, and perhaps his vanity had been flattered by her evident liking for him; but as he contrasted her gay flippancy, her caprice, her petulance, her shallowness, with the noble devotion, the uncomplaining fortitude, the deep feeling shown by Esther, he realised the difference between a true woman and an irresponsible trifler, and knew that what he felt for Esther was indeed love.

Blanche had no way of placing herself again in touch with Laurence except by writing to him, which she was reluctant to do, so she was very gracious to Pinto when he called one afternoon. She knew he was an intimate friend of Laurence Wilding, for it was at one of his studio teas that she had first met Laurence.

Cautiously she introduced his name. Pinto had seen little of his friend lately, he returned carelessly.

"I fancy there is a lady in the case," he added, smiling, and Blanche flushed scarlet. She had never thought of a rival. Eagerly she plied Pinto with questions, which he dexterously parried, contriving to leave her with the impression that he knew very much more than he chose to tell.

"Are you likely to see Mr. Wilding soon?" she asked, as her guest was taking leave.

"I'm going to his studio now," replied Pinto. "Can I give him any message from you?"

Blanche had come to a sudden decision. The idea of a rival was insupportable to her. She must make an effort to win Laurence back.

"Please give him a note from me," she said, and hastily pencilled an urgent request to Laurence to meet her at his studio at five o'clock on the following day.

* * * *

"Shall you be very much disappointed if we put off going to see those pictures till next week, Essie?" asked Laurence anxiously. "To-morrow is my only free day this week, and I have just had a note from Lady Blanche Hargreaves, telling me she will call at my studio to-morrow at three o'clock on urgent business. I think I ought to make a point of being there, for she has been very kind to me, and I have not seen her for five or six weeks now."

"Oh, certainly you must go. Perhaps she wants you to paint something for her."

"Yes, I had better be there. Curious thing. She says 'Mr. Pinto will give you this note,' but it was delivered by a messenger boy. I haven't seen Pinto for quite two months."

"Mr. Pinto," repeated Esther, in a startled tone. "That is curious. What can it mean?"

"I suppose Pinto was calling on Lady Blanche, and perhaps was going to the club, where he thought he'd see me, so offered to take a message. When he didn't see me, he sent the note on by messenger."

"But why should he offer to take a message? Why did Lady Blanche intrust the note to him? It seems very odd to me."

"Lady Blanche is odd, that's all," observed Laurence lightly. "But I don't suppose my interview with her will last very long. An hour or so will be enough to discuss any business she may have to talk about. We might manage the pictures after all, Essie, if you would be at my studio at about four o'clock. I'll have tea ready for you both. My old Mary can get up the jolliest little teas, I assure you. Do come, won't you?"

"Yes, do go, dear Essie," broke in Mrs. Marsden from her couch. "I know how much you have been looking forward to those pictures, and I should be sorry for you to miss the pleasure. She will go, Laurence," she added to the young man, and Esther's lovely, smiling face gave no contradiction.

* * * * * *

Laurence Wilding's studio was picturesque in the extreme. All that money and good taste could do had been done, and a more perfectly beautiful place could not be imagined.

It was three o'clock, and Laurence stood awaiting his fair guest. He was very much annoyed, for his old caretaker was not to be found, and the dainty little tea which he had intended to have provided was out of the question.

Digitized by Google

Also there was no one to open the door, so that when presently Laurence heard a knock, he hastened to attend to it himself.

"Hallo, Pinto!" he exclaimed, as he saw the visitor. "Come in, old man. Why, I haven't seen you for ages."

Pinto walked silently into the studio, and looked round.

"You are alone," he said tonelessly.

"Yes, but I'm expecting someone on business shortly."

"You're expecting Lady Blanche Hargreaves," said Pinto, suddenly facing round, and there was something so strange in his look and manner that Laurence involuntarily thought of Esther's warning.

"What do you mean?" he asked sharply.

"You are expecting Lady Blanche," snarled Pinto again. "She wrote to you that she would be here at five o'clock, but I altered the hour to three before I sent the note on to you."

"How dare you meddle with my letters? And what do you mean by your extraordinary behaviour now?" cried Laurence. "You must have been drinking, man."

With the bound of a tiger Pinto sprang upon him, and bore him to the ground. Laurence was the slighter and smaller man, and was completely taken by surprise, so his resistance was futile. Pinto held him firmly down, and Laurence saw something gleaming in his hand. He raised his voice with a wild shout for help.

"There isn't a soul in the building," observed Pinto, grimly. "I saw to that. At five o'clock Blanche will come here, but she will find you dead. It will be suicide, the doctors will say, for I shall arrange that. I shall console the beautiful Blanche, and she will be mine once you are out of the way."

Laurence felt a sudden shock, a pain as if a red-hot knife were plunged into his breast, and all was dark.

"Dead," muttered Pinto to himself. He rose, and opening the door of a large closet half full of lumber, he thrust the body within, placing the stiletto with which he had done the deed in the nerveless hand. Then softly and quietly as he had come he slipped from the room.

* * * * * *

"I can't make anyone hear."

Esther turned round as she heard a step behind her, and found herself face to face with Lady Blanche Hargreaves.

"Stella. You!" exclaimed Blanche in amazement. "What are you doing here? This is Mr. Wilding's studio."

Esther explained and Blanche listened, her face flaming with anger. This, instinct told her, was the rival Pinto had hinted at, and, she feared, a successful one.

"We had better go in," she said coldly. "Mr. Wilding's servant must be out. The door is not locked."

Pushing the door open, she swept in, Esther following with a vague anxiety in her heart.

The room was vacant. Esther took a seat near the window, and looked timidly around. Blanche amused herself by closely examining everything in the room. It was a long time before she broke the silence.

"Very odd he should be out," she remarked at last. "I said I should be here at five o'clock, and it is now nearly six."

"Didn't you appoint three o'clock?" asked Esther. Blanche shot a fiery glance at her.

"No; five. And Mr. Pinto undertook to give him the note at once. I don't understand this."

Esther shivered as she heard the name of Pinto, and the uneasiness increased.

"I shall wait no longer," proclaimed Blanche, at the end of another quarter of an hour. "You may do as you like, but I shall go," and she swept to the door.

But before she had time to turn the handle, a low, thrilling cry arrested her. She turned, and saw Esther standing frozen with horror, pointing to a door, from under which crept a dark, sluggish stream.

"What is that?" gasped Esther. "What is it? Merciful Heavens, it's blood, it's blood!"

With a cry that echoed through the whole building Blanche sprang to the closet and tore open the door. There, senseless and bleeding, lay Laurence Wilding.

"Oh, my darling, my darling, he has murdered you after all," wailed Esther, pressing the cold hand to her lips.

Blanche made one bound to the door, and fled shrieking down the staircase.

In a few seconds, as it seemed, the room was filled with people, and a doctor made his way to the side of the victim.

A moment's breathless suspense, and then:

"He lives, and his wound, though serious, is not necessarily fatal," he said.

Blanche had returned, and was waiting anxiously for the doctor's report.

"Thank Heaven!" she breathed softly, and then she stretched out her hands to Esther.

"He is saved for you, Stella; I feel it. You love him and he loves you. May you be happy."

For the wilful, capricious Blanche had a heart after all.

* * * * * *

"My darling, you are looking better."

Very tenderly Esther said it, for her husband of a few weeks was exceedingly precious to her, and had hardly yet recovered from his dangerous wound.

They were spending their honeymoon in the south of France, and every day seemed to bring fresh life and vigour to Laurence.

He looked up with a beaming smile to greet his young wife.

"I'm as fit as possible, dearest. What have you there? Letters? Heard from the mater?"

"Yes, and she is so much better. Oh, Laurie, how happy I am. Here are some letters for you."

He read them silently through.

"There is news of Pinto," he said, suddenly looking down at her, as she sat on a cushion by his couch.

Esther shuddered.

"Oh, Laurie, that dreadful man."

"The police tracked him to a common lodging house, where he lay very ill with pneumonia. He must have learnt that I had been found alive, and have tried to conceal himself. He is dead, Elsie."

She breathed a deep sigh of relief.

"And there is some more news in this letter, darling. Blanche is going to marry a friend of mine, a right down good fellow, and writes me the nicest letter about it. Read it yourself, dear. She seems almost as happy as we are ourselves."

"But not quite, Laurie. Nobody could ever be quite as happy as I am with you."

Vera Serkoff.

HOW AND WHAT TO DANCE.

By W. LAMB,

President of British Association of Teachers of Dancing.

Cloth, price 1s.

Containing complete instructions in the art of Dancing, including all the latest and fashionable square and round dances, and skirt dancing.

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "How and What to Dance," for which I inclose 1/2.

Name .....

Address .....

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID NEW SERIAL. YOU CAN START TO-DAY.

Dupes of Destiny

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT

By Blanche Eardley, Writer of "The Bond Between."

PROLOGUE.

A YOUTH is in the private room of Messrs. Samuel Sharpe and Quirke, solicitors, awaiting the head of the firm's announcement as to whether he is the heir to the baronetcy of the late Sir Basil Wingate or not.

Mr. Sharpe says:

"You will remember, Mr. Rust, at the reading of the will, the title, which by special remainder he had power to dispose of, and the money were left by Sir Basil Wingate to the elder son of his run-away only daughter, Helen Jerningham, should she have one; and failing a son being born to her, the title and the money with the estate, should go to you, his nephew; afterwards to your son—should you marry, or to the son of your daughter; no child of the feminine sex directly inheriting it."

He then tells Cyprian Rust that, hearing Helen Jerningham went to Australia, he has extensively advertised for her in Australian papers, but with no effect. Therefore he congratulates his listener on becoming Sir Cyprian Rust.

The solicitor is called out of the room, and Cyprian Rust sees on the table an unopened letter with an Australian stamp. The address he recognises as being in the handwriting of his cousin, Helen Jerningham!

Is it written to announce the birth of a son and heir? If so it would rob him of the legacy at the eleventh hour!

A step sounds outside the door. Quickly Cyprian Rust thrusts the letter into his pocket. He hurriedly says good-bye to Mr. Sharpe, and when he reaches his hotel he reads the missive. It tells how Helen Jerningham has left Australia, so that the future heir—if a boy—may be born in England!

Sir Cyprian Rust carefully burns the letter that might have dealt the death-blow to his ambitions, and mentally resolves to go to any extremes to retain the title.

Meanwhile Helen Jerningham is dying on board an ocean liner in giving birth to twin sons.

From incoherent remarks that she makes, the physician who attends her is led to believe that a secret is attached to the boys' history. But she dies ere she reveals her name or the boys' identity!

Many years later.

MARCELLA RUST, daughter of Sir Cyprian, finds a spade guinea which a mysterious man has hidden underneath the mat outside a certain room which she has been forbidden to enter in their home, Wingate Court, Crawley. Her curiosity is naturally aroused, and she tells her father of the occurrence. He seems annoyed at her alertness.

Sir Cyprian learns, through the Rev. Philip Nullius, that a dying woman wishes to see him.

He goes to see her, and she shows him a later will of Sir Basil Wingate, by which all his property is left to the descendant of Helen Jerningham unconditionally. Sir Cyprian snatches this will from her, and she dies before she can inform anyone else.

Sir Cyprian visits Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox, where he meets Mr. Caleb J. Johnson, millionaire and City magnate, who is in love with the hostess. The baronet, who has Lady Violet in his coils, forces her to swear to take particulars of the millionaire's house and property.

Late in the evening Johnson proposes to Lady Violet. Knowing her position, she, of course, refuses him. As she does so, the palms in front of the window part and a man lurches heavily into the room.

Lady Violet recognises him as her husband—a former Major in the Army, who has been separated from her for many years. Hastily she requests Johnson to leave; then, turning on her unwelcome visitor, she by threats prevails upon him to go.

In the corridor this Society ruffian encounters Sir Cyprian, and sees upon his watch-chain the Sign of the Spade.

Edward Day proposes to Marcella. Being refused, he angrily lets fall an allusion to Marcella's dead mother.

Lady Violet overhears this, and, with blazing eyes, dismisses Day, who acts as her secretary, from her service.

She makes him an allowance of £250 a year, and gives him a letter of introduction to the millionaire, Caleb J. Johnson.

Digitized by Google

The latter discovers, through a private inquiry agent, the whole history of Major Richard Frayne-Lennox, and buys off a General Lyster the cheque that he had forged.

Edward Day makes a satisfactory visit to the financier, and afterwards visits his wife, Lottie, a chorus girl, of whom he has grown tired. He tells her of the rupture between himself and Lady Violet, who does not know that he is married.

At Wingate Court, Marcella reads of the theft of a valuable picture from Caleb Johnson's house. As she was one of the last persons to see the picture, which the millionaire prized very greatly, she evinces great interest in the accounts of the robbery.

Sir William Slade, of Harley Street fame, visits Sir Cyprian, and, as the day is very boisterous, is greatly concerned to hear that Marcella has set out for Danger Point, a very dangerous rock on the coast. His host, however, assures him that Marcella will be quite safe, as she knows the locality well.

As a matter of fact, she is only just rescued in time from a very perilous position.

FOURTEENTH CHAPTER.

"Love's Young Dream."

WHEN Marcella opened her eyes she was on the beach beneath the shadow of the rock on whose grim surface she had so narrowly escaped death. For a time she knew nothing of what had passed; then recollection dawned, and, with a slight shudder, she looked up to see the face of the man she most hated, bending over her. It was Edward Day.

"You!" she gasped, in tones of undisguised disappointment, that made him shut his teeth with a metallic click. "How do you come here?"

"I am sorry," he said slowly, "if my presence annoys you, Miss Rust, but I happened to be staying a day or two in Crawley, and a very fortunate chance brought me out this way this afternoon. I am glad to have had the honour of being of some assistance to you, and to also apologise for having let my conduct be so utterly unworthy of the family to which I am proud to belong!"

This was a chance shot, as he was not sure whether Lady Violet had not also informed her niece that he had no right to the protection of her name. Apparently she had not, for Marcella hesitated, then said slowly:

"I am glad you apologise, Mr. Day, for it shows that you at least realise a little of the enormity of your conduct. But I will be only too pleased to try to forget our last interview, and attribute it to any cause than that it at first appeared to be. Had you no one with you?" she asked wistfully. "I thought I heard a voice call."

Before Edward Day could reply a shadow came forward.

"It was my voice you heard, Miss Rust. I seemed to know that there was someone in trouble on Danger Point, and having had some little experience with the 'Point' on previous occasions, I hastened half-way, and met this gentleman, who kindly mounted the rock for me, as I was prevented doing so owing to a recently-sprained ankle, which put the veto upon any undue exertion such as climbing.

"I would have gone right up to you if I could have carried you down the steep, but I felt that I would have ignominiously failed had I attempted it, so this gentleman kindly went up for me. I hope you are not hurt in any way? It was madness for you to have risked such a climb in this awful weather."

Marcella's heart contracted with a sudden gladness. The voice of the second man was the curate's, Philip Nullius, and somehow it put a new courage into her. Her pale face flushed with a colour Edward Day was keen to note, and her eyes brightened.

"You, Mr. Nullius?" she exclaimed. "Oh, I am so glad! You will take me back to the Court, won't you? I think I am all right now, only a little shaken. But I am anxious to return to father; he will be so worried about my absence." She struggled to her feet, then turned to the man who had carried her down to the shore. She had not forgotten that he had wilfully insulted and abused a dead mother's memory, just because her rejection had piqued his vanity.

"Thank you very much, Mr. Day," she said, with a gracious coldness. "You rescued me from a perilous position on Danger Point, and I am glad Mr. Nullius was here to draw your attention to me. I owe my life to him, and incidentally to you also. Had it not been for him, you might have passed on."

He bit his lip savagely. He felt her words were a dismissal. She looked upon the poverty-stricken curate as her saviour—not himself. Aloud he said:

"I will see you safely to the Court, Marcella. Your friend, Mr. Nullius, may be eager to continue his visits to the rest of his flock; we had better not detain him."

Philip Nullius' dark face coloured slightly, and he raised his hat preparatory to leaving. The calling of Sir Cyprian's daughter by her Christian name had struck him with a strange feeling that the fair fashionable Londoner was the lover of the girl who had been for so many weeks enshrined in his holy of holies as the most perfect woman he knew.

"Stop!" Marcella said coolly. "Mr. Nullius, will you relieve this gentleman of his self-appointed task, and accompany me home to the Court; that is, if your ankle is strong enough?" Then turning to the chagrined Edward, she went on carelessly: "I will not detain you any longer, Mr. Day; you must have plenty to do on your brief visit to Crawley, and my father has not those attractions at the Court that would appeal to you!"

As she strolled painfully and slowly away, leaning on the arm of the tall young curate, Edward Day looked after them with a bitter smile on his weak, vindictive face.

"Snubbed, eh?" he muttered. "Shelved for the society of a beggarly curate whom you credit with all the virtues under the sun! So, ho! Miss Marcella, you remember our last parting in London and mean to keep me at arm's length. Evidently your dear aunt has not informed you of the change in my fortunes, and I shall do nothing to enlighten you. You forbid me the Court, eh?" he laughed softly. "We shall see. There are many ways of reaching one's destination, and judging from your leisurely stroll, you will not get there for some little time."

The storm had abated almost as suddenly as it had risen, and only a dull murmur of the still turbulent sea, and the dismal soughing of the wind, remained as witness to the reckless gale that had swept over the recently sunny landscape. It was growing dark, and the fine rain that was steadily pouring from the heavens had ceased to lash as at first.

In the meantime Marcella and the curate slowly walked along the sea coast in the direction of the Court. The wet had penetrated to their very being, and they shivered, but both were strangely contented.

"Tell me," Philip Nullius said abruptly, "what took you up Danger Point in such weather as this? Surely it was not your own choice?"

Marcella laughed weakly. "My father told me that it was an interesting walk," she said. "Of course he did not know the danger in which the sudden gale would place me. He will be very anxious about me."

The curate was silent. He remembered that it was strange for an old inhabitant like Sir Cyprian not to have thought that such a walk as that to Danger Point would be dangerous to a girl who was ignorant of the treacherous freaks of the elements.

"Will you see your—your friend at the Court?" he inquired slowly.

"I hope not," Marcella answered briefly; "he is not a friend, he is my aunt's nephew, and I dislike him immensely, but occasionally tolerate him."

A sigh escaped the lips of the man by her side. It seemed almost that he was relieved by her statement.

"Then—then—you are not engaged to him?" he stammered. "I imagined you were!"

Marcella flushed deeply; the rain splashed against her hot cheeks as she turned her face to him.

Digitized by Google

"Engaged to that man!" she repeated. "Oh. Mr. Nullius, I thought you understood me better than to think such a thing of me!" The reproach in her voice stung him.

"I wish I were in a position to understand you as I do myself," he exclaimed passionately; "but whenever I fancy that I know you just a little more, Miss Rust, I suddenly remember that the village curate, obscure and unknown, with probably a shameful parentage, has no right to try to understand the Lady Bountiful of the village!"

"You can never be obscure to me," she said gently, "because, Mr. Nullius, I recognise that you are my equal—or more so—that I am your inferior! You will one day have the living here, perhaps," she went on, "and then will lose that sense of not being equal with the people who are beneath you. I am always your friend," she added softly. "I hope you will remember that."

The curate's dark eyes met hers wistfully. "I will never forget it, Miss Rust. It will be a memory with a halo round it when I have left Crawley."

"Left Crawley," she said quickly. "Why, oh, Mr. Nullius, what has made you think of leaving?"

"The same reason that actuates the decision of all men with a sense of honour," he answered bitterly. "I cannot trust myself to stay here without doing what would lower me not only in the eyes of everyone in the parish, but particularly in those of the woman for whose sake I am leaving Crawley."

"Then you—love!" she breathed. "And the woman—does she reciprocate?"

"I do not know," he said slowly. "I dare not ask her. It is better to leave in ignorance. At any rate I shall have my honour left to me; I shall not have dragged it in the mud by declaring my love for a rich woman, when I have nothing in turn to offer her. Don't you think I am wise?"

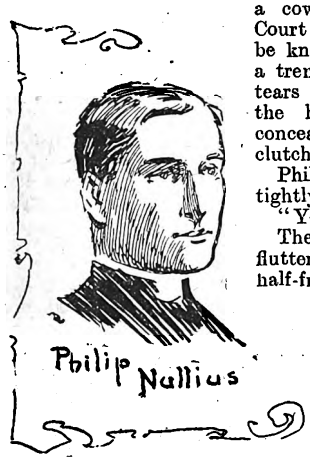
"If you ask me, Mr. Nullius," she said in a low tone, "the woman would rather you let her be the judge of what is best. She will know at once whether your love is more acceptable than money; she will know which she prefers—the glitter of gold, or the smile in your eyes. In justice to her you should let her be the arbiter of her fate. It is cruel to deny her the divine prerogative of her sex to bring joy to the man she loves!"

The curate's breath came hoarsely to her ears. It was too dark to see him; she only knew that his eyes were searching her face.

"You advise me to tell her?" he whispered. "To play pitch-and-toss with my happiness, and to be denied the humble privilege I have hitherto enjoyed—that of occasionally seeing her face and hearing her voice?"

She came to an abrupt standstill.

"Let her rather exercise the right of royalty, Mr. Nullius; let her bestow upon you the mark of royal favour! Then the blame will be on her shoulders—not yours. Don't be a cowardly suitor and flee the Court of Love; rather stay and be knighted 'Sir Chosen.' With a tremulous laugh, a blend of tears and smiles, she held out the hand that had remained concealed beneath her coat. It clutched a faded rose.



Philip Nullius grasped her hand tightly.

"You mean?" he said hoarsely.

The clouds hid the smile that fluttered to her lips; half-proud, half-frightened.

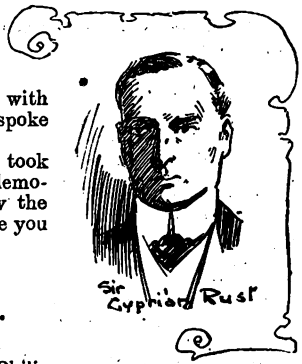
"That you are knighted a courtier in the Palace of Love!" she whispered.

He drew her closer.

"Marcella! Can I be awake—or is it a dream?"

She laughed tenderly.

"A dream—Love's Young Dream," she murmured; then, after a pause, in which the rain beat unnoticed against their faces, and the wind lashed them with cutting gusts, Marcella spoke again:



"Oh, Philip, how long it took me to change you from a democrat into a courtier, but now the 'Order of the Ribbon' will tie you to me for ever!"

FIFTEENTH CHAPTER.

"White Heather."

WHEN Marcella and Philip arrived at the Court it was quite dark, and the lights twinkled from the many windows that faced the long avenue leading up to the hall door.

"Come in with me," Marcella said softly—"let me tell father that you are not only my rescuer but the man I love."

"Dearest," he replied tenderly, "you do not know Sir Cyprian as I do. He would immediately think that I had presumed upon my position as your protector to force my attentions upon you—and in his anger and disappointment, he would deny you to me and perhaps take you away. Wait until I have obtained that living that is almost mine, then we will tell him together. It will only be for a few weeks now."

Marcella was silent. She would dearly have loved to have created a barrier between herself and her cousin, Edward Day. She distrusted him, and the open acknowledgment of her engagement would have shown him that all further hopes in her direction were out of the question.

But she saw the wisdom of her lover's advice, to wait until he had obtained the "living" for which he had worked, as then there would be more chance of Sir Cyprian listening to him. So, after a tender leave-taking, under the shadow of the trees, Marcella entered the Court by herself.

The hall was empty, but in the second hall opening out of it, and which generally was used as a smoking lounge, three figures stood near the glowing log fire.

They did not turn as Marcella stood motionless in the doorway, but she recognised Sir Cyprian, whose face was grave beyond the common; the second man was a stranger, with a particularly fine face, and kindly eyes, that Marcella instinctively felt she could trust. Then she remembered that her father had been expecting an old friend to stay with him, and guessed the identity of the new-comer.

The third figure was so much in the dark that she could only discern the faint outline of a man standing beside a mailed figure in armour. With a swift movement she gathered up her wet, clinging skirts and turned a little to the right towards the wide staircase, preferring rather to meet her father's guests in more conventional attire than a dishevelled dress, and wild, wind-tossed hair, whose moist strands still clung to her forehead.

As she moved noiselessly, the man standing in the shadow of the armour spoke suddenly, and Marcella caught her breath with a cry of amazement. It was the voice of the man whom she had hoped had accepted her snub, and left Crawley, or else had gone where she would never meet him again—at least until she could openly claim the protection of her lover from his attentions.

"How dared Edward Day come here when he knew that I did not desire his society even from Danger Point!" she thought angrily.

"Marcella can't be very long now, sir," he was saying, in his languid, aristocratic voice. "I left her under the care of the village curate; she probably desired to ask him questions regarding the Sunday-school, or on some other rural point. Anyway, I felt rather in the way, and came on alone. Marcella is in good hands, doubtless, though for myself I don't much fancy that curate chap. He has a sneaking way about him, as though he would think nothing of trying to be the social equal of a girl like Marcella."

Digitized by Google

Marcella's face burnt with indignation as she listened to the cruel, insidious tongue of her cousin—or rather the man she still imagined to be her cousin. That he had said the very words to incense her father against Philip, she knew only too well.

Sir Cyprian was a great believer in the distinction between the "rich man" and the village "Lazarus," and she guessed why Edward Day had so early paved the road to distrust and enmity against her lover in her father's mind. He was jealous already of her preference for the obscure curate. She pressed a little against the portière, the heavy folds of which fell round her, screening her from view.

"The curate!" Sir Cyprian's voice said, in tones of icy disgust. "I am surprised Marcella should show such a radical strain as to prefer his society to yours, her cousin! He is a worthy young man, I have no doubt, but Marcella must remember that she is the future mistress of the Court after me, and should learn that dignity befitting her position."

"What is the curate's name?" said the courteous voice of the man whose face had attracted Marcella. "After all, Rust, you must not forget that from curates have sprung our Deans, Bishops, and Archbishops. The church gives high honours to her servants."

The eyes of the listening girl sparkled with joy. Her lover had one defender already! She felt she almost loved the owner of the voice that had spoken so generously of an absent man.

"I admit the truth of your words, Slade," Sir Cyprian answered, with a sarcastic laugh, "but in the church, as in every other profession, it is influence that helps a man to success, and so far as I know this curate, Philip Nullius, has no prospects. The vicar tells me he came from some charity school!"

"Poor lad," murmured Dr. Slade, "all the more credit to him for having got on so well."

"Still," suggested the oily voice of Edward Day with a sneering laugh, "that is no excuse for his presumption in forcing himself upon Miss Rust, sir. Penniless adventurers have been members of the church before now, and the little I know about this curate is not very reassuring. He is a man of absolutely obscure parentage, and I should hardly consider him the sort of person of whom my cousin should make a friend."

"Coward! Despicable coward!" breathed Marcella, as she reached her room in safety, and gazed at her reflection in the mirror. Her eyes were gleaming, and her cheeks flushed with the wave of contempt that swept over her, as she thought of the cruel, back-biting man who stooped to insinuate vile motives to another man immeasurably his superior in every way.

Her maid looked at her young mistress curiously. "Lor, miss," she exclaimed, "you'll catch your death of cold if you don't change quickly—you are drenched to the skin, miss, with being out in this storm!"

Marcella laughed carelessly. "A hot bath will put me all right, Jane; a little rain won't hurt me."

The maid went about her duties quietly, and when, refreshed and glowing from the contact of the warm water, Marcella sat down to have her hair dressed, Jane said:

"The housekeeper is so put about, miss; the master sent for 'er some time ago, and told 'er to prepare one of the guest rooms in the north wing for Mr. Day, who will stay till next week, and she did think it a shame she should 'ave been told so late—only just before dinner."

Marcella frowned. The thought that Edward Day should be living under her own roof for even a few hours was distasteful to her.

She wondered uneasily whether her visit to Danger Point rock had not been the beginning of a succession of ominous events, in which the only bright one was her secret engagement to Philip Nullius; but aloud, she said quietly: "Don't gossip, Jane. The housekeeper has not much cause to complain. The Court sees very few guests at present. Take out my white satin dress, and my pearls," she went on, "I will wear them to-night."

When she was dressed Marcella dismissed her maid, and going to her writing-table, opened a box that had arrived that morning from an old school-fellow at the Convent in Brussels, and who now was staying in Scotland.

In the box lay a wreath of white heather, and a few words written in a hasty girlish hand.

"DEAREST MARCELLA,—I am sending you some white heather. It is very rare now, and it has taken me a long time to get enough to make the inclosed wreath. You know the old adage, don't you?—that if you wear white heather on any special event in your life, only good fortune can follow you! So I am inclosing this wreath of heather for you to don when you wish your luck to be especially brilliant! Let me know if the proverb comes true in your case, dear! If it does not it will prove a very strange exception.—In haste, your affectionate friend,

"DIANA WESTBROOK."

Marcella smiled as she folded the note, then took up the wreath of white heather and looked at it. "This is a special event in my life to-night," she murmured. "My engagement to Philip Nullius! It is strange that Diana should have sent this now. The very day on which I desire my luck to be bright and prosperous. Yes, I will test Diana's adage and wear her heather, and I trust it will be a harbinger of joy for Philip and myself."

Quickly removing the pearls from her hair she fastened the wreath around the soft coils of her brown tresses, then picking up her fan, she left the room and went downstairs to the drawing-room.

"Ah, Marcella," Sir Cyprian said quickly, "I am glad to see, child, that your adventure has left you none the worse. You were fortunate to be in such good hands."

Marcella looked at her father thoughtfully, then said quietly: "Yes, father. Had Mr. Nullius not heard my cry, and being unable to get up the Point himself on account of a sprained ankle, sent Mr. Day to bring me down, I should still have been on Danger Point—or, rather, over it!"

A curious expression crossed Sir Cyprian's face. Then it vanished, as he said suavely: "I referred to your cousin, Edward Day, as the 'good hands' in which you were, my dear. It was he who brought you down to safety—Mr. Nullius merely played a secondary part."

Marcella shrugged her shoulders. "The subject is hardly worth arguing about. I am inclined to think that I owe a great deal to Mr. Nullius—you, that I owe a great deal to Edward Day! Why discuss it any further? You must introduce me to your friend," she went on, with a gracious smile, turning to Dr. Slade, who since her entrance had watched her with searching eyes and a slightly amused smile as he heard her put her important father on one side so carelessly.

Sir Cyprian concealed his vexation, as he said lightly: "This is my truant daughter, Slade! Don't you think she is a handful to begin contradicting her old father on her return from a dangerous adventure?"

"I think Miss Marcella shows a very pretty spirit in defending the person to whom she considers she owes her life!" he replied laughingly. Then addressing Marcella, he said admiringly: "Forgive me for noticing your unusual decoration, Miss Marcella. White heather is quite a Scottish amulet for good luck."

Digitized by Google

Marcella laughed. "I am wearing it for that reason, sir," she returned prettily. "I have a wish for this day to begin a new era in my life—much has changed it for me."

A strange light leapt into the pale eyes of Edward Day as he came up to her with suppressed eagerness. His vanity was supreme, yet he hardly dared hope that it was his influence that had changed his cousin's life.

"Let me beg for one leaf of the heather, Marcella," he said laughingly. "My luck needs repairing badly. I'm sure you won't refuse me."

She drew back sharply, and shook her head. "No, I shall share my good fortune with no one. It is mine to mar or to cherish, and I prefer to cherish it."

SIXTEENTH CHAPTER.

Marcella Flings Down the Gauntlet.

AFTER dinner Marcella went into the drawing-room and scribbled a note to Lady Violet. She remembered that her aunt had asked her always to write her when she felt worried or in any way lonely, and in spite of her happiness there was a subtle something in the air that told her that her cousin's presence in the Court would work some ill to her, or her lover..

"I wish you were here, dear aunt," she wrote. "I want to pour something into your sympathetic ear, and, besides, I want to feel you near me. Did you know that Edward was here? He came to the Court this evening and is staying some days.—I am your always loving, "MARCELLA."

She stamped and sealed her letter, then turned to see Sir Cyprian at her side. "Well, Marcella," he said gently, "Writing to your aunt? Give me your letter. I will put it in the post-bag with mine." Then he went on quickly, "I am sorry that you should have snubbed your cousin, dear. He is a nice fellow, and having just obtained a post as secretary to the financier Caleb J. Johnson, seems in a position to become a wealthy man."

"I don't like him," she said coldly.

He smiled. "Perhaps you prefer the curate?"

Marcella laughed. "That's rather rough on Mr. Nullius, father. He deserves a better comparison than Edward Day. "Ah," she cried mockingly, as the portière shook slightly. "Don't be afraid, Edward. Come in openly. I am not ashamed of my opinion of you. Come and hear it."

With a livid face and skulking manner, he came forward and looked at her, radiant in her white glitter of satin, and with the wreath of heather resting on her dark hair.

"Be silent, Marcella," said her father coldly. "I forbid you to speak like that to my guest and your cousin. I forbid you also to hold any further communication with the curate, Philip Nullius! Do you hear me?"

An expression like that which had been in the face of Lady Violet on the occasion of her last interview with Sir Cyprian crept into the face of the baronet's daughter.

"I hear you—yes, father," she said slowly, "but I cannot obey you. I am over twenty-one, you know, and my own mistress. And to-night I have given my allegiance to someone who will come first with me in future."

Sir Cyprian took a step towards her, then stopped abruptly as though recollecting that it would not do to drop his mask before her. "What do you mean, child?" he said, with a forced smile. "Are you mad, or playing a practical joke on me and your cousin?"

"Mad," she laughed recklessly, forgetting the secret she had agreed to keep, in her eagerness to humiliate the man who had dared to spy upon her. "No, not mad, unless it is with love. I mean that there will be no further occasion for Mr. Day to annoy me, nor you to question me, father. I am engaged to the curate, Philip Nullius!"

A muttered imprecation rose to the younger man's lips, but Sir Cyprian stopped him with a raised hand. His face was very pale, and his eyes shone brilliantly.

"I won't discuss this matter any further, Marcella," he said gently. "You are naturally overstrung, and not yourself. It would be unkind to take you seriously; Dr. Slade has gone out for a stroll, or I would ask him to see you; but go to bed now, my child, and rest—a good long sleep will work wonders."

"But—but," Marcella faltered, feeling that her bold stroke had fallen strangely flat, "I am quite well, and know what I am talking about—I am engaged to Mr. Nullius. Nothing will alter that!" She spoke defiantly, yet the stillness with which her words were received struck a sudden chill in her. She had expected anger, argument, pleading—anything but this pitying commiseration.

Edward Day's white face stood out like a cameo—only his eyes gleamed viciously upon her, and Sir Cyprian's voice grew even more gentle, as he said:

"Come, dear, you must go to bed. To-morrow I will let you talk to me as long as you like, but now I will not risk the responsibility of letting you talk yourself into any great excitement." He held the door open, and feeling that she somehow had failed to hit the note of dignity and outraged pride at which she had struck, Marcella left the room with burning cheeks and stately head.

The door closed gently upon her. Then Sir Cyprian turned and looked at his sister-in-law's nephew. "Come, my boy. Cheer up"—he laughed—"girls always talk like that! Marcella is like other girls. You and I must prevent her from following up her folly!"

"We must not let that miserable curate win her, sir!" panted the young man.

Sir Cyprian laughed again. "That will be easy to prevent, Edward. It rests with you to help me keep Marcella at the Court, or let her waste her beauty in a cottage with the curate."

Edward Day bit his lips. "I would do anything," he muttered, "anything to keep them apart."

Sir Cyprian looked at him sharply. "Anything," he murmured. "Well, well—we shall see! You may be able to help me, and your cousin from making a mesalliance."

Edward Day leant forward, his white, passionate face startling even the self-possessed baronet.

"Anything!" he repeated, with a hysterical laugh. "Yes, I would do anything to keep that miserable curate from winning her. I would commit any crime even—break any law—to stand between them."

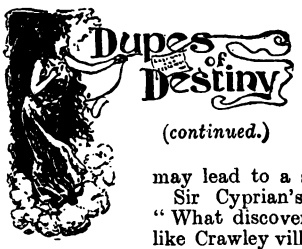
When he had retired to the library to wait for his old friend the doctor to join him after his ramble, Sir Cyprian sat smoking silently, deep in thought. Once or twice he muttered; "That hot-headed fool will be as pliable as wax! His love for the girl will be a powerful lever. I shall touch the notes, and they, the unconscious instruments, will make the music.

"Danger Point cheated me this afternoon. But I must not let the elements interfere with my plans. Providence has a knack of slipping in between the arrangements of man in a way not always pleasing. I must so work that Providence will have no chance of thwarting me." He drew from his pocket the letter Marcella had given to him to post, and read it with cynical smile—then flung it on the fire.

"So, there are confidences with her aunt already, are there? I must stop these!"

As he took up another cigar the door opened suddenly, and Dr. Slade came into the room. His face was alive with an intense excitement, and his voice trembled, as he caught the baronet's shoulder.

Digitized by Google



(continued.)

"Cyprian, old man, I have made a discovery!" he cried. "I've a good mind to follow it up—it may lead to a sensational story."

Sir Cyprian's blue eyes opened lazily. "What discovery could you make in a place like Crawley village?" he laughed.

"The discovery," continued the doctor impressively, "that the young curate at whom you and your nephew laughed this evening, is one of the children of that poor girl I attended on board the Australian liner twenty-five years ago. He is the boy whose history is wrapped in secret mystery. And I am going to find it out. That fellow, Rust, is no ordinary waif—you will find in time that he may prove himself even a fitting match for your lovely young daughter—more so than that puppy Edward Day!"

Sir Cyprian turned languidly in his chair. He looked interested, and his cigar had gone out. "That sounds quite romantic; 'pon my soul, Slade," he said gently, "you ought to be a novelist! Because you brought a waif into the world twenty-five years ago, you jump to the conclusion that all succeeding waifs must be your special one.

"I suppose," he went on, "you met the curate serenading my daughter."

"No," snapped the doctor. "I met him at the dispensary of the doctor here; he was getting bandages for an old woman. We strolled into the village together, and by a few leading questions, which he answered rapidly enough, I patched up the facts. He was sent to the Foundling Home that my waif had been sent to—the same year, the same month, and they told him in the house that he had come from a ship as a baby. I like the boy, and for his dead unknown mother's sake, I will try to help him." Then with an angry snort Dr. Slade slammed the door behind him.

Sir Cyprian rose, looked at himself in the glass, then smiled softly.

"I shall have to be particularly careful—particularly prompt. Those inquiries must be nipped in the bud by Fate. The curate must always be 'Philip Nullius!' It will be safer for him than—than the other!" He shivered, and glanced at the door. "It's strange, Marcella, and that—that boy—if it should be so! But," he exclaimed suddenly, and with a tightening of his lips, "I must step in between, and turn the wheel of Fate towards myself. Nothing shall intervene—nothing can cast me from my position—nothing, except——"

With another shiver he switched the light off, and opening the door, went softly to his own room.

SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER.

Sir Cyprian Makes an Offer.

THE first thing Marcella did the following morning was to escape as soon after breakfast as she could without offending her father's guests, and steal out of the Court by a side door in the garden, then make her way through the few fields that lay between her home and the parish church.

She felt she wanted to see her lover, to tell him that in her anger the night before she had betrayed their secret, and broken her word to him.

As she walked up the quiet church yard, Philip Nullius came out of the vestry door.

There had been a choir practice, and he had been glad to get away from the singing, and seize the chance of a few quiet minutes to himself. He wanted to think of this woman whose gift of love had changed the world from a dull grey monotony into a brilliant place of promise and joy. He was loved—and he loved! The whole of his past life rose before him in contrast with the radiant visions that lay full of beauty at his feet.

And at the door of the vestry he came face to face with the woman of his dreams! Marcella swayed towards him with a tender smile.

"Philip!"

"Marcella!"

The sunlight flashed upon them—the birds in the ivy that clustered up the walls of the church chirrupped one to the other, but they only heard the throbbing of each other's hearts—only saw the love-light in each other's faces.

At last Marcella spoke. "I have a confession to make," she faltered. "I—I—oh, Philip—I could not help it, but I told my father, before my cousin Edward, that I was engaged to you. I was annoyed with him, and forgot that you had asked me to wait until you had obtained the living that you expected. Forgive me."

"Forgive," he murmured. "How can you ask me, darling! After all I am glad that you were open and frank at first. Perhaps I was in the wrong to have suggested your silence until I had made sure of the living. You were right, darling, to have spoken at once. I will see Sir Cyprian to-day. Was he very angry with you?"

Marcella blushed. "Well, I can hardly say," she murmured. "He seemed to think that I was not in a fit state to be argued with about anything. He did not take me at all seriously, and suggested that a good night's rest would put me right. But oh! Philip," she said, with a sudden burst of fear, "you understood last night that I knew what I was talking about when I gave you my heart for all time, didn't you? My father thought I was joking, but—but you knew that I was never more serious in my life than I was then?"

His eyes flashed eagerly into hers.

"Darling, I know that last night you made me the proudest and happiest of men. I can understand your father not crediting you with a serious motive in declaring your love for such an ineligible fellow as myself," he added sadly. "But I will work hard, and prove myself almost worthy of your love, my darling, though now I am indeed but a poor match for the heiress of Sir Cyprian Rust."

"Don't say that," she murmured. "Since love levels all things, then it has made us equals. And, oh! Philip, you have changed the world for me! Before I had only Aunt Violet to love—somehow I could never feel more than respect and obedience for my father, though he has always been very good to me, but you have put rose-coloured glasses on my eyes, and I see the world through tender tints!"

It was a very secluded spot that the vestry door of the Parish Church opened upon, great trees hung protecting branches almost over to the church walls, and the strip of vivid green was trodden by no feet save those of the vicar—the curate, and the boys who went in to choir practice on week days, and to church on Sundays.

There was no possible chance of the handsome curate and the lovely heiress of the Court being interrupted in their stolen love-making outside the vestry door, and safe in their knowledge of these simple facts the lovers indulged in those sweet greetings that mean so much when exchanged between "two hearts that beat as one," and in whose eyes the sun rises, and sets.

So Marcella nestled in her lover's arms and received his kisses as her due homage, revelling in the knowledge that there—outside the vestry door—within the shadow of the church, they could exchange their tender love words safe in the seclusion of the rarely-trodden path.

"And"—Philip Nullius said in a deep, tender voice—"you are really mine, beloved! Wherever you go, in whatever brilliant assembly your duty takes you, your heart will remain true to the obscure curate in your father's parish? It is almost cruel to let you make a sacrifice like this," he went on bitterly. "Your youth and beauty should have a better setting that I can give them—yet a deeper love will never be found than mine for you, beloved."

"Hush!" she said softly. "If there is any sacrifice at all, Philip, it is one that I welcome with all my heart. Love delights in sacrifices, and it is only a joy for me to escape from the artificial atmosphere of the London drawing-rooms, where I meet men cast in the same insipid mould as my cousin, Edward Day, and it is no loss to lose sight of such men as he.

Digitized by Google

"Only this morning I thought that, compared with your honest, straightforward nature the strained, unnatural compliments of Edward Day were an insult to a self-respecting woman. I felt that a nasty insect had crawled across my hand when he touched it—and I shivered."

A woman's hand was pressed against the glass panel!

A light, sneering laugh broke the lovers' confidences, and, turning with crimson cheeks and frightened eyes, Marcella saw her father and her cousin, Edward Day.

Sir Cyprian looked sad and reproachful, an air of dignity seemed to have touched him, and in the presence of such silent reproof, Marcella became suddenly like a small child caught on forbidden ground. Edward Day, on the other hand, was smiling at her with a leering expression that gave his cruel face an additional menace.

Sir Cyprian broke the silence. He addressed himself to Marcella, ignoring the presence of the tall, grave young curate, who stood so calmly beside his daughter.

"You had better return to the Court, child," he said gently. "I am of course astonished and hurt at your conduct, but," he shrugged his shoulders, "youth and indiscretion always run hand-in-hand, so I will not say any more, except that you should be glad that your father and cousin only witnessed your disgrace, and for our own sakes you may rely on us not to publish it broadcast."

"Father," Marcella cried, with flashing eyes. "How can you speak like that! I am not ashamed of myself. I have every right to be here with Mr. Nullius. He is my future husband, as I told you last night. Tell them, Philip," she went on, in a quivering voice. "Tell them that we are engaged!"

"Your daughter has done me the honour of accepting me as her future husband, Sir Cyprian," began Philip Nullius. "I wished to call and see you to-day."

Sir Cyprian, ignoring his words entirely, turned to his nephew. "You see," he said sadly, "how the poor girl is induced to believe that she means the nonsense this young man has put into her mouth."

Then addressing Marcella, who had grown a little pale, he said gently; "Now, my dear, run along home and try to rest. I see you are inclined to be wild in your speech again, and to encourage unconventional proposals in a manner that would be impossible were you not under the influence of this man!"

Marcella cast an appealing glance at her lover, who had also grown white and stern looking, but he smiled reassuringly at her as he said quietly:

"Do as your father wishes now, dearest. We understand each other, and nothing can take back the vows we have sworn."

"Good-bye," she returned. "I love you, Philip, and no one"—with a defiant ring in her voice—"can rob us of each other. Good-bye, darling!"

With a last tender look she moved away, then paused, and glanced back at the three men.

"Go home, Philip," she said. "I don't wish you to stay long after I have gone. For my sake be wise and refuse to quarrel, however great your provocation."

As she walked down the path that led into the road, her cousin caught her up.

"Your village lover shall not be ill-treated, Marcella!" he said laughingly. "I shall not stay to frighten him."

She looked at him contemptuously. "You frighten him!" she said slowly. "Why, one blow from Philip Nullius would half kill you. You have more reason to fear him. Go back, I wish to be alone; had I desired society I would have called my dogs to follow me. I do not care for mongrels!"

He stood where she left him, his eyes full of hate and rage. "Mongrel, am I! All right, my lady Marcella! The mongrel will teach the thoroughbred a lesson one day."

In the meantime Sir Cyprian was speaking to the curate, who had briefly stated his love for Marcella, and his modest expectations.

Digitized by Google

(continued.)

"I am glad that you have spoken so openly," said the baronet, looking at him intently, "and in spite of my disapproval of this sort of thing, I will, on one condition, not punish my daughter or you, by reporting your breach of confidence to the vicar."

The curate flushed. "And that is, Sir Cyprian?" he said quickly.

"That you don't attempt to see my daughter for a month, or to tell her by letter anything of the confidence or conversation that passed between us, Mr. Nullius," Sir Cyprian began slowly. "She is highly excitable, and I sometimes fear for her reason in those moments of mad, passionate rage. I have this proposal to make to you, and if you consent to it, you may succeed in making yourself financially better able to think of marrying.

"There is a friend of mine, a clergyman, living in the South of England. I will send you to him with a good letter of introduction, on those terms of silence concerning my daughter. She would think nothing of following you, and creating a scandal. Do you consent?" and Sir Cyprian's lip quivered with a suppressed emotion.

Philip Nullius hesitated. The thought of leaving Marcella in ignorance of his destiny or even his parting, was hard, since he knew that she would wonder and perhaps doubt because he had not trusted her.

But, on the other hand, he was desirous of winning a chance of making a better home than he had at present to offer any woman, and as his annual holiday was drawing near, which would mean a month, he thought it a good plan to accept Sir Cyprian's offer, and so please him, though it hurt him to feel that he was going to do something to bring tears to those dear eyes. But the living—the extra income it might mean—decided him, and, besides, Marcella's father had made the offer.

"Yes," he said simply. "I will accept your terms, sir, and on my honour I agree to do as you ask, only you will tell Marcella that I am away on business for you, sir?"

Sir Cyprian smiled distantly. "Certainly, Mr. Nullius. She shall hear enough to ease her mind concerning your safety."

As Philip Nullius went off in the direction of the village, Sir Cyprian smiled softly as though well pleased.

"Well, sir," said Edward Day, "has he listened to the voice of reason?"

"Mr. Nullius has agreed with me," replied the baronet gently, "that it will do his health good to start on a month's holiday."

The two pairs of eyes—both blue, both wicked—met in a steady glance.

"A month's holiday," murmured Edward Day thoughtfully, "that will be very good for him I should think, sir."

Sir Cyprian nodded and linked his arm in that of the younger man. "Yes, Edward. A lot can happen in a month. Let us hope that Mr. Nullius will meet only with the good luck we both desire him on his month's holiday. You must console Marcella, while I"—he sighed—"while I arrange matters concerning our friend the curate."

Then laughing softly, both men strolled down the narrow strip of gravel between the graves, and slowly sauntered towards the Court, their arms linked, like their lives, in a bond of fellowship.

EIGHTEENTH CHAPTER.

What Marcella Saw.

Two days later Marcella, who had been kept indoors on account of a nasty chill, the result of her experience on Danger Point, sat down at her little writing-table and penned a letter. It was to her lover, and in it she begged him to write her and tell her what had passed between her father and himself. Then she sealed it, and addressing Jane, who was waiting on her, said with a slight blush:

"I want you to leave this letter at Mr. Nullius' rooms, Jane. Don't let it go out of your hands until it is in his possession. It is an important letter."

"Mr. Nullius, miss," replied Jane, a great understanding regarding her young mistress' troubled eyes, coming in a sudden flash upon her. "Why, miss, it's the talk in the village that Mr. Nullius is going away this afternoon. And there are some as says that there is a lot be'ind it. He looks so sad like!"

Marcella caught the woman's arm. "Away, did you say, Jane?" she cried. "Then there is no time to be lost—none! He will be starting by the two o'clock express from Crawley to London; I know the train, you must go down to the station, Jane, and put that letter into Mr. Nullius' hands. Do you hear? Go now! I will finish that lace you were unpicking. You have just an hour before the train goes—hurry—hurry!"

Jane hesitated. Servants are keen to read between the lines of a family estrangement, and Jane guessed that her handsome, high-spirited young mistress, had vexed Sir Cyprian because of her liking for the society of the fascinating curate.

But she loved her mistress, and she feared Sir Cyprian, and Jane had all an old maid's liking to see the ways of lovers made easy. So she took the letter obediently, and slipped out of the Court by the servant's entrance, and started at a jog trot for the station, which was three miles off.

Marcella walked up and down the dainty sitting-room which was her own special den. She was wondering how it came to pass that Philip Nullius should be leaving Crawley without letting her see him to say good-bye. She knew he loved her, and yet he was going off without making a single attempt to see her.

What did it mean? Whose hand was moving beneath it all? She could not help thinking that her father, and, incidentally, her cousin, had a share in the departure of her lover.

Her eyes flashed and her cheeks paled with a sudden resolve that, let come what may, she would fight her enemies and his, and not be moved one inch from the course she had marked out for herself.

She wished, however, that she had received an answer to her letter to Lady Violet. She longed for the sympathetic voice and caressing smile of that beautiful aunt, and her silence was a little disappointing.

She preferred to keep to her room, for Edward Day was still in the house, and she had determined not to meet him again, or to leave the privacy of her own rooms until the unwelcome guest had gone. After what seemed an interminable length of time, Jane returned, hot, panting, but triumphant.

"Did you see Mr. Nullius?" Marcella said quickly.

Jane nodded. "I was just in time, miss, the train was on the point of starting when I saw Mr. Nullius on the platform. 'E was quite alone, so I stepped up to 'im and gave 'im your letter. 'Is face lit up sudden-like, and he opened it quick, then said to me, very slow and impressive:

"'Tell your mistress that all is well. Not to worry or to think that I shall forget our conversation outside the church. I am going away on business that will be a means of my future advancement.' Then he wrote some words on a bit of paper and put it in your envelope. I got away, miss, just as Sir Cyprian drove into the station, but 'e didn't see me, 'is eyes were all on Mr. Nullius."

Silently Marcella took the note. That her lover was going away openly was a relief, but why had he not called or written before, and what did her father's presence at the station portend?

She untwisted the note and read the pencilled words:

"Sweetheart—good-bye, my thoughts and heart's love are yours. I love you.—P. N."

She pressed the words to her lips, with a sigh. Philip was gone. She could only possess her soul in patience and wait till he returned. Perhaps after all, her father was not so hard as she had imagined.

Digitized by Google

She dined alone, and after writing another letter to her aunt, went out into the corridor for a stroll. She knew that her father and his guests would be smoking and playing billiards, and she was not afraid of meeting them.

She found herself after a time near the wing that contained the mysterious door her father's valet had forbidden her to enter. It was the corridor through which the dark, silent man had passed, then vanished. She looked at it and saw the key in the lock, and acting on a sudden impulse, passed through, and turned the key. She was on the right side of the unused wing now.

Walking softly, aided by a dim flicker of light, she came to the door that Deacon had barred. The key was in that also.

Marcella smiled. Her father's servants were strangely lax in their supervision.

She pushed the door gently, it yielded, and she found herself at the top of a flight of stairs that finished in darkness.

She poised irresolutely on the narrow landing. It was dirty and did not look inviting. After all, why trouble about lumber rooms. Deacon was right, the dust was awful.

As she turned to retrace her steps a sound filtered through the darkness to her acute hearing. It was a faint cry. She listened, and it was repeated. Then with a swift spurt of courage, Marcella went down the stairs, and found herself in a passage, fairly clean.

On one side was a door, and in front of the door hung a curtain. Cautiously, and with quickened breath, Marcella lifted one end of the curtain, then stood petrified with amazement.

The panels in the door were of glass, transparent; and pressed against one of the panels, as though tired of beating it, was a white delicate hand.

It was the hand of a woman!

(Another long instalment of this serial next week.)

MR. PORKHAM: "Again I ask you, Miss Leflard, will you be my wife?" Miss Leflard: "No, Mr. Porkham, I cannot be your wife; but I will be——" Mr. Porkham: "A sister, of course." Miss Leflard: "No; a grandmother. Your grandfather proposed last night."

JESS: "Jack's entire truthfulness was what captivated me." Bess: "What did he say when he proposed to you?" Jess: "It ran thus—'I have never loved a woman as I do you since—since'—(referring to his notebook)—'since—let me see—the 18th of August.'"

MAY (to her best young man): "Now, Charlie, you must be careful and not expose yourself to the weather. Now, you were out in the rain last night?" Charlie: "No, I wasn't, little one. What makes you think so?" May: "Why, papa came home and said he met you coming home from the lodge, and that you were thoroughly soaked."

HUSBAND: "Now, I think that is going too far. You promised me you would countermand your order for that dress." Wife: "I wrote to the dressmaker that very day." "But here are the dress and the bill for it—enough to make me bankrupt almost! How do you explain that?" "I gave you the letter to post, and I suppose you forgot it, as usual."

JOHNNY: "Oh, my prerogatives are chapped!" Father: "Why, what do you mean, Johnny—your lips?" Johnny: "I always thought they were lips until last night, when I saw Mr. Thayer kissing sister in the hall, and when I asked him what he was doing, he said he was only exercising his prerogative, so of—" Sister: "Father, will you put Johnny to bed?"

Your Editor Chats.

I HOPE you will all like "Decoyed!"—the new series of which the opening instalment appears in this number.

Nowadays my readers have been led to expect so much from Short Stories that it is by no means an easy matter to supply their very exacting demands, yet I flatter myself that I am gifted in being able to discriminate between just what they do and what they do not want. That is the reason why I think that "Decoyed!" will be a popular series.

The young lady who is narrating in these episodes the story of a noteworthy period of her life does not, of course, considering the position in Society she now occupies, wish for her real name to be disclosed, so she has concealed herself under the name of Vivienne d'Alton. For the same reason she has carefully disguised all other clues by which she could be personally traced. But for these slight exceptions, the experiences related are perfectly true, incomprehensible though they may appear to many readers. Others, who have themselves been the victims of unscrupulous persons, will understand how such marvellous things can happen in Society circles, even in the twentieth century. In the vast majority of cases where young girls are made the butt of swindlers, nothing of the scandals ever sees the light of day, because those who have suffered do not care to have their misfortunes made the subject of common gossip. Unfortunately, the rogues who systematically practise their loathsome calling, know this, and, in the end, when their misdeeds are discovered, they successfully trade on the feelings of those they have ensnared.

However, the lady who calls herself "Vivienne d'Alton" has decided to tell Short Stories readers of all that happened to her, so that they, if they are ever placed in similar circumstances, may steer clear of the danger she encountered.

IN a cheery letter that Private C. H. Williams, F. Company, 2nd South West Borderers, Bloemfontein, S. Africa, sends me, the writer states how he, being a Northampton man, was greatly interested in the account of the experiences of Sara Gillespie at that town. He deplores the fact that "being a soldier on the veld I can scarcely get any papers to read. I should especially like a complete set of Short Stories containing 'The Pursuit of Sara.'"

May I remind readers that though the actual Boer War is now happily over, there are still many thousands of British Tommies in the two new Colonies. These have the greatest difficulty in getting any literature to read, and you would be doing a very kind action if, after you had finished with this paper, you would forward it on to the men who carry the guns. This is almost the only way in which Tommy Atkins can get anything at all to read.

On page 35 there appears the first of a series of pictures illustrating types of English lovers in various centuries. Some Scottish ones will also appear.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

LOVE— AND AN ACCIDENT.

How Robert Dutton Tried to Save His Honour.

"I SHALL never learn to feel indifferent about it, Robert."

"But, Muriel, don't you know that people who act in the most impassioned love scenes often hate each other?"

"Well, I am sure that sallow Italian girl loves you. Her soul is in her eyes when she is with you."

"Poor little Sigismunda!"

"You pity her—you know that she loves you!" exclaimed the young girl pettishly, drawing away from the arm to which she had been clinging in that openly affectionate manner which would have stamped them in the eyes of the most casual observer as betrothed lovers.

"Muriel, am I a conceited cad? I have felt sorry for the girl, who has to face trials of which you can't conceive. She was stolen in her babyhood by some man, I believe, and starved and beaten till her talent for singing was discovered. Then she was a street singer, a forlorn child out in the frozen streets—at tavern doors—in the crowd after a play—till her talent grew more marketable, and here she is."

"But the man does not own her now, does he?" asked Muriel with some interest.

"No, she is free. There is no one—she is alone in the world."

"No wonder there is such a hunger in her eyes, Robert. They devour you when she looks at you."

"You jealous little girl! Well, I'm afraid I like you being jealous," Robert said, holding her fast. "But do you think I care for the glances of those gloomy, dark, cavernous eyes, when such a blue, laughing, heavenly pair are watching me? Do you not know that I am thinking of you when I utter the burning, passionate words, and when I seem to enfold that poor girl in my arms I imagine you are there?"

"Don't make it too real, Robert, or she—she might mistake," whispered Muriel blissfully, looking up at the magnificent proportions of the being who was all her own, and feeling an ecstatic delight in her property. He was only a singer in comic opera, and there had been considerable opposition to the engagement, as the young woman's father, a dealer in tallow, did not behold the demigod with his daughter's eyes. But Muriel was an only child, and had never been opposed in her life. And it must be confessed that Robert Dutton was quite a presentable individual, with a well-bred air about him which rather confounded the tallow-chandler, and kept him at a distance.

The two young people were lingering in one of the bright little parks of our city, where the grass had grown emerald-green during the few days of Spring sunshine. On the boughs overhead a light and delicate tracery of green seemed hovering, and a few daisy stars shone whitely in the sod.

Muriel, pale and fair as a Scandinavian princess, with eyes as cold and blue as any turquoise stone, and hair of the palest gold, looked like a snow-maiden.

Only under Robert's ardent looks did a faint rose-flush ever colour those cheeks, and then it was like the after-glow kindled by sunset on the snowy peaks.

"I wish I could melt her—I wish I could waken her soul, if she has one," Robert thought, with some disappointment, as he left his betrothed that day.

He often felt the chill—the limitations of her nature; but though she were as soulless as Undine, he loved her, and spent his time in trying to warm the cold heart to life.

* * * *

"I say, Podsnap, that Italian girl's gettin' a stunner," said a languid dandy to the manager, as they looked on the stage from the side-scenes, "colour's no longer sallow, it's luminous—what Davenport would call sun-steeped. And she used to be such a skinny little beggar."

"All the difference between macaroni and beef," returned the manager, looking at Sigismunda with the eye of one who raised prize cattle. "She was starved before. Tell you what, my boys, look at those eyes—ain't they lanterns, ain't they stars. No, by Jove! They're blazing bonfires, they're fireworks, they're conflagrations!"

Sigismunda, in the dress of a Roman peasant girl, looked like the true type of the ardent tropical land from which she came.

Lithe and graceful in every movement, she seemed one blaze of colour, in her gorgeously-tinted raiment, with the strings of pink coral on the neck, the scarlet of a pomegranate blossom on cheek and lip, the blue-black gloss of her hair, and the flashing eyes, like antique jewels—dark, yet bright, appealing, tender, passionate, disdainful, scathing—blasting with a lightning-like scorn the villain in the play who approaches her with unlawful love.

Then Robert came upon the stage, and it was her rôle to spring forward to him with an appeal. He is her betrothed, and she cries out to him to save her, to deliver her from her persecutor, who never gives her peace from his unhallowed pursuit. It is Robert's part to shoot the villain down. He fires, and, to his horror, Sigismunda falls. By some mischance he has used a loaded revolver, and the girl had happened to receive the bullet.

She does not faint—she does not see—but she feels who it is that raises her up.

"Do not," she moans; "go away, do not look at me, I must be hideous."

For she knows by the horrible pain that her face must be drawn and distorted, and even in the agony of that moment she cannot bear that the man she loves should behold her.

"My poor child, do not think of that!" cried Robert, in an agony of terror. "I thought I had killed you. I believe I should have shot myself if I had. Look at me. Good Heavens! What is it? Can you not open your eyes?"

"She is fainting!" said a doctor, who had sprung upon the stage. "Take her out and give her air."

Once out in the green room the wound was examined. The bullet had torn its way across her face in an eccentric course and entered a pasteboard tree near.

"She will live," was the verdict, "but I fear she is horribly disfigured, and may lose the sight of one eye."

Robert Dutton dropped on his knees at the side of the girl in an agony of self-accusation.

"Save her sight, doctor!" he cried. "Send for the best assistance—spare nothing. I will be responsible."

"We will do what we can, but that pretty face is fatally marred, and I fear the worst with the eyes."

The girl was in a dead faint during this cruel verdict.

With the use of restoratives she came to her senses and moved her hands. Robert seized them

Digitized by Google

"I am here," he whispered.

"How dark it is. Have they put all the lights out?" she said. "Oh, I remember," and she clutched Robert's hand. "But why, why can't I see? And then this burning, fiery pain, as if my very eyeballs were scorched out! Oh, tell me—tell me, I am not blind—not blind!"

"No—no," whispered Robert pitifully, "all will be well in time, but you have been hurt. You know I did that, and I am miserable. I can never be happy again unless you recover, so you must try, will you not, to be quiet and calm, and do all they say? We will have the best skill, and hope for the best."

"I will do all you ask," she said softly. "Don't grieve too much, but I hope I may not be frightful in your eyes."

* * * * * *

For weeks after this terrible scene Robert went in vain every day to the humble lodging of the wounded girl. He never saw her. He had quite won the heart of Mrs. Bolger, the fat landlady, who had set him down at once as a distracted lover, and sympathised with him accordingly.

"Which it wrings my 'eart to see the poor lamb," she said, "as he's werry quiet, an' only moans now and then, as stands to reason, seein' her livin's gone, which she were not one as could go about with a dog a-singin' ballads like a blind man, but was that ladylike and delicate, an' wotever is to become of her?"

"I'll attend to that!" cried Robert. "But why — why won't she see me?"

"Well, it must be owned as her looks is not wot they was," Mrs. Bolger said, hesitatingly. "An' wot's beauty, arter all, when the 'eart's the right sort; but it comes 'ard, and then she can't see 'erself, and that makes it wuss and wuss."

"But the doctor said only one eye was affected."

"I believe she do 'ave a glimmer in one, an' in time that will be better."

"She must hate me!" cried Robert.

"Lord love you, it's t'other way!" cried Mrs. Bolger. "Which I do think, an' so I tells 'er as it would be better to get the first visit over."

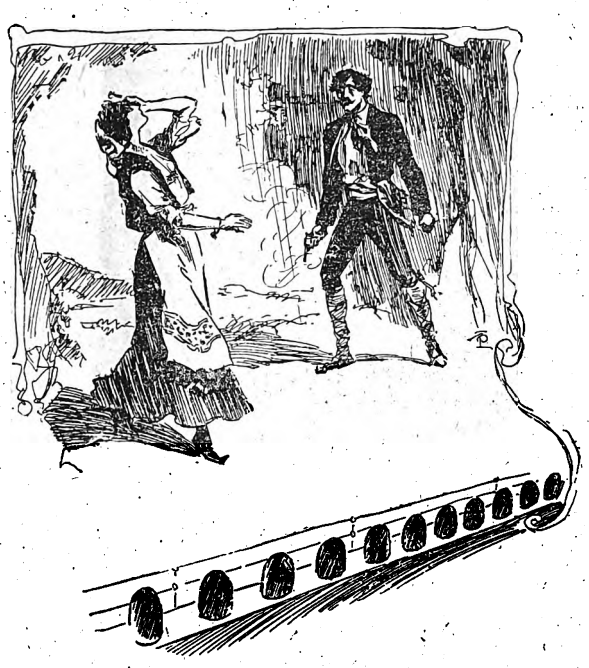
"Yes, let me see her!" exclaimed Robert. "Tell her I cannot believe she feels kindly if she shuts me out; tell her anything, so that she will see me."

Whatever little romance Mrs. Bolger may have extemporised, it proved effective, and Robert followed up the stairs, anxious, yet loth to go and look at his work.

The girl was sitting in an easy-chair by the window. It was a warm day, and she was there to catch the breeze, for she could not yet see well enough to enjoy any view. On the window-ledge stood a pot of violets that Robert had sent the day before.

The attitude of the young girl was hopeless in the extreme. She sat with her hands clasped in her lap, and her face turned away from the door. Yet she was waiting, listening, and caught the sound of the first step Robert made into the room. She did not turn even at that sound, but Robert saw that she was trembling from head to foot.

When he did catch a glimpse of that face he sprang to her side with a cry.



He had used a loaded revolver, and the girl had received the bullet in her head.

"Oh, is this my work?" he gasped. "Oh, those lovely eyes! Have I quenched their light for ever?" He had her hands in his now, and spoke on with a sudden impulse of pity and self-accusation. "Let me make what atonement I can; let me be your eyes from this time; I cannot leave you to your cruel fate! Be my wife, Sigismunda, and you shall not feel your loss."

The girl turned her white, disfigured face towards him, and reached out her hands blindly. In spite of all, the great love shone there and illuminated the marred beauty.

"Can you—do you—love me?" she faltered. "Then I thank Heaven. I am happy—I would bear more than this for your love. Oh, how weak I am! I ought to be noble and self-sacrificing, and not permit you to burden yourself with a helpless creature like myself. But I can't, Robert, I can't. It seems so heavenly that you should love me!"

The young man had not perjured himself by any vow of love, but the poor girl was too blissfully happy to notice that.

"I do not expect you to love me as I do you," she cried pressing his hands to her lips. "I am only a poor wounded little bird, glad to find shelter in your breast. But you! Oh, you are so grand, so noble——"

"There, my child!" cried Robert, with a forced laugh, turning away from the quivering face with a horrible sinking of heart as he remembered Muriel, "that is all settled, and you will get well as soon as possible. You need have no more care for the future—your future is mine." Then feeling that, some caress was called for under the circumstances, he touched her forehead with his lips. They were so cold that the girl shrank from them. "Ah," she said, "I am one of the children of the sun. You, Robert, are from the North, and you know what your poet says:

"'The cold in clime are cold in blood,
Their love can scarce deserve the name;
But mine is like the lava flood
That burns in Etna's breast of flame.'

"But you are so good—you are so good, my Robert. And, oh, you have proved your love by taking the poor blind girl to your heart. Do you know, I was sitting here and thinking that as soon as I could go out I would find my way to the river and end the story, for I did not dare to dream that you loved me. Now I want to live."

"Yes, yes. You must live for me!" cried Robert. "If you had drowned yourself I would have felt like a murderer. When you are quite well we will go to the seaside for a month, and see what the breezes will do. Would you like that?"

"I don't care—anywhere with you," said the girl, turning her eyes toward him. "Robert, I believe I can almost see your face. If God should give me that blessing, I would be content. Do you think it can be possible that I shall see again?"

"Yes, the sight of one eye only will be lost," answered the young man.

"But my face, is it very, very much disfigured?" she asked. "Mrs. Bolger puts me off. You will tell me the truth"

Digitized by Google

And she turned towards him with a little shiver, as if she dreaded the scrutiny.

The injury had affected one side of her face, leaving the other as perfect as ever, but the effect was horrible. It was as if half of a grotesque mask had been applied—the drawn mouth, the hanging cheek, the drooping, bulging eye-lid, that half-veiled, but did not conceal the dead, staring, sightless eye.

Robert instinctively shrank away from her, but she could not see it. A vision of Muriel, his pure and peerless snow-maiden, came to him as his eyes rested on this distorted face. Ah, the atonement was very hard.

"My dear girl," he said, grasping her hand, but turning his eyes away, "you are altered, but your heart is not changed. Do not let us talk of your looks. Whatever change is there, it is my work. If you will not mourn for your lost beauty I will not."

"As you love me, it is nothing!" cried the girl, with a sigh. "And since you make me sure of that, I do not care."

And so they parted for the time.

* * * * * *

Sigismunda could see the waves as they raced up the sand—a glitter that came and went.

She had a safe nook under a rock, where, shaded from the glare, she could hear the soft plash of the water, and see the white spray dash on the beach below.

She spent hours in happy dreams, while Robert wrote his music, for he was a composer in his way.

He had been very good to her—he had soothed her tenderly when for the first time she realised the terrible change in her face, and shrank in horror from her own likeness—this strange new being that stared at her from the mirror.

"How much he must love me when it stands such a test!" the girl thought, as she idly leant back against the rock. "Oh, God, I thank Thee! Oh, I cannot think of what life would have been without him—how desolate! No, I could not bear it."

At this moment came from the rock above the sound of a girl's voice clear and high, with a tone of scorn.

"How dare you speak to me, Robert Dutton?"

"Muriel, hear me. Am I not suffering enough?"

"And all for a ridiculous, quixotic notion! Why in the world should you marry her because you shot her? I never heard of such a thing!"

"But she is helpless. She has only me."

"And I had only you."

"Oh, you have everything. Beauty, and friends, and fortune, Muriel."

"Well, you have proved to me that you never loved me."

"Loved you! Can't you see what I suffer in giving you up? Do you think I love her, that poor object, who can only awaken pity and horror in all who see her?"

Sigismunda felt as if sea and sky were swimming away and melting into each other. The very rock was upheaving from its base, but she clutched it and held it down.

"God knows I love you, Muriel—that it would be Heaven to me now to call you mine. But do you not see that I cannot please myself? I believe, before God, that it was the sight of your sweet face which made my hand swerve that night. You were coming in with some gentleman, and a jealous pang seized my heart. Don't you see I ought to atone to that poor girl with my life's happiness, with my heart's blood, if need be?"

"No, I don't see it. She could have gone to some institution. We might have helped her."

Sigismunda stifled a cry, and sat with her half-blind eyes staring out to sea. Ah, how near the water came! She had only to sit there long enough, and the kindly sea would sweep her out of the path of those two lovers.

"Robert"—the girl's voice grew more tender as she spoke; "I will forgive all the past. In a moment of pity you felt that you must sacrifice yourself for that girl, but now, now that you see how you are spoiling your life and mine——"

"Oh, don't tempt me—don't let me see how sweet life might be for me! Muriel, I see a vision of your sweet face whenever I look at her, but then I remember—it was my hand—I must go on in this path, though it will be like walking over burning ploughshares."

"Then I must say 'good-bye!'" returned Muriel proudly.

Sigismunda's heart had ceased to beat; it seemed as if all the wheels of life stood still, and the water was creeping up to her feet, cold as the touch of a deathly hand.

"Muriel, we may not meet again; but do not go so coldly away from me. Think what you were to me—think what you are! Let me kiss you once, dear—let me kiss you for good-bye. You are dead to me, I know, but we kiss our friends after they are dead."

There was a sudden cry as of a soul in pain, then the sound of a splash in the water near; but when the two gained the top of the rock, they could see a woman's form floating in the distance, and a mass of black hair drifting on the waves.

"God forgive me!" cried Robert, with a blanched face. "It is Sigismunda! I must try to save her or die in the attempt."

"No, no! You shall not—it is madness!" cried Muriel, clinging to his arm. "She is almost out of sight."

"She must have heard us," muttered Robert, staring after the disappearing form. "She is beyond the reach of any comfort I could give her now."

"It was the best thing she could do," exclaimed Muriel, showing conclusively that she had not yet come into possession of a soul.

But Robert clasped the girl to his heart with a glad thrill in the midst of his horror. He did not know the value of the heart that was drifting away from him, and he only felt that this treasure was his own—all his own once more.

Helen Pierson.

Are You Generous? Are You Clever?
Are You Mean? Are You Dull?

Whatever you are it is as well to know other things concerning yourself, so send a specimen of your handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope to RANEE, 23 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. A reliable delineation of your character will reach you in return—this will give you the required information.

THE BOOK OF INDOOR GAMES.

By J. K. BENSON.

Square Crown 8vo, cloth. 400 Illustrations. Price 5s.

"No rainy or snowy day need be regarded as a misfortune by the boy or girl who is lucky enough to possess 'The Book of Indoor Games.'"—World.

"Days and weeks of pleasure lie bound within the covers of 'The Book of Indoor Games.'"—Daily Telegraph.

"The games and amusements are so surprisingly ingenious and so lucidly explained, that no home can be dull during the long winter nights into which this handsome volume finds an entrance."—Glasgow Herald.

At all Booksellers, or Post Free for 5s. from

C. ARTHUR PEARSON Ltd., 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID NEW SERIES. STARTS IN THIS NUMBER.

Told by the Decoy Herself.

A Striking Series of Astonishing Revelations.

FIRST EPISODE.

I am Transplanted to a New Sphere.

I WAS sitting in the class-room plodding discontentedly at an Italian translation which Fräulein Wernher had imposed upon me as a punishment for having transgressed some trifling rule of the establishment which recognised her as its supreme authority. The other regular boarders had gone out, under decorous escort, to take the daily walk which had become sickeningly monotonous to me, for I had done the same dreary round for eleven melancholy years, and even if I had been blindfolded, I could have picked out every step, or window, or lamp-post between the school and the circuit of the town.

Still, even our daily constitutional was mildly exciting in comparison with doing solo penance, and after a while, feeling thoroughly miserable, I put my task aside, and yielded to the fit of weeping which had been threatening all the morning.

"Surely," I thought, "no girl was ever so friendless and forlorn as I am!"

True, the school I was at was considered the best in Bochum, my fees had always been paid punctually, and I had invariably had more pocket money than any other girl in the school. Indeed, some of my fellow-students made a point of envying me because I lacked nothing that could be required for comfort.

But they forgot that I knew none of the home joys with which they were all blessed. I had neither mother, sister, nor brother, and my only near relative, my father, had never once been to see me or expressed a desire for a glimpse of me, since he first placed me in Fräulein Wernher's care, when I was a dot of seven.

No wonder, therefore, that I was miserable. And no wonder that my misery, having at last asserted itself, had made me so oblivious of everything else that I did not become aware of another presence in the room until I was shaken vigorously by Mademoiselle Touret, the French governess, who was brimful of excitement.

"Mees Vivienne!" she exclaimed in her funny, broken English, "Mees Vivienne, you cannot guess what has happened! Something so wonderful as you never did dream!"

"Something wonderful!" I echoed dismally. "I suppose we are going to have a different kind of pudding for dinner to-day, or something equally exciting."

"Oh, no, it is not that at all. It is that you will not want puddings here no more."

"That won't matter. I never like any of them, and will be glad to escape eating them. I wish I could escape everything else here. I am just tired of my life."

With these words I burst into a fresh fit of weeping. But I soon forgot my grief, and jumped to my feet as if electrified when Mademoiselle said dramatically: "Tired of this life, yes. But not tired of the new and beautiful life with your father, who did send for you this day."

"My father has sent for me? Ma'mselle, you are not saying this for a joke? If I thought you were, oh, I believe I should go mad with rage!"

"Oh, what one temper you are, Mees Vivienne! I am not joke. It is a veritable fact. Meestare D'Alton has asked Fräulein to send you home at once, and she tell me to fetch you to her."

Not another word did I wait to hear! It was enough for me that Ma'mselle appeared to be thoroughly in earnest, and with a stifled cry of excitement, I rushed out of the class-room, down two flights of stairs, and, without even giving a preliminary knock, I burst into Fräulein's private sanctum.

"Is it true?" I cried. "Is it true that my father has at last sent for me?"

Before Fräulein uttered a word, I knew that the wonderful had really come to pass, and that I was to leave school life behind me for ever. At any other time the principal of the Bochumer Töchterschule would have been very indignant at my unceremonious intrusion. But now she was an odd mixture of smiles and tears, and kissed me most affectionately, by way of emphasising her tremulous remark: "At last, my dear child, the dreaded fiat has gone forth, and I must lose the pupil over whom I have watched since she was little more than a babe!"

Somewhat to my astonishment Fräulein, for the first time in my recollection, began to cry bitterly, and it suddenly dawned upon me that she must be really fond of me. The idea had never occurred to me before, for Fräulein was not demonstrative, and I had always looked upon her as the stern preceptress, who never allowed the faintest deviation from established rules. Now, however, she was all tenderness, and I actually, amid the wild joy which my approaching freedom gave me, had room to feel sorry for Fräulein because she was losing me.

"But I am glad for you," she said, as soon as she had mastered her emotion. "I had begun to fear that your father cared no longer for you. In all these years he has never once seen you, and has never invited confidence concerning you. But when I sent him the receipt for his last payment to me, I sent also one of the photographs you had taken recently, and he is now most anxious to see you. He said he did not guess you could be so lovely."

Digitized by Google

"He might have known what I was like if he had cared," I remarked soberly.

"Yes, that is true. And I wish he had come here to fetch you, instead of only meeting you in Rotterdam, for I would have liked to see him once more, and talk to him about you. But that cannot be, as he is unable to spare time to come all the way."

"But how am I to travel alone to Rotterdam?"

"That is all arranged. I will go with you to Ruhrort, and will see you safely on board the steamer. At the end of your short voyage your father will meet you, and then things will be well with you."

"Fräulein, I am almost afraid, after all, of what lies before me. Just think, I shall not even know my father when I see him!"

"No, Vivienne, but he will know you. He has seen your photograph, and I shall write at once to the address he has given me at Rotterdam, and describe the clothes you will wear, besides giving the name of the boat you will sail on."

This programme was duly carried out. There was a certain amount of weeping, a lavish exchange of souvenirs, a short journey to Ruhrort, an affectionate parting from Fräulein, and then, with the fever of excitement dancing in my veins, I was sailing down the Rhine. to meet the father who was a complete stranger to me.

Under other conditions, I suppose, I should have taken a vast interest in my surroundings. And the scenery, though not so attractive as it is higher up the river, would have afforded a certain amount of delight to me, if my thoughts had not been centred in the meeting which was so near at hand. But not all the lack of parental affection which I had endured for so many years was enough to quench my eager desire to show my filial love; I could think of nothing but my father, and I mentally compared him with every man I saw.

The faint recollection I had of him was that of a tall, handsome man, with a fresh-coloured face, and kind, grey eyes, and this recollection was borne out by Fräulein Wernher's more mature memory. He was young, too, and as he could not be more than fifty even now, I pictured him as more attractive than ever.

Concerning the house in which I was to live in future I had but the most hazy of notions. While I was at school my father seemed to have spent his time in travelling all over Europe, without any fixed abode, and his remittances to Fräulein Wernher arrived from all sorts of places. But he intimated in his last communication that he meant to settle in a splendid establishment in London almost immediately, and that I was to act as his housekeeper.

"A splendid establishment" implies a staff of servants, and while I was smartening myself up a little, just before the steamer reached Rotterdam, I wondered if a lady's maid was to be included in the personal blessings in store for me.

Presently it became apparent that we had reached our destination and I rushed eagerly on deck that I might see my father as soon as possible. Hastily casting my eyes upon the throng of people who were waiting to come aboard as soon as the vessel was moored, I tried to recognise the one man in the world who possessed any interest for me.

A tall, handsome gentleman pressed eagerly in my direction, and my heart thrilled with pride and joy at sight of him. But alas! he looked past me to a lady who occupied the next berth to mine in coming down the river, and I was bitterly disappointed that he ignored me altogether.

But a worse disappointment was in store for me. I was glancing anxiously ahead when a sharp, incisive, but not unmelodious, voice accosted me with the words:

"I think there can be no mistake. You are Miss D'Alton?"

The speaker was a short, stout, sallow-faced man, at sight of whom my pride and joy sank to zero. I believe my disillusionment showed itself in my face for an instant. Then it occurred to me that this might not necessarily be my father himself, but someone whom he had sent to meet me, and I beamed smiles upon him.

"Yes," I said, "I am Vivienne D'Alton. I expected my father himself to be here. I am all impatience to see him, so I hope you will take me to him at once."

"What would you say if I were to pose as your father himself?"

"That you were having a little fun with me, because you happen to know that my father and I are practically strangers."

"My dear Vivienne, that is exactly what I expected you to say, for I've altered frightfully. When a man takes to adding superfluous flesh like I've done, even his own mother would look in vain for his former good looks."

"And you are Beverley D'Alton?"

"The very same, my dear, and very proud I am to be your father. But come along, child. I have a carriage waiting to take us to the house of a friend of mine who awaits your advent most anxiously."

That was all. There was no loving embrace for me. Not even a fatherly kiss of welcome. Just a stiff handshake such as might be bestowed upon the veriest stranger, and I felt more horribly depressed than I could have imagined possible.

Yet there was nothing tangible for me to complain of. My father's manners were those of a perfect gentleman, and he showed the utmost desire to insure my comfort in every way. He even insisted upon carrying my waterproof and umbrella to the carriage, and I noticed that the porter who disposed of my luggage upon a cab smiled delightedly at the heavy tip which was given him.

In fact, everything looked correct to the casual observer, and the studied deference which was paid to my comfort was gradually instrumental in making me see things in a somewhat different light. Of course, it was not my father's fault that Time had played such havoc with his good looks, and I reproached myself for having let it influence me at all.

After driving about twenty minutes we arrived at a large mansion, where I was enthusiastically welcomed by a Mrs. Sherwood, who was introduced to me as "my aunt."

"You sweet child!" she exclaimed. "Beverley and I thought you must be lovely when we saw your photograph, but you are infinitely prettier than we imagined. You will be immensely popular when you go to London."

Several kisses accompanied this eulogium, and I tried to be pleased with Mrs. Sherwood's welcome, but could not resist saying: "I hope looks are not supposed to be the only passport to popularity?"

"If they were," put in my father with a laugh, "I shouldn't stand much chance, eh?"

I blushed guiltily at this gentle reproof, and felt sorry that I had allowed my disappointment to be seen so plainly.

But Mrs. Sherwood saved me from further embarrassment by observing gaily:

"Thank goodness, the world nowadays knows how to appreciate people for mental and moral qualities. So women like me, who are painfully passée, need not worry because the Goddess of Beauty forgot to leave a permanent impression on them. But there, how forgetful I am! My dear Vivienne, you must be famished! Come with me, and I will show you the room you are to occupy while you remain here. Then, when you have taken your hat off, you shall have your lunch."

"Thank you, Mrs. Sherwood. I really think I am very hungry."

"Not Mrs. Sherwood. That sounds so distant. Why not call me 'Aunt Flora'?"

"With pleasure. But, do you know, I have never known that I had an Aunt Flora."

"Well, I'm not really your aunt. But your darling mother and I were just like sisters, and she would have loved me to watch over your welfare. Unfortunately, I did not know where you were until I met your father two months ago, or I should certainly have sought you out."

Part of this conversation took place as we were going upstairs, and I no sooner reached the room allotted to me than I impulsively kissed my new "aunt," for the dearest friend of my dead mother must naturally win my affection.

Left to myself by and bye, I hurried through my toilet, and, having barely glanced at my dainty surroundings, I ran softly downstairs to join my father and "Aunt Flora" in the dining-room. Half way down, opposite the top of the first landing, there was a pretty sitting-room, as I could easily see, for the door was partly open. I was tempted to peep in, but drew back when I heard my father ask somebody who, like myself, was hidden by the half open door:

Digitized by Google

"And you think she will swallow all that?"

"Absolutely!" was the reply in "Aunt Flora's" voice. "She is so deliciously inexperienced, and as gullible as a dove. Trust me to manage her all right."

The conversation struck a chill through me, for I was bound to connect it with myself, and I instantly wondered what sinister object could underlie Mrs. Sherwood's affectionate manner towards me. But eavesdropping is not exactly in my line, so I walked straight into the room, saying defiantly: "And in what way is my gullibility to be taken advantage of?"

"Good gracious!" exclaimed "Aunt Flora," "you surely don't connect our conversation with yourself?"

The surprise I witnessed was nothing like consternation, such as might be expected on the part of persons overheard talking of the discomfiture of the listener. On the contrary, it savoured more of amusement than anything else, and this amusement broadened into laughter when I tried to justify my apparently erroneous supposition.

"I certainly thought you meant me," I said shamefacedly.

I was tempted to peep in, but drew back when I heard someone remark; "And you think she will swallow all that?"

"What else could I think when you spoke of somebody's 'delicious inexperience'?"

"My dear child, when you have had servants under your control for a while, you will quite understand my present difficulty. I have a cook who came to me with splendid credentials, evidently given to her by people who were glad to get rid of her services as cook, just as I shall be. She knows absolutely nothing about cookery, but I fancy she can be converted into a first-class lady's maid for you. So I am going to ask her to resign the presidency of the kitchen in favour of a better cook. But, to avoid unpleasantness, I shall tell her that she is to be 'promoted' because she is in every way satisfactory."

"But why should she be unpleasant about such an improvement in her position?"

"Because she has better wages as a cook than she will get as a lady's maid, and it will require a little finesse on my part to make her fall in with my views."

Once more I felt myself painfully in the wrong, and the uncomfortable feeling of culpability was intensified when my father added gravely: "I am sorry to observe, Vivienne, that Fräulein Wernher has neglected to teach you that listening at doors is unladylike, and that a suspicious temperament is a never failing curse to its possessor."

"Beverley! How can you be so unkind! I'm sure she did not mean to listen, and still more sure that she is no more suspicious by nature than the rest of her dear mother's relations always were."

Digitized by Google

With these words my affectionate aunt put her arms round me and folded me in a motherly embrace.

And I ?

Well, I believed her to be the kind creature she professed to be, and I murmured broken regrets at being a source of disappointment to my father, who now displayed his parental love by kissing my cheek the while he enjoined me to forget what had been said and to think of nothing but being as happy as possible.

I did my best to obey the injunction, and soon became quite happy in the conviction that I was the central object of the love of a good, kind father and an aunt who desired nothing greater than to make me like her as much as my long-lost mother did.

Poor Vivienne ! If you had but heeded your first instinctive impulses you would have saved yourself and others an infinity of suffering at the hands of two of the most pitiless schemers who ever plotted the ruin of their fellow creatures !

* * * * *

Three days passed over, and I was thoroughly happy. Aunt Flora took me to all the best shops in Rotterdam, and bought me so many pretty things that I began to exclaim at the amount of money spent upon me.

" My darling Vivienne," was the smiling rejoinder, " what you are getting now is nothing to what is in store for you. You must not forget that your father is now a very rich man, and that he is so proud of you and so pleased with you that he does not care what is spent so long as you are happy.

" And he wants you to go to London, looking already as if the enjoyment of unlimited wealth was second nature to you. That is why he has left you with me while he goes to superintend the furnishing of his house in Park Lane. It is to be the most gorgeous residence in London, and Beverley wants his lovely daughter to be the queen of the coming season."

It was pleasant at first to hear myself spoken of as a beauty. But the flattery was becoming stale now, and I was by no means so sure of conquest as my affectionate relatives seemed to be, for I had often read that London contained thousands of beautiful women, and could not see why the addition of one more should make a great sensation.

However, I was not obstinate enough to argue the point, but yielded myself unreservedly to the delights of the present. The only mitigating drop in my cup of happiness was Annchen, my new lady's maid, promoted, so I was told, from the kitchen. Annchen was certainly not expert in her duties as yet. But she was a willing worker, and was anxious to improve herself, so I supposed she would be an accomplished maid in course of time.

But I could not bring myself to like having her about me. She struck me as being a prying, inquisitive person, who gathered up every crumb of information concerning everybody with whom she came in contact, but whose lips were firmly sealed about her own affairs. In fact, she gave me a creepy kind of feeling, and was everlastingly on my nerves. But she afforded me no real cause to complain of her, and as Aunt Flora was always singing her praises, it followed that the fault must be with me, and not with Annchen.

One thing struck me as rather odd. Mrs. Sherwood, who owned that she was not a blood relation of ours, and that she and my father had not seen each other for a great number of years until lately, always spoke of him by his Christian name, and I noticed that he reciprocated the familiarity by calling her " Flora."

It seemed, however, to be pushing intimate friendliness too far when I heard her observe to Annchen :

" I had a letter from Beverley this morning. He says the pigeon will be here in an hour or two."

I had gone to Aunt Flora's dressing-room, to show her a letter I had just received from Fräulein Wernher, in which I was given much interesting news about the schoolmates whom I left behind. Finding myself alone, I was waiting till my aunt appeared from the adjoining bedroom, and was very much astonished when I heard Annchen reply :

" Then we will pluck him very soon. Kaspar is quite ready."

" Auntie, may I come in ? " I called out, and I fancied there was a smothered exclamation when my near presence was thus made known.

" Is that you, dear ? " was the almost instant rejoinder. " By all means come in."

Then as I entered Aunt Flora turned a whimsically smiling face to me, and continued :

" What do you think, Vivienne, of your father's latest experiment ? He has recently tasted some pigeons cooked after a queer Dutch fashion in white wine, and he wants his London chef to know what they are like. So he is sending an order to a poulterer near Rotterdam to supply Kaspar Krause, who has the secret of the cooking, with a pigeon each day.

" This has to be got ready to send over by next morning's boat, and the supply has to be kept up daily until the London chef has guessed the recipe which Kaspar guards so carefully."

" And I have to see to the plucking before the pigeons are sent to Kaspar," added Annchen.

The explanation sounded plausible enough, though I was inclined to think the whole proceeding rather silly. But, of course, a man who was as wealthy as my father could afford to indulge in the most extravagant gastronomic tastes, and how was I to guess that the secret spoken of was of so terrible and so ghastly a nature that the consequences of it will haunt me to my dying day ?

" By-the-bye," remarked Aunt Flora, about three hours later, " there is a gentleman calling to-day with a letter of introduction from your father. I think he has business of some sort in Rotterdam, and Beverley asks me to be hospitable to him while he is here. Of course we must invite him to dine with us, though I don't suppose he is very interesting. People who come with letters of introduction seldom are.'

As I had never encountered anybody bearing a letter of introduction, I was not in a position to contradict this statement until the gentleman now being discussed put in an appearance, when I emphatically told myself that he was exceedingly nice.

He was a Mr. Graysworthy, a man about thirty-five years of age, of irreproachable manners and pleasant conversation. There was something about him which seemed to win confidence at once, and he readily accepted Aunt Flora's invitation to dine with us.

His special business in Holland, it appeared, was to sell some wonderful diamonds with which he had recently returned from South Africa, and if the merchants in Rotterdam fought shy of them, he meant to go on to Amsterdam, in the hope of finding somebody wealthy enough to pay the enormous sum the diamonds were worth.

" And you carry such a huge fortune about with you ? " inquired Aunt Flora. " I wonder you are not afraid of being robbed or murdered ! Some people would do anything to secure such a fortune at one swoop."

" I daresay they would," was the confident reply. " But I do not advertise my possessions to the casual onlooker. I do not even display a watch-chain or a tie pin, and nobody but those in the secret could guess that the belt I wear round my waist is worth fifty thousand pounds at the very least."

" Fifty thousand pounds ! " I echoed. " What an enormous fortune ! "

" My dear Vivienne," was Aunt Flora's smiling comment, " You have no real conception of what a big fortune is. Compared with what your father has, fifty thousand pounds is but a small sum."

" How strange it seems ! Aunt Flora, has he always been as rich as that ? "

" Oh, no ! It is only within the last few years that he has become enormously wealthy, since he took a number of shares in some South African diamond mines."

" And it is precisely because Mr. D'Alton has been so successful in his diamond dealing that I was recommended to ask his advice," supplemented Mr. Graysworthy.

I felt glad that this pleasant, gentlemanly visitor had sought and found kindness at my father's hands, and as the serving of dinner made it inadvisable to continue talking about the whereabouts of valuable diamonds, we changed the subject, our conversation ranging through such a variety of interesting topics that when the evening was at last over I felt sorry to think that Mr. Graysworthy would perhaps soon pass out of my life altogether.

Digitized by Google

Could I but have guessed at the tragic sequel to that most delightful evening, I should have been filled with horror. As it was, I enjoyed myself wonderfully, and was more than pleased when our guest, just before bidding me "Good-night," expressed the hope that he might see a great deal of me in future.

"I shall probably leave Rotterdam on Friday or the next day, according to the exigencies of business," he continued. "But I am looking forward to meeting you constantly in London."

"I believe I am to go to our new house next week," I smiled. "So you must be sure to look us up very soon."

"And in the meantime," added Aunt Flora, "we don't want to lose sight of you here. What do you propose to do with yourself to-morrow evening?"

"I have no particular engagement, and am sure to be free, for the diamond merchants will not be doing business after nightfall, I suppose."

"Well, I am sorry I cannot ask you to dine here with us, as I have promised that Vivienne shall visit some very old friends of mine, and I have fixed to-morrow for the visit."

This was the first I had heard of the arrangement just mentioned, and when I saw how disappointed Mr. Graysworthy looked, I felt that I could easily forego visiting Aunt Flora's friends.

"But that need not deprive us of your company," continued my smiling chaperon. "Herr and Madame Althaus are the nicest people in the world, and I am sure they will be delighted if you will join us at their house in time for dinner."

Mr. Graysworthy gladly fell in with this scheme, and promised to join us at seven o'clock at the residence of Herr Althaus. It did not occur to me that he had not got the address until I saw Aunt Flora write something on a card, which she handed to him.

"Here are explicit directions for finding the place," she observed. "So you will have no excuse for losing your way, and we shall expect you very anxiously."

Mr. Graysworthy took the card, read it carefully, and put it into his pocket-book. Then, with a happy smile and a warm hand pressure, accompanied by an ardent look of admiration when speaking to me, he bade us "Good-night."

And that is the last I ever saw of Gilbert Graysworthy.

* * * * * * *

During the following morning I heard a great deal of the Althaus family. It seemed that all the children were married and living elsewhere, and that both Herr and Madame Althaus were never so happy as when they had young people around them.

"You will enjoy yourself immensely," said Aunt Flora. "And Mr. Graysworthy will help to make the evening still pleasanter for you."

He bade me good-night—and that is the last I ever saw of Gilbert Graysworthy!

Of the truth of the last assertion I had no doubt, and it was a very happy girl who stepped into the carriage which was to convey us to our destination.

"You look fresher than ever," commented Aunt Flora. "But don't be rash, my dear. Mr. Graysworthy admires you immensely, and he is certainly not a bad parti. But your father has much greater ambition than that for you. He thinks you ought to marry nothing short of an earl. Besides, you have seen no men hardly yet, and must not lose your heart to the first comer."

This advice was no doubt well meant. But it jarred exceedingly, and I was conscious that my face put on a mutinous expression which warns Aunt Flora not to be too obtrusive with her worldly counsels.

Digitized by Google

Our drive was a very long one. But it ended at last, and we arrived at a big, lonely, dingy house, of which I did not like the outside look at all. Nor do I find the interior much more to my taste, and I actually looked with dismay at the commonplace, unwieldy, unprepossessing couple who proved to be Aunt Flora's much-vaunted friends, Herr and Madame Althaus.

If it were not that Mr. Graysworthy was expected to be here in the evening I should have felt tempted to feign a headache or some other flimsy excuse to go home again, and as the dreary afternoon wore itself away, I began to think that even prospective gay companionship was hardly worth the waste of time involved in spending a whole afternoon with the Althaus couple.

We had coffee and the others also had cakes. My aunt talked a great deal. Our hosts talked very little, and I talked still less. By way of breaking the monotony Aunt Flora asked me to play "some of my pieces" on the old piano, which was horribly out of tune, and I obeyed with alacrity, for if I could sit at the piano I should be exempt from listening to the intermittent, twaddly conversation of the most uninteresting couple it is possible to conceive. However Aunt Flora could regard them with comparative affection was more than I could understand, but that was probably because I was still young enough, and buoyant enough, to feel that reciprocal youth and bouyancy were necessary for my well-being.

I played on till seven o'clock without paying any further attention to my surroundings. But after a surreptitious glance at my watch had shown me that it was now time for Mr. Graysworthy to have arrived, I was all ears for the slightest noise at the front door.

But something must have detained him most unaccountably for more than another hour wore away without interruption. My fingers were tired of strumming the keys of the piano, and I was conscious of feeling more than ready for the dinner which was to have been served at seven precisely.

Madame Althaus had wandered in and out of the room several times, and Mynheer disappeared through the doorway just as I turned round from the piano, leaving Aunt Flora and myself alone for a moment.

"I'm awfully hungry," I said querulously. "I wish we had stayed at home instead of coming to a humdrum hole like this!"

"Vivienne!" reproved Aunt Flora. "I'm surprised at you!"

"And I'm surprised at you!" I retorted, rising and walking across the room. "You spoke of Herr Althaus and his madame as if they were somebody. I should be delighted with. And they are simply the most uninteresting old bores in existence! I wonder why they can't give us our dinner?"

"They are waiting for Mr. Graysworthy, who is behaving very badly in being so unpunctual."

I looked into an old mirror which hung over a dilapidated dwarf china cabinet, and saw such a discontented face that I felt it my duty to straighten it a little. Then I said:

"I suppose something has detained him. But that is not sufficient reason for keeping us without dinner till this time."

"Vivienne, you are very unreasonable."

"Who can be reasonable when dealing with such stupid people?"

"We will have dinner now, Mees D'Alton."

I started with confusion when I heard these words, for they were spoken in the oily, unpleasant voice of Madame Althaus, who had entered the room again without my hearing her.

"I am sorry to keep the young mees so long without her dinner," she added, striving to look benevolent, though her beady eyes flashed a malicious glance at me. "But it is the English mynheer who is to blame, and I am afraid the dinner is now spoiled by being kept waiting."

I was apologising for my own rudeness when I heard a noise outside which I instantly recognised at the "churr" of a nightjar, and I ran to one of the windows in excitement.

"What an odd thing for a nightjar to be churring already!" I exclaimed. "I thought they did not come out till quite dark."

"Vivienne, come here this minute! You must not disturb Madame's curtains by pulling them aside!"

It was Aunt Flora who spoke thus dictatorily to me. And, incredible though it seemed, there was a note of terror in her voice. Greatly wondering at the consternation I had apparently caused, I wrenched myself loose, and demanded to know what harm there could be in trying to see the nightbird which was jarring outside.

"There is no harm, Mees D'Alton," Madame assured me. "But I do not like my blinds pulled aside, and Madame Sherwood knows that it is so."

"I will take care to touch nothing of yours, Madame," I responded angrily. "One would think I were a mischievous baby. Aunt Flora, kindly excuse us to Madame. I am going back home."

"Not without your dinner," invited Madame Althaus, who was shaking as if she were frightened to death over something or other.

But I was not inclined to accept further hospitality at her hands, and as I was angry with Aunt Flora too, I was firm in my determination to go home as soon as the carriage could be brought out again.

"Very well," said my aunt, "I suppose you must please yourself. But if I had known what kind of girl your father was asking me to chaperon, I should have thought twice about it."

To this remark I made no reply, and during the drive back into Rotterdam we were both very reticent. I was spared the embarrassment of bidding "Good-evening" to the unctuous couple who inspired me with such unconquerable dislike, for Madame waddled out of the room when I refused to stay to dinner, and neither she nor her husband showed themselves to me again.

Although I said little, I was thinking a good deal, for I was feeling extremely puzzled. I wondered why both Aunt Flora and Madame Althaus should have been so afraid to let me look through the window. They were too late to prevent me from seeing that my maid, Annchen, was standing outside, with a big, rough-looking man, who had his fingers to his mouth, as if he were using them to regulate some sound he was making, and I couldn't help wondering what the girl could be doing there.

However, I did not tell Aunt Flora that I had seen my maid, and that I knew the "nightjar" to be the latter's uncouth companion, for I had an idea that some kind of trickery was afloat, and I resented having been induced to waste the greater part of a day under such uncongenial circumstances.

Being young and healthy, I did full justice to my supper, and slept well enough, too. But a great shock awaited me when Aunt Flora and I were having breakfast next morning. I was reading a most affectionate letter, just received from my father, when the English girl who acted as waiting-maid entered with a freshly-buttered hot roll, and burt into tears.

We both looked at her in astonishment. But my astonishment turned to horror when she sobbed forth: "Oh, Madame, I cannot help it. It is so terrible! They have found another dead body lying in the Messiner Straat. He has been murdered, stabbed through the heart. But he has not been robbed, for his money was in his pockets, and his watch and ring still on when he was found. And his name was on his cards and pocketbook."

"Yes, that is very dreadful," commented Aunt Flora, whose voice quavered with strong emotion of some sort. "But why should you take the affair so much to heart?"

"Because," sobbed the maid. "I saw the gentleman looking well and happy only two nights since."

"Two nights since?" I almost shrieked, for a horrible foreboding had seized me. "Where could you have seen him?"

"I saw him here, Miss Vivienne. The body is that of a tall, handsome Englishman, and his name is Mr. Gilbert Graysworthy."

(Another instalment of this exciting series next week.)

Digitized by Google

Pamela Gordon's Escapade.

How a Girl Outwitted her Mean Father.

THE Gordons were, or considered themselves, the very first people in Ramtown, and Josiah Gordon, the present head of the family, was very proud of his ancestors. He was about one meanest man in money matters ever known. He had driven his boys from home by his niggardliness; and now that his wife was dead, his daughter Pamela was all that he had left.

She was a handsome, strong, well-made girl, and intellectual, although he had given her the very poorest education, and no accomplishments whatever. She worked in his house without help, or thanks, or reward of any kind; her only consolation being that she was Miss Gordon.

"Much good that does me," she used to say, as she toiled away to save her rich father a few more pounds.

Girls who had no grandfathers to boast about had accomplishments and good clothes, and comforts and pleasures of all sorts, which she never knew, and which her father could well afford.

At last, on her nineteenth birthday, after she had longed in silence for many days, Pamela grew bold. Long, fur-lined cloaks were just coming into fashion, and how she wanted one only a girl can know.

It was while her father sat counting over a great roll of notes, which he had just received as the rent of certain property, that she went softly behind him, and said, meekly:

"Dad, can I have one of those large, black silk cloaks, such as Patsy Burroughs wears—one with a fur lining? I'll make it myself. It will wear for years. Oh, dad, I do so want it!" and she paused, with hands unconsciously clasped together.

Mr. Gordon looked at her horror-stricken.

"A silk cloak, with a fur lining!" he repeated, slowly. "No, you can't, Pamela; it's too expensive. Get your poor mother's grey cloak and wear that out. I'm sure she'd be willing."

"Poor mother's shawl had moths in it two years before she died," sighed Pamela. "She couldn't wear it, and you never knew, dad; you don't know how badly off I am. I've outgrown my jacket, and look quite a sight in it. I have boy's shoes, and a hat—oh, dear, such a hat! I cannot really go out anywhere."

"Women should stay at home," said Mr. Gordon.

"Certainly I ought to go to church," said Pamela.

"Not to show fine clothes," said Mr. Gordon.

"But I ought to dress like a lady," sighed the poor girl. "I should think you'd admit that, dad?"

"Ladies are not always the best dressed," said Mr. Gordon. "Far from it. You are Miss Gordon. Remember, the Gordons are the oldest family in Ramtown."

"Oh, I know all that, dad," interrupted Pamela; "but it does no good, if I must go about looking like a beggar."

Mr. Gordon brought down his cane on the floor, thundered out, "Hold your tongue, Pamela," buttoned his pocket-book into his bosom and trotted away to deposit the money, while Pamela, scarlet from brow to chin, remained where he had left her.

"Oh, what shall I do?" she exclaimed at last. "Is this a woman's fate, to beg all the days of her life? I have no education. I cannot teach. I can do nothing but housework. I'm the best washer in the village, but—There!" cried Pamela, bringing her foot down on the floor suddenly. "There! I've got it. A girl who can wash and iron as I can doesn't need to beg for her clothes."

Brushing her tears away she ran into the hall, took from a peg her shabby jacket and hat, put them on, locked up the house, and hurried down the village street as fast as her strong young limbs could carry her, until she stopped at a little white house, at the low window of which she tapped.

A little girl opened the door, and Pamela followed her into a sitting-room, where a thin woman sat, amidst cushions, in a big rocking-chair, with a brand new baby across her knee, two older ones on the floor near her, and two little boys building a model on the table, while the little girl who had opened the door made the sixth of the youthful group.

"Why, Miss Pamela" said the mother, "how pleased I am to see you! Excuse my getting up. I'm not strong yet. I was thinking when you came in whether or no I should be able to darn that place in the carpet, but I don't feel I shall. Nurse has gone away, and sister can't come because her husband is down with fever, and I'm awfully unsettled."

"You must be," said Pamela, fondling the baby. "Why, what a little beauty it is, Mrs. Pease. I suppose you've got a washerwoman this week?"

"No, I haven't. It's my worst trouble," said Mrs. Pease. "I had Kitty bring the things, and they are all mended and sorted out; but Barbara is engaged up on the hill, and I don't know what I'll do."

"Hire me," said Pamela.

"What?" laughed Mrs. Pease. "Why, Miss Gordon!"

"I mean it," said Pamela. "I wash better than Barbara, and I want to earn some money. You can pay me what you pay her, Mrs. Pease."

"Three shillings a day," said Mrs. Pease; "but, gracious, Miss Pamela, you can't mean it?"

"I mean it from my heart," said Pamela. "Dad thinks more of his money than he does of me. I'm going to earn clothes for myself. I need them, I'm sure."

Digitized by Google

"Men are so peculiar sometimes," sighed Mrs. Pease. "If you really mean it, it will be a great comfort to me."

Pamela instantly took off her hat and jacket, tucked up her skirt, and took Kitty out into the kitchen with her.

Before night "the washing," white as snow, was piled in a great clothes basket. Mrs. Pease had had a good bowl of soup, and all was tidy in the little sitting-room where Pamela sat mending the bit of carpet.

"I knew it would bother you until it was done," she said, "and now I'll go home and get dad's tea."

"Oh, Miss Pamela, I'm so much obliged," said Mrs. Pease, "and I believe you've only done it to oblige me."

"No," said Pamela, "I did it to earn money. May I come next Monday?"

"Why, gracious me! If you will," said Mrs. Pease.

"Been to see Mrs. Pease?" asked curious Mrs. Chalker peeping out of her kitchen door as Pamela passed.

"I've been washing for her," said Pamela.

"Why, how very kind of you, to be sure," said Mrs. Chalker.

"Nothing of the sort," said Pamela. "I took my money for it. Have you your washerwoman, Mrs. Chalker?"

"No, I haven't, and I'm not able to wash," said Mrs. Chalker.

Pamela instantly offered her services.

"I am going to go out washing," she said. "I'm going to do it, just as other washerwomen do, for money. I shan't explain why. But here I am, a splendid laundress, ready to be hired six days in the week, from seven to six, if any one wants me."

So it began. Before long Pamela had many employers, and the village was rife with supposition as to the why and wherefore; but never was girl prouder of herself than was Pamela when she laid down upon the counter of a draper's the money for the silk and fur of her coveted cloak; hard-earned money, but all her very own, not a penny of it coaxed out of any unwilling man alive.

She wore the cloak and a pretty plush bonnet and new kid gloves to church on Christmas Day. She looked well. The squire stared at her solemnly, but he knew she had had no money.

"I expect," he thought, "she's cut up her poor mother's old black silk. I won't ask any questions," and he held his peace.

Pamela, as she looked at him, wondered what he would say if he knew all. That week she had had some cards printed —professional cards.

The printer brought them home next morning. They read thus:

"MISS PAMELA GORDON—Laundrywork or House-cleaning done in the best manner. GORDON HOUSE, —— ——."

The cards were circulated through the village by a boy hired for the purpose, and on her return at night from her day's work, Pamela found a post-card awaiting her.

"MISS GORDON, Laundress—Please call at Mr. Bothwell's early to-morrow. "G. BOTHWELL."

Now Mr. Bothwell was the new minister, a widower, with two children. He knew nothing of the Gordons, or of the village as yet. He had preached there once, and had been "called" in consequence, on the demise of the excellent Mr. Dolorous, who had departed this life at a ripe old age. Pamela laughed a little as she determined to call and see what was desired. At seven o'clock she rang the bell of the pastor's very small house, and was answered by the gentleman himself. He was in evident distress of mind, and his dressing-gown needed mending sadly.

He looked at Miss Gordon for a moment, and then requested her to walk into his study. It was a dusty place, with a good deal of manuscript lying about; and the shrieks of weeping children were heard in the distance.

"May I ask what I can do for you, miss?" inquired the gentleman, motioning to a seat.

"You wrote to me," said Pamela. "Miss Gordon, laundress."

"Oh, dear me, yes," replied Mr. Bothwell, with wide open eyes, "I wrote to you. Thanks for your promptness. The fact of the matter is, my housekeeper—an aged person—I thought her most estimable—is lying terribly intoxicated on the kitchen floor, and has been for two days, and things are—are—— "

And Mr. Bothwell, running short of words, spread his hands out in a pantomime descriptive of chaos.

"I understand," said Pamela calmly. "Where is your kitchen?"

Two hours afterwards the master was calmly writing in his study, and the children, washed and dressed, were listening to the stories Pamela told them as she rubbed away at the wash-board.

The housekeeper had been dumped upon a bed in a small bedroom on the lower floor to sleep off her intoxication, and potatoes were boiling and a couple of chickens roasting for the family dinner.

Meanwhile Mr. Gordon, having some important documents to inspect, had come home unexpectedly, and entering the house, had found it empty, and in the sitting-room came upon a sight which petrified him with horror.

A little portable desk, which his daughter had appropriated for her own, lying open on the table, and in it the cards we have described, and her account-book.

He read the cards first:

"MISS PAMELA GORDON—Laundrywork or House-cleaning done in the best manner."

Then he ran his eye over the account-book.

"Washed—Monday for Mrs. Pease; Tuesday for Mrs. Chalker; Wednesday for Mrs. Mott; iron, Thursday afternoon; house-cleaning for Mrs. Down on Saturday."

He read this in a furious rage, and almost foaming at the mouth, until he came to the following items:

"Dec. 5th.—Bought silk and fur for cloak.

"Dec. 10th.—Made cloak. It fits well.

"Dec. 25th.—Wore the cloak to church, and thanked heaven I hadn't to beg it from father."

Then Mr. Gordon closed the book, and with a queer disposition to cry, sat down beside his solitary hearth, and looked at the fire for several hours without stirring.

When Pamela opened the door and came in she saw her father, and knew that he knew all.

"Pamela, come here," he said. "How long has this been going on?"

"Since October, dad," the girl answered.

"Then you've been disgracing me and yourself for three months," said the old man. "You, a Gordon! And all to spite your poor old father for being careful of his money."

Pamela was not afraid of her father now. She came over and sat beside him.

"Dad," she said, "it was not for spite; it was for want; I suffered so much mortification, not only from being shabby, but having to beg. If there is anything in good blood, as you think there is, perhaps that made it hard for me to beg even from you. I was happier earning what I needed. Would you like to be a beggar, dad?"

"You've done very wrong, Pamela," said her father. Then he paused and added: "You shall tell me what allowance you need for your clothes, and I'll let you have it monthly. Now, give me those cards."

He burnt them in the fire when she had handed them to him, and she hurried away to get his tea, and no more was said. The Gordons were not great talkers.

But Pamela is not sorry for what she did to this day.

As for Mr. Bothwell, he rejoices; for otherwise, perhaps, he might, being a shy man, never have met Pamela Gordon, who is to marry him before long. Other people may blame her for her "escapade," or call her "odd" or "spiteful"; he understands her and admires her all the more for her independence.

"Though, Pamela," he often says, "I should have offered myself all the same had you actually been a laundress."

Maud Vickers.

Digitized by Google

The Reason Why.

"I'll never ask another woman to marry me so long as I live." "Refused?" "No; accepted."

A Sure Sign.

CARRIE: "Are you sure that May and Algy are engaged?" Amy: "Why, certainly! I heard them quarrelling last night."

Something Fatal.

"She had the fatal gift of beauty, had she not?" "Well, I don't know whether it was her beauty or her money that was fatal, but anyhow she married a titled nonentity."

A Hint Accepted.

"MAY I kiss you, Miss Jane?" "I am sorry to see, Mr. Briggs, that you, too, are affected by the prevailing cause of business depression." "And that is?" "Lack of confidence." Then he kissed her.

Not Very Complimentary.

HE: "My people are bothering me to marry Miss Mayford." She: "You'd be lucky if you did. She is very clever and very beautiful——" He: "Oh, I don't want to marry brains and beauty. I want to marry you."

Pa was Sorry for Him.

SHE (anxiously): "Have you asked papa, Reginald?" He: "Yes." She (nervously): "What did he say?" He: "He didn't say anything; but I know he gave his consent, for he looked at me in a pitying sort of way, don't you know."

Naturally She Wouldn't.

GERTIE: "I want your advice. I've been proposed to by three men, and I don't know which one to choose." Mabel: "Do you know which has the most money?" Gertie: "Of course I don't, you silly! I shouldn't want anybody's advice if I knew that!"

How Ungrateful!

HE: "I am really surprised at Dr. White. After being our family doctor for years, and treating me for all sorts of things, and to think of all the money we've paid him, too!" She: "What has he done?" He: "He wouldn't pass me for the life insurance company."

A Most Awkward Allusion.

GEORGE: "Do you know what I am going to give you for a birthday present this year?" Maud (enthusiastically): "No; only I'm sure it will be something new, and stylish, and elegant, and awfully expensive. You dear, reckless boy, you!" And George wishes he had not said anything.

Circumstances Alter Cases.

THEY were standing at the front gate. "Won't you come into the parlour and sit for a little while, George?" "N-no, I think not," replied George hesitatingly. "I wish you would," the girl went on; "it's awfully lonely. Mother has gone out, and father is upstairs groaning with rheumatism in the legs." "Both legs?" asked George. "Yes; both legs." "Then I'll come in for a little while."

Not a Paradox.

SHE: "There is a woman whom I envy. And, curious as it may seem, she envies me." He: "How can can that be?" She: "We were both after the same man—and I married him."

It Always Happens Thus.

TED: "I've been trying to catch Dolly under the mistletoe, but Miss Autumn seems to be the only one I can find there." Ned: "It seems to be an instance of the wrong girl in the right place."

A Slight Misapprehension.

ARTIST: "What do you think of my peasant girl?" Young Miss: "I think her hat is perfectly charming. Is she going to the theatre?" Artist (despondently): "That's not a hat. She's carrying hay."

A Slip of the Tongue.

HE (pleadingly): "Why can't we be married at once?" She (coyly): "Oh, I can't bear to leave father alone just now." He (earnestly): "But, my darling, he has had you such a long time." She (freezingly): "Sir!"

Tit for Tat.

ETHEL: "Mr. Fiddleback wanted to send you a birthday present, but I told him you have stopped having birthdays ten years ago. Was I right?" Maud: "I believe so. I know very well it was two years after you stopped."

An Averted Tragedy.

"THE first man that made a declaration of love to me said that if I did not marry him he would shoot himself before my eyes." "Good Heavens, the man was crazy. Why did you not have a watch put over him?" "I did. I married him."

How He Won Her.

"No," said the fair girl, "it's no use. You don't come up to my ideal." "Perhaps not," he answered. "But I don't care if I can only get anywhere near my own." "Your own?" she answered. "What is your ideal?" "You," he whispered.

Out of the Frying Pan.

MR. BLUNDER: "Why, your mother looks as young as you do, Miss Stale." "Miss Stale (stiffly): That is not very complimentary to me, Mr. Blunder." Mr. Blunder (confusedly): "I—I didn't mean that—I—I mean you look as young as your mother!"

Altered Matters a Little.

"I HEAR your engagement with Miss Boodle is off. How did it happen?" "In strict confidence, my friend, she got cross because I stole a kiss." "I don't see why that should provoke her—when you were engaged." "Well, you see, I stole this kiss from another girl."

Quite Successful.

"So Winnie gained her object, after all?" said Miss Vinaigrette to her friend. "No," was the reply; "he married someone else." "I know," said Miss Vinaigrette; "but he didn't marry Daisy. Winnie prevented that, which was all she wanted to do."

A Lifelong Sentence.

"I DON'T like to spoil your Christmas, dear," said the sweet little thing, "but I think we might as well consider our engagement as broken." "I don't see why. Your father said postponed." "Postponed until you arrive at years of discretion, and in your case, Reggy dear, you know what that means."

She was Flattered.

MRS. SANSOM: "I understand, sir, that you have secretly been making love to my daughter, and I must forbid an acquaintance begun in that way. You should have seen me first." Shrewd Suitor: "Madam, had I seen you first I should have forgotten your daughter and fallen in love with you." Mrs. Sansom: "Um—the informality of the proceeding was all I objected to. Come with me and I will introduce you."

Digitized by Google

Concludes in this number.

A CRIMINAL MILLIONAIRE.

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "Olga Romanoff," "The Lake of Gold," etc., etc.

THIRTY-SIXTH CHAPTER.

The Lion at Bay.

FOR the next forty days the guests on board the Isola enjoyed the pleasures of the unexpected almost in daily succession. Their idea, like the rest of the world which was wondering what had become of the vanished President and his yacht, was that he would take the shortest route to the entrance to his unknown Underworld.

But Isolo Staunton and his trusty adviser knew that this would be expected of them and therefore the exact opposite was done. No sooner was the Isola well out of sight of land than she altered her course to the south-south-east and ran in an almost direct line at her utmost speed, save when the sighting of a vessel, which her guests would have so dearly loved to speak, necessitated a change of course and slowing down.

Meanwhile they noticed that, day and night, men were slung over the sides on stages, working hard with paint brushes and pots.

When they came on deck on the fifth morning they found that one of the two big funnels had disappeared and that yards had been rigged on the fore-mast. The next day in the place of the after funnel there was a crossed-tree main-mast with the main and topmast shrouds and the rigging all taut and trim, and with mainyard, top-sail, and top-gallant yard, braces, and everything complete, already fitted.

"I feel bound to confess, my dear Smith," said Dennison, when he looked round at the constructive changes which had taken place during the night, "that our friend ought to have been born just about the end of the eighteenth century. He would have made quite a perfect pirate. Just look at this ship. At Nice and at Rio she was about the finest-looking yacht afloat. What is she now? A dirty grey-and-white, red-daubed hooker that no one would insure for a couple of thousand pounds, and fancy putting sails on her—sails on a boat that can do her forty knots, nearly. What is she now? A three-masted, one-funnelled, shabby-looking steamer, probably, as anyone who saw her would think, loaded up with hides from the Argentine, staggering somehow across the Atlantic."

"Yes," said Mr. Smith, looking round the dirty decks and at the tarnished brasswork which had once been so spick-and-span and brilliantly shining, "yes, I think I may say that I know something about disguise, but this disguise of a whole ship, so that her own builder wouldn't know her, this, my dear Dennison, proves, as I said to you yesterday afternoon, that we have to do with a genius, and if we only catch him, what a triumph."

"Good morning, gentlemen," sounded Staunton's voice from windward across the deck, "you see, we have been making a few alterations. I'm afraid we haven't improved her appearance very much, but, unhappily, it is sometimes necessary to put even beauty into disguise."

"And that," said Mr. Smith, "I think you have done this time very effectually. Would it be allowable to ask our latitude and longitude?"

"If you will come up on the bridge," said Staunton, "I think I can about tell you."

He went up and they followed him. He took a pair of prismatic binoculars out of a case in the wheel house, took a look through them to the eastward ahead, then giving them to Mr. Smith, he said, pointing to what looked like a little cloud lying on the surface of the water:

"There, the land that you see ahead is, to be quite exact, 49° 20′ S. and 69° 24′ E."

"In other words," replied Mr. Smith, passing the glasses to Dennison, "Kerguelen Island."

"Otherwise known," added Dennison, when he had taken his squint, "as Desolation Land."

"Yes," replied Staunton, "that is one of the names that was given to it, and from what I have heard about it, I should say that it would be rather a dismal sort of place for civilised people to spend the balance of their days in. I believe there is just about enough growing on the land to keep life going with the help of the fish that you catch in Christmas Harbour, but it is only natural to conclude that the average civilised man—and woman—would deteriorate very considerably after working out an existence of that kind for a year or two."

"Yes," said Mr. Smith, "I suppose they would. As you say, it would be only natural. I have read about the place in Ross' 'Voyage to the Southern Seas,' and, speaking quite impersonally, I should say it was a most undesirable place for winter residence. And, again, trespassing on your confidence, Mr. Staunton," he went on, picking up the glasses again, "I don't suppose that you would choose such an utterly inhospitable spot even under present circumstances for your winter quarters."

"Not for myself, Mr. Smith, by any means," replied Staunton, with a laugh, as he looked round into the barrel of a Mauser pistol which Mr. Smith had put just under his nose.

"It's good enough for you, swindler, thief, assassin, and worse, for I happen to know what you wanted to do with my wife and daughter——"

"Durtal, Durtal," shouted Staunton in French; "come here."

"What do you want, sir," cried the captain, flinging open the door of the chart room.

"That," said Dennison, sending a bullet through his brain.

"To the rescue!" shouted Staunton, turning round and seeing two of the Mauser pistols pointed at his eyes. "What, you my prisoners here on my own ship——"

"Drop it, Señor," said Mr. Smith, in a curious mixture of the London vernacular, as his left hand caught the wrist of the arm which was moving towards Staunton's hip pocket.

Staunton was a man who could have broken Mr. Smith across his knee, but when that terrible upward wrench came, he was as helpless as a child. A lurch of the vessel sent Durtal's body pitching and rolling down the ladder from the bridge to the deck. At the same moment Darfield swung one of the Maxims on the forecastle round so that it commanded the bridge.

Staunton looked at it for a moment and shrugged his shoulders.

"And now," said Mr. Smith, with his eyes staring straight into Staunton's and his finger on the trigger of his pistol, "you know as well as we do that if we were to take you and your yacht back to England there would be very little difficulty in getting her condemned as a smuggler of false coin and counterfeit notes, and I need hardly add that there would be still less difficulty in sending you to the scaffold after we had produced the evidence which we possess as to the real cause of certain murders—call them mysterious deaths, if you like—which happened in London shortly before the Isola made that mysterious trip from Leith to the Bay of Nice and somehow managed to sight the ice cap of Hekla en route."

Digitized by Google

"Don't worry about details, Mr. Smith," said Staunton, still looking at the muzzle of the Mauser. "Get to the facts, please."

"Just what I was going to do," replied the detective. "No, don't move, please. We have got everything arranged, and if you lift a finger Mr. Darfield will sweep the decks with that Maxim. What I was going to say was this: If Mr. Dennison and myself did our duty, we should either shoot you now or take you home to be hanged with your friend and accomplice Ramiero Valdez, otherwise Padre Ramiero, who was so very nearly caught over the West Indian business. But you have a daughter who loves this victim of yours, whom you thought to consign to a living death of slavery and degradation—a fate which I understand you had also reserved for my own wife and daughter—in this Underworld of yours. For her sake we are going to give you and Valdez the option of disappearance."

"In Desolation Land, I presume," laughed Staunton; "well, what's the alternative?"

"For the present, at least," replied Mr. Smith, "you have the choice between Desolation Land, from which you may one day return, as you did from the Chinchas, and the undiscovered country——"

"In other words, Mr. Staunton," said Dennison, "you can take your choice between going ashore at Christmas Harbour with your friend Valdez and making the best of it there, with, of course, an ample supply of your own provisions, or being taken to the nearest British port and given in charge as the common, though gifted, swindler that you are. For your daughter's sake we should recommend absolute disappearance. Of course, there is a third choice, but, for your daughter's sake and Ellerton's, it would be a pity for you to take that. It would not be nice for us to have to go home to England and let it be known that your daughter's father had been shot or hung as a pirate and a murderer."

"You are perfectly right, gentlemen," replied Staunton, with all the coolness of the gambler who has staked all and more than he has against the fall of the loaded dice of the Fates and lost, "and you may believe me or not, as you like, but I am honestly, genuinely grateful to you for sparing Mercedes from the shame that you might have brought upon her. For her sake, I accept your terms unconditionally. I will answer for Valdez. Take the ship and everything there is in it. Give us a boat and some stores and I will promise you, in Mercedes' name, and by the memory of her mother, all that I hold sacred in the world, that we shall never contradict any story you like to tell about us."

THIRTY-SEVENTH CHAPTER.

Back to Civilisation.

As nothing was heard of the vanished Isola for over three months after her disappearance, it was universally concluded that she must have been so badly injured during her escape from the Bay of Rio that she got out to sea only to founder. As a matter of fact, her disguise had been so complete that, although she had been sighted over and over again, none of the keen-eyed watchers had recognised her, and so she was able to reach the Anchorage without exciting any suspicions.

But when once the couplings had been made there still remained the greatest danger and difficulty to be overcome. The nearer they got to the moorings, the more distinctly the Marconi apparatus on board interpreted the signals from the Underworld, but, try as they would, they could get no response to their own, and, therefore, it was impossible to converse with Ellerton. It was plain that, although by some means he had managed to construct an apparatus capable of sending signals through earth and water, either the Hertzian rays could not penetrate to him, or he was not able to receive them.

True, there was the telephone running through one of the guiding cables, but, as Darfield, who was the only one on board who completely understood the working of the diving-chamber, explained—if Herarra was still in control of his submarine kingdom, and Ellerton had managed to transmit his signals without his knowledge, to make the descent would simply be to enter a trap from which there would be no escape. For Mr. Smith, Dennison and himself, capture would mean death in the Boiling Lake, and for Madame de Ronski and Paula hopeless slavery. On the other hand, it seemed incredible that Ellerton, alone and a captive, should have been able to overcome his jailers and gain control of his vast prison-house with its population of slaves.

It was at this juncture that Darfield proved his complete sincerity and devotion by offering to go down alone in the diving-chamber and find out the true state of affairs. No one knew better than he did the tremendous risk that he was running, but he stopped all discussion on the subject by saying quietly:

"I am the only man who could possibly do it, because only four knew the secret—Mr. Staunton, Valdez, the Captain, and myself. Granted that Herarra is still in command, if a stranger went down he would simply be taken and killed at once. On the other hand, I could make them believe that I am on ordinary business and bring Herarra and Vizard back with me to have an interview with the Señor, as we used to call him. In that case, of course, it will be perfectly easy to deal with them. If they didn't believe me it would be awkward, but I still might manage to have a talk with Mr. Ellerton and get back, though then we could never rescue him. Still, I am the only one who can do anything, and I should be utterly unworthy to go back to Janet if I didn't do it."

He had his way, and when he had once more very carefully explained the working of the diving-chamber and the signals to the engine-room for lowering and raising it, he took down the telephone, rang up, and as soon as the answering ring came back, he said:

"Are you there, Herarra?"

"Yes," came the reply after a few seconds. "What have you been doing away so long? We thought you had got yourselves wrecked. Is the Señor on board, and have you any more stuff? We are getting short."

"Yes," replied Darfield. "I am bringing you a load down immediately, so stand by and have everything ready."

"All right," came the reply.

Darfield hung up the telephone again, and said to the others:

"That's a good idea—I didn't think of that. He can't very well suspect anything if I take him a load of silver down."

He pulled a lever at the end of the wall opposite to the sloping passage. A steel panel slid back, disclosing another room about ten feet square, half filled with ingots of silver.

"There's plenty there," he continued. "Now, I'll ask you to lend me a hand and load some of this into the diving-chamber."

They set to work with a will, and in half an hour or so, they had loaded in five hundredweight of the ingots. Then Darfield once again described the working of the mechanism with the help of a diagram which he had drawn for them, and went into the chamber. They both shook hands heartily, and Mr. Smith said shortly, but not without feeling:

"You are a brave man, Mr. Darfield, and I hope you'll have all the luck that your courage deserves."

"I hope so," replied Darfield, "but, remember, that if you make one mistake with the machinery they will know instantly down there that something is wrong. If I'm not back in an hour you may as well cast loose and go home, for the Underworld will be closed for ever."

They drew the levers and when the steel door had slid into its place the signal to lower was sent to the engine-room, and three rings on the telephone down the cable. Two answering rings came back, and then there was nothing for it but to wait and see what the fateful hour should bring forth, whether, in short, the Underworld was to be discovered and Ellerton rescued, or whether his fate and that of Darfield were to be shrouded in everlasting mystery.

Three-quarters of the hour passed, and still no signal came.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Smith and Dennison had stopped talking. The latter stood by the levers, and the former beside the signal-bell, each with a Mauser pistol in hand. The forty-five minutes grew to fifty, then to fifty-three.

"I'm afraid it's about all up!" said Mr. Smith, who had his watch in hand.

"I am not," said Dennison, in his matter-of-fact way. "It's quite possible that they're just having a quiet talk together. Darfield, naturally, wouldn't want to seem eager to hurry them."

"You seem to forget, my friend," said Mr. Smith, almost anxiously for him, "that Darfield told them that the Señor was here, and wanted to have a talk with them, and from what I have heard and remember of our late host, he was not a man who cared to be kept waiting. Ah, there it goes at last!"

Four loud rings on the telephone announced that the diving-chamber was ready to ascend. Mr. Smith at once sent the signal to the engine-room for it to be hauled up. Fifty seconds later another bell rang, announcing that the chamber was in its place. Dennison pulled the lever which drew the plate in the floor of the Isola back into its place, and Mr. Smith counted four minutes by his stop watch. Then he nodded to Dennison, who at once pulled the second lever. The water-tight door at the bottom of the passage slid back, and that of the diving-chamber was opened. As they stepped back out of sight they heard, to their intense relief, Darfield's voice saying:

"Welcome back to the Overworld; you will find the Señor waiting for you in the Council Chamber. After you, gentlemen."

Leon Herarra and his lieutenant André Vizard walked all-unsuspecting up the sloping passage, as they had done in the same circumstances many a time before. But as Herarra took his first step into the lighted chamber at the top he heard a voice, which he had heard before in a crisis of his career, saying quietly in Spanish:

"Hands up, Señor, or I fire!"

At the same moment, Dennison had gripped Vizard by the collar, and put the muzzle of his Mauser under his ear, saying in French:

"You surrender, Monsieur?"

And, of course, there was nothing for it but that or sudden death, and so one of the most absurdly simple and yet momentous captures in the history of crime was made.

As the readiest means of disposing of them for the present the two prisoners were ordered to go into the still open treasure-room, which they did in savage and wondering silence, then the panel was shut upon them, and they were left to discuss the miracle at their leisure.

Darfield then made a second trip to the Underworld, and in about half an hour returned with two other passengers, one of whom was certainly not less astonished, though decidedly better pleased than his last had been. It need hardly be added that this one was Wilfrid Ellerton. The other was Señora Herarra, who had ascended under the impression that the Lord of the Underworld had rewarded her faithful services, as he had done once or twice before, with an invitation to a yachting trip.

As soon as Darfield had made the introductions, they went up to the Council-chamber, and thence on deck. In the saloon the Señora was speedily and most disagreeably undeceived as to the true state of affairs by being handed over to the chief stewardess with orders that she should be taken to a state-room and locked in.

Certainly the most delightful meal that Ellerton had ever eaten in his life was the supper which followed his release, and perhaps never had so few people so much to tell each other. All that Ellerton learnt is already old news to the reader. So, too, are most of his experiences in the Underworld.

What his hosts, like the rest of the world, were naturally most eager to know, was the secret of those mysterious signals which at the eleventh hour had brought all Isolo Staunton's far-reaching and deeply-laid schemes to naught, and made his own release possible, and this was the explanation in his own words:

"To begin at the beginning," he said, "I began speculating on the source of the light that we have down yonder. It was not gas, I mean natural gas, or incandescent vapour, and it was not electricity, and, what is more, neither my late host, Herarra, nor anyone else in the place knew what it was.

"They have a laboratory, but the chemist is only a half-educated sort of fellow, with no idea of research, or, indeed, anything beyond the chemistry of metals. He told me, as the others did, that they found the substance there in large quantities, washed it well in leaden vessels with hydrochloric acid, and then found a residue which gave off light, such a light, indeed, that they had to wear dark spectacles when they worked with the stuff.

"Then they put a small quantity into their lamps, and the lamps went on burning, as one might say, for ever. Of course, I needn't tell you what the stuff was?"

"Not radium, surely!" exclaimed Dennison, almost dropping his glass.'

"Yes," laughed Ellerton. "Radium, and tons of it, as they say. Really, it is almost too ludicrous to think of these people going to all the trouble of breaking the law of nations to coin false money, and make counterfeit notes, when they had literally uncounted wealth close at hand just for the getting. However, that's only the first part of the explanation. As I told you, they thought they had got me there for life, and so they didn't make any objections to my amusing myself as I pleased, in fact—Staunton had given orders that I was to have perfect liberty within the Underworld.

"Fortunately, I had kept my chemistry well up to date, and it wasn't very long before I began to see the possibility of sending what I may call real radiograms to the Overworld, as, of course, they pass through rock and water just as easily as air, and so I set to work and made an apparatus, which I needn't bother the ladies by describing now, because I hope you will see a lot of them at work before long.

"All you have to do with it is to work a switch, which cuts off the rays given out from a large mass of pure radium, so that you can make longs and shorts of them according to the ordinary Morse code.

"Of course, I had a tremendous lot of trouble in finding a combination of substances to make my machine of, so that it would concentrate the rays, and send them in one direction, but when I had succeeded, I hoped that the signals would be picked up by some vessel with the Marconi apparatus on board, so I proceeded to fire off my signals—and the rest you know."

After supper there was a discussion on ways and means. It was, of course, absolutely necessary that the way to the Underworld should be kept open, and Darfield was the only man who could do so. Wherefore, as the second and third officers were quite capable of navigating the Isola back to Leith, where, according to contract, the crew were to be quietly paid off, and allowed to disperse, with no questions asked, it was decided that he should go back and take charge of affairs below, until the yacht should return with a regularly engaged crew and officers, and purged of her criminal character.

At Paula's earnest intreaty, her mother consented to make a short trip with her to the wonderland which Ellerton had been describing. It was nearly two hours before they came back, and when they did they brought Brenda, Thyrza, and Myra with them.

"It is all very, very marvellous," said Paula, while the others were wondering at the strange, almost unearthly, beauty of the three daughters of the Underworld. "But it is not nearly good enough for these poor darlings to spend their lives in. They should be daughters of the sun, and the blue sky, not of a lamplit cavern world like that. Our world will be a heaven to them when their poor eyes get strong enough to see it. Fancy, father, they have never seen the sun, nor the sky, nor the moon, nor the stars, nor the sea, nor the green fields. What a glorious revelation our world will be to them!"

EPILOGUE.

IT would take many more pages than are now available to describe the effect that was produced upon the civilised world

Digitized by Google

Gifts Worth £25,969

to users of Soap. You use it. Get some of the money. Save your wrappers of

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER.

THE BEST SOAP FOR ALL PURPOSES.

Equally good for Bath, Toilet, and Nursery, as well as for Household and Laundry. Made from the Purest Materials and has

THE LARGEST SALE IN THE WORLD OF ONE POUND TABLETS.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

ANOTHER GREAT PRIZE COMPETITION

120,419 PRIZES.

FULL PARTICULARS ACCOMPANY EACH TABLET.
Send Wrappers of Watson's Matchless Cleanser, Watson's Sparkla or Watson's Nubolic Soap to the address below—

VALUE £25,969

JOSEPH WATSON & SONS LTD., WHITEHALL SOAP WORKS, LEEDS.

Every competitor in the previous competition received a prize.

THOUSANDS OF COSTLY AND USEFUL ARTICLES.

The 5 MINUTES PAIN CURE FREE.

THE WIFE OF THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF writes: "Countess Roberts will thank the Lineel Co. to send her another bottle of Lineel Liniment, which is most excellent. She encloses 2/9."

LINEEL LINIMENT

Cures RHEUMATISM	in 5 minutes	Cures TIC	in 5 minutes
Cures NEURALGIA	in 5 minutes	Cures SPRAINS	in 5 minutes
Cures LUMBAGO	in 5 minutes	Cures BRUISES	in 5 minutes
Cures SCIATICA	in 5 minutes	Cures CRAMP	in 5 minutes
Cures GOUT	in 5 minutes	Cures STIFFNESS	in 5 minutes
Cures HEADACHE	in 5 minutes	Cures RHEUMATIC DEAFNESS	in 5 minutes
Cures FACEACHE	in 5 minutes	Cures ALL NEUROTIC And MUSCULAR PAINS	in 5 minute
Cures TOOTHACHE	in 5 minutes
Cures EARACHE	in 5 minutes

Cures COLDS and COUGHS in three or four applications to throat and chest.

LINEEL LINIMENT

Nearly 200,000 Free Bottles of LINEEL LINIMENT have been sent out within the last month, in response to as many letters, which can be seen at the Company's Offices. And in no single instance that has come to our knowledge has it been known to fail in absolutely curing pain in five minutes.

YOU ARE NOT ASKED TO BUY

Simply send a penny stamp for postage, mentioning this paper, and a Free Bottle will be sent by return post. Every day we receive extraordinary and grateful letters, testifying to the efficacy of LINEEL LINIMENT in curing pain. It would cost a lot of money to publish all these, and it is much more convincing and satisfactory to send you a free bottle, so that you may test it yourself.

Sold at all Branches of Boots' Cash Chemists, and by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ and 2/9 per bottle.

LINEEL PILLS Are the best remedy known to Medical Science for INDIGESTION, CONSTIPATION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, and BAD COMPLEXION.

Sold at all Branches of Boots' Cash Chemists and by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ and 2/9 per box.

WRITE FOR MEDICAL LEAFLET

The LINEEL CO. LTD., 16 Bevis Marks, London, E.C.

TO AVOID INDIGESTION.

That distressed feeling is simply a poorly-working stomach—it needs a little help—but no matter how bad it may be, a dose of will speedily give relief. Take Beecham's Pills for a few days, and the trouble will disappear.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

Digitized by Google

in general by the news of the disappearance of Isolo Staunton and the revelation of some at least of the mysteries of the Underworld to the inhabitants of the Overworld.

For Mercedes' sake it was given out that her father had been killed by a shell from one of his revolted warships during the escape of the Isola from Rio, and, as it was not worth anyone's while to contradict it, it remained as an accepted fact, and whatever became of Staunton and Valdez after their landing on the shores of Kerguelen Island, both of them kept their word and never gainsaid it. It might be possible that this fallen Crœsus of criminality may from some unknown and obscure position have watched, as none but he could watch, the splendours of his darling's future progress, but, if he did, he gave no signs—possibly being well contented to know that one at least of his aims, her happiness in life, had been amply, if indirectly, secured, even though the greatest of his own projects had failed.

Mr. Smith, of course, kept his word to Darfield, and the authorities respected it. After all, he was only an accused and not a condemned man, and so, under the circumstances, he was taken as acquitted, and, being the only man capable of discharging the duties of the post, he was for the time being constituted keeper and manager of the Underworld.

And then, when everything else was settled, when all the stores of illicit coin had been given up, when Mr. Battley had been forgiven on condition of superintending the breaking-up of his engines and the minting and note-printing machinery which they ran, and when the somewhat wonder-stricken delegates from the mints of Europe and America had satisfied themselves that the source of the flood of illicit coin which had deluged the money markets of the world was at last honestly dried up, then there rose the somewhat momentous question as to the ownership of this submarine El Dorado with all its countless treasures.

The Danish Government at once put forth a claim, based on the original documents which related its first discovery, and which Kesteven, who had retained them against any emergency of this sort, placed at the disposal of the committee of inquiry, saying: "You will find, gentlemen, that our way into the Underworld is about fifty miles to the south-east of the coast of Iceland. If the Danish Government can find the way by which those original inhabitants got into that cavern, and gradually groped their road, maybe generation after generation, to where we found them, we'll talk, but not till then. Our way in is outside all territorial waters, and, therefore, by the law of nations, it is a new country, and we've a right to it."

It is true that there were certain somewhat awkward questions asked as to any share that he might possibly have had in the use that was afterwards made of this submarine territory, but for the sake of Cora and the Grand Duke he lied quietly and consistently, and as there was no one of any consequence who had an interest in contradicting him, the upshot of the whole matter was that the splendid inheritance of the Underworld was divided between Mercedes and Cora.

Of this the almost immediate result was the formation of the Ellerton-Kesteven Radium Syndicate, under the presidency of Sir Wilfrid Ellerton, whose grief at his son's supposed death could only have been equalled by his delight, not only at his restoration to the liberty of the Overworld, but also at the genius, for it was nothing less, that had accomplished his release.

None better than he recognised the illimitable possibilities of the new source of power and light, and none knew better than his co-director, Derrick Kesteven, how to turn them to the best financial account.

And while all this was being settled, a somewhat singular compact was being made among those who had not had a little to do with the solving of the mystery of the Underworld. Wilfrid and Mercedes had renewed the promise they had given each other behind the Council Chamber of the Isola, on the terrace of Señor Martinez's villa high up among the tree-clad, flower-scented mountains overlooking the moonlit bay of Funchal.

But it was impossible that their vows could be fulfilled until the year of mourning had passed, and so Cora and her Grand Duke, Lady Maud and her engineer, and Paula and her "detective," as she persisted in calling the man whose courage and devotion had won what many a man in Europe would have given a noble name and a coronet for, held a curious, but, for all that, intensely interesting, meeting in that same Council Chamber of the Isola—then lying spick and span in her own true guise and trim in Funchal Bay.

They also would wait for the fulfilment of their own happiness until Mercedes' sorrow should be turned by the magic of her strangely re-awakened love into joy, and then they would spend their collective honeymoon amidst the mysterious splendours of the Underworld, over which Darfield and Janet now reigned as king and queen.

And when in due course of time all this came to be accomplished, and they came back to the Overworld, they said, with well-justified agreement, that no such honeymoon had ever been spent in a world upon which no moon had ever shone.

The End.

A Model Wife.

The Tale of a Well-Merited Punishment.

JONES was well aware that his wife was in the habit of rifling his pockets when he was asleep, but, like a wise man, he kept silent on the subject. One night, however, he awoke and caught her in the act.

"Ha!" he exclaimed, "what are you doing, my dear?"

The lady started, her cheeks flushed, the trousers dropped from her grasp, and she was about to make a full confession, when a bright idea entered her head. Recovering her composure, she said:

"I was looking to see whether your trousers needed any buttons."

"They do, they do, my dear," he exclaimed, springing out of bed; "needed them for weeks, months, and I wondered why you didn't sew them on; but I waited, for I was sure you would do it some time. And how kind of you to get out of bed at this time of night to attend to them. Say what you will, there's nothing in the world like a good wife. Let me turn up the gas while you sew them on. Got your needle and thread, and the buttons? No. Well, tell me where they are and I'll get them for you."

Mrs. Jones proceeded to sew on the buttons, while her husband sat on the side of the bed and encouraged her with words of praise for her wifely care and thought for his comfort, occasionally remarking that he would always say there was nothing in the world like a good wife.

Then he went to the wardrobe and brought out several pairs of trousers, a coat, two or three old vests, and a number of shirts, from all of which buttons were missing, and cheerfully observed:

"While we're at it we'll make a night of it."

Two hours later, when Mrs. Jones, with a weary sigh, removed the thimble from her finger, Mr. Jones patted her on the cheek and said:

"I say it again, my dear, I say it again, that wherever I go I will make it known, proclaim it from the house-tops, shout it in the highways and byways, that a wife who gets up in the night to sew buttons on her husband's clothes is a priceless treasure, a crown to that husband, and an ornament to her sex."

Then Mr. Jones, chuckling to himself, lay calmly down and slept the sleep of the just.

Tom Down.

Digitized by Google

Page Woodcock's Pills

50 years' increasing British reputation has proved them to be the safe, sure and speedy remedy for Wind on the Stomach, Indigestion, Biliousness, Sick Headache, Palpitation, Depression, Nervousness, Languor, &c. Sold by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ & 2/9, or post free for price from Page Woodcock, Ltd., 14 and 16, Euston Buildings, N.W. (late of Lincoln).

SMITH'S

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Stores, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

Chilblains

Icilma Natural Water Soap prevents and cures Chilblains, Chaps, and Gouty Irritations of the Skin. Rose scented. Price 10d. Send 2d. stamps for Samples of Soap and of Icilma Fluor Cream, perfect for the complexion against cold winds.—ICILMA (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

TRIUMPH Cycles

£10 10 to £19 19

or by Deferred Payment System.

"The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce."

CATALOGUES GRATIS.

TRIUMPH CYCLE CO. Ltd., COVENTRY.

4 and 5, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

30 Deansgate Arcade, Manchester. 4 King Edward St., Leeds.

PAWNBROKER'S SALE

Every article in new condition.

SUITABLE FOR PRESENTS.

A full list sent post free on application.

SAVE £ d s

13/6 Gent's magnificent 18-ct. Gold-cased Chronograph Stop Watch, jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper, 10 years' written warranty; also fashionable curb (pocket to pocket) double Albert same quality (stamped and guaranteed), with handsome seal attached; three together.

12/6 Lady's handsome 18-carat gold-cased Keyless Watch, jewelled movement; exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also fashionable long watch-guard, same quality (stamped and guaranteed) elegant West-End pattern the two together.

14/9 Furs.—Magnificent Alexandra Dagmar necklet and muff; beautiful real Russian sable hair, worth 4 guineas, not been worn; sacrifice for 14/9; approval willingly.

19/6 Genuine Italian Mandoline, by Stridente, Naples; fine tone; 21 ribbed, real rosewood, pearl and tortoiseshell inlaid, in saddler-made case; approval.

21/- Fine Old Violin, by Pietro Antorious; magnificent rich solo tone; in perfect condition, with fully mounted bow and case; approval.

10/6 Lustrous diamond and ruby Half-hoop Ring, set with 5 matchless doublet rubies and 3 real diamonds; solid gold, hall-marked.

7/6 Curb Chain Bracelet, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case.

6/9 Brooch; very handsome 18-carat rolled gold, 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls in case.

21/- Lady's solid gold Keyless Watch, jewelled in 10 rubies, beautifully engraved case, splendid time-keeper; 10 years' written warranty; week's free trial.

8/6 Fashionable Long Neck-chain; genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished; very choice design.

9/6 Organ Toned Melodeon; magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, and 4 acting stops, including Tremolo and Diapason action; rich powerful tone, perfect order.

9/6 Necklet with Heart Pendant, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern; heart set with pearls and turquoise.

12/6 Magnificent 5-row Pearl Collarette; finest quality, mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case.

Any of the above articles sent on approval willingly.

R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller,

284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1¾d. tins everywhere.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

Secrets of Youth.

How to have a beautiful face and figure. How to have beautiful eyes and hair. How to curl the hair naturally without curling pins or tongs. Little people can be made tall. Noses that are red or ugly shape can be cured, and looks greatly improved

This Pretty Book will be sent FREE. Ask for "BEAUTY'S BOUDOIR." Stamp must be sent for postage. Peralia Perfumery Co. (Dept. 14) 73 Camden Street, North Shields, Eng.

GIVEN AWAY

with this Week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 521)

A PAPER PATTERN of this

BOY'S TUNIC

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

FOR WHITE, SWEET CLOTHES, BRIGHT, HEALTHY HOMES

BORAX DRY SOAP

The safest, purest, and best powder soap for washing clothes, washing-up and house-cleaning money can buy.

Sold in ¼lb. packets everywhere.

BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENT MAKERS TO THE KING.

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham.

WRITE FOR FREE SAMPLE, ETC.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

The Lorn Colonial.

THE Colonial reader who painted such a doleful picture of his success with British maidens has the sympathy of "HONOUR BRIGHT," who writes: "I, for one, admire Colonials very much. They are more open and not so stand-offish as stay-at-homes. Your correspondent will find girls here more reserved than in the Colonies, but I am sure he will get on with them all right when he once gets to know them. He only wants a little patience."

* * * * *

I hope my Colonial friend will be encouraged by these kind remarks.

Girl Who Doesn't Like Music.

"BERT" is very musical, and plays the violin and piano well, but his fiancée does not care at all for music, and never wants "BERT" to play. In fact, she is jealous of his being so fond of his fiddle, and thinks it makes him less fond of her. "BERT" wishes to know if this might not mean unhappiness in after years.

* * * * *

It is a great pity your intended does not share your love of music. It might mean unhappiness in after years, and it seems very foolish that she should be jealous of your accomplishment. I would not advise you, however, to worry about that, if you are fond of each other in other ways. Such a difference might arise, but only if the couple were not really attached to each other. Besides, surely you can educate her into liking your playing? There are very few girls so unmusical as to object to music in others, and I hope, for your sake, your fiancée is not one of those.

Jealous of 'Bus Passengers!

SOME young men seem to have very jealous sweethearts, but I think "CLARIS" is unusually afraid of hers. She writes: "He was recently thrown out of work, and accepted a post as 'bus conductor. He sees a good many young ladies, and I have seen him deep in conversation with many of them. I have complained to him, but he said, 'I must speak to the passengers sometimes.' But I know he was a great flirt before I went with him. What is your advice?"

* * * * *

My advice is for you not to be so silly. Just fancy being afraid because your young man is civil and pleasant to his passengers. As for "deep conversation," well, conductors who have to explain to young ladies several times over that Charing Cross is not the Bank, and that every street isn't Holborn, have to be fairly "deep" or there would be trouble. Take my advice, and don't bother about your young man. He is evidently a very pleasant fellow, and none the worse because he shows it in his duties.

Unreturned Love.

"R. G." I am sorry you did not agree with my advice to "JACK" about meeting the girl who is so fond of him. But you know, I don't believe in "stock" advice, but try to enter into each case on its merits. In my opinion, "JACK" should agree to the girl's suggestion that they should meet. Because so far "JACK" does not return her love, is no reason at all why the two should cease to know each other, is it? It would be a very hard rule if all acquaintanceships had to cease because both were not in love from the first. You must know that love often takes time to mature. What may at first be mere friendship, deepens in time into something stronger. I quite agree that there is reason in your argument, but you know, the "correct thing" is not always the right thing, especially in love affairs.

The Absent Husband Again.

"SINCE I became engaged last March," writes "BEATRICE," "my lover has learnt that he will be sent to South Africa about two months after our wedding this year. He will be away for about a year, and fears he will not be able to afford to take me as well. What do you advise? Should we postpone the wedding until he returns, or should we get married, and then part for such a long time? I will abide by your decision."

* * * * *

I think, if both of you are willing, it might be better to postpone the wedding. After all, it would be very hard on you to part so soon after for a year, and it would not be very nice for you after marriage not to have a home of your own. When he comes back, you would be able to settle down happily together.

Tea and Etiquette.

Two girls know two young men. One of the latter lives in lodgings. Would it be incorrect for the girls to accept an invitation to tea at the man's rooms? This question comes from "VIOLET."

* * * * *

That depends on the sort of girl you are. There is nothing very terrible, to my mind, in two girls having tea at a young man's rooms. It is done a good deal in what are called Bohemian circles, and is not thought very much of. If you do not live in those circles, but have neighbours and friends who are easily shocked, then you should not accept such invitations unless accompanied by a chaperon. Under those circumstances, no polite young man would give the invitation unless he also included an older lady, say, your mother, or married sister, or maiden aunt.

An Awkward Fix.

"H. R." lives near a business establishment where a lot of young ladies are employed. He often passes them on the way to business, and one of them, who had stared very hard for some time, has now started bowing to him as they pass. "H. R." does not know her, and does not particularly wish to, but how should he act when they meet in this way?

* * * * *

You should make up your mind, "H. R.," as to the reason for the girl's bowing to you. Perhaps she fancies she has met you, and wishes to resume the acquaintance. On the other hand, she may be doing what is called "throwing her cap" at you. If you don't really wish to know the girl you should avoid meeting her, and look in another direction when you pass. After noticing that her attentions are unwelcome I suppose she will not continue them. But if a girl bows to a man, and he notices it, his duty as a gentleman is to raise his hat.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c., lecturing on Foods, says: "The chief text in the Gospel of Nutrition is that Tea and Coffee are not Foods at all, while Cocoa is an admirable and sustaining diet. Than

Fry's

PURE CONCENTRATED

Cocoa

no better food product of this nature can be obtained or used."

"A PERFECT FOOD."

TRY ALSO

FRY'S COCOA AND MILK,

A COMBINATION OF

FRY'S PURE COCOA with the BEST ENGLISH MILK.

Made instantly with Boiling Water. No Milk or Sugar Required.

"REFRESHING AND NUTRITIVE."—Lancet

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A BRIGHT NEW YEAR

Will be yours, if you use

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH.

Guaranteed free from acid. Produces quickly a lasting brilliancy.

Manufacturers:
The "Matchless" Metal Polish Co. Ltd., Liverpool.

The Light-Running

YŌST Typewriter

Noted for Beautiful Work.

YŌST Fountain Pen

For Rapid Shorthand. 10/6.

33 1-3% off Gold Mounted Pens. Send for Price List.

EMPLOYMENT

SITUATIONS found for Competent Operators and Shorthand Writers. No Fees.

MACHINES lent ON HIRE for Practice at 7/6 per week.

50 HOLBORN VIADUCT, E.C.

DELICIOUS WHOLESOME
PURE

16 GOLD MEDALS & HIGHEST AWARDS

JOHN HILL & SONS

SEND 3D

THE "TUDNO" CAKE.

Splendid for daily family use, of choicest quality and Genoa character,
8d. per lb.

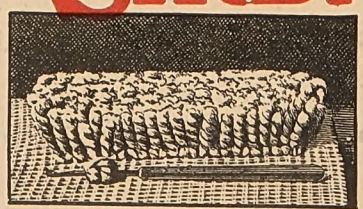
"ROTHESAY" RICE.

A delightful plain cake, rich and fragrant. A ½lb. sample sent free on receipt of 3d. in stamps to cover postage.

The "TUDNO" Cake & Biscuit Factories, Ashton under-Lyne.

THE "SIRDAR" RUG WOOL

BRIGHT IN FINISH.



OF SUPERIOR QUALITY.

FINEST and BEST FOR

RUG & MAT MAKING,

ENDLESS WEAR.

May be had in 30 Art Shades from the principal dealers. Insist on having the "SIRDAR" and Take No Substitute.

PLAIN DIRECTIONS FOR RUG AND MAT MAKING.

Wholesale only from HARRAP BROS., Bective Mills, Wakefield.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 785. Week Ending January 16, 1904. Price One Penny.

The poisonous gas was filling the room. The precious packet was at her feet, but she was held powerless in the grip of the chair!

(A Thrilling Incident from the Powerful Story, "In the Hands of the Enemy." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE

The purest and most efficient Remedy procurable for
COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, CATARRH, WEAK LUNGS, and CHILDREN'S COUGHS.

BRONCHITIS AND ASTHMA

Veno's Lightning Cough Cure
Produces its most brilliant effect in Chronic Bronchitis and Asthma. It effects astonishing cures in the worst and most persistent cases.

Rev. W. W. TULLOCH, D.D., Bonar Bridge, Sutherlandshire, writes: "July 22nd, '03.—I have been a martyr to asthma all my life and lately to chronic winter bronchitis. I have found Veno's Lightning Cough Cure a valuable medicine."

CHILDREN'S COUGHS

Mrs. ADA S. BALLIN, 5, Agar Street, London, Editor "Womanhood," and a great authority upon children's diseases, writes:—"Veno's Lightning Cough Cure is an exceedingly successful remedy; it is very pleasant to take and the relief it gives is very rapid. The preparation is perfectly safe for children."

W. LASCELLES-SCOTT, F.R.M.S., in his Certificate of Analysis among other things says:—"I have pleasure in certifying that in my opinion VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH COUGH is an exceptionally pure, safe, and effective preparation."

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES 9½d. Regular Sizes, 1/1½ and 2/9.

Ask for VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE at Chemists and Drug Stores, or post free from the VENO DRUG CO., Hulme, Manchester, England.

J. G. GRAVES'

TOOLS & MACHINERY.

Send for No. 2 Illustrated Catalogue of TOOLS FOR ALL TRADES; also, Machinery of every description. Approval before purchase. Terms to suit customers' own convenience.

Profitable Agencies offered to persons in regular employment

WRITE FOR TERMS AND PARTICULARS.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., Sheffield.

GIVEN AWAY

with next Week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 523)

A PAPER PATTERN of this

CHILD'S WINTER COAT.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

"No Better Food."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa.

"I have never tasted Cocoa that I like so well."—Sir CHAS. CAMERON, C.B., M.D., Ex-President of the Royal College of Surgeons, Ireland.

ASK FOR THE

"FIVE BOYS" MILK CHOCOLATE

"Unrivalled as a Chocolate Confection."—MEDICAL MAGAZINE.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

BODLEIAN 13.1.1904 LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 785.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending January 16th, 1904.

IN THE HANDS OF THE ENEMY.

The Story of a Girl's Peril and a Tardy Retribution.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

"MRS. TYRRELL, Doris and I have come to ask for your sanction to our engagement!"

Austin Howard had prepared a pretty little set speech for this momentous occasion—not that he was a timid man, for he looked frank and fearless as he walked across the small, plainly-furnished room with the happy and blushing Doris by his side—but even the coolest of men find it difficult to make a good impromptu speech in such circumstances. He stopped somewhat abruptly, for Mrs. Tyrrell had not risen from the couch with a smile and with outstretched hands ready to pronounce the maternal benediction.

She looked up slowly and gazed at them with only half-comprehending eyes. As she looked at them, the full significance of the words flashed upon her, and she rose to her feet with something very like a groan, letting slip from her trembling fingers a letter which fluttered to the ground and lay near Doris' feet.

"Mother! What is it?" inquired the girl anxiously. She forgot the immediate object of their entry into this apartment and hurried to her mother. "What is it? Have you had bad news?"

There was a pause, during which time Mrs. Tyrrell appeared to be gathering her strength for a great effort. When she spoke, she did so in a clear, firm voice:

"Yes; I have had news which is bad and affects you two in a way which you do not suspect. I have never spoken of this matter, because there seemed to be no necessity for doing so; but now I must speak, for my enemy is finding me out once more!"

Austin and Doris stared at Mrs. Tyrrell in perplexity. The latter stooped to pick up the fateful letter and motioned them to take seats near her. The pallor of her face was striking, but there was an air of great determination on the features which impressed her listeners with a sense of the importance of what she was about to tell them.

Austin drew a chair near the couch, but Doris sat by her mother's side and flung her arms round her neck with a cry of "Mother dear, mother dear!"

"You will both learn for the first time that my name is not Tyrrell!" began that lady. "Don't interrupt me, Doris, my child, but restrain your feelings and listen! My name, and Doris', is Seymour. I need not go into the whole story. Your father, Doris, was a doctor with a good practice when we married, but we made an enemy by that marriage. Mr. Sidney Lucas, a solicitor, wished to marry me; he was also angry because your father's reputation increased, to the detriment of his—Lucas'—younger brother, who was also a medical practitioner in the same town. He set to work to ruin us.

All rights reserved.]

"I am telling you what I believe to be the truth, although I cannot produce proof. He spread lying reports concerning my husband's medical mistakes, and that kind of thing is very difficult to expose when it is done cleverly, while the results of such defamation are positive. My husband found that his practice was decreasing; he heard of the rumours, but could not trace the author. He denied them, but the calumny spread and we were distracted.

"Then came a diabolical climax. My husband was accused of having prescribed the wrong medicine for a particular complaint and the patient died! The paper on which he wrote the prescription was produced; it was a clever forgery, but everyone believed that the charge was correct. To make matters worse, when the patient's will was read, it was found that she had left all her estate to Dr. Seymour!

"Lucas swore to drawing up the will at the lady's request; he stated that he expostulated with her, but she was clearly under the influence of her medical adviser and she persisted in her intention.

"The will was contested by the relatives, but my husband declared that he had never mentioned the matter of will-making to his deceased patient and did not defend the suit, which, of course, went against him and left the property in the hands of the relatives as he desired.

"This will made things look very black against your father, Doris, and the verdict of the coroner's jury, that the death was due to misadventure, was regarded as a mistake. It was quite a wonder that my husband was not prosecuted for murder!

"The result was that we were ruined at last; we had to steal away and live in retirement on the small annuity which we were able to purchase with the money we had. We dreaded the evil designs of the villain who had done so much wrong; we feared that he would yet pursue us, for he found out whither we had gone and had spread greater calumnies abroad concerning us. So we left that part of the country altogether and hid ourselves under the name of Tyrrell, my maiden name. My husband did not long survive his ruin; he died when Doris was five years old—fifteen years ago—and I have lived in seclusion ever since.

"I have never heard of Lucas since then, and I believed—shall I say that I hoped?—that he was dead. Yet, after all this time, he is finding me out! This letter, which is from the only relative I have, and the only person who knows of my whereabouts and my assumed name, tells me that Lucas is on my track again! I will not read it to you; it sounds innocent enough, but I know the man!

"Now, it is quite probable that he will discover us and make our identity known. Everyone believes in the mistake, and many believe in the supposed guilt, of your father!

Digitized by Google

"You see what that means, Mr. Howard? It means that your wife will be branded as the daughter of a man who was morally a criminal, but who escaped the legal consequences by some lucky accident! Are you willing to face that?"

Mrs. Tyrrell's lips were dry when she finished speaking.

Doris had buried her face on her mother's bosom and was quietly sobbing—sobbing with sorrow at the misfortunes of her parents and at the overthrow of her own happiness.

Austin Howard's face was pale; he gazed steadily into the eyes of Doris' mother and saw in them a look which convinced him of the truth of her story. He rose, took the girl from her mother's bosom, and folded her in his arms.

"It will make no difference!" he said simply.

"No, no!" cried the girl, liberating herself from his embrace. "It will not be just to bring that disgrace upon you! Can we not do something to defeat the evil machinations of this man and bring his misdeeds to light?"

"I care nothing for what the world may say!" declared the young man passionately. "Doris, you are mine, you gave yourself to me only a few moments ago, and I claim you! I will not listen to these Quixotic scruples!"

"I think that Doris is not entirely wrong!" said Mrs. Tyrrell (for so we will continue to call her) in a tone of quiet decision. "I do not know whether or not we shall be able to do anything against this man, but I intend to try. I will let him find me out, if he can, and then act. I think, also, that you must submit to a trial of love, Mr. Howard!

"I propose to make a stipulation, namely, that you two shall not see one another or correspond for six months. Nay!" she added, as Howard broke in impatiently, "it will be a test for both of you. Do not blame me or think me hard; I am doing it for the best!"

"But perhaps Doris will be in danger, and I wish to have the right to help her!" cried Howard in expostulation.

"I intend to get Doris away from here without anyone knowing where she has gone," said Mrs. Tyrrell calmly. "You know our story, Mr. Howard. Doris was working hard for an appointment when she fell ill, and so proved herself unequal for it. Afterwards, she began to try for a post as secretary to some lady or gentleman, in order to eke out our small income. We did not like parting, but it was necessary. Well, she can take up such an appointment and hold it till—till other conditions arise!"

Howard protested, but there was a majority against him, for Doris desired it. He looked reproachfully at her as she expressed the wish, but the girl's eyes filled with tears and he called himself a brute.

"I yield to the suggestion, but with bad grace!" he said with a sad smile. "All I can say is that I should like to imitate Rip van Winkle during the next six months!"

So it was settled, and Doris continued her negotiations for the post of secretary to a gentleman in a country house not far from Inverness; these negotiations had been commenced, and it was this fact which hastened Austin Howard's declaration and led to the scene just described.

Strange are the ways of Fate! Doris obtained the post and left for Inverness within a week; and that new departure in her life was the first step towards the vindication of her father's character!

Eskadell, as the country house was called, was situated a few miles from Inverness, and it was a lonely place to all except those fond of purely natural beauty. Doris found life at Eskadell very pleasant after the first feeling of homesickness had worn off; she liked her occupation, which was to act as amanuensis for Mr. Martin Carden, in connection with his scientific researches and his commercial interests, and she delighted to roam about the grounds and the adjoining country, studying the flowers, the plants, and the animal life. At times she felt dull at the loss of Howard's company and letters, and the recollection of her father's misfortunes cast a shadow over her, but she was fairly happy in her new surroundings.

Mr. Carden was not difficult to please, and he began to take a fancy to Doris. On her side, the girl scarcely knew how to judge the man; he was courteous to a degree, and was held in high esteem by everyone, as she could see by the tone of the letters which reached him, yet she had an indefinable feeling that there was something hidden.

A month passed and she had overcome this feeling to some extent when, as he paid her the first month's salary, it was revived and intensified.

"I shall be away for a day or two, Miss Tyrrell!" he told her, with a curious light in his eyes. "I do not think that anything important will arise, but you will leave the letters unopened in any case. You will find many papers to put in order in the room above, and you will have sufficient occupation till I return. It is very important business!"

He turned away as he said the last words, but he was not quite quick enough to prevent Doris from seeing an almost fiendish gleam in his steely eyes. It made her shudder, and she felt inclined to tell him then and there that she must leave Eskadell at the end of the second month; he was out of the room, however, before she could say anything, and she afterwards tried to laugh at her foolishness.

Left to her own resources, Doris busied herself by setting things straight in the room above. There were all kinds of publications containing marked articles, which had to be indexed for reference; there were other cuttings which had to be pasted in books, and there were many letters and communications which had to be reduced to order. She was indexing a cutting when she came across the word "Lucas," and the name at once attracted her attention.

Turning to the page indicated, she found a cutting from a newspaper published in the town where her mother and father had lived; it was a sensational account of the flight of Mr. Lucas, her father's enemy, who had been detected in the misappropriation of trust moneys.

She read it again and again.

"That ought to go a long way towards clearing my father's character!" was her first thought; but she afterwards remembered that the flight of Lucas did not convict him of spreading calumnies against her father. "Still," she murmured, with a glow on her cheeks, "this information should give my mother a weapon of defence if Lucas should really be hunting her out with a view to pursuing his malevolent designs. I will tell her of this, and perhaps she can have him tracked and arrested."

She discontinued her work to write a long letter to her mother; when this was done, she had time for reflection.

"How did Mr. Carden come to take sufficient interest in Lucas to preserve that cutting?" she asked herself. "When he comes back, I will take an opportunity to casually inquire; I must be careful, lest he detects the secret of the name of Tyrrell!"

On the third day, Doris received a letter from her mother; in it the sorrowful woman explained that Lucas, much older in appearance yet still easily recognisable, had found her. He had stopped her on her walk and had deliberately stated his intention of persecuting her. "I had had your letter," continued Mrs. Tyrrell, "so I threatened him with arrest. He turned red with rage; he had evidently thought (and rightly) that I knew nothing of the past; but he soon recovered and laughed at my threat. He would make every place so unpleasant for me, he swore, that I should be glad to be at rest for ever. And then, Doris, he spoke of you and said that he would wreak his vengance on you! He would get you in his power and kill you! I am so glad that you are away, but I tremble for you, my child! The man must be mad!"

The letter ended somewhat abruptly, testifying to the mental condition of Mrs. Tyrrell; the reading of that note left Doris pale and agitated. Who was this man, and how could his wicked deeds be stopped?

"You look pale, Miss Tyrrell!" remarked Mr. Carden cheerily, when he appeared the next day. "Found it rather lonely here, eh? Yes, it must be lonely for you, although there are several servants here. Feel one bv vourself, of course. Well perhaps we can make it more pleasant for you. Ha, ha!"

Digitized by Google

Doris felt grateful for his consideration, although that laugh jarred upon her nerves; but Mr. Carden was really so affable that Doris began to feel less miserable. Perhaps Mr. Carden could throw some light on the Lucas matter?

"You have a curious collection of cuttings, Mr. Carden," she took occasion to observe with apparent unconcern. "I actually saw one about a dishonest solicitor named Lucas. Did you know him?"

Carden started as if stung. "Oh, you saw that, did you?" he queried slowly, and speaking with evident restraint. "I don't know why I kept that cutting. I met him once. Yes, we must soak that slip off the sheet and destroy it. Do you know anything of that man?" he inquired suddenly.

It was now Doris' turn to start and flush. "My mother knew a solicitor of that name years ago; possibly it is the same," murmured the girl.

Carden swung round on his swivel chair and did not reply; it was well for Doris that she did not see the cruel smile that played round his clean-shaven lips.

Doris concluded that she had vexed Mr. Carden by reminding him of the misdeeds of a man whom he had once known, and she also saw that she had been betrayed into saying more than she had intended; she therefore decided not to press for more details. In a little while Mr. Carden's good-humour returned, and he chatted with her in a manner which surprised her. He had not unbent to that extent before!

"You are rather a clever girl, Miss Tyrrell, and it is a pity that your health spoilt you for taking up a position such as the one for which you were trying," he remarked later in the day. "Yet I don't know that I regret it, for I should then have lost a valuable assistant. Now, you must help me more in my laboratory work; you are capable of it, I am sure! What do you say to making a beginning this evening?"

"I shall be pleased," cried Doris, with genuine pleasure. "I hope," she added, half in jest, half in earnest, "that I shall not make anything explode!"

"I shall not give you the chance," answered Carden drily.

The girl laughed; she saw only humour in the reply, and missed its real meaning.

It was eight o'clock when Carden summoned Doris to go with him to one of his laboratories. Dinner was over, and they could do a couple of hours work before retiring. He led the way to a far wing of the house, which was never used; servants were permitted to go there to dust and keep the place in some sort of order at frequent intervals, but otherwise nobody ventured there. There was a general notion among the servants that the place was dangerous because Mr. Carden carried out various chemical experiments there, and Carden himself had fostered the notion.

Carden ushered Doris into a long room, which contained many scientific instruments; this apartment was lighted electrically, the current being obtained from accumulators. He shut the door behind him and motioned her to a chair.

"Sit down, while I tell you something!" he said harshly.

Full of wonder at the change which had suddenly come over the man, Doris obeyed mechanically. The usual benevolent smile was gone, the aspect of the face was entirely altered; he stood before her with a diabolical look on his features, which was so unexpected that it paralysed her faculties for the time.

"Fate has aided me," he continued, with a ring of triumph in his voice. "When I advertised for an amanuensis, I did not dream that the successful applicant would prove to be the daughter of the man and woman whom I have hated for a period which may well be called a lifetime. I did not know you under your assumed name, and you do not sufficiently resemble either of your parents to make you recognisable. It was not till the day I went away that I knew anything of your identity. Do you guess mine?"

Doris shivered; the look of mingled horror and disgust told him as plainly as words that she had guessed. She tried to rise from her seat, but she found that she was held tightly in the grasp of the hinged arms of the chair; they had pinned her to her seat.

"You cannot get up, and it will be useless for you to call out!" declared Lucas, for it was he. "Nobody will hear you. This room has no windows and only a narrow skylight, so your cries could not be heard."

"Why are you so cruel to my people and me?" Doris contrived to gasp.

"I hated your father because he always thwarted my plans in some way or other. And I hated, and still hate, your mother because she refused me for him! And I can deal your mother a blow through you. I intend to do it. I will tell you how."

He pointed, with apparent inconsistency, to a small packet on the floor close to her feet.

"That packet contains enough to clear your father's name. Think of that! But you will never read it, nor will anyone else. You have learnt too much; you betrayed some of your knowledge when you spoke of the cutting, and I can easily suppose that a clever girl like you has gleaned much more information. I determined when I first came back to play with you and torment you, as a cat does a mouse, but that sort of thing is dangerous with one who has such knowledge.

"I am going to leave you here. I shall cause the room to be filled with a new gas which I have discovered and which has the effect of paralysing the organ of speech and the motor muscles at the same time as it sharpens the feelings and the mental faculties. When this is accomplished you will find the arms of the chair release you, but you will not be able to move.

"You will not be able to call for help even if you should hear some one outside the door.

"Then I shall set fire to this wing. The wind is blowing from the other part of the house, so only this wing will suffer. You will see the flames curling round you, your agony will be immensely intensified, but you will be powerless! And you will perish by an awful death, with your eyes on that packet!"

He almost shouted the last sentences in exultation, and quickly passed out of the room. In a few seconds Doris felt her sense of smell tickled by a peculiar odour, pleasant and soothing in its effects at first. It excited her; she tried to cry out, but her voice failed. In less than two minutes she felt the arms of the chair relax, but she could not move. She lay back in the chair with widely opened eyes and waited.

An ominous crackle struck terror into her heart; it was the beginning of the fire! She waited in agony; the flames came shooting from all parts of the room! Her heart seemed to stand still with fear, but she could not move in the slightest degree.

She knew what would be said. It would go forth to the world that she had meddled with the chemicals unknown to Mr. Carden, or Lucas, and that she had spilt something which had rendered her unconscious and had set fire to the wing. Her charred body would be found, and——

The flames were leaping from the walls towards the ceiling, and now the floor was catching.

Digitized by Google

Nearer and nearer the tongues of flame came to her; great beads of perspiration stood upon her face. The fire would soon catch her clothes, but she could do nothing—nothing—except lay there and stare with distended eyes in front of her! How long before the devouring element caught her dress?

She fancied that she heard shouts outside, but probably the presence of the fire was not evident yet. She tried to turn her eyes to the packet, as Carden had said, but she could not move them.

The heat of the fire was affecting her; it would be a mercy if she were rendered unconscious! If not, she would go mad with horror!

Ah! A tongue of flame swept across her hand and was gone. The agony of that instant was terrible, but it proved to be her salvation. It caused her, involuntarily, to make one desperate effort to rise, and the strength of that effort broke the spell of the gas. She found herself on her feet, erect, with the flames dancing about her!

The instinct of self-preservation returned in all its power. She stooped to pick up the packet, and dashed to the door, thrusting the packet in her pocket as she did so. The door had not been locked, for Carden had to consider the possibility of the room not being entirely destroyed, and a door locked on the outside would tell awkward tales.

It required some nerve to hold up the skirt on one side so that it protected her face and hair from the flames, and thus rush to the door and fling it open, but Doris did it with firmly-set lips, and emerged into the corridor with a tiny tongue of flame burning a hole in her skirt. With great presence of mind she lay down and rolled over and over, extinguishing the fire and then sped down the corridor for freedom.

A thousand thoughts surged through her heated brain; Carden might be at the end, waiting to strike her down and take her back to the burning laboratory! She did not stop, however, but sped on till she reached the inhabited portion of the building. The place seemed deserted, so she concluded that the inmates had become aware of the fire, and were outside.

Here was her chance of escape with the precious packet in her possession! Carden, in aiming at the refinement of cruelty by causing her to die a terrible death within reach of the evidence she so longed to possess, had this time over-reached himself, as villains often do!

Doris would not lose time by repairing to her own room in order to obtain hat and cloak. She hurried out of the building by a back door, and ran through the grounds to the open country. As she broke her way through the hedge which formed the confines of Carden's estate, she heard a sound behind her; the next instant there was a sharp report and something struck the hedge quite close to her head. She divined the meaning of this; Carden had discovered her escape, and had so far forgotten his caution as to fire at her with his revolver!

Doris raced along the country lane for dear life; she knew that Carden would show her no mercy. The lane was a very tortuous one, so that she could keep clear of his bullets by maintaining an advance of only a few yards; but when she reached the end of this lane—— ?

She dared not think of that! Yet it was soon brought to her mind with full force, for in a couple of minutes she was in an open road at right angles with the lane, and she could hear the rush of footsteps behind her!

She ran on wildly, straining every muscle to maintain the pace, but her pursuer gained on her at every step. Panting, struggling onwards, stumbling, she reached the bridge over the railway line. She stumbled and collided with the buttress. A shout of triumph came from Carden. He sprang at her with outstretched hands to grasp her, and then——

He started back in horror, for Doris, with a wild despairing cry, had made use of her gymnasium training to scramble on to the parapet. For a moment she stood there, looking down at the metals, twenty feet below; then she gathered herself together and sprang forward from the bridge!

Even Carden uttered a cry of compassion as he started forward to catch at her dress, for he had heard what Doris had not and what had escaped her eyes, despite the bright moonlight which made everything almost as visible as in the daytime—a train which was rattling round the bend and towards the bridge!

The driver saw the dark object fall from the bridge right on the very line which his engine would soon pass over, and he involuntarily blew his whistle and tried to pull the train up in time, but it had passed under the bridge several yards before he could bring it to a standstill.

"I didn't feel anything, but he or she must be as dead as a door nail!" he told his fireman. "We must ha' gone clean over her!"

The guards went back along the line, followed by three or four of the male passengers who had heard what had happened. They found a woman lying between the two metals, unhurt save for a sprained ankle, but in a swoon; the train had passed over her without touching her.

"Phew!" whistled a guard. "She dropped lucky, and her swoon prevented her from moving, or I expect she'd have tried to get up and escape, and she'd ha' been settled!"

"Great Heavens!" cried one of the passengers. "It's Doris!"

The speaker was Austin Howard. Mrs. Tyrrell had told him of the visit of Lucas and of Doris' letter, and Howard had tracked the scoundrel to Inverness. There he had lost him, and was now on a wrong track, believing that he had a clue, when he was thus strangely brought face to face with Doris.

In order not to further delay the train, Doris was placed in the only vacant first-class compartment and there restored to consciousness while the train rattled onwards. She sobbed hysterically when she saw Austin and clung to him, but he calmed her, and they alighted at the first stop.

There she told her story, and at dawn the police were in possession of information which sent them in search of Carden, formerly Lucas, while Doris telegraphed to her mother to allay any fears which she might have if news of the fire reached her.

Later information from Eskadell showed that the wind had veered and carried the flames to the other portion of the house, with the result that it had been completely destroyed.

Carden, returning after he had seen Doris jump on the line, found the edifice burning furiously; he had made a desperate attempt to save certain property, entering the flaming building against the advice of all, and had been caught by the flames in an upper room, and had perished within sight of his servants and the local firemen, who were powerless to help.

Thus he had died the same terrible death as he had intended for Doris.

Little remains to be told. The small packet contained notes made by Lucas himself, a kind of confession of what he had done to ruin Dr. Seymour—a confession written gloatingly and in order to increase his delight at what he was doing and had done! The papers had a thumbed appearance, showing that he had often re-read them in later years, doubtless gloating over them every time!

Full justice was done to the memory of Dr. Seymour; the Tyrrells assumed their real name, and the clouds lifted from the horizon, showing a bright future. For Austin Howard had ample means, and he absolutely refused to await the expiration of the six months' probation! And, it must be admitted, neither Mrs. Seymour nor Doris was very pressing on that point.

G. Hubert.

PEARSON'S DREAM BOOK

Giving the Interpretation of Dreams by Magic Ciphers, by the Square of Fate, by a Table of Dreams, according to Days, etc.

BY PROFESSOR P. R. S. FOLI.

Author of "Handwriting as an Index to Character," "The Fortune Teller," etc.

Crown 8vo, Cloth. Price 1s.

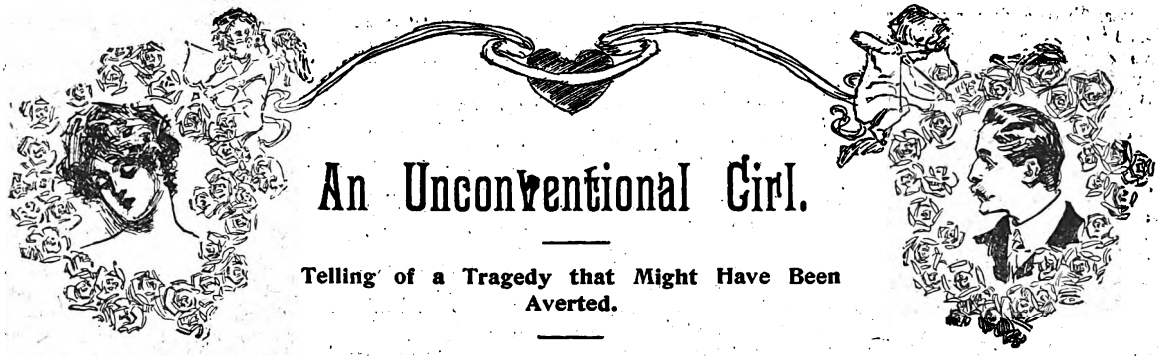
Digitized by Google



An Unconventional Girl.

Telling of a Tragedy that Might Have Been Averted.

"Look!" cried Mrs. Jephson-Hawes. "Good gracious! look at that girl!"

The good lady rustled all over with indignation.

Her companions were a tall, aristocratic young girl, in a simple black satin dress, straight in its folds, clinging in its outline as the drapery of a statue, its sombre hue only relieved by three strings of amber beads wound closely about her throat; with a broad black plush hat and long black plumes drooping over the pale, fair, high-bred face; and the other a handsome young Englishman with dark eyes and that languid air supposed to be "good form" in exclusive circles.

Howard Winthrop looked with a dawning interest kindling in his eyes at the girl whom Mrs. Jephson-Hawes indicated.

It was a fresh October evening and Venice was all aglow with light and sparkle.

Our friends were looking at a gondola near them, in which stood a young girl, her slight figure thrown out in relief against the sky. The sun had set, but the after-glow was still there; the water beneath was sheeted silver, the breeze had grown fresh, and blew full against the lithe young figure, whose heliotrope silk dress was of a soft, clinging kind. It had the beauty of falling in soft folds, and it seemed to cling caressingly to the well-rounded, supple limbs of this girl who stood with the oar in her hand propelling the gondola herself, while the gondolier looked on with a surprised grin upon his face. The light upon the flushed face showed intense and vivid colouring and all the charms of youth and health, added to a sort of radiant independence of everybody and everything. The bronze-gold hair that hung in a bewitching, soft, curly fringe almost down to the violet eyes, was carelessly blown by the wind, and the long old-gold feather that decorated a plush hat of the same colour swept out like a meteor upon the breeze.

"I knew I could do it, mamma," she said to a pale, delicate-looking woman whose plain grey dress formed the greatest contrast to her daughter's. "It only needs practice to do anything."

Howard Winthrop could not resist the thrill of admiration that ran like a subtle electric fire through his whole being. The fresh, unconventional attitude, the radiant health and youth, the vigour, the fire.

At that moment the long feather, having lost its hold in the rude struggle with the wind, fluttered away like some bright-winged bird, and sailing along for a moment with a sort of giddy delight in its freedom, dropped suddenly and softly as a golden shadow at the young man's feet.

He seized it rapturously but tenderly, and hastened nearer the water's edge. The flight had been noticed, and the gondola was turned towards the land.

The young lady looked about her as it stopped, and, having discerned a very handsome young man with her plume in his hand, she smiled a bewitching smile.

"It was carried to my feet," Howard said, bowing.

"She's terrible for losing her things," said the mother, in a plaintive voice, hovering near, like a moth about a gorgeous butterfly. "Nothing ever stays on her that can get away."

"I would call that an evidence of the depravity of inanimate things," said Howard, with an admiring glance.

The mother looked puzzled. The daughter laughed.

"They come back, you see," she said.

"I should think they would," answered Howard. "I'm sure I wish I might."

He was quite shocked at his own boldness, but perhaps more so at the girl's answer.

"I wish you would; we don't know anyone here."

Yet her face was so frank and ingenuous that he could not think evil of her cordiality.

"I should be glad to be of service to you in any way," he answered cordially. "I know Venice pretty well, for this is my third visit."

"We are not at a hotel but at a pension, and it's very dull," she said. "We stayed one night at a place in the Plaza San Marco, but the people never go to bed there, and mamma could not sleep. We are abroad for her health, and so we had to find a quiet place, and it is quiet—oh, deadly quiet!"

Howard suddenly recollected his companions who were waiting for him, and drew out his card. The mother produced one of hers, and feebly seconded her daughter's invitation. The whole proceeding struck the young man as curious and unconventional in the extreme as he walked back to his party. While he had looked at the radiant vision it seemed correct and proper.

"They don't know me. I might be a blackleg and an adventurer. I hope they don't admit everyone so carelessly. The girl is so beautiful."

And he experienced a sort of pang at the fear that anyone else should be taken into their acquaintance in the same unconventional manner.

"I can be of real service to them," he said to himself as he took out the cards and read

MRS. JOHN STIRLING MISS DULCIE STIRLING.
"Dulcie."

What an odd diminutive, yet it had a soft clinging music about it that thrilled him. It was singing itself over and over again in his brain when he came upon Mrs. Jephson-Hawes, looking very stately and sedate, and Miss Mabel with an additional frosting in her face and manner.

"Really, Howard, that very unconventional person seemed to have something to say to you," said the elder lady.

But Howard did not satisfy the curiosity that was evident. He only bestirred himself to procure a gondola, and in a few moments they were afloat on the smooth, shining water. It was not yet dark, the after-glow had not faded.

The golden lamps shone out like golden flowers against the deep violet shadows. Domes and spires came out distinctly in that light, and all the serried masts of the merchant fleet at the mouth of the Quidecca stood up like lances. So they glided on till the darkness fell and a pale crescent moon rose "like a silver sickle in a field of stars."

But Howard Winthrop was thinking of none of these things. He saw instead a slight figure in a pale purple gown, with a vivacious, sparkling face and wind-blown, bronze hair. "She's awfully pretty, but 'bad form.'" he decided as he lit his cigarette that night. Yet she had taken possession of his fancy, and seemed quite at home there.

No one could have been more astonished than our hero himself when a few evenings after this he found himself drifting over the sheeted silver of those same waters with the enchantress herself. How it had come about was not exactly clear to him; but it seemed as if the invitation had come from Miss Dulcie herself, and that her mother had failed at the last moment.

Digitized by Google

"We hire the gondola by the week," the young lady had volunteered, "and it's a pity to send it away, with such a moonlight too."

So Winthrop found himself at her side, feeling as if he were sailing in an enchanted boat on an enchanted sea.

"Mamma gets tired so soon," she said to him frankly, "that I have to go about alone. One hour in a picture gallery uses her up, and she doesn't remember anything about it, poor dear; so what's the use."

"But you are too young, and, excuse me, too pretty, to go about without a chaperon," said Winthrop, looking at the effects of moonlight on the glowing face that bloomed like a flower in that pallid light.

She wore a dress of Vandyke blue velvet, with a cape of white Spanish lace carelessly tied over it. About her neck was a quaint collar of filigree silver, and on her arms bracelets of the same delicate frostwork. A Rembrandt hat of blue plush, with a long blue feather, held in place by a bird's silver claw, shaded, but did not conceal, the glory of her ruddy hair.

It gave Winthrop a sort of pang that he could not explain to look at her and think of her freedom.

It was not the proper thing at all.

"They have such musty, fusty ideas nowadays," she said, smiling brightly up in his face. "I rather like to shock them. Perhaps I shock you too?"

"Would you enjoy that?" the young man asked evasively.

"Oh, no! I would rather you approved of me; though"—with a mutinous and bewitching smile—"I don't know that I would give up my own way to bring that about. I've been a good deal spoilt—you have seen that. I know. The doctors told mamma long ago, when I was a child, that if I was opposed I would burst a blood-vessel and die. I'm afraid I've made use of her fear to get my own way. It's an ignoble confession to make, isn't it?"

"Yet you look extremely healthy," he answered in a sceptical tone. "I own I should be tempted some time to oppose you. It's not a good thing for any human soul to meet with no opposition."

"Well, mamma consoles herself for her own weakness by thinking I may have a strong hand to rule me one of these days. She takes the most dismal views of matrimony, do you know, and says, 'Poor dear! she will suffer enough one of these days. Let her enjoy life now.'"

"But you? I trust your views are more rose-coloured," said Winthrop, feeling his heart beat more rapidly and half despising himself for it.

What was this strange, impulsive creature to him?

"I? Oh, yes! I have my own dreams—what girl has not? I do not believe life is so leaden-hued as some say. The poets are particularly to blame for that, I think. They should be crowned with cypress, instead of laurel, for all the dismal songs of grief and gloom they have perpetrated. But I have not seen the Fairy Prince yet—at least, I think I have not"—with a mischievous look into Winthrop's eyes. "You know I am not eighteen yet."

Winthrop thought it would be hard to find a girl more emancipated.

"I predict all bright things for you," he said; "let me look at your hand. I learnt palmistry once from an Arab."

The girl frankly held out her hand; it was rosy-white and dimpled. Its soft touch, as it lay in his own, thrilled Winthrop from head to foot.

"The line of life is——"

He hesitated. He knew it was all nonsense, but he felt his heart sink as he saw that mystic line so suddenly broken on the little rose-lined hand.

"Well, what is it? Shall I die soon? That will be when my husband contradicts me, I know."

Winthrop rallied and spoke gaily.

"You will have a long life, a rich husband, and always have your own way. Here is a dark man who loves you."

It was quite in the approved gipsy style, and Dulcie nodded.

"Oh, yes. I know the dark man."

"What?" exclaimed Winthrop in surprise. "I thought you knew no one."

"Oh, he is an Italian count we met at Trouville in the summer—a dark, gloomy fellow, with magnificent eyes. He has a history."

"They all have."

"He is very poor."

"They all are."

"And he talks English in a broken way, and in a low, musical voice. He was teaching me Italian, and I am going on with the lessons when I get to Naples. He lives in Naples."

"Ah!"

Winthrop could not account for the jealous pang that stabbed his heart.

"Mamma has been in constant terror lest I should fall in love with him on account of the romance of the thing; and I'm afraid of foreigners. I feel that Count Torriani could do any one of those dark deeds we read about in Italian romances; but there is an interest in being with a man who adores you," with a bright glance.

Winthrop winced.

"So he adores you and tells you so?"

"Oh, yes. He reads me sonnets full of volcanic passion. He accounts for my indifference by believing that I am too young to be fully awakened to the best happiness of life."

"And you go about with him?" Winthrop asked in a dumb fury.

"Certainly. He is splendid-looking and a perfect gentleman. Besides, he knows his country as a foreigner could not do; and he appears to feel so much that I cannot crush him at a blow—can I, now?"

Winthrop felt himself growing hard and cold.

"You can only decide that for yourself," he said.

Somehow the rest of the sail seemed to have lost its enchantment. They landed and climbed the sandy ridges that glisten in the silvery light.

Every pool is a molten mirror. Before them lay the placid lagoon, on one side a line of dark blue, with creamy waves crawling lazily upon the shore. It was the Adriatic.

It was in vain that Winthrop tried to withdraw himself from the subtle charm of Dulcie's society. In vain he repeated to himself that she was too unconventional and too impulsive for that strict, cold London circle to which he belonged.

Mrs. Jephson-Hawes shrugged her shoulders at the very mention of the girl, and Mrs. Jephson-Hawes was the autocrat of his society. She had voted Miss Dulcie "crude—crude in the extreme," and there was scarcely a more significant term in that lady's vocabulary.

There was Mabel, a truly high-bred and perfect specimen of conventional breeding—a girl whose voice, musically modulated, was never raised above the regulation tone, whose step, floating and graceful, was never quickened by impulse, whose manner was cool and quiet and charming, but she charmed Winthrop no more.

He found himself longing for Dulcie's changing, ringing, tones. There was everything in her voice—appeal, merriment, melancholy, tenderness—it was as changeful as her eyes, her face, her whole manner. She was never the same—a perpetual study, an eternal delight. She fascinated him.

He spent all the time when he was away from her in steeling his heart against her, but with the first glance into her fearless bright eyes all his panoply fell from him, and he became her slave.

And so at last they found themselves together in Naples, and a new personage appeared on the scene.

The tall, dark, melancholy nobleman, who expressed a whole record of past grandeur and fallen fortunes in his sallow, pathetic face and sombre, dark eyes, was seen everywhere with Dulcie.

Her mother seemed to keep in the background as persistently as if she were indeed a moth and shunned the daylight.

Digitized by Google

When the Count saw Winthrop, an antagonism seemed to spring up at once in his breast. He discerned a rival, and hated him from that moment.

As for our hero, he ground his teeth in impotent rage when he saw his charmer leaning upon the Count's arm, looking up with a bright smile into his face, and listening to his broken sentences, as if they were the wisdom of the gods. He tried remonstrating with feeble Mrs. Stirling, who was just at that moment engrossed in a new symptom, and indifferent to all else.

"It gives rise to remark," he said, "unless a young lady is engaged to the gentleman."

"Oh, dear me!" she wailed; "don't ask me to interfere. Dulcie does as she likes; she always has—she always will; I haven't the nerve to control her—and, after all, I am sure of her, Mr. Winthrop. She is very independent, but she always will do right—I have that confidence in her. Do you know any remedy for neuralgia?"

Winthrop answered somewhat wildly, and got away in a discouraged mood. He must speak to the young lady herself. Most girls are keenly alive to rumour; and perhaps he might alarm her sufficiently to make her throw aside the languishing Count, who infuriated him so with his adoring airs.

It was a lovely sunset. As Winthrop stepped out upon the terrace between the sculptured vases full of trailing flowers, he saw a view which is, perhaps, the most famous in the world; the bay, like a shining crescent, lay before him, purple and emerald in the shadow of rocky headlands. The fishing-barks, with their white wings, looked like birds asleep on the blue waters.

There was a flicker of amber among the trailing ivies beneath him, and he hurried towards it. Dulcie was sitting there, idly picking some flowers to bits; a mosaic of bright leaves lay over her dress.

"So you serve the offerings of your victims?" he said grimly.

"Oh, they are from the Count. I couldn't keep all he gives me."

"Does it never strike you that you might stop it, if you don't care for it?" Winthrop asked, somewhat brusquely.

Dulcie opened her lovely eyes.

"But suppose it is not altogether unpleasant?"

"Oh, in that case it is quite correct, otherwise it might be better not to give rise to surmises that may be incorrect and injurious."

There was a slight rigidity about Dulcie's mouth and a little tremor in her voice.

"And why should you care?"

With those lovely eyes raised to his, the fresh young lips so near, the slender form within his reach, Winthrop's self-possession deserted him. A thicket of ivy and myrtle screened them from sight. He forgot everything but the rapturous beating of his own heart. In a second he had snatched her to his breast, and pressed a sudden kiss upon the scarlet lips.

"Because I love you, darling!" he murmured.

The golden-bronze head lay on his shoulder one second, while Dulcie said artlessly:

"Oh, I am glad, glad!" when a sudden rustle startled them. The Count stood glowering at them with gloomy eyes.

The Count stood glowering at them with gloomy eyes.

Winthrop started back, with a sudden impulse to knock him down, there was so much hate in the dark face. But he restrained himself—perhaps the man had done him a service. He had interrupted a passing frenzy; yes, that was what our unworthy hero styled his unpremeditated confession.

"Leave me," Dulcie whispered. "I must speak to him. I can calm the wild beast in him, I am sure."

Winthrop was glad to go away. He felt quite breathless with the plunge he had taken. It was all over now—too late to escape.

Was it too late? He had been betrayed into a sudden declaration and a kiss. Well! Dulcie had heard many such, and had been kissed before, very likely. A girl so very unconventional—no, somehow Winthrop could not wrong her in his mind.

Digitized by Google

What was a kiss? He felt the touch yet upon his lips—light as rose leaf yet glowing as flame. Should he give up all for that kiss? Dulcie was sweet and bewitching, but she was not the wife for him. She was crude, "undeniably crude."

He felt, somehow, all the harder to her that he had been betrayed into that weakness. He had looked upon himself as a self-centred fellow, who had himself well in hand; this undisciplined rebound of his nature was owing to her.

Her unfettered nature had worked upon his own to his detriment; he must shake off the fetters.

He nerved himself to the task, and sat down to write. He would not see her again—he dared not. The very memory of her witchery stole to him like a subtle and bewildering perfume. He must write.

Never was task so hard. Over and over again he attempted and tore into bits the unsatisfying result.

Now it was diffuse and kind; now it was too short and cold. At last he kept one in despair.

It ran as follows:

"MY DEAR MISS DULCIE—I am called away so suddenly that I fear I shall not have the happiness of seeing you again. Forgive me for the liberty I took this afternoon. I cannot forgive myself. Believe me, the feeling was not feigned; but I scorn myself for the weakness that betrayed me into an expression of interest that I cannot indulge. Circumstance, our own spheres in Society and the fitness of things, must all be consulted as well as that treacherous organ—the human heart. Make my adieux kindly to your mother. With best wishes for yourself, I am,

"Yours very humbly and repentantly,

"HOWARD WINTHROP."

When the young man had dispatched this note he began to pack hurriedly. He had not the nerve to meet the girl again after having sent it.

He resolved to wait till it was dark, and then to go. He could trump up some reason for the Jephson-Hawes.

The night was singularly alive and bright. Winthrop noticed that Vesuvius' plume had grown into a column; it grew beneath his eye, piling itself mass on mass. As he gazed, it was no longer a plume, but an arch that spanned half the horizon.

It grew rosy, fire-tipped. The dark billows were rose-crowned, the sombre mountains of smoke were flame-capped. The mountain was in eruption.

He paused to look. The sight charmed him and made him forget his journey for the moment.

There was a trembling in the earth, in the air. Then a volley of black vapour shot up, rent with veins of fire, like a cloud veined with lightning, and streams of lava—seething, liquid flame—began crawling down the cone.

Standing so transfixed, Winthrop had forgotten everything. He was not aware of a dark shadow stealing behind him, or of the glitter of steel flashing near. Only when he hears a woman's cry and feels two round, young arms about his neck, does he realise that someone is crashing away through the shrubbery, and that Dulcie has fainted in his arms.

He lifted her to a long, rustic seat near by, and realised for the first time that he has stopped near the garden—nay, that they are on the very spot where he had kissed her that very day. She lay there now, pale as the stone statue that stood near, and he suddenly saw with a cold horror that there was blood streaming over her white dress.

But the lovely eyes were open for a moment, and an arm stole about his neck again.

"I saved you, did I not, darling? You are not hurt?"

"No, no!—but you? I do not understand."

"It is a scratch. But the Count's dagger was aimed at your heart. I have saved you—that is joy enough."

Then she fainted dead away again, and he was aware that the attendants were thronging about them—that the mother was hovering with feeble moans over her daughter, that a medical gentleman was examining the wound.

"It is not serious," he said.

Then Winthrop gave her up to other hands with a sickening feeling of reluctance, and she was carried into the house.

He paced the garden-walks a long time, but scarcely looked at the wondrous panorama before him. Only he felt as if he, too, had undergone some strange convulsion of nature, as if a torrent of seething lava coursed through his veins instead of blood.

"And I have been ready to cast away such a love!" he groaned; "a love that could fling away life as a worthless thing for my sake. Oh, my darling, forgive me! I know I cannot live without you now!"

Suddenly, the memory of the letter stabbed him like a dagger. It had not reached her, evidently, before she had left the house. His messenger had indeed stopped on the way to do a little courting on his own account.

"Oh, fool that I have been!" he cried, starting into a hurried walk. "My doom is certain if she sees that. She would never forgive that cold, heartless letter!—my proud darling!"

He hurried up to the hotel, hoping it might not yet have been delivered. He felt as if he would give ten years of his life to get that scrap of paper in his hand once more. He had some hope as he asked for Mrs. Stirling.

There seemed an unusual bustle about the halls. A flurried look in people's faces. Mrs. Stirling did not come to him. He made his way to their parlour. The door stood open.

"Is she worse?" he asked, as he caught Mrs. Stirling hurrying by. "Is the wound more serious than the doctor thought?"

"Oh, for Heaven's sake, go away!" moaned the mother. "She has broken a blood-vessel, the doctor says. It is not the wound at all, only he says the excitement may have brought it on. She was quite calm, and was reading a note that someone brought her. The effect on her was terrible in the extreme.

"There is no hope. I cannot be calm, and so they will not let me stay with her. Oh, God, have mercy upon me! No—no, you must not go in."

But Howard Winthrop heeded nothing. He strode onwards to the couch upon which they had laid the wounded girl. She was ghastly white but conscious, and turned from him with a shudder.

He forgot conventionality then. It mattered not to him that his conduct was "bad form." He dropped on his knees at the bedside, and gasped out:

"Forget it, Dulcie, it is not true. I have found out my own heart now, and know that you are my life. I love you—before Heaven I love you!"

She lifted languid eyes to him, and the shadow of a smile touched her pallid lips.

"I told you that I had never been crossed in my life. You see, when it came I could not bear it. I am going to die, because I cannot have my own way. I am a poor, weak creature, after all."

"You are heroic," cried Howard, with a great sob in his throat; "do not slip away from me now, when I know your worth. Oh, darling! God has angels enough without you. Tell me—tell me you forgive!"

She held out the crushed slip of paper she still held in her hand.

"Take it," she whispered faintly. "I forgive—and believe—in spite—of all—that you love me."

A grey pallor settled on her face, and Winthrop was hustled from the room to pace his own floor till the sudden hush that falls on all earthly sounds when one Presence enters settled down over all. He knew that he had thrown away the most priceless boon ever offered to man, that he had murdered his own happiness for ever.

A voice followed him with a ceaseless cadence of pain, saying always: "It might have been. It might have been."

Helen Pierson.

LADY NOVELIST: "Darling, I have been untrue to you. I love another." Husband: "W-h-a-t!" Lady Novelist: "Calm yourself, dear; calm yourself. That is only what my heroine says to her husband, and I wanted to see how the husband would act."

Digitized by Google

Unsolved Love Problems.

A Prize of One Guinea is offered to the reader who sends in the most Satisfactory Solution to the Problem. Replies should not exceed one hundred words. See "Your Editor Chats."

VII.—THE ENGAGEMENT OF EDITH SARGEANT.

"INDEED, Wilfred, you make it very difficult for me to refuse you."

The speaker was a tall, fair-haired girl who was sitting on a sofa in a charmingly furnished drawing-room, and looking up at the grave, clerically-attired man who stood before her.

"That is naturally what I desire to do," he replied to her naïve remark, with a smile of singular sweetness.

"Oh," cried Edith a little impatiently, "what good would it do you if I married you and did not love you?"

"But you would in time," he insisted; "I am patient and I have learnt to wait. We have known each other since we were children together, and I am perfectly certain we are exactly suited to one another."

"Oh, yes, that is what mother says—a very suitable match, my dear—but I don't want only a suitable match—I don't want to marry a man unless I love him so much that I can't help myself."

"Edith," said the man, going a shade paler under his weather-beaten skin, "what do you know of love? If you do not love me like that, is there anyone else that you do?"

Edith flushed, and averted her head.

"Whom should I love?" she cried with a forced laugh. "I have not had an offer since Jack Osborne went abroad and got engaged on the way out, and this is being absurdly frank, is it not?"

And he was satisfied.

"Then," he cried, "if there is no one else I am content. Give what you can now, and I will teach you to love me more in time."

"But how can I tell if I shall ever love you more?"

"You will," he replied with a certainty that a man, even of his force of character, should dread to take upon him, and he seated himself beside her and took one of her hands in his.

Wilfred Arlington was not young, his hair was grey at the temples, and there were lines about his eyes and firm, compressed mouth, but he was young for a bishop, even a Colonial bishop, and Edith, who had sat on his knee as a golden-haired child, had still some of the awe left with which she had regarded the tall, grave clergyman, mixed now with admiration for his intellectual powers, and the rapid way in which he had come to the front.

She was flattered that he should seek her for his wife, and the thought of exchanging the narrow life of a cathedral close for the larger, wider existence of a bishopric in Greater Britain was very attractive to her, and she could not help being aware that had she never met Dr. Clinton she would not have hesitated to accept gladly what was offered her, and indeed to return his love with interest. There was only one thing she desired more than that she should love Wilfred Arlington, and that was that Maurice Clinton should love her.

And yet she was hardly aware of it; she had not been consciously telling an untruth when she gave him to understand that there was no one else, though a certain sub-consciousness had caused her to fence with the question. For the past six months she had not dared to question her feelings.

She had met Maurice at a friend's house, and they had immediately become friends. A friendship so devoid of flirtation, or any approach to sentiment, that she had not liked to refuse when he suggested they should write occasionally to one another, lest she should seem to put it on a different footing, and to be refusing what had never been offered.

A few letters had passed between them, but until Wilfred Arlington's declaration of love had caused her to inquire into the state of her feelings, she had never even wondered whether Dr. Clinton loved her, or she him. And now all that she knew was, that had she never met him she would undoubtedly have loved Wilfred.

Meanwhile, the bishop was watching her with more anxiety than she imagined. He loved her very deeply, but he thought it wisest not to show it too much lest she should be frightened, and afraid of the responsibility of accepting so much love.

"Edith," he said at last, drawing her closer to him, "will you not let me try to make you love me?"

And Edith, terrified lest she should have given her heart where it was not wanted, looked up into his earnest, deep-set, grey eyes, and said:

"Yes, make me love you, and I will gladly give my life into your safe keeping."

"Thank God," he cried with fervour, and before she could draw back he had kissed her on the lips.

By her instinctive shrinking Edith knew she did not love him, and she feared what she had done.

"No—no——" she cried wildly, pushing him away. "Do not kiss me again, I can promise nothing. Wait—wait, only wait, and I will try to love you. Give me time—six weeks—a month; I cannot answer you now at once."

Digitized by Google

"As you will, my dear," said he a little wearily, for he began to see it is a terrible thing to give all your heart and get so little in return. "I have to return to Aralong in six weeks' time, so at the end of a fortnight I will come to you for my answer."

Thankful to him for his kindness and patience, Edith felt almost light-hearted when she bade him farewell at the little gate between the close-cut hedges of yew.

She would write to Dr. Clinton, and she would tell him of the offer she had had without mentioning any names, merely putting down her indecision to her doubt whether she was fitted to be a clergyman's wife, and whether she could bear to leave her country and all her friends. According to his reply she would know if he loved her or no. If he did, then the heavens themselves opened before her, and if he did not, then shame to her for having allowed her love to go unasked; she would cast all thought of him out of her heart and she would—yes, she determined she would—love this good man who so truly loved her.

She wrote her letter, she put the case before her friend, she asked his advice, and she sat down to wait.

At the end of a week no word had come, and her heart sank within her, for, as she argued:

"If he loved me he would have written at once, lest I should accept the offer, but if he only regards me as a friend he will wait a while to think it over that he may be sure to give me the right advice."

So for a time she was humbled to the dust, and then pride came to her aid, and she determined no one should ever guess she had given her love where only friendship was asked.

Just at the psychological moment came the bishop, and he said:

"Edith, I promised you a fortnight to think over my offer. I have just received a letter which makes it imperative I should return to my diocese, Aralong, next week. Will you not promise yourself to me now that I may go about my work with a heart at peace?"

While Edith resented his assumption that only one answer was possible, it showed her that by asking him to wait she had given him the right to hope, and the yearning look in his eyes, and the strained lines about his mouth, as of a man suffering great anxiety, made her feel she was not treating him quite fairly, so she said:

"I do not think I shall know more at the end of a fortnight than I do now. I do not think I love you yet, but I want to, and I have a very real affection for you, and if you will have me on those terms, I will marry you and try to make you a good wife."

Wilfred folded her in his arms saying in a voice deep with feeling:

"I am not afraid if there is no one you love better. You do not know how glad you have made me, for, next to my God, I love you, Edith, and you shall be happy."

Having thus cast the die, Edith was much happier. She was now fortified against the sting of the perfectly friendly advice from Dr. Clinton that she expected to get. There was even a certain amount of satisfaction that she would be able to tell him she had decided before she heard from him. He did not love her, she would marry the bishop, and, secure in her love for her husband, would only think of Maurice Clinton as a friend.

For the next two or three days Edith was kept busy receiving congratulations. Everyone was pleased with the engagement, both on her side and on his, and she grew very proud of her fiancé and quite convinced that she had done the best thing for herself, while the bishop was so quietly radiant that she was humbly grateful she could bestow so much happiness with so little effort. She did not allow her thoughts to dwell on Maurice Clinton in those days.

The afternoon visitors had gone, and Mrs. Sargeant had retired to write the great news to relatives at a distance, while Edith, a little weary of smiling and talking, sat thinking dreamily how good a man she was going to marry, and how wonderful it was he should love such a very ordinary person as herself in whom others found no attraction.

Suddenly the door opened and the manservant announced:

"Dr. Clinton!"

And not till then did she realise he had been in her thoughts.

Maurice came forward eagerly with outstretched hands.

"Miss Sargeant, I have not been able to come before, but here I am now to answer your letter in person."

The beating of her heart almost suffocated her, and Edith could only stammer:

"Why—why—did you not come before?"

"Oh, well, a chapter of accidents," he said. "First of all I was away for a few days, and then when I returned and got your letter there was a most important operation I was obliged to perform on a patient. It was two days before she was fit for it, and I have only now been able to pronounce her out of immediate danger and leave her to my partner, because—because I dared not delay any longer."

As he spoke he had been anxiously scanning her white face and what he saw there made him start forward and seize both her hands:

"Edith, Edith—tell me—I am not too late! You have not decided?"

She could only bow her head, and show the ring on her hand; she felt she could not have spoken a word to save her life.

Maurice fell into a chair like one stunned, then he said:

"It was a matter of life and death for that young girl, and I could not in humanity leave her, and now I am too late, oh, my God!" And he buried his face in his hands with a groan.

It needed no actual words to tell Edith that this man loved her even as she loved him, and her crushed pride reared its head from the dust where it had lain since she thought she had given her heart unsought.

She put out a pitiful hand and touched his shoulder.

"Why did you not write?" she asked.

"Because I was a fool! Because I wanted to tell you with my own lips how I have grown to love you till you are as a very part of myself. Because I thought we were so much one, it was impossible for you to love anyone else. Fool that I was, while I hesitated to spoil the crown of my joy by a letter I lost it altogether." Then he turned to her wildly:

"Surely I am not to be so terribly punished because I stayed to fulfil my duty as a doctor? Edith, you love me; surely you do. Is there no hope for me?"

Poor Edith, the words that would have brought her joy a month sooner, now gave her only pain, but she would not avow her love for one man while the affianced wife of another, so she replied with a touching dignity:

"Dr. Clinton, you are ungenerous. I have promised to marry my old friend, Bishop Arlington, you cannot expect me to say that I love you."

"You are quite right," said Maurice, regaining his self-control, "I ask your pardon. It was the suddenness of the blow that made me lose my head. I only distress you—I will go. Good-bye, Edith!" And he took her hand and gazed wistfully at her. "If — but, no, I will say no more—it must lie entirely in your hands. I know you will do what is right," and raising her hand to his lips he left the room.

So Edith was left alone to face the situation.

At the knowledge that Maurice loved her, all her love for him that might have died away, awoke in fierce intensity, and she knew now that whoever she married it would be Maurice Clinton alone that she loved.

She had given her word to the bishop, could she take it back again? Could she take her happiness at the price of his? And yet would it be right for her to marry him when she loved another?

L. Hughes.

HANDWRITING DENOTES YOUR CHARACTER.

And if you wish to learn what this is send a specimen of your handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope to BANER, 23 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. A reliable delineation of your character will be sent in return.

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID NEW SERIES. BEGIN READING TO-DAY.

Told by the Decoy Herself.

A Striking Series of Astonishing Revelations.

SYNOPSIS.

VIVIENNE D'ALTON, who in this series tells the story of a certain period of her life, is a young lady who has been educated in Germany.

Until the time when the story commences, she had never seen her father since he placed her at the school in Bochum, although her fees are paid regularly and she has a liberal allowance of pocket-money.

Her mother is dead, and she has no brother or sister. Hence, she seems quite alone in the world.

But one day her father sends a message to the school that he wishes his daughter to leave and to meet him at Rotterdam. Vivienne is greatly delighted at the news, and while she sails down the Rhine to meet her father, conjectures as to his appearance.

The person who announces himself as her father at Rotterdam is not in the least like the handsome gentleman she had pictured to herself, but is short and stout.

They drive to a large mansion, where Vivienne is enthusiastically welcomed by a Mrs. Sherwood, "a bosom friend of her mother," who requests Vivienne to call her "aunt."

Vivienne takes an instantaneous dislike to "Aunt Flora."

A Mr. Gilbert Graysworthy comes to dine at the house, and incidentally mentions that round his waist he carries a belt containing fifty thousand pounds' worth of diamonds.

A day or two later Vivienne is shocked to learn that Gilbert Graysworthy has been found murdered in the street! There seems no motive for the crime, for his money, his watch and chain are still upon his body. Who could the murderer be?

SECOND EPISODE.

I Journey to England.

THE dreadful news imparted so suddenly was such a frightful shock to me that I could neither speak nor move for some time. I could only lean back in my chair, feeling sick at heart, and trembling all over. Looking at my aunt, I expected to find her equally agitated, for it is a terrible thing to hear of the murder of a man whom you have welcomed to your table but a few short hours since.

But, having by a gesture dismissed the maid, Mrs. Sherwood displayed very little concern, and I think my stillness deceived her as to my real feelings, for she observed, in a callous tone: "What a mercy it is that he did not join us last evening, after all! People might have thought we had had something to do with the poor man's death, if he had been seen last in our company."

"Oh, how can you be so heartless?" I exclaimed passionately. "Fancy hearing of a horrible thing like that and thinking only of yourself. It's absolutely disgusting!"

Aunt Flora, for just a second, looked angry enough to kill me. But the anger disappeared like a flash, and she replied, with sweet self-restraint:

"My dear child, when you have lived as long as I have, and have seen as much of the world as I have, you will not be unreasonable enough to expect youth and age to show their emotions in exactly the same way. And when you have seen more of human nature, you will not run away with the idea that your heart and your judgment are so much better than those of other people."

I suppose I ought to have apologised for my rudeness when met by such an obviously sensible argument as this. But I am of an obstinate turn of mind, for I retorted, with scarcely less warmth of manner than I had displayed before:

"All the same, I've seen enough of the world to know that growing old does not necessarily make people grow callous, and, and——"

Aunt Flora was to have heard a few more home truths, but I was not equal to continuing my argument, and broke into a wild fit of weeping, which seemed to astonish Mrs. Sherwood considerably. For a while she made no comment. Then, noting that I had quieted down, she said, in a loud, sharp voice:

"Your present conduct, Miss D'Alton, is the reverse of seemly. When I tell your father that you have fallen in love with the very first single man whom we introduced to you, he will be extremely disappointed, for he thinks you are wiser, instead of more foolish, than the average run of impressionable girls."

"How dare you say that I was in love with Mr. Graysworthy?"

"I say it because nothing is more obvious. Yesterday, although you had only met the man once, you were ill-natured and unsociable to everybody else until you thought it was time for him to arrive. Then you brightened up for his sake, and when he failed to put in an appearance, you were so rude to Mynheer and Vrow Althaus that I was thankful to get you away from the place. And this morning, because I don't burst into tears and bemoan loudly the death of a man in whom I have no interest, you pile such insults upon me that I would never forgive you if I did not fully understand the reason for your vagaries of temper."

Digitized by Google

To this speech I made no response, not because I was sulky, but because I was not sure that Mrs. Sherwood was in the wrong. And when she made a dignified exit from the room, I remained in a very uncertain frame of mind for some time.

Could it be true that I had fallen in love with Mr. Graysworthy, and that that was why I wept bitterly on hearing of his death? Certainly I liked him, as anybody else would like him. But my love does not dwell so near the surface that I could fling it to the first comer, and I dismissed the idea as grossly unjust, especially after I recollected that our parlourmaid had been no more able to restrain her tears than I had been.

Concerning the indictment of rudeness on the previous day, I was willing to grant that ennui and disappointment might have made me less tolerant of the failings of our host and hostess than I might otherwise have been. But I felt quite sure that, under similar circumstances, I should again behave in similar fashion, and that, after all, there was a great deal that was strange about the Althaus couple.

About Mrs. Sherwood, too, for that matter. Else why should she have shown such fear lest I saw through the Vrow's dirty curtains and still dirtier windows? And what did the cry of the night-jar mean? Or the presence of the big, burly man who produced it? Still stranger, why should my maid have been talking to him? And how is it that she was not at home in time to perform her usual evening duties?

It also occurred to me that the unfortunate young Englishman had probably been attacked and killed while on his way to join us. And I wished with all my heart that we had not given him an invitation, as he would then have probably been saved from the death which awaited him.

But did it lie in wait for him? Was it not much more likely that the footpads who had killed him were simply lying in ambush for the first unwary traveller who might come their way? And was it not notorious that strangers of apparent wealth were often killed and thrown into the numerous canals of Rotterdam and Amsterdam?

I was so absorbed in thinking over all sorts of possibilities in connection with the tragedy of which I had just heard that I did not notice the presence of the parlour-maid, who was clearing the breakfast table until she observed timidly:

"Please excuse me, miss, for crying just now, but I really couldn't help it."

"Of course you couldn't," I returned sadly. "It's a very awful thing to have happened."

"They are saying downstairs, miss, that it must be the work of some enemy, or else the poor gentleman would have been robbed."

At these words a startling idea came to me, and I asked eagerly:

"Susan, are you sure he wasn't robbed?"

"The papers say not, because his things were all found on him—money and watch, too."

"Susan, let me see that paper. I want to satisfy myself about something."

Probably Susan thought simple curiosity was at the bottom of my wish to read the Tageblatt. But she obeyed me at once, and went to fetch the paper.

"Please, miss," she said a few minutes later, "Madame is very angry with me for mentioning the murder while you were there, and she says that if I give you a newspaper to read, she will dismiss me at once."

"And so I will!" joined in an irate voice from the doorway. "In fact, you may consider yourself dismissed now, this very instant."

It was Aunt Flora who spoke thus angrily, and it was easy to see that she was simply furious. Susan was dismayed beyond words.

"Oh, Madame," she implored. "Surely you do not mean it!"

"Indeed, I do! I will have nobody in my service who forgets her place like you have done this morning. There are plenty of well-trained waiting-maids to be obtained by anybody who pays good money."

"But, Madame, I am a stranger here now. My people have left Holland to go to America, and I have nobody belonging to me here."

"I cannot help that. You shall have a month's wages, and leave my service this very day."

The more I saw of Mrs. Sherwood, the less I liked her. But I was not intimidated by her, so said promptly:

"Susan, don't worry about that. If Madame Sherwood will not employ you, I will, and if you like, you shall go back to England with me."

Susan immediately expressed her gratitude, and hurried out of the room, with the wise intention of avoiding further unpleasantness. But Mrs. Sherwood looked daggers at me, and announced her intention of inducing "poor dear Beverley" to reconsider his promise to make me the mistress of his Park Lane mansion.

"You are no more fit to preside over a house than is a babe unborn!" was her scornful assertion. "You would have everything in a muddle directly, and your own father would find his authority disputed if you were allowed to take the servants in hand."

For all answer to this diatribe, I touched the bell, which Susan answered.

"Susan," I said quietly. "Go and order the carriage for me. I am going out."

Susan disappeared, and Aunt Flora seemed to suddenly realise that, although I was but a school girl, just emancipated from schoolroom discipline, I was quite beyond being ruled by her. For she dropped her antagonistic attitude, mustered a beaming smile, and exclaimed cheerily:

"That's right, dear! I'm so glad you've decided to go out. Where are we going to?"

For a second only did I debate whether to feign civility or not. Then I decided that no good could come of constant recrimination, and that, having evidently a most deceitful person to deal with, I might as well use a little moderation in showing my own real feelings.

So I answered her in kind, with the words:

"It's very good of you to think of going out with me. But I shall not need to keep you long, if you are pressed for time. I only want to read what the Tageblatt says about that poor man who has been killed."

"But you don't need to go out to see the paper!"

"There is nothing else for it, if you will not let me see your copy, and if the servants must not bring me one."

"My dear Vivienne, you are under a most strange misapprehension. I wouldn't presume to dictate what you should read or what you should not read.

"What I was angry about was your being told of this sad tragedy at all, as it was sure to be a shock to you. I had read the news myself, before ever you came down to breakfast, and had carefully put the paper out of your sight, for your father strictly enjoined me to keep all unpleasant things from you.

"Then Susan came and upset all my plans by blurting the news out at breakfast time, and, not content with that, she wanted her love of sensation to be pandered to by watching you read and cry over the painful details.

"No wonder I was angry! But, in the privacy of your own room, there is no earthly reason why you shouldn't read all the sensational news in Rotterdam, if you wish to."

I had won a victory, and I knew it. But I had sense enough to appear to take Mrs. Sherwood's elaborate explanation at its fictitious value, so said that I was sorry for misunderstanding her. The result was that I eventually perused the much disputed news sheet in my own room, and satisfied myself that that which I had half guessed at had indeed taken place.

As Mrs. Sherwood had truly said, the details of the case were painful reading to me. But to the outsider it would appear amply evident that personal revenge had been at the bottom of the tragedy. The victim had apparently been deprived of nothing, for was not his property, including his money, his pocket-book containing a few notes, and his watch and chain, all still to the fore? So how could robbery be suspected?

Digitized by Google

But what about the belt of diamonds, worth fifty-thousand pounds? That was not included amongst the recovered items, and its disappearance left only one conclusion open.

Gilbert Grays worthy had been killed by somebody who knew of that belt of diamonds. He must have been lured to some pretended diamond merchant's house, and robbed of his life and his gems. Then, having carefully left everything else upon him, the murderers found a chance of depositing the body where it was found in the dark hours of the early morning, and I was thankful that nobody except Aunt Flora and myself heard him mention his wealth while he was in our house. Otherwise I might always have feared that the assassins got their fatal information through the indiscretion of one of our servants.

* * *

Aunt Flora really must have had my interests at heart, for she had been consideration itself ever since she and I fought out the question of supremacy, and she virtually insisted upon turning over all management of the household affairs to me.

I looked closely at the two. The man was certainly no whom I had seen before, and the woman looked very much like Annchen, my maid!

"'It will be fine practice for you," she said smilingly. "Of course it doesn't matter if a lot of money is wasted over the experiment, but it will get you into the way of giving your orders authoritatively before we go to Park Lane. And you don't know how thankful I am to find you so sensible and grown up! I had pictured you as a perfect innocent, who couldn't say 'bo' to a goose, and who must be managed accordingly."

"'And you are glad to find me different?"

"Can you doubt it? True, dear Beverley was going to give me a lot of money for training you into grown-up ways, and I find my occupation gone."

"Oh, well, you shall have the money, anyway, so don't worry about that."

It was evident that I certainly was grown-up. And my father ought to have been pleased, if he really wanted me to play the Lady Bountiful in a natural manner, for I had a happy knack of dispensing his wealth right royally. But, though it was Aunt Flora herself who was to be benefited this time, she did not seem to be at all delighted by my generosity. In fact, this was the only subject on which she and I were now in danger of being at variance, for she was as fond of safeguarding my father's interests as if they had been her own.

My maid, Annchen, had to be replaced for a time by Susan, for she had an attack of hysteria when she heard of the sad death of the poor gentleman who visited at our house, and I had not the heart to insist upon her performance of her duties. In fact, I would have liked to dispense with her altogether, for I preferred Susan. But Aunt Flora was so pleasant and obliging that I felt I ought to consult her wishes to a certain degree, and she seemed to think Annchen quite a treasure.

Remembering what I had seen from Vrow Althaus' window, I mentioned to Annchen that I had seen her talking to a man outside. But she was so hurt and astounded by the accusation, and furnished me with such a convincing alibi, that I was soon convinced that I had been misled by a chance resemblance, and that Annchen was not the girl I saw.

It is nice to have unlimited money to use, as I had already found out. We left Rotterdam by the Harwich boat and journeyed very comfortably. But, though the house was to be dismantled and given up, all the trouble I had was to allow myself to be dressed, step into a carriage, and be driven to the boat landing.

Aunt Flora kept her berth during the whole of the evening, and advised me to do the same. But I could do no such thing, for I was in vigorous health, and was voyaging back to my native country, which I had not seen since I was a little child. So I naturally spent as much time as possible on deck.

Susan attended Aunt Flora, and Annchen had an easy post in looking after me. There were very few saloon passengers on board. But the second-class cabins were fairly full, and, from the superior vantage post of the poop, I liked to look at whatever transpired on the lower deck.

"It is growing very cold, miss. Shall I fetch you another wrap before I go to my cabin again?"

It was Annchen who asked the question, and I replied in the negative, adding that I meant to go and lie down for a few hours, so that I might be fresh when my father met me at

Digitized by Google

Harwich. Aunt Flora had already given Susan permission to go to bed, and Annchen informed me that if I did not require her services till within a couple of hours of landing, she would gladly go to bed, too.

I saw the girl close her cabin door behind her, after peeping into Mrs. Sherwood's stateroom, to see if the latter were really comfortable. Then I took my cloak off, and lay down on the lounge for a while. But, feeling absolutely wideawake and restless, I soon rose and wrapped myself up again. Then, creeping softly out of my cabin, and up the companion, I sat in the shadow of one of the poop ventilators, idly gazing, now upon the gliding waters, black as ink in the darkness of the night, and anon watching the few passengers who preferred the glories of the ocean to the seclusion of their berths, although it was long after twelve.

Suddenly, I looked with something more than passing interest upon two people who joined each other on the lower deck. One of them looked very like Annchen, only Annchen had no such cloak as this girl was wearing, and it clearly was a case of striking resemblance, as Annchen had said. The other was certainly the big, rough-looking man whom I had seen through Madame Althaus' window. He struck a match to light his cigarette, and left not a doubt in my mind that it was the same man. But his cigarette was left unlighted, for the girl snatched the burning match out of his hand, and flung it on to the deck.

I could not hear what she said, but fancied that she might be reproaching him for being indiscreet enough to show himself like that. And I could not help lingering there, watching the couple who seemed to converse in whispers. For they held a strange fascination for me, although their presence was as ominous of darkness as is the cry of the bird the man imitated on that fatal night at Rotterdam.

"They are birds of evil!" I told myself. "They are birds of evil! I wish they had not been journeying on the same ship with us!"

"Miss D'Alton, pray forgive me if I seem intrusive. But you have dropped your cloak, and will get your death of cold, if you don't be careful!"

These words were uttered by Viscount Broomville, a fellow-passenger whom Aunt Flora introduced to me during dinner, and they brought me back from foolish pessimism to a pleasanter frame of mind. Still, although I turned to the Viscount with a grateful smile for his thoughtfulness, I felt myself bound to take him partially into my confidence.

"You see that couple sitting near the hatch?" I inquired, almost in a whisper, receiving for answer:

"Yes, they are evidently enjoying themselves."

"Would you recognise the man again?"

"Yes. He is a perfect specimen of a rascal. But the woman is too closely wrapped up to be easily identified. Have they any special interest for you?"

"I saw them both, under ominous circumstances, a week ago, and something tells me that mischief attends them wherever they go."

The Viscount presumably was too well-bred to pooh-pooh my superstitious remark. But he must have thought me very foolish, for how could he possibly enter into my feelings over the matter. Still, this did not prevent him saying softly:

"If you will allow me to escort you down below, Miss D'Alton, I will walk on to the lower deck, and have a closer look at the couple. I shall then be certain to know them when next I see them."

Without a word, I turned, and, doing my best to avoid attracting attention, I hurried down the companion ladder, and waited near the saloon till the Viscount joined me again.

"I'm so sorry," he said. "But the birds must have scented my coming, for they have both disappeared. It's a pity I didn't get a better look at the woman."

"Oh, it doesn't really matter," was my somewhat shame-faced rejoinder. "I was really very silly to trouble you over the matter. But I thank you all the same."

"Oh, please don't thank me for having done nothing," was the smiling rejoinder. Then my new friend bowed and left me, and I passed quietly into our state-room, and was soon fast asleep.

I hardly seemed to have rested an hour when Annchen, bright, fresh, and smiling, brought me a cup of tea, and told me that we should be in Harwich in an hour. This was joyful news, and I lost no time in getting ready to join the eager throng of passengers who were preparing to land as soon as possible.

Aunt Flora did not come on deck until the boat touched the landing stage, and I think she was rather surprised to see me talking animatedly with Viscount Broomville, who, besides being a "genuine aristocrat," as she afterwards put it, was an extremely handsome man.

"How do you do, Mrs. Sherwood?" he asked cordially. "I have just been telling your niece that I already know her father, and that he is responsible for the good stroke of business I have done in Rotterdam. In fact, I hope you will both welcome me when I call to see him to-morrow."

I was delighted to know that I should soon see him again. But I would have given my right hand rather than let him come, if I had known what the awful results of to-morrow's visit were to be.

(Another long instalment of this exciting series next week).

I AM very glad to say that the interest in our Unsolved Love Problems is being well sustained; in fact, it goes farther than this, for the number of entries grows larger every time. All of you will be glad, therefore, to see that another one appears in this number, on pages 73 and 74. It is entitled "The Engagement of Edith Sargeant," and, in my opinion, the story forms one of the most interesting problems that have yet appeared, and I am anticipating that many of the readers who have not yet attempted to show their argumentative powers will make a start in endeavouring to explain what is the correct thing for Edith Sargeant to do. There is no doubt whatever that the position in which she finds herself is a truly embarrassing one to a strictly honourable girl. It is by no means always an easy matter to choose between love and duty, and the circumstances of every case have to be based solely upon their own merits. Now, readers, what do you think she ought to do? Would it be right for her to marry the bishop when she loves Maurice Clinton?

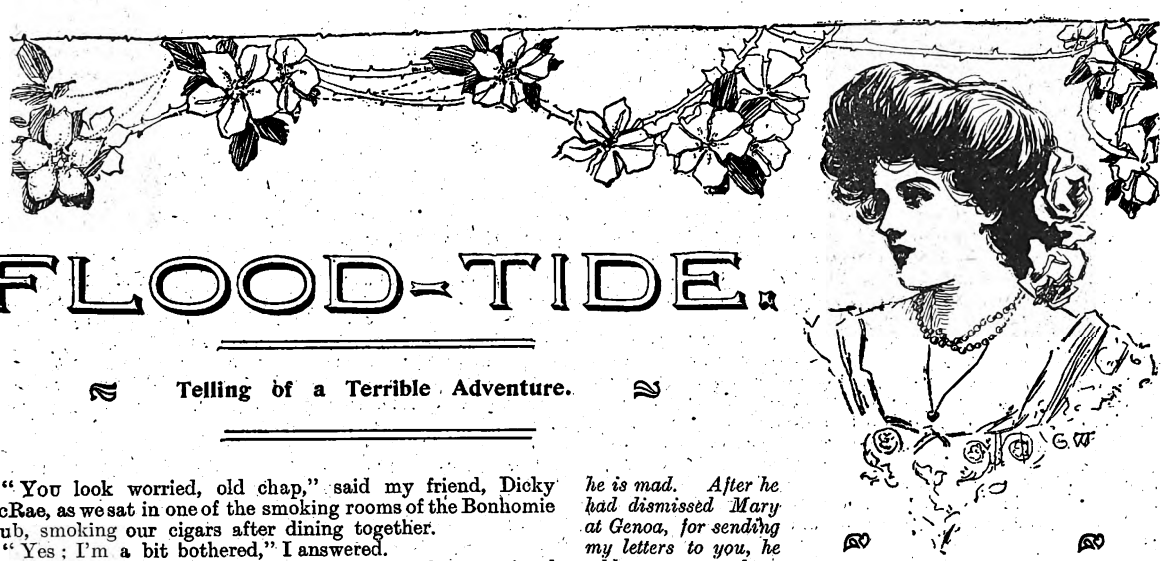
I will award a prize of one guinea to the reader who sends in what I consider to be the best reasons for the course he advocates Edith Sargeant to take. Replies must not exceed one hundred words, and should be written on one side of the paper only. The last day on which I can receive replies will be Friday, January 22nd. None arriving after this date will be considered. Address your envelopes to The Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Mark the top left hand corner "Seventh Love Problem."

* * * * *

In my next chat I will announce the winner in the Unsolved Love Problem that appeared in our Christmas number, entitled "The Duty of Roger Forbes."

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google



FLOOD-TIDE.

Telling of a Terrible Adventure.

"You look worried, old chap," said my friend, Dicky McRae, as we sat in one of the smoking rooms of the Bonhomie Club, smoking our cigars after dining together.

"Yes; I'm a bit bothered," I answered.

"Mammon or Cupid, Travers, if one may be permitted to inquire?" asked Dicky. "So far as my personal observation goes those are the only sources of trouble when a man is concerned."

I smiled in spite of myself, as I answered:

"Well, you've got it in once. Both the gods are mixed up in this. Shall I bore you horribly if I make a confidant of you?"

"Can't possibly say until you've got on a bit," rejoined my candid friend. "Fire away."

"Well, you know there is an understanding between Mabel—that is, Miss Dalrymple—and myself, although her uncle, who is also her guardian, is distinctly averse to the match?"

"I seem to have a dim recollection of listening to a half hour's rhapsody dealing with her charms and virtues as viewed through your eyes, old chap. Period, as they say on play bills, a year ago. The scene, if I mistake not, this very room. The course of true love was not running smooth. Uncle and guardian thought you were after her 'tin,' which, to do you justice, I'm quite sure you were not."

"I was, and am now most anxious that every penny of it be settled upon herself," I interjected.

"Good man," observed Dicky. "Well, I believe the lady will be twenty-one in nine months' time. Stern uncle's guardianship ceases to exist. Lovers marry and live happy ever after, eh?"

"That is what we reckon on," I said dolefully. "But complications have arisen. Mr. Dalrymple requested me to cease seeing Mabel, and intimated none too gently that the doors of his house I were closed against me. I told him plainly that I should still endeavour to meet his niece. His answer to that was to drag her off to the Continent, forbidding her to communicate their whereabouts to me. Indeed, he intercepted two letters she sent me, and returned them to her with his compliments. For a time we managed to correspond through her maid, but she got found out and got 'the sack,' poor beggar. I'm allowing her a pound a week to keep her going until she gets another berth. When she left, Mabel and her uncle were at Genoa, that was six weeks ago. I tried to get a month's leave so as to try and track them down, but several of our fellows are on the 'sick list' and the Colonel refused it. Since then I have heard nothing from her until this morning, when I got this."

I passed the letter across to him.

"River House,
"Bank Side,
"Wapping.

"MY DEAR JACK (he read out)—I cannot imagine what has come over my uncle. The most charitable assumption is that he is mad. After he had dismissed Mary at Genoa, for sending my letters to you, he told me to get ready at once to travel. Since then we have been to, goodness knows how many places, remaining only a few days in each, but gradually getting nearer England. Three days ago he told me we were going back to London, and I rejoiced, thinking that at last I should be able to find some means to see you. Imagine my dismay when instead of our going to the old house in Mount Street, he brought me to this strange place where I am virtually kept a prisoner.

"I am afraid he means to do me some bodily harm. His manner is awfully strange. He turns a deaf ear to all my appeals to be allowed to go free, and when I threatened him with your vengeance yesterday, he flew into a mad paroxysm of rage.

"He has, however, in a calmer moment so far yielded to my intreaties as to allow me to have an interview with you here to-night at ten o'clock in his presence. Oh, come, dear love! I am not only pining for you but am in actual fear of my life.

"With all my love,
"Always yours,
"MABEL."

McRae gave a low whistle of astonishment as he passed the letter back to me and ejaculated:

"And this is the twentieth century! Of course you are going."

"Certainly, but I am not sure that I ought not to take some precautionary measures. Under ordinary circumstances the obvious thing to do would be to appeal to the police, but I hesitate to drag my poor girl's name into a scandal. She would no doubt have taken some step of that sort herself had it not been for this consideration."

"No," said Dicky. "I can see the difficulty. But still something ought to be done. The place, judging from the address, is some out-of-the-way hole, where you might be knocked on the head and nobody be the wiser."

"At any rate, you will know where I have gone," I remarked. "Suppose I drop you a line to-morrow if things are all right. Should you not hear from me by—say, eleven, communicate with the authorities. Of course, it is just possible that Mabel in her fear may have unconsciously exaggerated the affair."

Dicky puffed away at his cigar meditatively.

"Yes, that is all right," he ejaculated at last, "but I don't like your going there alone. The whole thing looks 'fishy' to me. If I may, I'll come along with you, first sending a note to my brother telling him the address we are going to, and asking him to take steps if I don't arrive back by morning."

"My dear old chap," I objected, "I am awfully obliged to you, and should be only too pleased to have your company, but it's a beastly shame to drag you into this. There may be grave danger."

Digitized by Google

"A delightful change from the monotony of life," he responded lightly. "Glad to be of some help to 'Love's young dream.' So I'm coming."

I tried to dissuade him from the venture, but he had made up his mind to stick by me, and finally I gave in.

By the time my friend had written the letter to his brother the moment had arrived to start.

The hall porter got us a hansom, and we were soon bowling along at a good pace towards our very mysterious destination.

On the way down we talked of nothing but the strange adventure upon which we were embarking. During the conversation Dicky remarked:

"By the way, haven't I heard somewhere that Dalrymple was once confined in an asylum?"

"Yes, when he was a much younger man," I rejoined. "But he was only there a few months, and was discharged as cured. Been very steady ever since, and people have mostly forgotten it. My own theory is that he has lost his mental balance again; that is about the only explanation which will fit in with his conduct."

"How awful for Miss Dalrymple," Dicky responded, "but buck up, old chap, we'll soon have her away from him."

Bank Side, Wapping, turned out to be a wretched street abutting on the river in one of the lowest parts of the locality. We dismissed our cab at the top of it, and walked down, keeping a sharp look-out for River House. After some trouble we found it at the end of the lane—a ramshackle place standing by itself with one of its walls lapped by the river.

"Cheerful-looking hole," I remarked as I knocked at the door.

It was opened quickly as though I had been expected, and Dalrymple appeared, holding a candle.

He started back as he saw I was not alone.

"As the place which you have chosen as a residence for your niece is in a distinctly dangerous locality, I have thought it wiser to bring my friend Mr. McRae with me," I observed sternly in answer to his look of surprise.

He muttered something about it not mattering, and motioned us in. I noticed that his looks were wild and distraught, and glanced meaningly at my friend.

As soon as he had shut the door, he bade us follow him, and we started across the hall towards the stairs at the farthest end, he being some little distance ahead.

He had reached the stairs, when suddenly he stooped down and lifted a lever, and before we could grasp his intention, the flooring seemed to sink beneath our feet and we were precipitated into a vault below, the floor of which was covered by about two feet of water; the boards which had given way returning to their original position when relieved of our weight. McRae being just ahead of me was the first to fall, and his body served somewhat as a shield for mine. It took a few minutes for us to recover, but having found we had not received serious hurt, beyond a few bruises and slight cuts, we started to examine our prison chamber.

It was about seven feet high and not very broad, as we found by linking hands and stretching across. Then we commenced to hammer upon the roof, calling out at the top of our voices, but received no response. Remember that all this time we were in pitch blackness for there was no window to the place.

Judge of our amazement when suddenly three thin rays of moonlight broke across the darkness and we saw each other's faces. It did not take us long to reach the spot whence the light proceeded. It was an aperture let into the wall which adjoined the river, and it was an inch or so from the top of our prison chamber. Evidently some sliding panel, worked from the exterior, had been removed, but the space thus exposed was too small to squeeze our bodies through and in any case the iron bars let into the brickwork would have prevented our exit. Dicky was the first to grip the reason of this change in our prison chamber.

"Your hand is smaller than mine; stretch it through the bars and see what is beneath them," he said.

Without seeing his reason I followed his suggestion, but drew it back quickly for it had touched water and the sudden contact was chilly.

As we crouched there, our faces were close together, and I saw a look of fear creep over his as I let the water drip from my fingers.

"Can you see the object of our jailor?" ejaculated my friend. "If I am not mistaken the tide is rising, and if that opening is below the level to which it reaches, this vault will be filled and we shall be drowned. That letter he allowed Miss Dalrymple to write was merely a trap to get you here."

Even as he spoke the river was slightly ruffled by a passing breeze and a few drops of water came full tilt at our faces.

"But we can swim," I said.

"Of what use to swim if the water reaches to the roof of this horrible vault," he asked.

"That we must see," I returned, and by jumping up, managed to run my hands over the roof. Alas! his fears were but too well founded. For the moisture still clung to it from the tide which had gone before. There was no doubt about it, we were trapped. The groan which involuntarily sprang from my lips told its own tale to my companion in misfortune.

"It is as I feared," he muttered, "and I can see no way out of it."

I need feel no shame in admitting that we were both panic-stricken. In an ordinary way neither of us would have shuddered at death. We had faced the grim old terror many a time, in the Soudan, and South Africa. But this was such a hopeless death. If only we could have died fighting, or even been given the chance to strike one blow in self-defence we should have been satisfied.

It was the thought of having to stand there whilst the remorseless water rose higher and higher, knowing that, struggle as we might, it must eventually touch the roof above our heads and creep with insidious force through our nostrils, until it soaked the life from our bodies.

It was only for a few minutes though, and then Dicky ejaculated hopefully:

"There is yet hope that we can attract the notice of some passing boat."

His cheerfulness went far to banish my terror, and I joined with him in sending a lusty hail across the water.

The sound travelled forth and returned to us in echoes, but there being no ships anchored near and the hour being far into the night, it was unlikely that any boats would be upon the river, and no answer came to us. Once I thought I caught the splashing of oars, but it was my fancy. After a while my companion realised the hopelessness of our cries.

"Let us save our breath for something which is likely to be of more help," he said. "You are of lighter build than myself, clamber up on my shoulder and see if you can move that trap."

I followed him to the centre of our prison chamber and did his bidding, but the heavy oaken beams were as hard as iron, and would not give a jot for all my pushing. Besides, from my position it was impossible to put forth full strength.

"See if you cannot find the join, and prise it apart with your fingers," ejaculated Dicky.

But the trap had been contrived so cunningly that I could not find a chink, although I searched closely with my penknife.

I dropped to the ground and we stood facing each other, trying to think of some fresh means of escape. I moved to the grating once more, and found, as I feared, that the water was nearing the opening. It was, in fact, nearly up to the opening, and the wind was rising, and blowing dead in our faces, so that every now and then a tiny cascade was blown towards us.

Digitized by Google

"Just one more shout," I said, "And then we must somehow close this opening."

"Best save our breath with this wind blowing against us, our voices will not carry an inch," answered my companion.

Nevertheless, I thought it unwise to neglect anything which might possibly help us, so I once more yelled at the top of my voice.

It was of no avail. The sound was beaten back in my teeth as though even the elements had conspired against us.

"Quick, your coat," shouted Dicky. "Perhaps we may caulk this opening. Another moment and the water will be upon us, and it will be too late."

I grasped his meaning, and tore the coat from my shoulders. Working together we pressed its ample folds between the bars, so that it formed somewhat of a barrier to the water, whilst kept in that position by our hands. We soon knew from the dampness that the water had stretched itself above and beyond the aperture, which knowledge gave us some hope as only a few drops filtered through.

"It will make us none the less secure if we give up more 'togs' to the service," I told Dicky. "Take off what you can spare, old chap, whilst I press my back against the bars to rest my hands a bit."

When he had added his coat and waistcoat to mine, I began to think we should cheat Dalrymple after all; but to make assurance doubly sure, I added all I had on except my trousers.

In spite of our predicament, Dicky's light-heartedness found vent in whistling one of Huntley Wright's songs from "The Country Girl." I was about to attempt to imitate his sang froid, when my attention was attracted by a slight whirring in the wall; and this time it was beyond our reach, even if we had the clothes left with which to stop it up. Once again the moonlight beams came into the vault, and we could catch a glimpse of each other's faces.

"What now?" I queried. "This looks a bit hopeless."

He was silent and I knew he was puzzling his brain for some contrivance to meet this fresh danger. I did not speak again for a few minutes, so that he might have a chance to get his thinking tackle to work; whilst at the same time I also racked my own. At last I could bear the silence no longer. It was some consolation to hear even one's own voice.

"Is it a case?" I asked.

He did not answer but I saw from the drooping of his head that he thought it was.

It was now my turn to act the part of consoler. Extending my hand, which he clasped in his own with a hearty grip, I said: "Cheer up, old chap! At least we have made a good fight for it. And now there is nothing left but to die as gamely as we can. I'm sorry I dragged you into this, Dicky——"

"That's all right, my boy," he answered. "Suppose the end had got to come some time. One might as well meet it trying to help a 'pal' as in any other manner."

We were slowly being drowned.

By this time the water began to come in from the second opening; at first in a trickling stream, and then in a regular cascade as the tide rose higher.

"Time we took to swimming," whispered my companion. "We may as well keep the 'ball rolling' as long as we can."

And thereafter we rose with the water.

It was awful. That unearthly silence in the semi-darkness! The river by now had covered three quarters of the upper grating, and the water in our chamber had crept up to the river's level. There was only an inch or two of space between our heads and the roof, and the water was rising higher and higher.

We watched the last rays of light slowly lifted upon the bosom of the river.

As though to mock our misery the moon had formed a silvery path leading right away to the farther shore. The houses stood out clear, with here and there twinkling lights illuminating their windows.

I thought of my past life. Of the many great deeds which as a boy I had resolved to accomplish, and of the very little it had been given me to attain in manhood.

Then we were plunged in darkness.

The river had risen above the grating and blotted out all hope even as it quenched all light!

There was not sufficient room to swim now, and we had to tread water to keep our heads clear.

Suddenly we thought we heard a scream above us, and as evidence that we were not mistaken, there was a heavy splash and a body was swept past us in the water outside.

Digitized by Google

"I'm afraid Dalrymple is doing more murderous work and committing his victim to the river," said Dicky, grimly.

"Good God—Mabel, my poor darling!" I moaned.

Then came a trampling of feet above our heads, and the welcome sound of bolts being withdrawn.

"Keep quiet," whispered McRae. "I believe Dalrymple imagines that we are dead, and is going to gloat over his handiwork. Even if it is too late to save our lives, he shall share our fate!"

"I can at least avenge her," I muttered.

"Look out for the trap falling," came the warning from Dicky.

Down came the planks, striking the water with a sullen splash, and narrowly escaping my head.

A form bent over the opening and catching sight of our bobbing heads, would have given vent to a cry, but before it could leave the lips, I, being nearest, had made one desperate jump, and, catching the figure by the throat, dragged it into the water.

My rage would have caused me to choke the breath from the person, but suddenly it struck me that the flesh was too soft, and the throat too well covered, to be that of Dalrymple; whilst the limbs which coiled round mine in their agony were well moulded and supple. My fears as to some terrible mistake being thus aroused, I somewhat relaxed my grip, and fortunately it was so, for at that moment, Dicky McRae, who by now had clambered to the solid flooring above, shouted to me to stay my hand.

"You blithering cuckoo, it's a woman you have got hold of."

Then I glanced down and was filled with remorse, for it was my dear girl.

With his aid I managed to get her from the water, and we placed her upon a settee that was near and tried to revive her.

Slowly she recovered her faculties under our clumsy efforts and the sweet colour crept over her features as she realised who it was that was bending over her.

"My uncle," she gasped. "He has fallen into the river."

"A good place for him," muttered Dicky, sotto voce. But nevertheless he crossed to the window.

"I can see nothing of him, Miss Dalrymple," he announced. "But don't worry, no doubt he will reach the bank in safety."

"Tell me, dearest, what has happened?" I asked.

Then from her modestly-told story, we learnt that we owed her lives entirely to her.

The noise of our entry at the outer door had warned her of our arrival. Her uncle had promised to bring me up as soon as I arrived, but as he did not do so she had stolen downstairs to see what had become of me. By that time the trap-door had closed over us, and she could only see her uncle hovering about, but something in his stealthy movements warned her that he was up to mischief.

Silently she watched him manipulating some levers, without in the least knowing what it betokened. Then our cries penetrated dimly to her ears. Her uncle was dancing about, shouting with demoniacal joy, snapping his fingers; and was evidently raving mad.

In spite of her fright she had come lower down the stairs, and then saw that her uncle was leaning out of a window, which, on subsequent investigation, proved to be directly over the gratings. No doubt with the characteristic cunning of the homicidal maniac, he was ascertaining whether the water had entered the second aperture.

At that moment she had heard our cries once more, and realised that he was trying to murder somebody. She screamed to summon assistance. This no doubt startled the would-be murderer, and caused him to overbalance and fall in the river.

It was his body we had seen swept past the grating, and two days later it was washed up on the beach near the mouth of the river.

Martin H. Potter.

.. THE ..

INDEPENDENCE OF KITTY.

And How She Lost It.

THE many unfortunate circumstances which left Miss Kitty Sanderson and her young sister to face alone an appalling world need not be told here.

Her pecuniary assets (bar a few pounds) were nothing; but she possessed a radiant face, and was ungrumbling and fearless. And also she set great store on a suddenly discovered independence. Wherefore Miss Kitty held her head high in grim London town.

Bravely, with careful management, those few pounds held out. But an advertisement came to her notice and so she resolved to keep up her sister's music lessons still.

That morning, flushed and anxious, but confident, she answered several questions of a young-old, keen-faced agent for something or other. And in the afternoon (this was something like success) she was installed at a desk which had a typewriter fitted with a disappearing mounting. A simple desk to the unseeing eye. But you pressed, or pushed, or pulled, or something of that sort, and a shining typewriter bobbed into view.

For a consideration, payable weekly, Miss Kitty was to manipulate the disappearing typewriter. The room let in the sun splendidly, and it was summer; and she wore a cool, striped blouse, and enjoyed her work. Her little sister made a fresh start on the music lessons.

The agent for something or other did business on the second floor. On the same floor was another office, on the floor above more offices. On the third floor, higher up, to learn wisdom from the stars, was the office of a paper, Love and Duty. Mostly Love and Duty was Mr. Jack Pavitt, aged twenty-four.

Digitized by Google

That gentleman, coming down from the heights one day, found a lady—who wore a neat striped blouse—in evident distress upon the stairs. The reason of her distress was that an office boy was blocking the stairs with two brooms and a dustpan, while he whistled in a manner calculated to irritate. In this office boy there was no chivalry.

Mr. Jack Pavitt, appealed to silently by the radiant face, said "Good afternoon," very pleasantly; cuffed the office-boy, and showed, standing and smiling like the hero of a melodrama, an unhindered way for the owner of the radiant face. But going home that evening, he blessed the office-boy, and that night he dreamt of a striped blouse. In case you have forgotten, I have said this already, let me remind you again that it was Summer. And even n London some birds were singing.

Very gradually—for she held tight her independence—he learnt of her situation. He resolved great schemes, most of them only to be rejected. On a Saturday afternoon (on that day the typewriter refused to bob up after two o'clock under any circumstances) Miss Sanderson, seated in the tiny sitting-room, heard a great commotion in the street. Her sister came in breathless.

"There's a man outside with a great big box. And he says it's for us. And he wants eightpence."

"It's not for us," Kitty told the carrier when she reached the pavement. "It can't possibly be for us."

And yet the address was quite plain.

"S'ouse me," said the gigantic carter. "This is the right street, or else I'm—or else I'm a bloomin' Dutchman!"

And he did not look at all like a Dutchman.

"The address is right enough," said Kitty. "You'd better take it back to your yard, or somewhere."

"This was our last job," said the driver of the van. "We knocks off at one—supposed to. The yard'll be shut. I wants my dinner, too!" finished he.

"Oh, I'm so sorry," said Miss Kitty, moved by the appeal. "Of course you want your dinner. I'll take the wretched thing."

Miss Kitty Sanderson gave him a shilling (remnant of the pounds), and told him not to mind. So he carted the huge box up to the sitting-room; and there, when he had gone, she opened it, and it was full to the edge of very pleasant things to eat.

Miss Kitty's independence choked in her throat. After all, as Grace said: "Well, you can't pitch them out into the road, Kitty, can you?"

Later, Grace found in the box a half-sheet of notepaper, with these words on it, "From Uncle Jim."

Kitty was dubious. But Grace said: "Mother did use to talk about a brother of hers who went away. Perhaps it's him," she said, ungrammatical in her excitement.

"Then why doesn't he come and see us?" argued Kitty, independent still.

On the next Monday Mr. Jack Pavitt was very pleased with himself. More than once he trembled on the verge of disclosure and disgrace. But he managed to hold the secret.

It was in that very week (the gods, as advertised, giving to Mr. Pavitt with both hands) that Miss Sanderson confided an ambition to him—to make money in her spare time. And she, personally, thought that writing stories was a very nice and easy way of making money.

To himself Mr. Jack Pavitt said: "Well, this is luck."

"I hate you for everything you have done! I loathe a coward!"

Aloud he said: "Well, Kitty," (they had got to that, you know), "there's our rag, of course."

"What's it called?" asked Kitty innocently.

"Come now!" Jack was a little hurt. "Love and Duty!—I've told you heaps of times."

"Yes, I remember," said Kitty.

"I'd try it if I were you," said he.

"I think I shall," she decided. "They'll be fearful rot, my stories, I. You don't have the things to read, do you?"

"Oh, no," replied Mr. Jack Pavitt, lying wholesale for the cause.

It should be explained that Mr. Jack Pavitt had a tolerable private income, with which he would be a philanthropist.

So now, in the evenings, and on Saturday afternoons, Miss Sanderson was very busy. From Love and Duty came a nice little note, thanking her, inclosing a moderate cheque, and asking for more.

Kitty was vastly pleased. And you must picture the audacious Jack (i.e. Love and Duty) in his chair, signing her cheques with his pen name. He had to decide reluctantly that her stories were not good enough to print. He paid for them out of his private income.

At this, Kitty, full of her independence, wondered very much. More cheques came, but she was not at all satisfied. She wrote to inquire when her stories would be used. Mr. Jack Pavitt, seeing the coming storm, sat tight, and did not reply. When he met her and she asked about her stories, he said he had heard nothing about them from the editor. They were bound to be printed soon. But still Miss Kitty Sanderson was not at all satisfied.

Then she made up her mind. The scene changes to the offices (third floor) of Love and Duty. Mr. Jack Pavitt sat at a desk by the window. His paid but unprinted contributor faced him from the chair.

"Good morning, Jack," said she. "I want to see the editor about those stories of mine."

For a moment he weighed in his mind further prevarication or otherwise. Then he decided. He caught his breath, and said:

"He's here! What is it?"

"What do you mean, Jack?"

Certainly Miss Sanderson was full of a great wrath.

"And the stories? No good at all?"

"Oh, I'll alter 'em a bit," said Jack lamely.

She would not be appeased. All the huge independence of Miss Kitty Sanderson swept back upon her. She said:

"I hate you! I hate you for everything you have done. And—I loathe a coward!"

She finished close to tears. In the silence that followed his manhood came to the help of Mr. Jack Pavitt.

Kitty turned upon him, and cried: "Why don't you go?"

"I will not go," he replied, "because you love me."

Outside the office of Love and Duty it was Summer still. Inside it was Spring.

But it was a long time before he dared to confess his identity with Uncle Jim.

Herbert Shaw.

Digitized by Google

Parts of Speech.

"A KISS, I'm told," said pretty Susie Brown, "is both a common and a proper noun." "That's true," her lover said, "but you will find it is a noun not easily declined."

With an Eye to Business.

TOM: "Why were you so determined to kiss that cousin of yours? You can't call her pretty." Dick: "I wanted to establish a precedent. She has two very pretty sisters, you know."

It Seemed So.

MISS THIN: "Don't you think my new dress is just exquisite? They all say so." Her Friend: "Oh, lovely! I think that dressmaker of yours could make a clothes-prop look graceful."

The Conclusion was Obvious.

MISS A.: "Why do you say that Miss Van Million, who is to be married to-day, is so plain? Do you know her by sight?" Miss B.: "No; but I notice that the papers have only printed the picture of her future husband."

She Put Her Foot Down.

MRS. DE FASHION: "My dear, I have picked out a husband for you." Miss De Fashion: "Very well; but I want to say now, mother, that when it comes to buying the wedding dress, I am going to select the materials myself—so there!"

He Kept a Stricter Account.

"GEORGE," she said, as she looked up from her paper, "you were always telling me before marriage how much you loved me." "Yes." "And now you never mention it." "No." "Is it because—because——" "It's because I put it down in the cash-book now instead of telling you."

A Very Good Guess.

"AH, dearest," sighed a young man, kneeling at the feet of his ownest own, "do you know what, of all things, is nearest m heart?" "Really I cannot say," she sweetly replied, "but in this cold weather I should think it was a flannel vest." She was too practical, and it broke the engagement.

A Cure for Superstition.

MILDRED (very superstitious): "Oh, dear, I would never have accepted you, Jack, if I had remembered it was Friday evening!" Jack: "There's only one way to avert the evil omen, darling. We must very carefully kiss each other seven times at least every seven minutes during the first seventy minutes of our engagement."

A Ruse that Succeeded.

"PAPA," said the young mother, "I've decided on a name for baby; we will call her Imogen." Papa was lost in thought for a few minutes; he did not like the name, but if he opposed it, his wife would have her own way. "That's nice," said he presently. "My first sweetheart was named Imogen, and she will take it as a compliment." "We will call her Mary, after my mother," was the stern reply.

An Ambiguous Remark.

BASIL: "When we are married, my love, we shall have a lot to struggle with." Ella (consolingly): "We shall have each other!"

Another Version.

HE: "He that courts and runs away will live to court another day." She: "But he that courts and does not wed may find himself in court instead."

Who Could it Have Been?

MRS. SWEETSER: "George, you forgot to kiss me this morning when you went away." Mr. Sweetser: "Are you sure of it? I certainly remember kissing somebody this morning. I supposed it was you."

Such Flattery is Wicked.

"Is it a sin," asked a fashionable lady of her spiritual director, "for me to feel pleasure when a gentleman says I am handsome?" "It is, my daughter," he replied gravely; "we should never delight in falsehood."

He Immediately Repaired the Mistake.

"SIR!" exclaimed the fair maid indignantly, as Wittiman kissed her hand, "this is entirely out of place." "I thought so myself," returned the young man apologetically, "but I really hadn't the nerve to attempt the first one on your lips."

This Mercenary Age.

CLARA: "I am going to give you back our engagement ring. I can never marry you. I love another." Clarence: "Give me his name and address." Clara: "Do you want to kill him?" Clarence: "No; I want to try to sell him the ring."

He was Showing Good Tact.

"MAMMA," said the sweet young girl, "I think Mr. Meadows loves me and is beginning to have serious intentions." "What," the fond mother asked, "has brought you to this opinion?" "He laughed heartily at one of papa's jokes last night."

They are All the Same.

PHYLLIS: "Harry is the most conceited man I ever met." Maud: "What makes you think so?" Phyllis: "Why, he first asserts that I am the most adorable woman in the world, the most beautiful and intellectual, in every respect a paragon, and then he wants me to marry him."

She Rejected his Late Application.

"GEORGE, dear," she said with a blush, "do you know that Mr. Sampson asked me last night to be his wife?" "Well, I like his impudence. The idea of proposing to an engaged young lady. What did you say to him?" "I told him that I was very sorry indeed, but he was too late."

The Lesser of Two Evils.

MABEL: "Dicky, darling, mother wants to see me particularly, but it's so expensive travelling all that way. Don't you think she'd better come to us for a bit?" Dick: "Nonsense, dear; you've never found me stingy about that kind of thing. I'll give you the money for your journey after breakfast."

The Horse Mistook the Sound.

NELLIE (sympathetically): "You poor dear! What a narrow escape! And what startled the horse?" Maudie (indignantly): "Well, you know, Will was just helping me out of the dogcart, and—the stupid horse could not tell the difference between a 'Good-night' kiss and a signal to start. And he started. Some horses have so little sense."

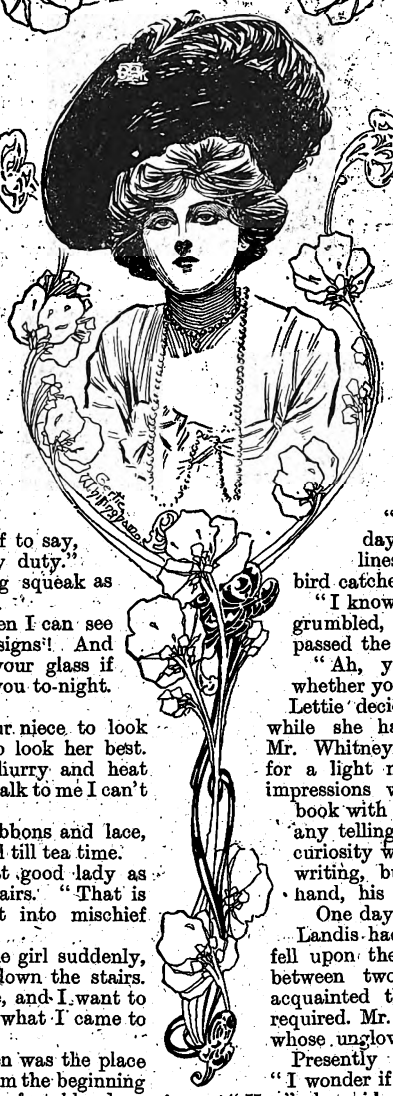
His One Advantage.

"IT seems to me rather presumptdous for a youth in your position to ask for my daughter's hand," said the girl's father. "Can you give me any good reason why I should give my consent?" "Yes, sir," replied the young man promptly. "What?" "I am comparatively modest and economical in the matter of my personal expenditure, and I think you will find me less costly to maintain than any other son-in-law you could pick out!"

Digitized by Google

ODDS MADE EVEN.

The Tale of - - - - Two Mistakes.



"LETTIE, flirting is odious!"

Miss Elarson turned from her mirror, and looked at her aunt with wide-open eyes, round the corners of which lurked an expression of amusement.

"I quite agree with you, auntie," she said; "that is why I never flirt. I detest a flirt. And I never could see the fun in leading men captive in spite of themselves. There are always plenty of them ready to go into captivity without being led."

Mrs. Landis settled back in her chair with an air of hopeless expostulation, as if to say, "It will do no good, but I must do my duty." Her chair gave forth a timid, deprecating squeak as she rocked gently backwards and forwards.

"My dear! To say you never flirt, when I can see by the look of your eye that you have designs! And you would never spend two hours before your glass if you did not expect Mr. Whitney to admire you to-night. Confess, now, would you?"

"Why, Aunt Kate, you don't want your niece to look like a fright, do you? It is one's duty to look her best. And if I must dress, I am not going to hurry and heat myself. As for Mr. Whitney, if he likes to talk to me I can't prevent it. One must be civil."

The young lady leisurely adjusted her ribbons and lace, and announced herself at her aunt's disposal till tea time.

"Well, enjoy yourself, Lettie," said that good lady as she rose to accompany her niece downstairs. "That is what we came here for. Only don't get into mischief while you are under my care."

"I'll tell you a secret, Auntie," said the girl suddenly, facing her aunt when they were half way down the stairs. "My next story is to be one of the seaside, and I want to learn all I can about seaside life. That is what I came to Freshhaven for."

Certainly the lodging-house at Freshhaven was the place for experience of seaside life. It was filled from the beginning to the end of the season with a most comfortable class of boarders; schoolboys there for a fortnight's frolic, business and professional men with their families, some whose business no one knew, but all of whom were good-natured and eager to make the most of their holidays.

Mr. Roger Whitney, of whom Mrs. Landis and her niece had spoken, was a London artist, down for a few weeks of rest and change. He had from the first manifested some interest in Miss Elarson. What man fails to appreciate the fact that there is always a pretty face opposite him at table, that his position is the envy of half the men in the house, and that the young lady in question smiles upon him quite as frequently as upon the envious ones who would oust him if they could.

It came about naturally, as such things do, that Mr. Whitney was the escort of Mrs. Landis and her pretty niece on all occasions. If they wished to spend the morning on the beach, he carried camp-stool and cushions; if they carried their work to the lawn, he read or talked to them; he took them for drives, and generally made himself pleasant. As the days went by, he even allowed himself to be persuaded into giving Miss Elarson a sunrise row upon the water. But his temper was hardly proof against this unwonted early rising.

"It is downright tyranny getting a fellow up at such an unearthly hour," he said, as he helped her into the boat and shoved it off.

"It is the pleasantest time in the whole day," she said, as she adjusted the rudder lines in her hands. "You know 'the early bird catches the worm.'"

"I know it is the early worm that gets caught," he grumbled, looking over his shoulder to see that they passed the pier safely.

"Ah, yes," she said slyly; "it depends on whether you consider yourself the bird or the worm."

Lettie decided to begin the writing of her story while she had scenery and people at first hand. Mr. Whitney was developing into an ideal character for a light novel, and it was easier to write while impressions were fresh. She often took her note book with her on their little excursions, to transcribe any telling bit that came to her. Mr. Whitney's curiosity was sometimes aroused as he watched her writing, but as her notes were written in short-hand, his repeated inquiries were not rewarded.

One day, returning from a row, from which Mrs. Landis had been detained by a headache, a silence fell upon the two, such a silence as sometimes comes between two people who feel themselves so well acquainted that constant effort to entertain is not required. Mr. Whitney rowed slowly, watching Lettie, whose ungloved hand dabbled idly in the water.

Presently he said in a tentative kind of way: "I wonder if you were ever in love?"

"Yes," she said, rising to the situation, "lots of times. Weren't you ever?"

"I don't know. I've thought so once or twice, but I doubt if it was the real thing. How do you tell the genuine article?"

"Well, you know, Mr. Whitney," she replied, rescuing the boat from threatened collision with another by a quick turn of the rudder, "I never bother myself about that. It is so uncomfortable to be always analysing and weighing and measuring."

"I suppose so. But did you ever find the real thing?" he insisted.

She blushed. She was thinking of a certain love story not many months old, which was never going into any of her books.

"You are growing curious again," she said, flinging a handful of water on him as he sat facing her.

Lettie's story grew rapidly, and she found Mr. Whitney more than ever an inspiring subject for copy as his attentions grew more and more lover-like. Not that she encouraged him or drew him on; she simply let him "gang his ain gait," keeping him always away from subjects of purely personal import. She was not yet ready for that.

Digitized by Google

Several of the guests were sitting on the lawn one afternoon when Mr. Whitney strolled up and decoyed Miss Elarson off to a quiet, shady spot elsewhere. He seemed somewhat distrait, and all Lettie's attempts at conversation failed. At last she was silent.

"Miss Elarson," he said suddenly, "I want to tell you something."

His look and manner were unmistakable. It was coming unless she could put him off.

"Do you, Mr. Whitney?" she said cordially; "I have not heard anything amusing for an age."

"Has the Summer been so tame to you? To me it has been far from that. It has seemed like Heaven. Knowing you has changed my whole life, Miss Lettie."

"Do go on, Mr. Whitney," she said, smiling sweetly and provokingly on him. "Tell me the rest of it, and perhaps I can guess where you found it. I am sure I must have read it somewhere."

"Pshaw!" he answered, half angrily. "Why can't you give a fellow credit for being serious? I am in earnest, Miss Lettie."

She began to fear she should not be able to manage him.

"Of course you are in earnest, Mr. Whitney. I never knew a more earnest man. But it isn't good for you this kind of weather. It is insufferably hot here. Isn't it time for the bathers to be out? I promised Aunt Kate to go down to the beach with her."

But he was not to be put off long, and Lettie realised the fact. She wrote hard and long at her story, absenting herself from festivities in spite of the united protests of Mrs. Landis and Mr. Whitney. After several days' hard work she laid down her pen with a sigh of relief. Now she could let matters take their course.

She half wished he might have changed his mind, for she was not so hardened as to wish to break a man's heart for her own amusement. But if he would not be put off, if he would speak, why, her story was ready for the last love scene. That was a comfort.

An hour later she descended the stairs looking fresh and cool in the daintiest of pale blue dresses. Mr. Whitney was stretched full length on the grass near the verandah where her aunt was sitting.

"Where have you kept yourself for so long, Miss Elarson?" he asked, looking lazily at her from under his hat brim.

"I've been working," she replied. "Don't you pity me losing all the fun?"

"Pity you! I pity myself a great deal more. It has been an eternity."

"How old you must be by this time! Are there many grey hairs?" she asked teasingly.

"There were; but I tore them out in my despair. Are you going to work this afternoon?"

"Not if I can help it," she answered; "I think I have earned a holiday."

"Then come down to the beach with me," he said, sitting up and looking more animated, "I know a nice shady spot where we can get a breeze, and you can talk to me while I sketch."

"Very well; I am in an entertaining mood to-day. Wait till I get my hat."

Mr. Whitney did not seem inclined to stand by his programme for sketching. He drew fitfully for a few minutes, and then swung half round on his stool so as to face her.

"I am going to finish what I tried to say the other day when you left me so suddenly, Miss Elarson. I wanted to tell you that I love you."

He seemed rather nervous, making uneasy little scratches on a card that he had picked up. Lettie poked the end of her parasol in the sand and felt relieved that he stayed where he was. He was not going to be silly.

He went on calmly enough, yet with little nervous hitches between his words that showed the listening girl that he felt what he was saying.

"You have been such an inspiration to me this summer. Will you not continue to be that? Can't you learn to love me? Lettie, will you be my wife?"

Of course she could not, and would not. But he seemed so much in earnest that her conscience gave her some painful twinges as she told him so. She grew quite soft-hearted about it, and cried a little, thinking what a blow it must be to the poor man.

But to her unspeakable astonishment he seemed rather relieved than otherwise at her refusal. He tried manfully not to show it, but it was plain to be seen that he had feared she would accept him and was glad that she had not. She was puzzled, and inclined to be angry.

"Miss Elarson," he said, seeing her astonishment, "you have a right to be angry with me. I must make a confession, and then you will see that I do not deserve even your friendship. I painted a picture which I called 'The Wooing.' But the expression was not good; it was not real, and I could not make it so. Then I met you and found your face just what I had been longing for for my picture. I studied you for that. I really got to thinking a great deal of you, you know, so it was not all a pretence. But there is no excuse for me. There, you know it all!"

As he finished speaking he tossed the card into her lap. It was a cleverly accurate sketch of what her face must have been ten minutes before. The uneasy dashes were not from nervousness after all. She looked at the man. His head was in his hands, and his eyes bent on the ground, a most abject picture of humiliation. She looked at the card again, and thought how completely she had been duped. She need not pity him, at all events. Then the ludicrousness of it all struck her, and she burst into a hearty laugh. It was Mr. Whitney's turn to wonder. He looked up.

"I don't see anything funny in it," he said gloomily.

"You have confessed very frankly, Mr. Whitney. I shall have to confess now, though I did not intend to. You do not owe me anything for this."

"What can you mean?"

"I mean that I write stories and copy my heroes and their pretty sayings from life when I can. I have found you a very obliging model."

"You mean," he said, with rising anger, "that you deliberately led me on to make love to you so the public might have the benefit of it?"

"I didn't lead you on, and you know it, Mr. Whitney. I simply let you. You wanted me for your picture."

"True," he said, a smile taking the place of the show of temper in his eyes.

"I think we're even," Lettie said, holding out the card. "Use your sketch. I am sure I am very grateful for the help you have given me."

"And you really do not mind my using this?" he asked.

"Not in the least," she answered, smiling.

Then followed half an hour's animated discussion of the story and picture before they went back to the house.

Mrs. Landis was still on the lawn when her niece and Mr. Whitney returned. The glance that passed between the two young people as they separated at the steps told that astute lady that they knew something which the world did not. She followed Lettie to her room.

"My dear," she said, kissing her, "you need not tell me a word. I have eyes, and I have seen it all along. I see by your face that it is all settled."

"Yes, Aunt Kate," said Lettie, looking down demurely and trying not to laugh, "it is all settled."

Agnes Wiltberger.

WIFE (sweetly): "What's the matter, dear? Did I forget to mend your shirt?" Husband: "Madam, this is too much! The woman who neglects her husband's shirt front is no longer the wife of his bosom."

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID NEW SERIAL. YOU CAN START TO-DAY.

Dupes of Destiny

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT

By Blanche Eardley, Writer of "The Bond Between."

PROLOGUE.

A YOUTH is in the private room of Messrs. Samuel Sharpe and Quirke, solicitors, awaiting the head of the firm's announcement as to whether he is the heir to the baronetcy of the late Sir Basil Wingate or not.

Mr. Sharpe says:

"You will remember, Mr. Rust, at the reading of the will, the title, which by special remainder he had power to dispose of, and the money were left by Sir Basil Wingate to the elder son of his run-away only daughter, Helen Jerningham, should she have one; and failing a son being born to her, the title and the money with the estate, should go to you, his nephew."

He then tells Cyprian Rust that, hearing Helen Jerningham went to Australia, he has extensively advertised for her in Australian papers, but with no effect. Therefore he congratulates his listener on becoming Sir Cyprian Rust.

The solicitor is called out of the room, and Cyprian Rust sees on the table an unopened letter with an Australian stamp. The address he recognises as being in the handwriting of his cousin, Helen Jerningham!

Is it written to announce the birth of a son and heir? If so it would rob him of the legacy at the eleventh hour!

A step sounds outside the door. Quickly Cyprian Rust thrusts the letter into his pocket. He hurriedly says good-bye to Mr. Sharpe, and when he reaches his hotel he reads the missive. It tells how Helen Jerningham has left Australia, so that the future heir—if a boy—may be born in England!

Sir Cyprian Rust carefully burns the letter that might have dealt the death-blow to his ambitions, and mentally resolves to go to any extremes to retain the title.

Meanwhile Helen Jerningham is dying on board an ocean liner in giving birth to twin sons.

From incoherent remarks that she makes, the physician who attends her is led to believe that a secret is attached to the boys' history. But she dies ere she reveals her name or the boys' identity!

Many years later.

Sir Cyprian learns, through the Rev. Philip Nullius, that a dying woman wishes to see him.

He goes to see her, and she shows him a later will of Sir Basil Wingate, by which all his property is left to the descendants of Helen Jerningham unconditionally. Sir Cyprian snatches this will from her, and she dies before she can inform anyone else.

Sir Cyprian visits Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox, where he meets Mr. Caleb J. Johnson, millionaire and City magnate, who is in love with the hostess. The baronet, who has Lady Violet in his coils, forces her to swear to take particulars of the millionaire's house and property.

Late in the evening Johnson proposes to Lady Violet. Knowing her position, she, of course, refuses him. As she does so, the palms in front of the window part and a man lurches heavily into the room.

Lady Violet recognises him as her husband—a former Major in the Army, who has been separated from her for many years. Hastily she requests Johnson to leave; then, turning on her unwelcome visitor, she by threats prevails upon him to go.

In the corridor this Society ruffian encounters Sir Cyprian, and sees upon his watch-chain the Sign of the Spade!

Edward Day proposes to Marcella Rust, the beautiful daughter of the baronet. Being refused, he angrily lets fall an allusion to Marcella's dead mother.

Lady Violet overhears this, and, with blazing eyes, dismisses Day, who acts as her secretary, from her service. She makes him an allowance of £250 a year.

Johnson discovers, through a private inquiry agent, the whole history of Major Richard Frayne-Lennox, and buys from a General Lyster the cheque that he had forged.

Edward Day is engaged by Johnson, the millionaire, at a liberal salary. He afterwards visits his wife, Lottie, a chorus girl, of whom he has grown tired. He tells her of the rupture between himself and Lady Violet, who does not know that he is married.

At Wingate Court, Marcella reads of the theft of a valuable picture from Caleb Johnson's house. As she was one of the last persons to see the picture, she evinces great interest in the accounts of the robbery.

Digitized by Google

Sir William Slade, of Harley Street fame, visits Sir Cyprian, and, as the day is very boisterous, is greatly concerned to hear that Marcella has set out for Danger Point, a very dangerous rock on the coast. His host, however, assures him that Marcella will be quite safe, as she knows the locality well.

As a matter of fact, she is only just rescued in time from a very perilous position.

Marcella feels that there is something very mysterious about the doings at Wingate Court, so writes to Lady Violet for advice. Her father, however, gets hold of this letter, and destroys it.

Sir Cyprian is very concerned when Sir William Slade announces that he identifies Philip Nullius as one of the children that was born on the Australian liner five-and-twenty years ago. The baronet mentally resolves that the curate must be got out of the way.

He gives the curate a letter of introduction to a clergyman in the south of England. Philip, thinking it will be to his advantage, goes.

Marcella, a day or two later, penetrates to a part of the house, to which her father has forbidden her. The dust laying about is frightful. She begins to retrace her steps when she hears a faint cry.

She goes down some stairs, and sees a door with glass panels. Pressed against the glass is the white, delicate hand of a woman!

NINETEENTH CHAPTER.

The Woman of Mystery.

MARCELLA fell back with a cry of astonishment. The sight of that lily-white hand pressed against the glass panel in the door came as a sort of shock to her.

The secrecy that had appeared to exist concerning the forbidden wing, the attitude of her father's servants, even Sir Cyprian's own words to her, came with a flash of inspiration, illuminating the mystery of what lay beyond in the corridor, labelled by her father s orders "no thoroughfare!"

Who was the owner of that delicate white hand? she wondered—and why should she be confined in such seclusion in an underground passage of the Court?

Seized afresh with a desire to fathom the secret upon which she had so unexpectedly fallen, Marcella gently turned the handle of the door.

The slight noise it made had the effect of sending the hand from the panel, only for its place to be taken the following moment by a face, lit by unnaturally brilliant eyes, dark and frightened, that gazed in alarm upon the intruder in the passage.

Marcella nodded reassuringly. She felt that this woman with the timid, fawn-like eyes was no foe to be feared, but a helpless woman to be protected.

She put her mouth close to the glass and said in a low, cautious whisper: "The door is locked—how can I get in?"

Silently, and with a gleam of intelligence in the brilliant eyes, the woman raised her hand and pointed to an object in the passage behind Marcella's head. She turned quickly, and saw a nail, on which hung a key.

It was the work of a moment to detach it from its place, unlock the door, and walk into the room—her movements being followed keenly by the dark-eyed inmate who had crept behind a chair in the manner of a frightened child.

The room in which Marcella found herself left nothing to be desired in the way of furniture. It was as richly appointed as her own boudoir; flowers, plants, and mirrors being in profusion, yet the windows were nothing more or less than small panes of glass very high in the wall, and heavily barred outside, the only light in the room being that which came from the electric globes.

Marcella felt a strange sense of being in a beautiful cage, as she gazed round. She saw that another room opened out of the one she was in, and it was furnished as a bedroom—so the unknown prisoner in the Court lived in durance vile!

"Tell me," she said gently, "who are you—and why do you live so far from everything and everyone?"

The woman looked puzzled. "I have always been here," she said slowly. "I am happy here, he is kind to me sometimes, and I love Dolly!"

Marcella looked at the white, smiling face, that once must have been very beautiful, with a strange fear. She wondered whether her companion was quite in her right mind. There was a simplicity in her speech and manner that suggested a sudden stoppage of the powers of reason.

"Take me to 'Dolly,'" she replied gently. "Is she a little girl or your maid?"

"Dolly is Dolly—no one else!" the woman answered gently. "I don't know what I should do without her! Come, she is in there!"

Marcella followed her wonderingly, and lying in a miniature child's cradle she saw a life-size wax doll, over which the woman leant tenderly.

"They told me she was dead," she went on in a cooing voice. "Then when I said it was impossible for me to live without my baby, they let me have her. It is a long time ago since I was ill, but now she is with me, I don't mind anything—not even him," and she shuddered slightly, "only I wish baby would grow—she has been a long time like this!"

Marcella turned away.

Her eyes were swimming, and she could not trust herself to speak in the presence of such an awful tragedy. A woman with the mind of a child cherishing a wax doll instead of her own lost baby! It was more of a puzzle than ever that such a secret should be kept at the Court!

Why should the relatives of this lonely woman not acknowledge her openly, instead of burying her alive! Surely this was not the only reason for which Deacon had prevented her from entering the corridor?

A sudden thought struck her. She turned swiftly to the woman still caressing the doll.

"I want to ask you something," she said gently. "Who waits on you here? Have you a maid?"

She looked puzzled. "Sarah looks after me," she replied slowly, "and—and he always comes to see me on his way into the other rooms—the rooms where the beautiful things are kept." And she laughed softly.

Marcella did not hear the last words of her speech. She was wondering what man the lonely creature with the infinitely pathetic laugh could mean, when she spoke of him "hurting" her. Surely it must be Deacon!

"Tell me what man it is whom you see?" she said persuasively. "I may know him—I live here too, you know."

The woman looked at her thoughtfully, as though struggling with an idea that had floated accidentally into her mind.

"You live here," she murmured, "then you have seen him, too! He is dark—very dark—and sometimes he is harsh to me and says things I cannot understand——"

"A dark man!" Marcella exclaimed, remembering that brief encounter with the mysterious stranger coming out of the corridor some weeks ago. "Yes, I have seen him—but only once! Do you see him often?"

The woman nodded. "Yes, sometimes every day, but he has not been here to-day. I suppose he is busy—he is not often late."

Marcella leant towards her eagerly. "When does this dark man visit you?" she said quickly. "I should like to see him!"

A frightened expression crept into the woman's eyes. "He would not like it—he would be angry and scold me."

"No, not if he did not know I was here," Marcella breathed. "If you tell me when he may be coming to see you, I could hide behind those curtains until he had gone."

The frightened look intensified on the pale, quivering face, and the large, dark eyes gazed wonderingly into the clear, resolute ones of Marcella.

"I cannot," she murmured. "Go—please go; he will be very cross with me, and he threatened to take Dolly from me if I disobeyed him —and—" — a glimmer of tears showed in her eyes— "you don't want me to lose Dolly, do you?"

Digitized by Google

Marcella put her hand on her arm gently. "No, I will not stay since you fear it may get you into trouble," she replied. "I will go now, in case you think the dark man will soon be here and find the door undone. But I will come back again, now I have found you—only you must tell no one that I have discovered this room," she went on warningly, "or I may be prevented from ever seeing you any more."

"You will come again?" the woman repeated with a faint sigh. "Yes, come again, and I will take you to see the beautiful things in the other rooms—oh, they are wonderful—wonderful, and he loves them! I have seen him bending over them when he and his friends thought there was no one looking."

"That's a bargain then," Marcella said hastily —humouring what she imagined to be the fantastic play of a childish mind—"when I come again you will show me those beautiful things."

With a smile of infinite pity she opened the door and slipped into the passage, then, turning the key in the lock, she put it back on the nail.

Before moving on, she lifted the curtain that hung in front of the glass panels, and glanced into the room that held the mysterious captive. She was leaning over the wax doll that she had carried from the inner room, and the expression on her face made Marcella's eyes grow suddenly moist.

As she prepared to grope her way along the narrow passage, towards the staircase that led into the unused wing, a light step in the distance made her pause and listen with every sense strained to the uttermost.

She shrank back into a convenient corner, and waited while the steps drew nearer, and gazing from her hiding place, she presently saw the tall figure of a man coming in the direction of the panelled door.

It was too gloomy to see his face, but Marcella knew instinctively that he was the "dark man" to whom the strange woman had referred, and also identical with the man she had seen coming out of the forbidden corridor on Christmas Eve, and whose action in placing a spade guinea under the rug had so excited her curiosity.

"The dark man," she breathed, tingling with a sense of excitement, and watching with dilated eyes as the figure drew closer.

The man appeared apparently oblivious that he had an audience, for he walked slowly along, his face partly concealed by the profusion of black beard and hair, which, together with blue "goggles," acted almost as a disguise.

Moved by an uncontrollable impulse, Marcella swiftly stretched out one hand, just as he was passing her, and touched ever so slightly the white cuff that showed from under his sleeve. It was a slight action, so sudden and silent that the man did not guess that he had been touched, but passed on, and the next moment Marcella heard the closing of a door.

Some time later—perhaps a quarter of an hour—Marcella moved from her hiding-place and noiselessly followed the tall dark man up the stairs into the corridor. She was determined to trace him to his lair—to know who the stranger was that dared have secrets in her father's house. As she hurried after him, he suddenly stopped, as though to pick up something, then continued on his way.

Eager with the scent of battle in her nostrils, Marcella hastened her steps, and then before she could save herself, she fell heavily over something on the ground. It was an instant's work to spring to her feet, bruised yet not vanquished, and follow the tall figure ahead of her, that had not even paused at the sound of her fall.

Out into the corridor breathless and exultant, soon now she would know the man for what he was, she would come face to face with him, and challenge him with the secret in the corridor.

The strange steps kept ahead, and, moving to the left, the man went in the direction of Sir Cyprian's suite of apartments, quickening his speed.

Marcella was now almost abreast of him, but Fate, with that ironic method of dashing the cup from one's lips, again was on the side of the quarry, for a nail caught in her dress, and when she had freed herself the man had disappeared.

Suddenly she stopped; standing in the window seat on top of the stairs there was a shadowy figure. Could it be the same? she wondered.

With a noiseless movement she went up, and touched the man on his arm.

He turned quickly, and instead of the dark-bearded man she had followed so closely, saw the fair, almost hairless face of Edward Day.

"I thought you had gone to bed ages ago, Marcella," he said, in such tones of genuine surprise that she could only gaze at him silently. Was he acting ignorance, or was he really innocent of the fact that another man must have passed by him only a moment ago?

"I am looking for someone," she said coldly; "a tall, dark man who came out of the unused wing just now. Have you seen him?"

He looked amused. "I have seen no one of that description, Marcella. It could not have been Dr. Slade, because he is stout and rather bald, nor Sir Cyprian. Are you sure the man was not a servant?"

"It was not a servant," she said coldly, moving away, "but someone with no right to wander about the Court without leave."

As she turned back, he caught her hand in his.

"Marcella, don't keep me at such a distance always," he pleaded. "Give me a chance of winning back your regard."

"That is impossible," she retorted, "for you never had it! Besides, you are well aware of the fact that I am engaged to Mr. Nullius, the curate."

A slight smile flickered across his mouth. "Ah, I had forgotten for the moment that little incident of the interesting curate. By the way, he has left Crawley, has he not?" he went on carelessly, eyeing her between half-closed lids.

She raised her head and regarded him calmly. "Why ask me that when you knew of it before myself?" she said scornfully. "It's a waste of time to lay traps for me, Mr. Day. I can see through your methods very easily."

He flushed. "Really—ah, you say that, Marcella, because there are no traps or methods to be spotted," he laughed easily. "If I troubled to plot I fancy I should be rather successful."

"I don't doubt it," she retorted. "You would bring the whole of your genius to bear on an unworthy object! But I ani glad you will have no occasion to interfere in my private affairs."

Digitized by Google

(continued.)

He looked after her savagely. "Proud little termagant!" he muttered; "wait a bit, my dear cousin Marcella! You will find that it was rather unwise to snub the poor secretary, Edward Day. I shall score soon, and when you have lost the fascinating curate, we shall see whether you will be so ready to snub me then!"

In the meantime Marcella was knocking at the door of her father's study. She had dismissed Edward Day from her mind, and was occupied with the one thought concerning the man with the black beard.

Sir Cyprian rose from his chair as she entered. He was looking pale and slightly thoughtful, but he smiled lovingly upon his daughter as he said playfully:

"Well, my dear. It is rather late for a talk, but I will forgive you, since I am sure you have come to tell your old father that you are going to be a good girl and not worry him any more."

Marcella gazed at him steadily. "If by being a 'good girl' you mean that I have forgotten what I said about giving my love to Philip Nullius, father, I am afraid that I shall disappoint you again," she said gravely. "But you must know that I am not the sort of girl to take back to-day what I said yesterday—and I can never say that I do not love Philip. But in every other respect, father," she continued gently, "I will always try to please you by giving you no cause to worry about me."

Sir Cyprian stroked his moustache slowly. "Poor child!" he murmured half aloud, "I was hoping that you were better—that your foolish infatuation had given place to a more sensible frame of mind. But I can't scold you, Marcella; I can only regret the sad strain I see in you."

Something in his tone made Marcella flush angrily. The half tolerating, half-pitying speech was as gall and wormwood to her proud spirit. She would rather have had harsh vituperation heaped upon her head than be made an object for commiseration.

"I did not come here to discuss my engagement with Mr. Nullius," she said coldly, "but to tell you something else."

He shot a keen glance at her. "So long as you refrain from discussing the curate I shall be glad to listen to you, my dear," he said suavely; "only"—and he raised one white hand warningly—"spare yourself any great excitement. If you are afraid that you may lose your self-control, I beg of you to put off any discussion until you are stronger."

"I am perfectly strong," Marcella began hotly, when the words froze on her lips. Her eyes, following the movement of Sir Cyprian's hand, were fixed upon the shining linen of his cuff. Smeared across its white surface was a mark, as though a dusty hand had come in contact with it!

TWENTIETH CHAPTER.

The Man with the Black Beard.

"DEAR LADY VIOLET,—I am coming to see you, if I may, to-morrow afternoon concerning the answer to that question I asked you some weeks ago, and to which you were unable to reply definitely on account of family reasons. I told you that I never gave in, and I fancy now that even you will reward my patience and perseverance by saying just that one little word so necessary to my happiness.—I am, sincerely yours,

"CALEB J. JOHNSON."

Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox had read and re-read the letter in her hand many times over.

She had received it the previous day, and from that time to within a few hours of Mr. Johnson's arrival she had wondered how much he meant by his innuendo about the family reasons, and whether he was at all acquainted with the existence of the real skeleton in her domestic cupboard.

She had not seen the financier since his proposal, and the unwelcome interruption that had held back the answer on her lips. She had refused an invitation he had since sent her, having only accompanied Marcella in the role of a chaperone to view the celebrated copy of the "Mona Lisa."

From that date Lady Violet had avoided those houses where she knew the financier would be most likely to visit. But in spite of her withdrawal from gaiety, she had heard of the dramatic loss Mr. Johnson had sustained in the theft of his masterpiece, and the fair, creamy skin of her ladyship had paled to a sickly sallow as she read hungrily the many suggestions thrown on the affair by various experts.

She rose and looked at her reflection in the long mirror. "You cannot let this man have any other answer than that which you gave him last time," she murmured. "Even if that skeleton did not exist to put a barrier between us, there is another—not of my making, thank God, but one in which I have a guilty knowledge, and which must for ever stand between myself and Caleb J. Johnson or any other man.

"I must stand alone. I have someone to protect more dear to me than position, money, or even my life; whatever happens I must guard my darling from the leper's touch."

Her face softened, and a curiously tender smile touched her lips as she turned away from the glass.

"That man has left England," her thoughts ran on; "he will never attempt to return now that he knows I possess his secret. His liberty is dear to him, such as it is, and he will never dare to force himself on me."

She rang the bell, and ordered the carriage to be ready in half an hour's time, then sat down and began to write a long, loving letter to Marcella, from whom she had not heard for some days.

Then a short time afterwards she leant back in her carriage, a lovely statuesque figure in rich furs, followed by the admiring glances of men and women, who were acquainted with her beauty through the photographs in the shops.

As her eyes wandered carelessly among the moving faces round her, Lady Violet gave a little start. A figure had attracted her attention, though there was nothing remarkable about it, with the exception of a profusion of inky black hair and a trim black beard. A pair of blue glasses denoted that the wearer suffered from defective sight.

Upon this harmless individual the eyes of the woman in the carriage gazed with something akin to fear and wonder. "What can he be doing here in that dress?" she muttered. "I must find out—he usually tells me when he is coming to town; this must be a new move.'

She stepped from the carriage and dismissed it, telling the coachman that she had some shopping to do that would detain her a very long time, and that she would drive back in a cab. When he had disappeared in the traffic, she hailed a hansom, and telling the driver to follow the man with the glasses and black beard, pulled the fur collar of her coat round her face and closed her eyes.

Presently the driver raised the little flap at the top of the hansom, and said in a loud aside:

"Lidy, the gent as you want me to foller 'as been joined by another one; they're turning into Victoria Station now by the Underground.'

Quickly paying the man his fare, she slipped out and caught up the man with the beard, who was talking earnestly with his companion, who was so disguised in a scarf and slouch hat that nothing could be seen of his face.

They passed by the Underground station, and came into the London, Brighton, and South Coast line. The crowd was dense, and a dull wintry fog had settled upon everything. She stood behind the man with the glasses at the booking stall, and heard him say, "Two first return Clapham," and immediately knew her destination. Then she took her ticket, and once more followed closely behind them. They were talking more loudly, and with less fear of being overheard.

"The train does not go for half an hour," the man with the glasses said; "we had better go into the refreshment room and have something to drink."

Digitized by Google

"Half an hour!" She sighed with relief; that would give her just time in which to collect her thoughts, and decide upon her action in following the man with the black hair and goggles.

After all, how could she successfully attempt to avert his discovery of her identity? Yet, in spite of everything, she felt compelled to learn something—to hold some string by which she could control the destiny of one dear to her—far, far dearer than all else in the world.

She went into the waiting-room, and sat down; the room was large, and there were not many people in it. On the seat a few yards from her, she noticed dimly the figure of a girl. She was beautiful after a theatrical type, but her face was thin. She seemed to have some trouble on her mind, for her eyes were blue-rimmed and weary, and her mouth quivered like that of a child.

The woman whose wealth had never brought her happiness, felt a fellow-feeling for the golden-haired girl, whose way in life seemed also hard, and she wondered whether she were a wayside flower that had been plucked and worn for an hour.

She leant forward impulsively.

"Forgive me," she began in her low caressing voice, "but you don't seem well—can I do anything for you? Are you waiting for someone or going by train?"

The girl had started violently when she spoke first, then surprise had given way to admiration when she gazed at the musical-voiced woman who had addressed her. The aroma of violets and the richness of the furs did not escape her notice.

"I am not ill, thank you," she said slowly, her hands twisting and untwisting nervously. "I am waiting for my train. I am going to Brighton to join a company for tour."

Lady Violet raised her brows—that explained her first impression of the stage—this pretty, fragile-looking little creature was an actress! A member of the great middle-class who neither sank nor swam, but just went with the tide.

She looked at the girl's cloak. It was an old waterproof ulster, and her hat was a shabby straw trimmed heavily with velvet.

A sudden thought seized her. She drew closer to the girl, and said in her most seductive tones:

"I wonder will you do me a great service? I am going on some business that necessitates my looking as quiet as possible, and in these things"—with a gesture towards her sable coat—"that will be impossible. I want you to change clothes with me for a time, just your hat and cloak. I will give you my address, and you must come to see me when you return from your tour. I may be able to help you, as I know some big people in the theatrical profession."

The girl looked at her without speaking. Her London-bred intelligence was averse to putting implicit trust in plausible strangers; still, the face of the woman was so proud and aristocratic that somehow the girl felt she could not be judged by the common standard. Besides, the thought of appearing among her fellow actresses in priceless furs and ostrich feathers was a temptation to her vain little heart.

"It's a funny sort of favour!" she laughed, "and I'm afraid you won't make much by the exchange; but I don't mind obliging you, as you say it is so important."

They passed into the inner room, and there were quietly metamorphosed respectively into each other's sphere of life, from an exterior point of view.

"Good-bye," Lady Violet said, holding out her hand and smiling quietly. "Tell me your name so that I may remember my benefactress."

"My name's Lottie Haste," the girl replied. "I will return your beautiful things when I know where to send them."

"Don't do that—if they are any use, keep them. The coat is warm and I have others. I am a rich woman, child; you must come and see me on your return to town. This is my card."

She pressed the piece of cardboard into the girl's hand and

Almost everybody knows the value of Bovril as a strengthening and nourishing beverage. Bovril is equally valuable in cooking, and a little added to gravies, soups, croquettes, hashes, &c., wonderfully improves their flavour and increases their nourishing properties.

Digitized by Google

Dupes of Destiny

(continued.)

hurried out. Her train was almost due, and she wanted to secure a seat in the same carriage as that occupied by the man with the dark beard and glasses. She was quite safe from discovery now—the flopping hat and shabby ulster of the little chorus girl were an ample disguise.

In the waiting-room Lottie Haste looked curiously at the card in her hand. She had taken a sudden fancy to the beautiful dark woman whose personality dominated her completely. As she gazed at the card, her face changed colour, and an exclamation rose to her lips—the name on the card was "Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox, Grosvenor Place, W."

"His aunt," she murmured; "that beautiful, gracious woman is the aunt of the heartless blackguard whom I married—Edward Day, the man who deserted me! And to think that she, of all women in the world, should be the one to whom I should do a favour in lending her my old rags! and he said she hated actresses, and would never allow him to mention my name! Yet she has the sweetest eyes I have ever seen in a woman. I will keep the card and one day call on Lady Violet." She smiled grimly. "Why, she's my aunt by marriage!"

In the meantime Lady Violet had taken her seat in the carriage, in which already the two men had seated themselves. They did not once glance her way, though a shabby-looking woman in a first-class carriage is not often seen.

With the exception of those three the compartment was empty, and Lady Violet pulled the collar and hood of the cloak closer round her face, and settled in a corner to doze. Her gentle breathing was listened to with grim satisfaction by her companions; then the man with the black beard spoke softly, and at the sound of his voice the silent figure in the opposite corner began to tremble.

"It's rather important that he should know nothing about me. You are a friend of the old cleric who got him into St. Paul's from the Foundling Hospital. His name was the Reverend James Cray—he's an old chap, and I've discovered that he is since dead—but he does not know it, and you must personate the old man's representative, you understand?"

"Yes," said the other voice slowly. "You want me to win his confidence—and then——" He paused significantly, and laughed chillily. "I understand."

"That's well," replied the man with the black beard softly. "He is not an ordinary sort of chap; he is strong, I should say, and not easily bowled out. He is tall, dark, and has very distinctive ways. His name is also unusual; it is Philip Nullius; and he is spending his holiday in a village called Leyton. He is there for a month—and you know a lot can be done in a month."

The woman in the shabby ulster shivered as though a cold blast had struck her.

The conversation had been of a different nature from that she had expected, and she had nearly regretted having followed the man—but the moment she heard the name of their apparently unconscious victim, every nerve was again on the alert.

It was an uncommon name, one that once heard would not be easily forgotten, and the occasion on which she had last heard it had been when her niece Marcella had told her the name of the tall, handsome, young curate whom she had accidentally seen outside the Dovermarle Hotel.

She had observed the tinge of colour that had swept the girl's creamy skin, and her woman's instinct had instantly told her that Marcella's fresh young heart had passed into the keeping of the curate, Philip Nullius! And it was against that lover that the man with the black beard was plotting something sinister!

Why was he taking so much trouble to bring ill upon the hapless curate? she wondered. Surely he could not be taking such elaborate steps because Marcella's girlish transparency had revealed her secret?

No—she knew sufficient about the nature of the man in the black beard to be quite sure that another more powerful motive was at the root of his desperate plot. What it was, she determined to discover—for it must be a very powerful lever that would make a man like that risk so much—possibly his liberty.

Besides, there was Marcella—she must not lose her lover. What matter if he were poor and obscure; he was the man who had won that dear, tender, and true heart, and therefore, for Marcella's sake, he must be saved.

Thoughts flashed through her mind with kaleidoscopic rapidity; plan after plan was evolved, to be discarded. She must be very wary before pitting her brain against that of the man in the black beard.

As the train slowed into the station of Clapham Junction they spoke again.

"You will find him at this address. I told him that I had a clerical friend there who would take an interest in him. The house is right out in the country, about five miles from Leyton. It is called 'Water Grange,' because of a moat that runs round it.

"Philip Nullius is living in Leyton in rooms, until my friend arrives at 'Water Grange.' His address is '18 Lillie Road, Leyton.' Now you know all that is necessary. I expect you to be subtle and delicate—no blundering—no confidences with other men. It is always better to tackle difficult jobs single-handed. You understand?"

The man nodded. "It's risky, and no mistake," he laughed. "A job more suited to another sort o' man than me—but if I take it in hand I'll promise you it won't fail; by the way," he added curiously, "you don't mind my asking a straightforward question, do you? Is there a special reason why this young parson chap should be knocked on the napper?"

The woman in the corner held her breath for the answer.

After a pause the man in the black beard said softly:

"The reason why Philip Nullius should be out of my path is one so startling and unexpected that even your strong nerve would be shaken, my dear 'Shovel,' at the prospect of such danger threatening me—the man who has so long been your leader and brought you wealth through his successful daring.

"That curate, ignorant as he is of the fact, is the most deadly of all my foes, and I shall know no peace until he is removed from where he may do me harm. There are methods more safe than the extreme one, remember, but the one you adopt in order to do my bidding is one that must be equally silent and leave no traces behind!"

A few moments later the two men, followed by Lady Violet, got out at the Junction, one leaving the station. In a separate compartment the other and Lady Violet travelled back to town.

When the train arrived at Victoria, Lady Violet looked in vain for the dark-bearded man, he was no where to be seen; but passing straight on ahead of her she saw her brother-in-law, Sir Cyprian Rust, smiling as though on very good terms with the world and himself.

Once outside the station the baronet hailed a hansom, and drove in the direction of Piccadilly to his club.

As he leant back, busy with his thoughts, two men, in earnest conversation walking along the wide pavement, attracted his attention; one he recognised instantly as the financier, Caleb J. Johnson, but it was on the face of the financier's companion that Sir Cyprian's genial blue eyes were fixed in a gaze of horror.

The man seemed to be walking with an air of sullen unwillingness by the financier's side. He was sportive-looking in dress, and his reckless, dare-devil face had a cowed expression.

With a silent gesture from the financier, a brougham drove up, and as the two men stepped inside, Sir Cyprian wiped his brow with his handkerchief; the face of the man beside Caleb J. Johnson was that of the intruder who had accosted him so strangely the night of Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox's dinner-party—the man who had recognised the fateful sign on his chain!

Digitized by Google

"What—what does he want with that Johnson chap?" he muttered, with chattering teeth. "Can it mean danger to me? Is my star beginning to flicker in the firmament of success?"

TWENTY-FIRST CHAPTER.

"There is no Barrier Now."

"AND you understand that you go to-night? All is ready for you. As you step on to the deck of that Australian liner, a cheque for £1,000 will be put into your hands. A watch will be kept over your movements by agents of mine, who will notify at once whether you are keeping to your promise. The very instant you attempt to land anywhere in the British Isles, that interesting little cheque, which was dishonoured through your forgery, will be placed in the hands of the police.

"You understand, I hope; don't do anything rashly—take your time to decide about remaining in England to stand in the dock, and probably get a long term of penal servitude—or go to Australia and live on the best of the land for the rest of your natural life. I hope you follow me, Major Frayne-Lennox?" And Caleb J. Johnson bit the end of a cigar, and gazed across the room where that worthy, the derelict husband of Lady Violet stood chewing the end of his moustache.

"I understand well enough," he answered sullenly. "I am in your power. I haven't much choice. And as to agreeing to your terms, I don't fancy you need worry about my returning to England. A thousand a year is not easily earned nowadays. But don't think I can't guess your motive for wishing me conveniently 'dead,'" he said, with a slight sneer.

"I wish," replied Caleb J. Johnson slowly, "to relieve a good woman of such an incubus as yourself. To spare her the knowledge that you are alive to disgrace her again—to let her think that you are really as dead to the world as you are to her—and now I fancy you have the best chance in your life in which to retrieve your miserable existence by dying to all intents and purposes."

The other shrugged his shoulders cynically. "All right, I'm on the job. My wife will be able to write 'R.I.P.' over my grave in her memory from to-night."

When that night Major Frayne-Lennox, under another name, went on board a liner from the docks, the man who saw him off and returned in the tug to the shore, carried away with him a bundle, over which he kept jealous guard until the train arrived in Fenchurch Street Station, then jumping into a cab, he gave an address to the driver, and touched the bundle with an exultant laugh.

"So drops the curtain on your existence, my friend. I consider that I have done the kindest and most humane action in my life to-night—only I did not think it would be so easy. Money is a wonderful oil with which to turn round the wheels of life!"

* * * * *

"And now I have come for my answer. I have waited long for it, and you must admit, Lady Violet, that I deserve some little kindness at your hands."

Mr. Johnson held the slim white fingers of her ladyship in a close grasp, and looked steadily into her eyes. His own were rather bright, but the expression of his face was enigmatic, only his mouth smiled.

She released her hand slowly from his, and motioned him to a chair. She was trembling slightly, and her eyes were troubled.

"I am sorry, Mr. Johnson, that you were not content to accept my first answer as the inevitable," she said at last; "because it compels me to speak very plainly on a subject that I had hoped never to re-open with anyone for the rest of my life. I am not a free woman."

A curious light crept into the financier's eyes—a mingling of triumph and self-contempt.

"Don't tell me, Lady Violet," he said quickly. "I know

DYSPEPTICS.

Nervous, debilitated, half-dead people will gain new life, energy and strength from Mother Seigel's Syrup, because it does the only thing which can give permanent relief—helps you to digest your food. Food is a strength-maker and health-maker, but it must be digested. Discomfort after meals, pains in the chest and shoulders, headaches, palpitation, flatulence, loss of appetite, broken sleep, constant weariness of mind and body, these are sure signs of indigestion.

MOTHER SEIGEL'S SYRUP

The unfailing success of Mother Seigel's Syrup in curing all these weakening and distressing symptoms of imperfect digestion, lies in the power of the root and herb extracts, of which it is composed, to regulate and tone the stomach, liver and kidneys. When they are clogged with the decayed products of indigestion, it clears them of their noxious load. When weak, it gives them tone and vitality, makes them equal to their work. Then food eaten with a relish and digested as a perfect mill grinds grain, makes and keeps your body strong and healthy.

WILL CURE YOU.

"For several years, chronic dyspepsia was the curse of my life," says Mr. R. Locke, of 2 King Street, Hammersmith. "After eating, I had a feeling of fulness in the chest, a gnawing pain and weight at the stomach and an incessant aching in the shoulder blades. I had little or no appetite and was literally afraid to eat.

MOTHER SEIGEL'S SYRUP

I felt tired and lifeless, and at times my head was in a whirl with giddiness. Biliousness and constipation no doubt were the cause of this. Doctors could not cure me, and I was well nigh in despair, when a friend advised me to try Mother Seigel's Syrup. After taking two bottles my appetite improved, and I could digest what I ate. Eight bottles completed the cure, and though seven years have gone by since then I have never again had an attack of indigestion."

CURES CONSTIPATION.

Digitized by Google

all that you could ever have to tell me. I understood that relationship between yourself and—the uninvited guest at your dinner-party. I am a man of the world, and can read between the lines of Fate better than most men, and in spite of what I knew that night, I also knew that you would one day give me the answer I desired—the answer that would make you my wife and the richest woman in Society. It has come earlier than even I dared to hope."

He paused and looked at her keenly.

"Lady Violet, I cannot pretend to feel what I am going to communicate to you, because in my heart I honestly rejoice in the occasion that makes it possible for me to repeat my question."

She turned her head sharply to him, and he saw that she looked very pale.

"What do you mean?" she whispered, her voice unconsciously sinking to a murmur. "What can you have to tell me that will affect my answer to you?"

He took a swift step towards her. "Only this, Lady Violet," he said quietly, yet the blood was throbbing in his veins with the sense of victory—"you need no longer hug the chains that have for so many years fettered you to a scamp. I won't say any more—but tell you that your patience and long-suffering have been rewarded, and you are free now to choose another husband, and I am bold enough to dare hope that you may come to regard me in that light. I—I—care very much for you," he broke out passionately—"and could make you care for me."

She flung her hand out with a gesture that stopped the words on his mouth. "Tell me how you know—this! How you knew that it would be welcome news to me! Wives are generally supposed to mourn their husbands' death, you know"—she finished with a hysterical laugh.

He put his hand in his pocket, and drew out a paper.

"I will read it to you," he said quietly. "Sit down."

She obeyed him silently, then in a carefully-modulated voice Mr. Johnson read:

"While some dock labourers were at their work in the early hours of the morning, they discovered the following articles of a gentleman's wardrobe—a coat, stained with blood, and a waistcoat, together with a soft, crush hat. In one of the pockets of the coat a note-book was found, but no money or jewellery. The name written in the note-book was that of an officer in the Army, Major Richard Frayne-Lennox, who some years ago left the Service under a cloud, and was believed dead by his friends. The widow of the unfortunate man is a well-known leader in Society, and much sympathy will be felt for her; the police are already searching for the body, as they fear foul play."

"Oh, how awful—how horrible!" she gasped. "I never thought such a wretched end would be his." She started to her feet suddenly. "Mr. Johnson, I cannot play the hypocrite by attempting to feel that this is a great sorrow to me, but I am, after all, humane, and to think that that man was once my lover is a fearful shock; he must have sunk so low—so frightfully low. He was also the father of my child!"

"Your child!" he exclaimed. "I did not know you had one—is it dead?"

Her face flushed and then paled. She could have bitten off her tongue after she had spoken, but it was too late. "Yes," she said quietly, "I lost it." She turned to him with a pitiful smile. "Mr. Johnson, you will not compel me to listen to you to-night while that wretched newspaper paragraph is still ringing in my ears? Please go now—I could not listen—to-night—I want to be alone."

He took her hand in his. "I understand," he murmured, "and appreciate your reason for wishing me to go now; but you will understand that when I call again in a day or two I shall hope to be received as your future husband!"

She bowed her head. The strong overpowering personality of the Gold King made her absolutely unable to cope with his will. She was only glad of the respite—that there was yet a little time in which she could collect her thoughts and grow accustomed to the new phase of life spreading before her.

And gradually, when the nine days' wonder concerning the non-appearance of the body of the late Major Frayne-Lennox was over, Society heard with expressions of pleasure and disapproval that Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox would shortly and quietly become the wife of the well-known financier, Mr. Caleb J. Johnson of New York City.

She received a curt note from Sir Cyprian congratulating her on her conquest, but none from Marcella, either in congratulation or in reply to the letter she had written some days ago. It was unsuual for Marcella to leave a whole week without writing, and a vague sensation seized Lady Violet, in the midst of all her quiet preparations for her wedding, that something was wrong at the Court.

She wrote immediately to Sir Cyprian, warning him that should all not be well with Marcella, she would instantly go up to the Court and bring her away at all costs.

The following day a telegram arrived. She opened it fearfully, then sighed with relief. It was from Marcella, and ran:

"In bed with bad cold, don't worry—sorry unable come to town for wedding. Love.—MARCELLA."

She pressed it to her lips, and the murmured words, "My darling girl," reached the ears of the financier, who was looking at her curiously.

"You are fond of that girl," he said drily. "I shall be jealous of her soon."

She looked at him swiftly. "I love Marcella dearly," she answered softly; "almost as though she were my own child."

"More than you love Edward Day, your nephew, eh?" he said smilingly. "He is a clever young chap, and your letter of introduction to me came just when I wanted a secretary. He will be installed next week; at present he is holiday-making in the country, I believe."

"Holiday-making!" she said sharply. "I did not know. I am not very keen on him personally, but I am glad my letter procured him work."

She did not add that he was no relation to her—that he had been the child of the unfortunate woman whom she had befriended in a moment of impulsive pity. The little she had written had told enough without explaining too much. At any rate, she was glad that there would be no occasion for Marcella to meet Edward Day again.

Moved by a sudden thought she went up to her future husband and said quickly:

"Caleb, I want you to do me one great favour when—when we are married."

"You have only to command—I'll obey," he murmured, touching her hand with his lips. "What is it, Violet?"

"That you will do all you can to get Sir Cyprian to let Marcella live with us. She is unhappy, I fancy, at home—and I could be a mother to her!"

"Say, rather, a sister," he smiled—then added: "I will soon do that for you."

She looked at him gratefully. "Thank you, Caleb. You are a strange man, yet I think you really care for me."

A slow smile curved his lips. "I do care very much—I have dared a great deal to win you—my peerless bride!"

The wedding day dawned, and at an unfashionable church, at an unfashionable hour, the Society beauty and the New York millionaire were made man and wife. They had desired no publicity, and hardly anyone knew of the date of the wedding.

As the bride and bridegroom stepped out of their carriage at the station, en route for the Continent, Lady Violet's maid met her with a telegram.

"This has just come, my lady."

With a curious tightening of her heartstrings, she tore the orange-tinted envelope open. Instinctively she guessed that it contained bad news; as she read the few words on the inclosure she uttered an exclamation:

"Violet!" said the financier sharply, "is anything wrong?" Then, taking advantage of the prerogative of a husband, he looked over her shoulder, and read:

"Marcella left Court. Keep her till I arrive. Sure to go to you.—CYPRIAN RUST."

(Another long instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

PAWNBROKER'S SALE

Every article in new condition.

SUITABLE FOR PRESENTS.

A full list sent post free on application.

SAVE £ d $

13/6 Gent's magnificent 18-ct. Gold-cased Chronograph Stop Watch, jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper, 10 years' written warranty; also fashionable curb (pocket to pocket) double Albert same quality (stamped and guaranteed), with handsome seal attached; three together.

12/6 Lady's handsome 18-carat gold-cased Keyless Watch, jewelled movement; exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also fashionable long watch-guard, same quality (stamped and guaranteed) elegant West-End pattern the two together.

14/9 Furs.—Magnificent Alexandra Dagmar necklet and muff; beautiful real Russian sable hair, worth 4 guineas, not been worn; sacrifice for 14/9; approval willingly.

19/6 Genuine Italian Mandoline, by Stridente, Naples; fine tone; 21 ribbed, real rosewood, pearl and tortoiseshell inlaid, in saddler-made case; approval.

21/- Fine Old Violin, by Pietro Antorious; magnificent rich solo tone; in perfect condition, with fully mounted bow and case; approval.

10/6 Lustrous diamond and ruby Half-hoop Ring, set with 5 matchless doublet rubies and 8 real diamonds; solid gold, hall-marked.

7/6 Curb Chain Bracelet, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case.

6/9 Brooch; very handsome 18-carat rolled gold, 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls in case.

21/- Lady's solid gold Keyless Watch, jewelled in 10 rubies, beautifully engraved case, splendid time-keeper; 10 years' written warranty; week's free trial.

8/6 Fashionable Long Neck-chain; genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished; very choice design.

9/6 Organ Toned Melodeon; magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, and 4 acting stops, including Tremolo and Diapason action; rich powerful tone, perfect order.

9/6 Necklet with Heart Pendant, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern; heart set with pearls and turquoise.

12/6 Magnificent 5-row Pearl Collarette; finest quality, mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case.

Any of the above articles sent on approval willingly.

R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller,
284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

PART 1. READY JANUARY 26.

Ask Your Newsagent

to let you see a copy of PART 1. of

PEARSON'S

HOME MANAGEMENT

Edited by ISOBEL of "HOME NOTES."

To be issued in TWELVE FORTNIGHTLY parts.

Price 7d. net each.

This work is the most thoroughly up-to-date and exhaustive work on HOUSEHOLD MANAGEMENT ever published, and contains 12 Beautiful coloured illustrations, upwards of 64 full-page Illustrations, together with a very large number of Cuts in the Text.

The parts may be obtained at all Railway Bookstalls, Booksellers and Newsagents, or of

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD.,
17, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Secrets of Youth.

How to have a beautiful face and figure. How to have beautiful eyes and hair. How to curl the hair naturally without curling pins or tongs. Little people can be made tall. Noses that are red or ugly shape can be cured, and looks greatly improved.

This Pretty Book will be sent FREE. Ask for "BEAUTY'S BOUDOIR." Stamp must be sent for postage. Peralia Perfumery Co. (Dept. 14) 73 Camden Street, North Shields, Eng.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½% repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1¾d. tins everywhere.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

To Asthma Sufferers.

Instant relief is gained in all cases of Asthma, Bronchitis, Croup, and Whooping Cough, by the use of POTTER'S ASTHMA CURE. Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists in Tins at 1/-. Test it free of charge. Send post-card to POTTER & CLARKE, Wholesale Druggists, Artillery Lane, London, E., for Free Sample Kindly mention this paper.

Page Woodcock's Pills

50 years' increasing British reputation has proved them to be the safe, sure and speedy remedy for Wind on the Stomach, Indigestion, Biliousness, Sick Headache, Palpitation, Depression, Nervousness, Languor, &c. Sold by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ & 2/9, or post free for price from Page Woodcock, Ltd., 14 and 16, Euston Buildings, N.W. (late of Lincoln).

SMITH'S

SULPHOLINE LOTION

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

PIANO PLAYING BY EAR.

The "Harmonic Indicator" enables any one ignorant of music to play beautifully by ear and VAMP to songs, &c., in any key. No figures nor notes to learn. Fits any Piano or Organ. Post paid, 2/-. C. E. ARTHUR, 21 Robert St., London, N.W.

Ask your grocer for

EPPS'S

(The most nutritious)

COCOA

And take no other.

FREE TO YOU.

To advertise S.L.S. Records we are giving away our noted Phonographs for a limited time. Absolutely not a penny to pay for one. Write, giving full address and nearest railway station; enclose stamp. Mention this paper.

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128 CITY ROAD, LONDON.

TO CURE DRUNKARDS

without their knowledge, send stamp for FREE TRIAL PACKAGE of a wonderful remedy that has saved homes. Send no money. Address in confidence. WARD CHEMICAL CO., 51 Century House, Regent Street, London, W.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Country Men v. Town Men.

"ETHEL" wants to know if a country girl is not more precluded from the chances of meeting eligible suitors than a town girl? No, "ETHEL," do not be despondent. Your case appears very much worse than it is. Living in the country is not necessarily prejudicial to a girl's meeting eligible suitors. In fact, I think the reverse is the case. You will find that the proportion of old maids in the country is less than in towns. Sooner or later the right man turns up, so don't be worried. Perhaps you do not meet so many men as a London girl, but perhaps you are all the better for that. Meeting a lot of men does not necessarily lead to marriage.

* * * * *

I myself know a family of three girls who have all their lives lived in the remotest country districts. Now all are well and happily married. Had they lived in town they might have had many flirtations and become experts at that pastime, but is it not better to meet few men and true, than many and unreliable? In the case of my friends, visits from men were few and far between, yet, somehow or other, when they did appear, they turned out to be, from a girl's point of view, worth a dozen of the town butterflies a London girl encounters.

The Best Time to Marry.

"WHICH is the best time to marry?" asks "ENA."—Whenever things seems opportune, my dear "ENA." Few girls are inclined to sit down and ask themselves this question in cold blood. I should imagine that you are not engaged, or, if so, you have entered into the thing in a very philosophical spirit. Generally speaking, early Spring is the best. Then you have all the external joys of Nature to accompany your realisation of love's dream, with all the outdoor recreations to share with each other, such as cycling, walking, driving, boating. The possibilities of any disturbance of that dream are less than if accompanied by the cold and damp of winter. And we all know how important it is to get over the early stages of marriage without a "tiff."

* * * * *

When winter comes, you will have accustomed yourselves to each other, and will take to fireside pleasures and winter enjoyments and responsibilities as a natural sequence and pleasant variance. But a marriage in winter, when all is drear and dark, when fog chokes one, when microbes are getting active, and household expenses and bothers are greater than in summer, may be the prelude to ill-temper, and perhaps divergence which joyous Spring drives away. So if your man did really pop the question under the mistletoe a week or so back, and you have an interest in this question, I advise you to wait till Easter, when the new year will be old and pleasant enough to beam on you.

A Love that has Endured.

"DARBY and JOAN" write me a joint letter, and this is what they say: "We are the happiest couple alive, and yet both of us are dreading the hour when one shall be called to rest, and so leave the other alone. We are eighty-three years old." I can quite understand your feeling anxious, "DARBY and JOAN," but you say you are the happiest couple alive, and surely this is something to be very thankful for. When the call comes I am sure the one left will have hope and faith enough to feel that the other is waiting with hands outstretched in welcome. So try to forget all but this. Life is so short that it should be happy, and, if possible, free from care.

Love and Jealousy.

"F. H. T." says: "I like two girls, one in England and one in America; the one in England is very jealous even if I kiss her married sister, and I have had a quarrel with her. The American never quarrels with me, is not jealous, and loves me more. Which one shall I be engaged to?" From what you tell me, "F.H. T." I should certainly advise you to get engaged to the American girl, but, at the same time, remember being jealous shows that the English girl loves you too. America is a long way off, but a girl who is not jealous is seldom met with, so I think you would be happiest with her. Jealousy is the ruin of many a happy home.

An Errant Lover.

I VERY much sympathise with "MADGE," but I fear that as her lover visits the other girl so constantly, and is so reserved about it, it rather suggests that his affection for you has waned. One can generally tell this when told that anyone's love for you is "just the same." Those words have an ominous ring, and generally mean, that while he still thinks you are a most charming and attractive girl, there is somebody else who—well, with whom he is in love. I should advise you to take no further steps in the matter, beyond telling him that while he continued these visits, all must be regarded as over between you. If he really loves you, that will soon bring him to his senses, and if, after all, he is merely flirting with the other girl, as is very likely the case, he will soon drop it.

Two Suitors.

"GRETA" is in a puzzling position about two gentleman friends. She met them both at a party, and both seemed to take a fancy to her. After the meeting they called in turn, but neither knew the other was smitten. "GRETA" likes them exactly equally, and cannot choose between them. One is rather a frivolous young man, who talks a lot, and is very agreeable. The other is much more serious, and steady. Would it be wrong for "GRETA" to receive the attentions of both of them for awhile until she makes up her mind?

* * * * *

I can see complications ahead, "GRETA," if you do so, though I can quite understand you do not want to make up your mind on so delicate a matter until you have seen more of them both. After all, I suppose you are not called upon to fall in love with either just because they pay you attentions. A girl can always reserve the right to have what friends she likes until things have reached the engagement stage. Wait until one or the other of them says or does something definite, then give him the answer you feel you ought to give. If you don't like him enough, have the courage to tell him so.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

The 5 MINUTES PAIN CURE FREE.

THE WIFE OF THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF writes: "Countess Roberts will thank the Lineel Co. to send her another bottle of Lineel Liniment, which is most excellent. She encloses 2/9."

LINEEL LINIMENT

Cures RHEUMATISM	in 5 minutes	Cures TIC	in 5 minutes
Cures NEURALGIA	in 5 minutes	Cures SPRAINS	in 5 minutes
Cures LUMBAGO	in 5 minutes	Cures BRUISES	in 5 minutes
Cures SCIATICA	in 5 minutes	Cures CRAMP	in 5 minutes
Cures GOUT	in 5 minutes	Cures STIFFNESS	in 5 minutes
Cures HEADACHE	in 5 minutes	Cures RHEUMATIC DEAFNESS	in 5 minutes
Cures FACEACHE	in 5 minutes
Cures TOOTHACHE	in 5 minutes	Cures ALL NEUROTIC And MUSCULAR PAINS	in 5 minute
Cures EARACHE	in 5 minutes

Cures COLDS and COUGHS in three or four applications to throat and chest.

LINEEL LINIMENT

Nearly 200,000 Free Bottles of LINEEL LINIMENT have been sent out within the last month, in response to as many letters, which can be seen at the Company's Offices. And in no single instance that has come to our knowledge has it been known to fail in absolutely curing pain in five minutes.

YOU ARE NOT ASKED TO BUY

Simply send a penny stamp for postage, mentioning this paper, and a Free Bottle will be sent by return post. Every day we receive extraordinary and grateful letters, testifying to the efficacy of LINEEL LINIMENT in curing pain. It would cost a lot of money to publish all these, and it is much more convincing and satisfactory to send you a free bottle, so that you may test it yourself.

Sold at all Branches of Boots' Cash Chemists, and by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ and 2/9 per bottle.

LINEEL PILLS Are the best remedy known to Medical Science for INDIGESTION, CONSTIPATION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, and BAD COMPLEXION.

Sold at all Branches of Boots' Cash Chemists and by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ and 2/9 per box.

WRITE FOR MEDICAL LEAFLET

The LINEEL CO. LTD., 16 Bevis Marks, London, E.C.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache and Neuralgia.

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Kaputine is not a single crude drug such as has been condemned as dangerous by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients, having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The SAFE Remedy.

Kaputine is the only preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and infirmaries. Proof positive of its superior and sterling qualities.

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1½; Samples 1d. each.

Kindly mention this paper.

Asthma

Lung Diseases, Blood Spitting

I CLAIM TO HOLD THE WORLD'S RECORD

For the

ABSOLUTE LASTING CURE

OF ASTHMA, Chronic Bronchitis, Consumption and BLOOD SPITTING, Emphysema, & all other Lung Diseases

If you suffer from either of these complaints write to me at once, and I will send you, Free of Charge, and under cover, my new illustrated work, which will more than substantiate my claim to hold the World's Record for effecting LASTING CURES, as opposed absolutely to all forms of temporary or so-called relieving remedies. My treatment is the result of 25 years' continuous investigation and minute research, and embodies the experience consequent upon its application to nearly 90,000 cases, and can be carried out at home WITHOUT INTERFERENCE WITH DAILY OCCUPATION.

This is an Extract from one of Thousands of Testimonials I possess:

"I have been a sufferer from Bronchial Asthma six years. If I exerted myself in the least I became short of breath; and wheezed so that I could be heard all over the house. I began to spit blood; could not rest day or night. Sometimes I spent the night pacing the bedroom floor, sitting at the window, and propping myself erect with pillows. Since I went in for your treatment I am pleased to say I feel as well as ever I did.

"Ruddington. "(Miss) A. VINCENT.

(Full address on application.)

£1,000 I will forfeit this sum to any Charitable Institution if this testimonial is not genuine. Write to me at once and I will send you full particulars, and tell you free of charge if I think a cure can be effected or not.

The Weldhaas Hygienic Institute, No. 80, Burgess Hill, nr. Brighton.

Curable

Digitized by Google

Sixty Years Ago-and Now.

"What's rank, or title, station, state, or wealth,
To that far greater worldly blessing, health?
What's house, or land, or dress, or wine, or meat,
If one can't rest for pain—nor sleep—nor eat—
Nor go about in comfort? Here's the question,
What's all the world without a good digestion?"

The above lines are culled from the "Poet's Corner" of a journal of some sixty years ago. It was about the same period that BEECHAM'S PILLS started upon their long and prosperous career, and it is possible that the poet had not then tried the merits of that most excellent remedy. That he did so later is more than probable. If so, he may still be in the land of the living, hale and hearty. For nothing is more conducive to a long and happy life than a sound state of the digestive organs.

It is indeed, better to have a good stomach than a patent of nobility—to possess a healthy liver than unbounded wealth—to sleep soundly and rise in the morning "as fresh as paint," than to occupy an exalted position in society.

Fortunately there is not much occasion, nowadays, for anyone, rich or poor, to go about subject to the terrors of indigestion. A bad digestion may be cured, a weak one strengthened, and a good one confirmed.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

are, in fact, the recognised remedy for all forms of dyspepsia, a disease far-reaching and distressing enough, which generally arises from complicated irregularities of the stomach, liver and kidneys.

By their specific action on these organs, BEECHAM'S PILLS re-establish healthy digestion, purify the blood, eliminate uric acid, and act as a fine tonic upon the nervous system. There is certainly no other medicine before the public which combines so many life-giving properties as BEECHAM'S PILLS.

This Wonderful Medicine is specially suitable for Females of all ages. Every woman who values health should read the instructions wrapped round each box.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1s. 1½d. (56 pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 Pills).

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 786. Week Ending January 23, 1904. Price One Penny.

She crept stealthily into the room, and with the candle set fire to the curtains of the bed wherein Malcolm lay.

(A Dramatic Incident from the Story, "The Woman with Dark Hair." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE

The purest and most efficient Remedy procurable for
COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, CATARRH, WEAK LUNGS, and CHILDREN'S COUGHS.

BRONCHITIS AND ASTHMA

Veno's Lightning Cough Cure

Produces its most brilliant effect in Chronic Bronchitis and Asthma. It effects astonishing cures in the worst and most persistent cases.

Rev. W. W. TULLOCH, D.D., Bonar Bridge, Sutherlandshire, writes: "July 22nd, '03.—I have been a martyr to asthma all my life and lately to chronic winter bronchitis. I have found Veno's Lightning Cough Cure a valuable medicine"

CHILDREN'S COUGHS

Mrs. ADA S. BALLIN, 5, Agar Street, London, Editor "Womanhood," and a great authority upon children's diseases, writes:—"Veno's Lightning Cough Cure is an exceedingly successful remedy; it is very pleasant to take and the relief it gives is very rapid. The preparation is perfectly safe for children."

W. LASCELLES-SCOTT, F.R.M.S., in his Certificate of Analysis among other things says:—"I have pleasure in certifying that in my opinion VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH COUGH is an exceptionally pure, safe, and effective preparation

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES 9½d. Regular Sizes, 1/1½ and 2/9.

Ask for VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE at Chemists and Drug Stores, or post free from the VENO DRUG CO., Hulme, Manchester, England.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache and Neuralgia.

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Kaputine is not a single crude drug such as has been condemned as dangerous by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients, having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The SAFE Remedy.

Kaputine is the only preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and infirmaries. Proof positive of its superior and sterling qualities.

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1½; Samples 1d. each.

Kindly mention this paper.

J. G. GRAVES'

J. G. Graves' Handsome Watch Catalogue, showing hundreds of designs, is sent Post Free. Ask for No. 1 Catalogue.

WATCHES

THE 'EXPRESS' (Reg.) English Lever, 50/-

BRITISH Manufacture throughout.

Keyless or Keywinding, is the finest value ever produced. Sent on receipt of a deposit of 5/- and your promise to complete the purchase in nine more monthly instalments of 5/-

Important Advantages offered to Cash Purchasers.

AGENTS WANTED. WRITE FOR TERMS.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., Sheffield.

Home Rupture Cure.

Marvellous Blessing to Those who are Ruptured. Proofs so Positive and From Such Reliable Sources as to be Free From All Doubt.

Dr. W. S. Rice (Dept. 431), 8 and 9, Stonecutter Street, London, E.C., has the distinction of perfectly curing even the most difficult ruptures of long standing. He does this without causing the patient one bit of pain, absolutely without danger and without the loss of a moment's time from work. He does not use the knife, and sends his method and treatment direct to the sufferer's home, where it can be used without assistance, and brings immediate relief. Dr. Rice has cured hundreds of old men who have been ruptured 30 and 40 years. Never before have such letters of testimony been received as Dr. Rice receives every day. Mr. James Cole, 13, Holdick Street, Midland Road, Peterborough, was cured at the age of 66 years. He writes Dr. Rice as follows:—"I had a bad rupture, and when I saw your method of cure advertised I was rather doubtful as to permanent cure; but I am thankful I tried it, for I do not feel anything of the rupture now. It was just the treatment I required to effect a cure." It will pay anyone who is ruptured to write to Dr. Rice for a sample of his method, which will be sent free by return of post. Investigate fully his method of cure. Do this at once. Don't delay in a matter of such importance. Write to-day. Thousands of cases cured.

MR. JAS. COLE. From a Photo.

GIVEN AWAY

with this Week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 523)

A PAPER PATTERN of this

CHILD'S WINTER COAT.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

BODLEIAN LIBRARY 20 JAN 1904

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

No. 786.] [One Penny.

Week Ending January 23rd, 1904.

The Woman with Dark Hair.

Containing the Incident depicted on the cover.

A Fascinating Tale of a Terrible Deed.

Malcolm Strong was sitting on a seat on the Brighton front, and also, a little to his right, sat Hilda Sladen, playing with a half-read book.

When Malcolm glanced up, quite idly, he did not know, of course, that Hilda Sladen had been looking at him for some time, and had decided that he was certainly an ugly man, but with something of a chin. But he looked up; he could have sworn that, for a second, their eyes met; then she was at her book again so quickly that he could not be certain whether she had noticed him. Yet he had seen her eyes—dark eyes, and she had dark hair.

Presently she closed the book and got up from the covered seat. She began to walk slowly westward.

But in a few minutes Malcolm Strong went westward, too. He was a lonely, struggling artist, dependent on his work, which up to now had been a dependence rather frail.

Soon Malcolm passed the girl who had attracted his attention, and he slipped into a tobacconist's shop to buy some cigarettes. When he came out she was standing just outside, talking to a gentleman. It was Frank Duncan, an old friend of Strong's.

The former saw the artist and stepped forward to greet him, saying:

"Why, how do you do, Strong? Haven't seen you for an age! Let me introduce you to my cousin, Miss Sladen."

After about half an hour had elapsed, which time they had spent in strolling along the esplanade, Duncan announced that he had an urgent engagement to attend to.

Hence Malcolm Strong and Hilda Sladen, who had been so opportunely brought together, were left to themselves.

They sat down, and in five minutes Hilda Sladen thought that she might have known him all her life.

She was at Brighton for a month, on a visit to some friends with her mother. Very often a girl is lonely with her mother. They talked of books, of plays and of players that they knew. When he left her, he was to meet her that evening at seven o'clock.

Hilda Sladen was not often with her mother during the afternoons and evenings of the next three weeks. Malcolm lent her good books for herself to read, and books of wild excitement and great improbability for her mother, which reading the latter loved. He took her to Lewes to see the white monument on the hills which marks where martyrs were burnt, who cried bravely for their faith in their last hour; he told her of them that had died there.

"I love everybody who has suffered," cried she.

"Why, so do I," said Malcolm. "It's the one creed worth having."

Down the steep road to the station she was silent. But while they waited on an empty platform for the train she said:

"I'll be back in London this time to-morrow. And—in a week you'll have forgotten me."

"I seldom forget friends," said Malcolm. "I might have said the same thing to you."

"It would not be true as far as I am concerned," said Hilda Sladen.

He stopped. "I was very downhearted the day I met you," he said. "Such trying—and such failure. I was beginning to think that I had better throw away my tools."

"Never do that. You may be great and glorious some day." This was a phrase she had used before.

"I'm not so certain about that," he laughed. "But you've bucked me up tremendously. New ideas, my own ideas all sharpened, and new thoughts. It's three weeks ago, isn't it? Three weeks—I feel as if I had known you for years!"

"Do you know," she said, "I felt like that the third time I saw you, when we went right east to where the cliffs start."

"Yes," said Malcolm, "we've hit it off well together. It's been a splendid time. We've been good friends."

She turned and looked at Malcolm. They were in a secluded part. Her lips were half parted. Suddenly her arms were round him:

"I don't give kisses like that for 'friendship'!" said the woman with dark hair.

"You're very good," said Malcolm. "I didn't know; you make me proud." He put his hands upon her shoulders. "I've never told a woman lies. I'm sorry—but I can't give you as much as you give me."

"I'd better not see you again," said Hilda Sladen. "It's not your fault at all. It's mine—I'm stupid! You see, I thought I was proof against these things. I had better not see you any more," she repeated. She paused, and added: "But I can't stand being lonely." A woman's cry.

"It's as you please," said Malcolm gently.

"Do you want it to end now?" she asked him fiercely.

Digitized by Google

He shook his head.

"You are so different. You're sure you don't want it to end—you're sure you're not tired of me yet?"

"Quite sure."

"I must see you now and then." For he had told her he was going to London. "I'll be so good; I won't worry you. And you will forgive me, won't you, for being so stupid?"

"Forgive you!" cried Malcolm, a very humble man.

"And you'll let me know the day you're coming to London? I want to see you the first evening you're there. If you'll only be patient with your work, I know you'll get on. I want to see you succeed. You will write and tell me, won't you? Don't disappoint me."

He did not answer for a minute.

"Don't write if you're tired of me already," she cried, and her eyes had changed.

"You might get tired first," said Malcolm, smiling. "I'm a very ordinary kind of man."

"You don't understand me yet."

"I'll write," he said.

He would have given half his life for the power to paint her eyes as they were when they had changed.

Malcolm went to London, to begin a stern campaign with editors, and he met her at a post office in the Strand.

They walked over Westminster Bridge, and he saw her into a tram for Brixton, where she lived. The next day he started on his fight, and he tramped six weeks from office to office before he sold a single drawing.

But it was a good drawing, and the honest approbation of the editor who bought it paid for that six weeks' worry. When it appeared many people looked in the corner for the signature, and said: "A new man."

When he told Hilda Sladen, she was more pleased even than himself. "I told you so," she said.

"Don't say 'great and glorious' again," said Malcolm, "because it makes me feel so small."

At another time he said to her: "When are you going to begin to hate me?"

She looked at him surprised.

"Sometimes, you know," said Malcolm, "your eyes change—oh, often your eyes change—and then they're fine; but it's then that you hate me!"

"Don't talk like that," said she.

"Why not? I should never be afraid of your hate."

"Why will you say such horrid things? There's one thing I want you to promise me. If another woman ever comes for you, and you feel—at last—I want you to let me know. I couldn't stand that—unless I knew at once. You've got that tiny gold cross I gave you?"

Malcolm nodded. It was the one present that had passed between them.

"If that ever happens—directly it happens—promise that you'll send me the gold cross. Promise!"

"It's a promise," said he.

"Then I shall know," said Hilda Sladen. "Don't write a word, don't put a date. Just send the cross, in one of those grey envelopes you use."

Malcolm began to get commissions and to sell his work. His own work, too; the style he wanted to do; and his joy was greater than words. He went for one paper to do a series of sketches of the pottery districts, the country and the people around Hanley. When he came back a regular berth was offered him.

This provided his living money. Further, he had an idea for one big picture that had long been in his mind. A picture of few colours, black and orange and grey. No hack work about this; it was to be his own creation.

With a friend he rented a cottage at Ditchling, in Sussex, and went down there to fight with the picture. He thanked Hilda Sladen for the way she had encouraged him. Her heart leapt at the success he had made; for long she could not speak, but then she murmured again of the gold cross.

And she said: "Is it the cottage that you showed me once, when we walked over the hills from Lewes? You said then that you would like to work there. There was a fine light."

"That's the cottage," said Malcolm. "I can't thank you enough for the way you've helped me. Good-bye."

* * * * *

For long weeks Malcolm struggled with his picture in the little cottage at the foot of the quiet hills. Often he was lonely there, because Derriel, his friend, was often called away to London. Slowly the picture grew.

He longed to get it done, to go out one morning and shout to the hills, "This is my work!"

The other woman comes into the story in the manner of a melodrama. One day Malcolm could not work. He went out and climbed the rough road over the Beacon; he reached the yielding earth on the top, and he was striking away from the line of the telegraph-posts when a speck came flying towards him from High Park Corner.

It was a girl on a horse with head down, furiously bolting. Great wedges of soft turf flew up from the horse's hoofs, and the horse was heading straight for the steep, zig-zag road down the Beacon.

She was nearer now. She had lost her hat; she had fair hair and a white face, and her lips were close shut. If she had lost her hat, her nerve was still her own; for she sat back resolute, tugging the useless reins, her eyes a real flame.

She sat back there with the pluck of all the world, a matter of seconds how long she could keep her seat. Certainly she could not keep her seat at that pace down the hill. And once off the turf, too, on the hard road, her horse must jar and stumble.

Malcolm cried out in himself with admiration for her pluck and the way she rode. And as she was almost on top of him, he took what seemed a hopeless chance—he leapt forward, forward and with a clear mind; from the first impact he had a bruise on his shoulder that lasted for weeks; his tense pull wrenched the animal's head round with such a jerk that the girl was nearly unseated. He was dragged forward; he dug futile heels in the turf, and was, of course, swept on again. Again he dug his heels in the ground; the resistance lessened, he was dragged on again, but cried to her: "Stick on!"

His body was like fire; from the sharp, intolerable pain there might have been the weight of all Sussex on his arm; but he stuck grimly to it.

And presently he was lifting her from the saddle. Then his right arm, that now he could not feel, dropped to his side. His face was whiter than her own; the blood ran from his lips where he had bitten them in his struggle; she stood breathless and panting, and said:

"That was magnificent!"

"If you had lost your head I could have done nothing. What was the matter with your horse?"

He was holding the bridle by the left hand, and now the horse was blown and quiet.

"I don't know," she said. "I came out alone. He was very fresh this morning. Back there, I think there was a piece of paper fluttering on the road, and then he was off."

"You feel all right?"

"Splendid!" she laughed. "Now that it is over."

Malcolm's heart was big at her wonderful pluck. But, still holding her horse, he stooped down and touched a blood-stained spur.

"It was that more than the paper, I'll be bound," said he. "What do you want a spur for with a horse like yours? He was frightened at the paper, but he bolted at the spur which you did not know you were using so. Here's his side all marked. And every time you touched him with it he wanted to bolt the more."

"How beautifully you lecture."

"It's a lecture you ought to have," he retorted, and now they were smiling at one another. "It's all right, as it happened—and you ride very well, but there's no one can ride well enough to take the Beacon at a gallop."

"You're quite right, but I've not asked you if you are hurt."

"My arm's nearly pulled out," said Malcolm. "That's all."

"I'm so sorry."

"It's lucky I was about," said he.

Digitized by Google

"I'm not going to ride any more this morning. I shall walk back home."

He waited. His eyes said: "Where's home."

Reading the question, she said: "It's not far—not very far—that is. Just at the beginning of the Common."

"The big white house?"

She nodded.

He brought the reins forward over the horse's head, looped his uninjured arm through them, and they went back to the big house together. On the way they passed his own little cottage; he told her of himself and his work.

"May I come in some day," said she, "and look at the picture?"

"Certainly," said Malcolm. "When it is finished."

Her name was Betty Ingram, and she lived in the white house with her father, a kindly, middle-aged man, retired five years ago from Indian woods and forests.

"It was nothing," Malcolm said to him.

"It was a great deal," said Mr. Ingram, and looked at his daughter, who had explained things. The colour was in her face again.

That day Malcolm found he could not work on the picture at all. Indeed, the total of his day's work was five sketches of Miss Betty Ingram. Betty Ingram on horseback, Betty Ingram as she had stood talking to her father, study of a face with fair hair (Betty Ingram's face), and so on.

When he had done these sketches, he looked at them carefully, swore to himself, and deliberately tore them up.

Two months afterwards he sent to Hilda Sladen in London the gold cross.

But no word came from her in reply.

* * * *

Winter came upon the Sussex hills, but could not rob them of their green, and gave a wonderful rich brown to the turned earth. Winter and dark nights, and damp and cold, but Malcolm, the picture done (and he knew that it was good), said that it was good to be alive.

He was a man worth notice in the papers now. The struggling was behind. And the papers gave a paragraph to his engagement, and another, later, to his marriage, which was to be at an early date.

It was on the last day of the old year that the dark-haired woman came by a slow train from London and left it at Hassocks.

I do not know that she had any set purpose in her mind. She came really against her will; she had been near Victoria since the early afternoon, irresolute, despising herself because she had repeated to herself over and over again that she must see him for the last time. Only this purpose then; how could she let him go for ever without seeing him once more?

"He might have written," she said. But then she remembered that she had not written after he had sent the cross, and by that he might have thought she had not wished to hear from him.

She knew the way to the cottage. She learnt that Malcolm was there by himself. When at last she reached it, it was late, and the cottage was black and lonely, no lights showing from its windows. He was asleep, then. Could she not just see him without his knowing, and then go? What could be wrong in that—was it not her right, who had loved him first?

Malcolm had found no need for security of the cottage with the four rooms, and the two rooms knocked into one, which made his studio. Hilda Sladen found her way in through an unlatched window.

She stumbled against a little table in the dwarf passage from the door, and waited breathless, fearful of any movement to tell her she had been heard. Then she struck a match, and found a candlestick on the table. With that in her hand, she went cautiously upstairs.

The little house was full of ghosts as she went, stair by creaking stair. She longed to cry out, to wake the house, to bring turmoil upon the awful darkness that pressed upon her, upon the more awful lights that the candle sent dancing up the walls. And she knew that control had gone from her; she knew that she must see him; she did not care for anything, because she knew that she was mad.

His room was unlocked. Carefully she crept in, holding the candle to throw the light between the curtains, and stood long looking down upon him who lay sleeping there.

Malcolm slept on his side, not stirring. For a long time she waited there, scarcely breathing, dry-eyed and terrible.

She left the room at last, and went as carefully down the stairs. And she was at the foot of the stairs when a thought came to her and shook her, and she whispered it in her madness to the walls. Her mood changed; the thought came like a storm and gripped her, and would not let her be—this thought to end all, perhaps for her as well, but certainly for him.

"When will you begin to hate me?" he had said to her long ago. And the hate, the sweeping hate that was not really of her own will, came to her now, in a lonely house of terror, while the old year died.

She took off her hat and coat, and put them on the table, and went upstairs again. He slept still. She stood shaking now, altogether uncontrolled, a child of rage.

She held up the candle and set fire to the curtains of the bed. The flame ran along the beaded fringe, caught and then stopped, caught again in earnest, and then the curtains flamed fairly to the ceiling. Now she stumbled out and down the stairs, heedless of noise, but could get no further than the door, which she had opened.

Her coat was on somehow, but all power to move had gone from her, as she stood and gripped the table in the passage with bloodless hands.

Suddenly Malcolm woke. He was aroused either through that noise on the stairs or through the smoke with which his room was quickly filling. He tore the curtains down. They ripped from their rings upon the wide rod overhead, and lay, a blazing heap, upon the floor. He leapt across the room for the water jug, emptied it over them, and trampled out the dull red. Nothing else had caught.

Wondering, but only half-awake, he slipped into his things. When he had dressed, he looked about for reasons, and then was conscious of the bitter draught that came up the stairs into his room. And there was another light beside his own, which he had been too stupid to notice. It came from the candle upon the table in the passage.

And in the passage he came upon the woman with dark hair. "You know me at my worst," she cried "Don't say anything, don't speak; I set fire to your room. Now. I'm glad you're safe. For I tried to go upstairs to put it out but I could not move."

He could not speak.

"But when I lit your curtains I meant to kill you. Don't be afraid I shall trouble you any more. I'm wicked, I'm bad. There's the gold cross. Just take it back for memory—you will take it back, won't you?—it's the last you'll hear of me. I think it's in my blood to be bad. I'm going before a priest. Good-bye!"

She went through the open door, on to the winter road. And the little gold cross shone in the candle-light.

But Malcolm went back to his room and dressed, and waited for the light. It was past seven o'clock when the grey broke into the beginning of the day.

He took a stick and went out towards Ditchling Common. Suddenly there was a flutter of a dress at the iron gates, and a girl came from the big white house towards him. It was Betty Ingram.

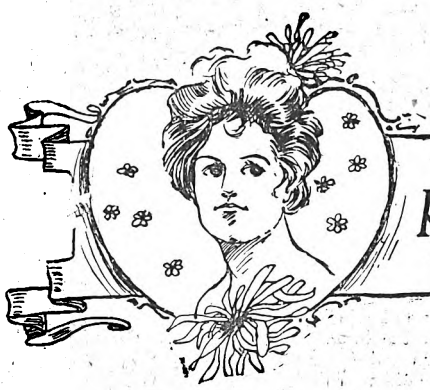
"Oh," she cried, when she saw him. "I've been awake a long time. I couldn't sleep—I've dreamt such dreams about you. All sorts of dreadful things were happening. You don't know how glad I am to see you."

"I'm as glad to see you. I couldn't sleep either. How strange a coincidence!" said Malcolm, and took her in his arms.

But he never thought fit to tell her of how the dark-haired woman came to him that night. So the story is written here—a story of two women who loved.

Herbert Shaw.

Digitized by Google



A Paragon of Perfection.

Being the Tale of an Idol Whose Feet Were of Clay.

"I DON'T like your paragon," said Winnie's father; "he is too perfect!"

And when Mr. Bradley said a thing he said it decisively, as much as to say that he meant it.

Winnie bent her pretty face a little more over her sewing—perhaps to hide a blush, perhaps not. Her father lit his pipe, which had gone out while he had been making the long speech of which the above words formed the conclusion.

"But everyone says he's good-looking and clever," ventured Winnie, without looking up from her work.

"A band-box dandy!" exclaimed her father with emphasis. "I don't care what everybody says of him; I've told you what I think."

Anyone but Winnie would have thought him angry, but Winnie knew her "dad" too well. She dropped her sewing, and, crossing over to the big chair in which he sat, she put her pretty cheek to his, and one arm about his neck.

"But I like him," she murmured, in the most winning of voices, and with the least accent in the world upon the personal pronoun. Mr. Bradley laughed and kissed the soft cheek that was so temptingly near him.

"You little witch," he said, "wheedling round your poor, simple, old dad once more!"

Winnie Bradley laughed, a little, soft, happy laugh, like the music of a brook in summer.

"Oh!" she whispered; "say 'yes,' dear daddy!"

And that was how "daddy" consented to his daughter's engagement—with the condition that a whole year was to elapse before marriage was even to be mentioned with Algernon Tempest, whom all Deephurst regarded as "a paragon of perfection."

How and in what fashion Mr. Algernon Tempest had acquired the honour of this appellation must be described.

He was handsome, though in a somewhat effeminate way.

His moustache was small, but elegantly trimmed and curled. He dressed to perfection. He could sing a little, play a little, do a hundred little things passably well. Nature had given him a fine pair of eyes and the knowledge of how to make use of them; a well-set-up figure, curly hair, and a blandness of manner which women took for civility and men for servility. And to conclude with, as if all these distinct advantages were not sufficient, he possessed an easy berth and a fair income.

"Such a man ought not to be lucky in love," said Deephurst society. But, strange to say, Algernon Tempest had come, had seen, and had conquered the heart of the prettiest girl in the place! Of a truth, it did not seem quite fair, but it was the fact all the same.

Winnie Bradley, only daughter of John Bradley, of Bradleys' mill, and the cynosure of all the young men's eyes, the desire of all their hearts, for miles around, had been captivated by the newcomer, and—well, hence the "yes" reluctantly wrung from daddy's lips.

And Winnie loved him. She thought him perfect, as most girls think their first lover. For Ronald, as she called him, at his request—he did not care for his first name, he said—was her very first lover, if not her first admirer.

But not one of her admirers had ever gone so far as to be constituted anything like a lover. No wonder Winnie's face flushed, and her heart beat and trembled, when Ronald told her that he loved her. Foolish little heart! Then he had laid his suit before John Bradley, and honest John Bradley, though he felt he for some unknown reason despised and had a kind of contempt for him, had said nothing of it, and had told him he would talk it over with Winnie. It must be said that Winnie's lover had pleaded his cause well—almost eloquently. That was another of his gifts. But the engagement was to be only a conditional one.

Winnie stole away from her father's side with a glance at the clock, after that "yes" had been spoken. In an hour she would meet her lover, at their usual trysting-place, the wooden bridge that crossed the millstream.

"What will Ted say?" said Mr. Bradley suddenly. Winnie started.

"I had forgotten him," she said.

"I hadn't," said Mr. Bradley drily.

There was a silence. What would Ted Warrender say indeed, Winnie was thinking. Her bright face suddenly went serious. He would say a good deal, and that not of a pleasant kind. Not that Winnie had ever thought of him as a lover, nor had she given him any encouragement. But she knew he loved her. So did her father know it as well. Poor Ted! There was a blow in store for him when he came home.

Ted Warrender was the son of John Bradley's greatest friend, and when Richard Warrender died, leaving a boy of nine alone in the world, John Bradley adopted him. Winnie, then a curly-haired mite of three, tyrannised over him, teased him, played games with him, wandered about Deephurst woods, gathering wild flowers with him. When seven years later he left school and went to China, Ted left his little playmate a shy little maiden of ten. He came home twice during the next ten years, the second time to find her a beautiful girl of eighteen. And he went back to China for the third and last time with her sweet face engraved on his heart for ever. And now he was coming home for good to settle down in England; and Winnie had forgotten him. And she wondered—even hoped that he had—if he had forgotten her.

What would he say, indeed! He had never seen, probably never heard of Mr. Algernon Tempest. How would his dainty ways, his affected little mannerisms, strike him, was what was in Mr. Bradley's thoughts. Grimly he imagined that they would not appeal favourably to the stronger natured man who had seen the world. And John Bradley almost chuckled when he thought of their meeting.

But Winnie? Her thoughts were very different indeed. She pictured sturdy Ted Warrender lost in admiration of her lover's handsome face and personal charms. So strangely does love blind us all!

Winnie met her lover at the appointed time, with her news. Ronald Tempest kissed her, and put his arms round her. But he was not excited. He was not an ardent lover by any means, feeling that all such display of emotion was "bad form" and "not the thing." But Winnie was too much in love with him to notice his somewhat calm demeanour.

Digitized by Google

They strolled away, and she slipped her arm through his. But even this he did not much care about.

"Are you not glad, Ronald?" she asked him gently.

"Of course I am, dearest, but I do think the year is absurd."

"But daddy wishes it!"

"Oh, of course, I know, if Mr. Bradley insists, it must be so. And, after all, he may relent later, dear."

Winnie looked up in his handsome face adoringly. She was a little shorter than her lover, and in response to her gentle pressure of his arm, he looked down upon her with a certain light of tenderness in his eyes.

"I hope so," she murmured.

"And now—the ring," her lover said; "look, Winnie dear; I bought it last week in town."

Winnie's blue eyes shone with love and delight as her lover produced a little case with a shining diamond ring in its velvet hiding place.

"Oh!" she cried; "but will daddy let me wear it?"

"He must let you."

"But——"

"I don't intend to let all the young men of the town be running after you, now you belong to me."

The dictatorial arrogance of this speech Winnie took for the pride of having won her, poor little woman! And after this tiny little momentary difference she tried her best to make up to him for what she thought was her unkindness to her lover! She clung to him even yet more closely, though Mr. Algernon Tempest did not respond in any great degree.

"Oh, bother!" ejaculated Winnie's lover five minutes later. But Winnie had been so busily employed gazing at her lover's handsome face that she had not noticed what he said.

Suddenly a very familiar figure caught his gaze. It was that of Mr. Algernon Tempest, and he was not alone!

A little four-year-old girl was sitting by the side of the wood through which the lovers were strolling. The path was broad and the grass underneath their feet was green, but the little maid was crying bitterly. Winnie slipped her hand out of her lover's arm in an instant, and ran to the child.

"What is it, dearie?" she asked tenderly, putting her pretty arms round the forlorn little mite.

"Please, I'se lost," said the little maid with yet more tears.

"Oh, don't cry! That will never find you!" said Winnie in haste; "who are you and who brought you into this pretty wood to see the flowers growing and hear the birdies sing?"

Baby gave a big sob and Winnie dried her eyes for her. In the meantime Mr. Algernon Tempest stood aloof, looking very indifferent, and somewhat displeased.

"Come along, Winnie," he remarked, after the tears had been dried and the little maid comforted.

"And leave this dear little mite alone?" said Winnie, facing her lover.

"Oh, bring it along with you if you wish," replied the lover.

I wish I could only reproduce in cold words the sulky face of Mr. Algernon Tempest and the pitying one of Winnie Bradley. But I cannot. The trio wended their way back to Deephurst, the four-year-old mite clinging to Winnie's hand tightly, but looking now and again at Mr. Tempest on the other side of her with a certain curious glance of awe, intermingled with repulsion. Mr. Algernon Tempest was not a favourite with children.

"Oh, I am home now!" said the mite, when they at length reached the high road; "I am found again!"

Winnie laughed, a bright laugh of sincere amusement, but Mr. Algernon Tempest only smiled.

"Do you know where you are now, baby?" said Winnie.

"Oh, yes. Me know. There's home—and mother!"

And she put her pretty little face up for a kiss, which Winnie gave her over and over again.

* * * * *

"So you are engaged?" said Ted Warrender quietly.

"Look!" answered Winnie; and she showed him the ring on her finger. "Won't you wish me happiness, Ted?" she pleaded, as he turned away. How was she to know that he cared for her?

Ted Warrender came back to her side, and held out both his hands.

"You know, Win, what I wish you—now and always."

Somehow, the sound of the old name, the name that no one but Ted had ever called her, went through Winnie's heart. But she battled bravely with the sudden strange feeling that had come over her, and made an attempt to laugh. But he dropped her hands.

"You have not seen Ronald?" Winnie said.

"Not yet," said Ted, with a half smile. "Do you expect me to fall in love with him too? That's asking rather too much."

It was a fortnight after Winnie's engagement, and Ted Warrender had only been back in Deephurst a few hours. But the first thing he had noticed was a ring upon Winnie's engagement finger; and his heart, that had hitherto been light and hopeful, had sunk to the bottommost depths of misery at the sight of it. He had come home with big hopes in his thoughts, with dreams of happiness, visions of gladness, but he never once had thought of—this!

"I wish you every happiness," he said, with an effort, and went away. But all that evening, even when with her lover, her affianced husband, Winnie could not forget the look upon his face, and the tone in which he uttered those few words.

"What a terrible infliction your friend, Mr. Warrender, is!" remarked Winnie's future husband a few days later, after he had been introduced.

Winnie coloured a little. Much as she cared for her lover, she felt that his remark was not in good taste. Perhaps Mr. Algernon Tempest noted her hesitation.

"I mean," he said loftily, "he is so big, so brusque, so outspoken——"

Digitized by Google

"So manly," suggested Winnie.

Her lover turned languidly to her.

"So you love manly men?" he said.

"Of course I do," said Winnie. "I like a man to be—well, a man!"

Mr. Tempest rose from his chair leisurely, and curled his dainty little moustache with forefinger and thumb.

"Well," he said deliberately, "there is no accounting for tastes. Some prefer this style, some that. But it is not always the manly-looking man who is the most manly!"

He gave this axiom forth with the assurance of a learned philosopher. Winnie ran to his side, and put her pretty arms round him. She kissed his cheek.

"Forgive me, Ronald," she said; "I am afraid I was unkind to you."

"You were," said her lover, "but it does not matter!"

* * * * *

Ted Warrender did not conceal his aversion to Winnie's lover from anyone excepting from Winnie herself. He had so little in common with Mr. Algernon Tempest, and he despised him for his little affectations and fopperies, to which love had made Winnie blind. But he was too loyal to say so to her; and he cared too much for her, had he not been so, to give her pain. So he kept it from her, and hoped she would never know how passionately he loved her. He did not know of those two little incidents of which I have spoken, or perhaps they might have given him an even keener perception of Mr. Algernon Tempest's character, and a greater knowledge of how love can blind a woman to that which everyone sees but herself.

A month went by, and then there befell to Ted Warrender the task of solving the greatest problem that had ever presented itself to him. Be it remembered, poor Ted had scant reason to love "The Paragon," for he looked upon him as an interloper, and he sincerely disliked him. So that the problem, when it did come, was all the greater test of his loyalty and manliness.

He had to go to Dullingham, a big manufacturing town about fifty miles away, on business. This transacted, he found that he had an hour to waste before he could catch a return train. So he amused himself by strolling about the crowded streets, looking into the shop windows.

Suddenly a very familiar figure caught his gaze. It was that of Mr. Algernon Tempest, and he was not alone. A feminine arm was resting within his own, and a girl's face was looking up into his affectionately. And the first thought that knocked at the heart of Ted Warrender was that the lovers had come over to Dullingham together.

He looked again, and his heart very nearly stood still. For the face was not that of Winnie Bradley. Ted hesitated a moment, then he made up his mind. Stepping quickly forward, he spoke to "The Paragon."

"Hullo, Tempest, you up here as well as myself!"

"The Paragon" started, coloured, and being, in spite of his bravado, a coward at heart, drew his slight figure up stiffly and with an assumption of hauteur, replied:

"Pardon me, my name is not Tempest!"

Ted stood and looked at him straight in the face for a moment.

"I beg yours," he said, and he contrived to put a certain sarcastic accent on the words which conveyed, just as Ted had desired, the fact that Mr. Algernon Tempest had been recognised. Ted lifted his hat and walked quickly away, his heart in a tumult. What was he to do—what should he say?

Tell Winnie? He dared not; and if he did, how would she take it? If she believed him, she would question her lover, who would of course deny it; and Ted would be branded with the stigma of having tried to part the lovers! And if he did not tell her, he would by his silence be permitting her to remain engaged to a man who was, while her newly affianced lover, upon closely affectionate terms with another girl.

Poor Ted! His was a problem indeed, and the more he thought it over that day, the more difficult it appeared to solve. Look at it which way he might, he could not come to a satisfactory decision. He journeyed back to Deephurst, keeping a watchful look-out for "The Paragon," with the question still unanswered.

To make his "assurance doubly sure," he, when two days later he happened to meet Winnie, put a casual question to her, in as indifferent a tone as he could command.

"Oh, by-the-way, was Mr. Tempest here on Tuesday afternoon, Winnie?"

"Why do you ask?" said the girl, blushing a little, as she always did at the mention of her lover's name.

"Oh, for no reason in particular."

"Let me think—this is Friday. No, I did not see him on Tuesday. He told me he was very busy over something or other—I quite forget now what; but why?"

'Oh, nothing! It's of no consequence."

While, during the next few days, Ted Warrender was trying to solve the problem that perplexed him, wondering if to lay it before Mr. Bradley, Fate was preparing an utterly unforeseen solution of her own. It was a bright afternoon, and Winnie and her lover were strolling idly along the path beside the mill-weir, "The Paragon" holding forth loftily, and Winnie, as was her wont, listening to him admiringly. A little group of children were playing in the field on the other side of the mill-stream, their hands full of wild flowers they had gathered in the wood beyond.

Suddenly a piercing scream caused Winnie and her lover to look up. The "mite"—the little four-year-old whom Winnie had brought home when lost, much to the disgust of her unsympathetic lover—had overbalanced and had fallen into the mill-stream.

"Save her! save her!" exclaimed Winnie, grasping in a moment what happened. She turned instinctively to her lover. But he only stood, pitifully white, a craven, shivering with fear, and dumb.

Winnie's eyes flashed at him a glance of withering scorn.

"Then I will!" she cried, and she plunged into the running stream in an instant. With quick wit, she had run a few yards up the bank first, so as to get ahead of the little form being carried to the weir. Cumbered as she was, Winnie struck out bravely.

"Don't!" whined "The Paragon" on the bank.

"Out of the way, you cur!" said a strong voice behind him, and the shock of a form rushing past him sent him sprawling on the path. "Go and get help, you fool!"

But by the time he had reached the mill, and help had arrived, Ted Warrender was clinging like grim death to a stake in the bank, with one arm round Winnie's waist, and Winnie was clutching at the "mite's" drenched little figure.

When help arrived, it was a matter of a few moments to drag the trio, wet and exhausted, but safe, to the pathway.

"Winnie! Winnie!" exclaimed Ted Warrender hoarsely. "Thank God that I was at hand!" But Mr. Algernon Tempest had slunk away.

* * * * *

"The Paragon" had two very unpleasant interviews that evening. The first was with Ted Warrender, to whom after some tears and a poor show of bravado, he confessed that he had been at Dullingham.

"And you are making a fool of Winnie Bradley as well as of some other girl!" exclaimed Ted hotly. "Well, you will quite understand it is at an end now."

"That is for Miss Bradley to say."

"Or her father!" said John Bradley, coming into the room.

"The Paragon" fell limply into the nearest chair.

"There is your engagement-ring, and I am requested by my daughter to inform you that she never wishes to see your face again!"

He threw the ring at his feet with a gesture of contempt.

That was a year ago, and "The Paragon" has long since disappeared from Deephurst. Winnie's fancied love for him is dead. But Ted has never told her of that meeting in Dullingham, though he thinks he may do so, some day—when she has said "Yes."

Clifton Bingham.

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID NEW SERIES. BEGIN READING TO-DAY.

A Striking Series of Astonishing Revelations.

Told by the Decoy Herself.

SYNOPSIS.

VIVIENNE D'ALTON, who in this series tells the story of a certain period of her life, is a young lady who has been educated in Germany.

Until the time when the story commences, she has never seen her father since he placed her at the school in Bochum, although her fees are paid regularly and she has a liberal allowance of pocket-money.

Her mother is dead, and she has no brother or sister. Hence, she seems quite alone in the world.

But one day her father sends a message to the school that he wishes his daughter to leave and to meet him at Rotterdam. Vivienne is greatly delighted at the news, and while she sails down the Rhine to meet her father, conjectures as to his appearance.

The person who announces himself as her father at Rotterdam is not in the least like the handsome gentleman she had pictured to herself, but is short and stout.

They drive to a large mansion, where Vivienne is enthusiastically welcomed by a Mrs. Sherwood, "a bosom friend of her mother," who requests Vivienne to call her "aunt."

Vivienne takes an instantaneous dislike to "Aunt Flora."

A Mr. Gilbert Graysworthy comes to dine at the house, and incidentally mentions that round his waist he carries a belt containing fifty thousand pounds' worth of diamonds.

A day or two later Vivienne is shocked to learn that Gilbert Graysworthy has been found murdered in the street! There seems no motive for the crime, for his money, his watch and chain are still upon his body.

Aunt Flora shows great annoyance that Vivienne is so concerned in the gentleman's death, and vents her spite on Susan, the maid, by dismissing her.

Vivienne, however, to show her independence, engages the girl herself as her own lady's maid, for which kindness the latter is very grateful.

She and Aunt Flora leave Rotterdam for England by the Harwich boat.

On the passage across Vivienne sees a person whom she believes is Annchen, a maid whom she greatly dislikes, talking to a man whom she has seen before under very suspicious circumstances.

She also meets a Viscount Broomville, a fellow-passenger whom Aunt Flora seems to wish to impress. He is most attentive to Vivienne, and she forms a very high opinion of the Viscount as a true born gentleman.

He announces that he is going to call upon Mr. Beverley D'Alton regarding some business affairs.

THIRD EPISODE.

The Decoy Enters Her Den.

I HAD often dreamt of London glories and had read of the splendours which money could procure. But I had neither dreamt nor read of such a marvel of beauty as my new home in Park Lane was.

The moment one entered the house one was impressed by its magnificence. The fine hall was lined with wonderful frescoes by the greatest artist of the day, and the fountain which played in the centre had its tiny jets turned into fairy rainbows by myriads of gem-like electric lights, which lurked amongst the palms and flowers banked up in lavish profusion. Rich sapphire blue velvet portières veiled the great mahogany doors leading into various rooms, and the grand staircase, which cost, so I was told, fifty thousand pounds, was a miracle of art in white and coloured marbles.

To tell the truth, I was almost spellbound with amazement at what I saw, and after I had been shown all over the house, I could well believe my father's assertion that he was the richest man in London.

"And you will have to be one of the busiest girls," he smiled, as he watched me look with shining eyes round the exquisite little boudoir which had been prepared for my special occupation.

"You seem to have quite an army of servants," I smiled back, "so I hardly know what there will be to keep me busy."

"My dear child, there is no earthly reason why you should worry about anything but your own pleasure. When I spoke of your being busy, I meant that you would have to do a tremendous lot of shopping amongst costumiers, milliners, and jewellers. Remember, my dear, that I always want you to look your best, no matter how much it costs. If you get what you want, and leave me to pay the bills, perhaps we shall both be happy."

"How good you are to me! I shall never be able to repay you!"

"Oh, yes, you will. You see, I am a gregarious animal in my own way, and the very fact of your living with me is part payment for anything I do for you. I have found it dreary work living alone while I was scraping my fortune together, and I mean to make up for all the privations of the past by surrounding myself with bright and happy faces."

"That means that you intend to entertain a great deal?"

"Certainly, though I have one peculiarity. A man of wealth always has innumerable applications for help from all sorts of people, and I am no exception to the general rule. But I have an office in the City to which all such business communications are addressed, and all such people as wish to be helped on in the world must seek me there.

Digitized by Google

"By way of compensation for seeing so much of the seamy side of life in the City, I want everything here to be absolute brightness and content. No man who is not rich is content, so it follows that I only want rich men about us here. And every woman, to be happy, must have either beauty or good family to boast of, so you can select your friends accordingly. But, mind—no poverty and no discontent."

"Beverley, how long am I to wait for you to let me pass you?"

I had been so closely attentive to what my father was saying that I had not noticed Mrs. Sherwood standing just within the doorway, looking the reverse of contented.

He stepped hastily aside and apologised at once.

"My dear Mrs. Sherwood," he said, "I'm sure you will believe me when I say that I had forgotten all about everything except that it was necessary to explain my wishes to my daughter, who is not yet as well acquainted with social duties as you are."

I wonder if it was fancy, or whether there was really a hidden meaning in the way in which the words "Mrs. Sherwood," "My daughter," and "duties" were pronounced? There certainly was a very curious inflexion upon them all, and the speech had the effect of producing an instant change in Aunt Flora's manner, which promptly became as fawning as it had been just now aggressive.

"You poor dears!" she exclaimed theatrically. "I can quite understand that Vivienne is perfectly delighted and that you are wrapped up in her. But you have both forgotten that lunch will be served in a few minutes, and that we don't want the servants to see Vivienne sit down at table in her travelling dress."

"To be sure! You are quite right," was the cordial reply. "I'm evidently in the way, so I'll take myself off while Vivienne gives herself up to the attentions of her maid. By-the-bye, did you not say something about having invited Viscount Broomville to call here to-day?"

This question was addressed to me, and I answered: "No, father, I didn't exactly ask him. He said he had something to see you about, and would like to call, so, of course, I said we should be pleased to see him."

"Well, dear, it's all the same, and the more friends call to see you, the better I shall like it."

A genial smile accompanied this speech, which implied that I myself was the attraction which brought Viscount Broomville to Park Lane so soon, and I was certainly very much pleased at the idea, as every girl would be who has only just been emancipated from school.

While eating my lunch, I could not help smiling at the pleasure with which I had viewed the prospect of presiding over my father's household arrangements, for I should certainly have been hopelessly incompetent to deal with the butler, and the housekeeper, and the chef, and all their underlings; some of them evidently thought themselves much grander personages than ever poor dear Fräulein had considered herself.

But I did not feel disappointed. On the contrary, I looked forward to a life of happy gaiety, undimmed by a single responsibility or care, and when Viscount Broomville presented himself between four and five o'clock I was as beautifully dressed and as radiant as either my father or I could desire.

Mrs. Sherwood was also magnificent, in a rose-velvet tea-gown, but I fancied she did not look quite happy when she saw me, at my father's whispered request, begin to preside over the Sèvres teacups.

Our visitor seemed to have eyes for nothing but me, and he very evidently cared to talk to nobody else. In fact, I was beginning to be rather embarrassed by his open admiration, when rescue came in the shape of a question from my father

"Did I understand you to say, my lord," he asked, "that you did good business in Rotterdam?"

"Splendid!" was the reply, "I have netted at least twenty-five thousand pounds, thanks to your directions and recommendations. But I sha'n't want to visit Rotterdam again on business in a hurry."

"Why not?"

"Because I seemed to be pursued by the most extraordinary dangers. Twice I was attacked by footpads, and only my own agility saved me from being murdered. Another time I was stepping into a cab when I happened to look into the face of the man who held the door open for me, and actually recognised him as one of the desperadoes I had fought with on the previous evening."

"How very lucky for you—yet how extraordinary!"

"Yes, rather. But the manner in which I was constantly menaced was more than extraordinary. It was significant."

I was listening breathlessly, for I recalled, only too vividly, the tragic end of that other young Englishman whom Fate had taken to Rotterdam. Aunt Flora had walked to the window, no doubt to gaze upon the ever-moving crowds in the Park. But my father seemed as much interested as I was, and he inquired promptly:

"Significant? Of what do you consider the attacks were significant?"

"Of deliberate shadowing," was the confident reply. "I feel absolutely certain that somebody must have known that I carried a lot of valuable property about with me."

"Of course. The people at the hotel knew. They have a happy knack of shadowing their guests, and if any of them saw you visiting the different diamond merchants, they could easily guess that you either had money to buy diamonds, or that you had diamonds to sell. You will remember that I warned you to be careful. However, you have luckily reached England again, and are no doubt going to invest your money to good advantage."

"I should like to ask your advice, if I may. You are the great authority on investments, and people are beginning to say that everything you touch turns to gold, so if——"

"My dear Viscount, I'll advise you with pleasure, if it will be any use to you. The fact is, I'm putting a lot of money into the 'New Barbary Land Development Co.' It is not thought much of just now, and shares are below par. But they'll fetch a huge premium in another week, and I shall sell out with a cool profit of a million. But, mind, this is in strict confidence."

Viscount Broomville became very excited at the prospect of another great "scoop," as he called it, which was thus opened out to him. But some fresh visitors were announced, and there was only just time for him to arrange to call at my father's office in the morning, ere it became impossible to talk further about business without being overheard.

* * * * *

I suppose I was not the first girl to be sprung upon Society with a tremendous flourish of paragraphs, or whose social success, by reason of the money at her command, was a foregone conclusion. But I certainly was amazed at my own sudden popularity, and could not understand how it was that half a dozen high-class weeklies sported a full-length portrait of "The beautiful Miss Vivienne D'Alton, who is just making her début in Society."

Later on I learnt that all this kind of thing is a matter of management. If you haven't a capable relative to blow your social trumpet, you employ an agent, and the miracle is wrought!

But even fabulous wealth is not all-powerful, and my father soon realised that the great party with which he was going to signalise my advent would be much more successful if I were chaperoned by a lady of title. Mrs. Sherwood was very angry at the idea. But "dear Beverley" was firm, and Aunt Flora found her authority on social matters superseded by the Dowager Countess of Windelmore, a lady of undoubted ready-made influence.

The Countess had but a small jointure, and when my father in his tactful way invited her to pay us a visit of indefinite length, with an honorarium of two hundred pounds a week "for personal expenses," she readily consented to do her best for me.

Digitized by Google

Upon the whole she found me very docile, and only too delighted to exploit fresh fields and pastures new. But the splendours with which I fell in love at first sight soon began to pall upon me. So did the perpetual supervision to which I seemed to be subjected, and I longed to be just a bit like other girls who could walk about the beautiful park and its environs instead of always being driven in a splendid carriage.

So strong did this desire become that I excused myself one evening from going to the opera, on the plea of being tired and out of sorts. My father was evidently disappointed, but, after enjoining me to go to bed, so as to be as fresh as possible the next day, he accompanied my two chaperons to the opera, and I was actually to be left to my own devices for several hours.

I might have been sleepy before, but I became wide awake at once when my somewhat foolish plan seemed easy of fruition.

Annchen and Susan gladly took their dismissal when I told them I should not want them until eleven o'clock, and I lost no time in putting on a dark cloak and the least conspicuous hat I possessed.

Then, with my face all aglow with the spice of mischief that was in me, I watched my chance to slip down the marble staircase, across the tesselated hall, and out of doors, without being seen by the big footman who was supposed to be doing his duty, but who had no doubt gone to flirt with pretty Susan.

Oh, how delightful it was to be out in the cool night air, free from the blaze of jewels and electric garishness! I was not afraid of coming to grief, for there were still any amount of people both driving and walking, and a brisk constitutional was all I meant to indulge in.

But something occurred which convinced me that my schoolgirlish escapade was providentially inspired.

At the foot of Park Lane I turned to the right, and stepped briskly along, smiling at the thought of how horrified Lady Windelmore would be if she could see me now. I had almost gained the Albert Memorial when I saw, passing by a lamp across the street, the handsome, erect form of Viscount Broomville.

Almost at the same moment I brushed against two people who were so engrossed in watching his lordship that they paid no attention to a chance pedestrian, and I walked on without appearing to have seen them

Suddenly sense and speech returned to me, and I cried out "Lord Broomville, remember Rotterdam!"

But my heart was beating furiously, for the pair were no other than the birds of ill omen who had voyaged with us from Rotterdam. The woman I knew again by her cloak and by the curious hat which completely hid her face. The man I recognised by his face and figure, which could not easily be mistaken.

But why were they here? And why were they watching Viscount Broomville? Could it be that they intended to do him an injury? And was it possible that they were concerned in the previous attacks of which he had complained? If this were so, would it not be well for me to watch them in their turn, so that I might be on the spot to utter a warning?

Fired with this idea, I walked sharply on till I was sure they could not see me. Then I crossed the road and hurried townwards again, taking care never to let my face be shown by the lamps under which I had to pass.

My heart was palpitating horribly, for I feared lest some dreadful event were impending, and I was all the more frightened because I was utterly unused to being out alone after dark.

Anxiously looking ahead, I saw Viscount Broomville, by no means in a great hurry, walking leisurely in front of me. Across the way, the woman was hurrying off alone, and the other bird of ill omen was stealthily lessening the distance between himself and the Viscount.

Did the man really mean mischief, and if so, could I be in time to intercept his purpose? Anyhow, I meant to do so, even if I had to make an outcry and thus draw to myself the unwelcome attention which I was, of course, under the circumstances, anxious to avoid.

Slowly the first man went on, apparently in deep meditation. Swiftly his pursuer followed behind. And still more swiftly did I almost overtake the latter.

Even in much frequented neighbourhoods there are always some spots which, as night grows late, are fruitful in opportunities for the intending assassin, and one stretch of the roadside, which was entirely in darkness by reason of the distance of the street lamps, struck me as so specially dangerous that I quickened my pace to a run.

But so did the bird of evil omen, and as he wore some kind of noiseless footgear, there was nothing to warn the unsuspecting man ahead that he was in danger. My own shoes were too thin to make any clatter, but I was not so swift a runner as the man whom I believed to be an assassin, and I already despaired of overtaking him when I saw him draw something out of his pocket, and raise his arm ready to strike.

Digitized by Google

For half a second I knew not what to do, for I was dumb with horror. Then sense and speech returned to me, and I shrieked out:

"Lord Broomville, remember Rotterdam!"

Instantly, as if turned on an electric pivot, his lordship faced his pursuer and threw up the arm already descending to kill him. Then he would have grappled with the fellow, but a face-to-face encounter was the last thing the latter desired, and, cleverly dodging further contact, he ran on until a turn into the next street hid him from our sight.

After giving my timely warning, I trembled so much that I only kept myself from collapsing altogether by leaning against the garden wall near which I had stopped, and when Viscount Broomville, in a few quick strides reached my side, I was trying vainly to restrain the tears which the reaction from terrible excitement had produced.

"Miss D'Alton," he said wonderingly, "you have saved my life, I am sure, and I can never thank you sufficiently! But it is amazing to see you here alone!"

"And I ought not to have been here," was my tremulous answer, "so I beg you will not say a word about this to anybody. But I'll tell you all there is to tell."

In a few minutes Lord Broomville had heard my story, at the end of which I said:

"The man is the same man I saw in Rotterdam, the night Mr. Graysworthy was murdered. He is very likely one of those who tried to take your life there, and has come over in the boat with you on purpose to secure the wealth he has perhaps heard about."

"In that case the rascal would have been disappointed, for I have nothing on me of great value to-night. In fact, I intrusted everything I could raise this morning to your father to invest in the New Barbary Land Development Company, so my money and securities are beyond the reach of thieves."

"It is a pity that that man has got off scot-free."

"Yes, but I couldn't leave you alone here while I pursued him, so must trust to better luck the next time he tries to play the assassin. And as you will be safer at home than here, we had better lose no more time."

"You will not say a word about having seen me?"

"Not a word, of course. But I shall never cease thinking of your courage and presence of mind."

Much to my relief my arrival was as unnoticed as my departure had been, for the footman was still amusing himself downstairs, and as soon as I reached my own room, I carefully put the cloak and hat where I had found them. I also removed every other trace of having been out, and then rang for my maid, although it was only half-past ten.

Susan answered my ring.

"Susan," I said, "bring me a tray with some supper on it; I am better now, and feel quite hungry. And tell Annchen that I want her."

"Please, miss," returned Susan, "Annchen hasn't come back yet. She thought she would go for a walk, as you didn't want her."

"But surely she doesn't have permission to be out till this time of night! Who told her that she might go?"

Susan wasn't able to answer my question satisfactorily. Neither did Annchen, when she presented herself half-an-hour later. But, looking at her, I was again seized by a most uncomfortable antipathy to her, for the resemblance between her and the accomplice of the bird of evil omen was disagreeably striking.

Yet, unpleasantly reminiscent as her personality was, I could hardly hope to rid myself of her presence, for she seemed to be as great a favourite with my father as she was with Aunt Flora, and, greatly to my surprise, I saw him talking very confidentially to her immediately after breakfast next morning when I went into the library to select a magazine.

"Very well, tell him that his stupid bungling has lost him five hundred pounds," I heard my father say.

Of whom was my father speaking to Annchen? And how was it that she seemed to be so much in his confidence?

(Another instalment of this entrancing series next week.)

A Young Man's Folly.

How a Scheme to Capture a Rich Bride Ended.

HANDSOME Hugh Duchesne lay swinging in a hammock under the trees that cast a wide shade over Duchesne Place.

He had been back just two days from a two years' sojourn on the Continent, and was enjoying the rest and calm to the utmost capacity of his idle, languid nature.

Under the shadows of the same tree sat his mother, a stately matron of sixty, the only human being of whom Hugh Duchesne had ever stood in fear.

"Hugh," said Mrs. Duchesne, "I have invited the Hildreths here for the summer. They will arrive very soon."

"Have you?" responded Hugh languidly, but his tone did not betray the annoyance his face expressed. He had gone abroad to escape these very Hildreths.

"Yes," continued Mrs. Duchesne. "Yes, they come to-morrow. I want you to go down to the station to meet them. Mrs. Hildreth is always so particular about having due respect shown to her, and I would not offend her for the world!"

"How many of them will there be?"

"Three; Mrs. Hildreth, her niece, Mrs. Gray—who is a young widow, and a beauty, I am told—and Carrie, who has just passed her twenty-first birthday, and has, therefore, come into possession of twenty-five thousand pounds left her by her father, you know."

"Yes, I know," assented Hugh, wearily. He had heard of that twenty-five thousand pounds every day for a year. He had been shown a portrait also of the prospective heiress, which had hastened his departure.

"I wonder," he asked, lazily, as he rocked himself lightly in the hammock, "if Miss Carrie has any more flesh on her bones than she used to have?"

"Hugh," cried his mother, "I supposed you were a gentleman. I am surprised to hear such an ill-bred remark from you. Carrie is a most estimable girl, and has good breeding and a kind heart, and——"

"And money," interrupted Hugh, "which covers a multitude of deficiencies in a woman, always."

"You will have an opportunity to determine before long," answered his mother, "whether money is not of some use after all. Duchesne Place will be under the hammer in less than two years, unless something is done to save it, and you and I will be beggars."

She gathered up her work, and swept away, as she finished, and Hugh, covering his eyes with his shapely hand, almost groaned aloud.

"Oh, my God, if she knew!" he moaned. But, mercifully, Mrs. Duchesne did not know.

Suddenly a voice broke the silence, trilling a snatch of song:

"I love my love, I love my love,
I love my love, because my love loves me."

This is what the voice sang. The singer came up the orchard path, and was almost within reach of the motionless figure in the hammock before she saw it.

Then she started back with a little smothered cry, and a face grown suddenly crimson. She blushed and paled so easily, did Flossie, the old gardener's young daughter.

Digitized by Google

"You are very happy this morning, dearie," said Hugh, putting out his hand to her. "Come here and let me look at you. I have not had a chance of more than one glimpse of your face since I came home. Why, child, where has your flesh gone—you are as slender as a reed—you, who were so round and rosy. Have you been ill since I went away?"

"Oh, very ill!"

"They never wrote me of it."

"I was not here, I went away to my sister's—you remember her, she was Mrs. Tristan's governess. She married and lives in the country. I was with her a long time, resting and recruiting."

All the time Flossie's eyes had been turned away from the eyes of her listener, and the hand he held shook like a leaf in his.

"You are not strong yet, I see," he said kindly. "You must take good care of yourself, child; for you are too young to die; too young, too fair, too dear!"

Again a wave of colour swept over Flossie's sweet face. But just then a voice from the house called to her, and she hurried away.

"How changed she is—in some indefinable way," murmured Hugh, as he looked after her. "She seems so much older, somehow—poor child!"

He had known her from her childhood, and had made a pet of her long before he went away.

The next day the Hildreths came. Mrs. Hildreth, forty in years, and a thousand in Society-wisdom and experience; and with one supreme desire in her soul, which was to marry her daughter to Hugh Duchesne.

Carrie Hildreth came also, tall, thin, sallow, with pathetic eyes, that always seemed pitying her own plainness, which was rendered doubly noticeable by the richness of her toilets, and the lustre of her jewels.

Twenty-one in years, and looking thirty-five beside the splendid beauty of her cousin, Mrs. Gray.

Had it been possible to put Mrs. Gray out of the way, save by cold-blooded murder, Mrs. Hildreth would certainly have done it before she would have brought her to Duchesne Place. But she had invited her niece to spend the summer with them, before Mrs. Duchesne's invitation had been received, and she had been obliged to inform Mrs. Duchesne, therefore, of this, and to bring Mrs. Gray with her.

Lisle Gray was, indeed, a rival to be feared. She had that rare combination, blue-black eyes, golden hair, and a brilliant bloom. She had also a warm heart, that held all its stores of passion yet untouched, for she had been an old man's darling; and though she had sorrowed for her husband as for a friend and protector, it had been no more.

Something new stirred in Hugh Duchesne's heart and pulses when Lisle's cool, fair hand first touched his. Something that made him restless, and afraid to look into her eyes; and, therefore, he was all to Carrie that Mrs. Hildreth could desire.

He turned Carrie's music at the piano, and listened attentively to her beautiful voice, which was her one solitary charm. All a woman's love and power of feeling, and repressed longings were in her voice when she sang. And while Hugh Duchesne leant over her at the piano and listened she was singing her heart away; hopelessly, she knew—but, alas! she could not hold it back. It was her doom to love him, and she knew it from that hour. He was so kind to her for days, so thoughtful and attentive, and both her and her mother's heart leapt for joy.

Only Mrs. Duchesne saw the truth. Once she caught his eyes as they rested on Lisle Gray. She had never seen that look in his face before.

"Was your niece a wife long before she was a widow?" she asked carelessly of her friend that night.

"Only a year."

"How very sad!"

"No, not sad, for he was an old man and left her wealth," Mrs. Hildreth answered, and then could have bitten her own tongue off in her rage. She did not care, you see, for Mrs. Duchesne or Hugh to know that Lisle Gray was rich as well as beautiful.

"Well, not exactly wealth," she hastened to add, "but a competence—enough to dress her, and keep her in society. But she is very extravagant. It would require a fortune to support her. Luckily, she has a wealthy lover, now in India; and I am hoping, when he returns, she will marry him. But she is a sad coquette—for ever making victims to her beauty."

"Ah!" was Mrs. Duchesne's only comment. She knew her friend well, and made due allowance for her statement. And after this she looked at Lisle Gray with renewed interest.

"If she has wealth," she said mentally, "she is a far more desirable wife for Hugh than Carrie. All the Duchesnes for generations have married handsome women!"

A day later she was alone with Carrie. Mrs. Hildreth was taking her siesta; Lisle writing letters; and Hugh smoking his cigar.

"How beautiful your cousin is," she remarked. "Like a rare picture!"

"Yes," responded Carrie, with a sigh. "I sometimes think I would give all the remainder of my life to be, only for one year, as beautiful as she is."

"That is extravagant language," said Mrs. Duchesne "One cannot expect to have everything. Some have beauty, some mental gifts, some wealth, some position. Few have all."

"But Lisle has," responded Carrie. "She is bright, and good, and beautiful; and her husband added wealth when he died. She has a hundred thousand in her own right, free of incumbrances. But do not mention it. She does not like to have it known."

Strive as he would, Hugh Duchesne found himself unable to control his real emotions. He was barely courteous to Lisle, and quite attentive to Carrie. Yet Carrie was not deceived.

One night she went to her room, and threw herself on the bed, in a passion of tears.

"It is no use—no use!" she cried. "He loves her; but he is trying to hide it—

A Reduced Facsimile of Our Next Week's Cover.

"My lost wife—will she ever return?"

A Dramatic Episode from "A Fatal Fascination," which will appear next week.

Digitized by Google

trying—oh, my God! he is trying to love me! Such a useless effort for any man!"

While she wept there, Hugh Duchesne was in the shrubbery, with Lisle Gray's hands, for the first time, clasped in his. Lisle's face was lifted wonderingly, as she listened to his impassioned words.

"I am, perhaps, mad!" he said. "I have no right to love you—only I do. But I am tied, hand and foot, more hopelessly—more horribly bound than ever man was before. And now, to have this come upon me—this passion, so mighty, that it takes hold of nerve, and soul, and brain, and will not let me rest night or day. I could almost kill myself when I think of it! I have no right to talk to you like this—to talk at all—only that these few words save me from instant insanity. Looking at you here, in the moonlight, I knew my brain would go mad if I did not speak!"

Then he turned away, and left her.

Within, a woman near the open window had sat, and heard all. It was his mother. She smiled, and said to herself:

"It is time he knew."

Outside, another woman had heard also, and had crept off in the shadows of the shrubbery, like a wounded deer.

Mrs. Duchesne tapped at Hugh's door; but no answer came. She entered. He was lying prone upon a couch, the picture of despair.

"Hugh," she said tenderly, "I have a bit of news for you which may surprise you. I would far rather have Lisle Gray for my daughter than Carrie Hildreth. Do not fear my displeasure!"

He turned and looked at her.

"Then you must have discovered that she, too, has money," he said, with a touch of scorn in his voice.

"Well, yes, she has money," answered his mother coolly; "and you love her. She will be an honour to us all, and keep up the reputation for good taste in family beauty, which the Duchesnes have always had. I hope you will not delay long. End Carrie's suspense—and make Lisle happy!"

"God help me!" he cried.

"What do you mean?"

"Nothing. Only that I would bless the hand that would put a bullet through my brain!" he said, and rushed out of the room.

For a week Hugh looked like an insane man. He ate nothing, slept little, and was as pale as death.

The ladies pitied him, and petted him; and Lisle lost flesh and bloom. She loved him with all her heart; and the mystery of his words and behaviour frightened her.

At night she sat by her window, and heard the thud of his horse's hoofs, as he rode off into the darkness alone. He would ride half the night, till his weary horse could no longer keep pace with his mad thoughts; and he would come home, to toss the remainder of the night in wild dreams.

Ah, it was a wretched household there, at Duchesne Place. At last Mrs. Duchesne grew to believe that some madness had come upon her son.

One night they were all startled by the sudden appearance of the old gardener. He was pale and trembling, and could hardly gasp out his errand.

"Flossie is ill—dying," he said, "and she asks for the young master—for Mr. Hugh. Where is he?"

Hugh was summoned, and hastened away with the old gardener to the latter's little cottage, just outside the grounds.

"How strange!" said Mrs. Duchesne, "and yet not strange. Hugh was always so kind to her when she was a child. I have no doubt she feels that he can help her. Her childish faith in him was so great."

But the night went by, and Hugh did not return. Mrs. Duchesne could not sleep. In the grey dawn, Hugh came in, pale and haggard, looking years older.

"How is Flossie?" his mother asked.

"Dead!" he answered. "And I am going away for a few days. Make my excuses to the guests. Imperative business calls me."

Two days later he came back. With him came a woman, evidently a servant, and a child—a beautiful, laughing boy, a year and a half old.

Into the presence of his mother and his guests he bade them come.

"I have a confession to make before you all," he said. "I want you all to know me as I am—a poor, weak, miserable coward. You see this child. Well, it is mine—the child of my wife, who died two days ago. I married her secretly four years ago. I admired her pretty face; and was fond of her, as one is fond of a toy, and so I married her. But I dared not confess it to my mother. When I repented of the step, I rushed away, and I never knew of this child's existence, till the night before last, when its mother lay dying. Heavens! to think of all she suffered for me.

"And I killed her. She heard my mad words to another woman, a week ago, and they killed her. She felt that she was in the way of my happiness, and she lay down and died, like a wounded lamb. And when she knew she was to die, she told me of our child, and asked me to care for it. And so I have brought it home, and you have heard the whole miserable story."

"Take the child out of my sight!" cried Mrs. Duchesne, turning fiercely upon the nurse.

"Mother!" cried Hugh.

But she silenced him.

"Do you think I will ever own it, or let it bear our name?" she cried. "The miserable, low-born child of a servant. Take it away, out of my sight!"

The nurse turned to go. But a hand detained her.

"Give the child to me," said a soft voice, and Lisle Gray put out her arms, and the child laughed and leapt into them.

"I am going away to-morrow," she said, turning with dignity to Mrs. Duchesne. "I will take the child with me."

"God bless you!" cried Hugh. "But do not go. Oh, if you will do this for my child—will you not stay for me?"

She looked into his face, before them all, the child still upon her breast.

"I will come back, if you want me," she said, smiling, "but only on condition that your mother will welcome me and this helpless little one. Otherwise you must come to me."

So Lisle went. But in due time Mrs. Duchesne thought of the mortgage on Duchesne Place, and, forgetting her wrath, sent for Mrs. Gray and the child. And even Mrs. Hildreth, when she read the marriage notice, sighed a sigh of relief.

"For, thank fortune," she said, "Lisle can't spoil more of my plans."

But as for Carrie—ah, well, she hid her hurt, as only proud women can. The bravery of a strong man is great, but the bravery of some proud women is greater.

Edward Wallbrook.

Small Homes and How to Furnish Them.

By Edith Waldemar Leverton.

With 16 Illustrations.

Crown 8vo, cloth.
Price 1s. Post Free 1s. 2d.

CONTENTS:—

Choosing the Home, the Furniture, Wall Papers, Floor Coverings.
On Colouring Red, Blue, Green, Yellow, and Pink Rooms.
The Entrance Hall, Staircase Nooks, Cosy Sitting Rooms.
The Dining Room, Kitchen, Scullery, the Bedrooms, etc.

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS.

Digitized by Google

A HUMAN BIRTHDAY PRESENT.

The Tale of a Girl who Loved and Doubted.

MRS. RAYNOR, Jack, and I, were sitting in our little sitting-room, and for the hundredth time they were telling me what they knew of my life.

"You see, Birdie," said mother, as I had always called her, "it was a stormy night and Jack had been detained at business—he was junior clerk at Cotton & Co.'s then—but just as he was running up the steps about seven o'clock he met a woman hurrying down them. She brushed by without speaking, and he, when he reached the door, almost stumbled over a basket where you lay all snuggled up in warm flannels. Ah, but you were a very nice baby, my dear."

"Pity my mother hadn't thought so!" I sarcastically observed.

"Undoubtedly you would have fared better than in our humble home," said Jack grimly.

"Why, Jack, you don't think I meant that, do you, dear?" I hastily asked. "It made me feel badly to think my own flesh and blood would abandon me and trust me with strangers, that's all."

"That was seventeen years ago to-morrow night," meditated mother, unheeding our conversation.

"Yes," I chimed in, anxious to clear the cloud from Jack's forehead; "and you have always called it my birthday, and have always made the day so pleasant for me, too. Let me see," I rattled on, "you thought I must have been about a year old, and so I am eighteen to-morrow. Have you made my birthday cake, yet, mother?"

"Yes, indeed, and that reminds me I must go out and see to the icing of it to-night. No, you stay here. Hold her, Jack, for she's not to see the cake until to-morrow."

I retreated before her laughing command, and seeing how sour Jack still looked, I determined to do my best to make him behave like his own old self again. Perching myself on the arm of his chair I leant over, trying to catch his eye.

"Cross, dear?" I asked, very sweetly.

"No," he replied in a tone that said, "Yes, decidedly so; let me alone."

But I was not to be rebuffed. Slipping my arms round his neck I drew his face round towards mine.

"You're sorry you didn't send me to the Foundlings' Home, aren't you? It's enough to make anyone cross to think how he has been troubled for seventeen years just because he was so soft-hearted over a miserable little baby whose own people didn't care about keeping it. Are you sorry, Jack?"

"Are you, Birdie?"

He suddenly straightened up, a look in his dark eyes I had never noticed there before.

"What have I to be sorry for?" I asked. "Was I not thrown into the hands of the dearest, kindest mother and brother a girl ever had?"

"Yes, dear—that is, we've always meant kindness; but still I am not your brother."

"I know it, but I love you just as well," I began, but somehow under the steady look of Jack's beautiful eyes I could not go on with my usual protestations of affection, as I had always been in the habit of doing, and I drew my arm away from about his neck.

"But I don't want you to, Birdie," he said slowly; and then he went on eagerly, "my darling, I want you to love me just as well as I do you. I want you for my very own, for my wife, Birdie."

Clasping me close in his strong arms he told me how happy I could make him by saying that I loved him. And so strongly did he argue his case that some way I was completely won over to his way of thinking, and before the birthday cake was iced Jack and I were engaged.

"I've accepted Jack as a birthday gift," I whispered to mother as I ran out.

A radiant look of surprised joy fairly illumined her dear old face as she comprehended the meaning of my remark.

"It has been the wish of my life," she whispered, kissing me softly. "Be ready for other birthday gifts to-morrow," she called after me.

"Oh, happy birthday!" I whispered when to-morrow dawned, and I, awaking, remembered my promise to Jack. "What better gift could I have asked than the gift of dear Jack's love?"

Digitized by Google

Several little tokens were at my breakfast plate; some very expensive, too, for, since Jack's pictures had begun to sell so well and orders poured in faster than he could execute them, he had begun to be quite extravagant.

He had gratified an oft-expressed wish of mine by having a little cameo earring, found in the basket in which they first found me, set in a ring for me for one of my birthday presents. It was an exquisite, clear-cut cameo, and it had a decidedly unique setting; so I had always indulged in the hope that some time, perhaps, I might learn through it who my parents were.

It had evidently dropped into the basket by mistake, for there was nothing else about me to identify me. There were none of the proverbial strawberry marks or moles so often found on lost children in stories, so I had only the cameo to connect me with the unknown past.

So I slipped it on my finger and when Jack told me to keep it for an engagement ring until he could procure another it became doubly dear to me.

By-and-by, as soon as breakfast was finished, much to my surprise and disappointment, my lover went up to his studio and remained invisible for two hours.

"He might have spent my birthday with me, anyhow," I pouted as I plodded upstairs feeling "blue" enough.

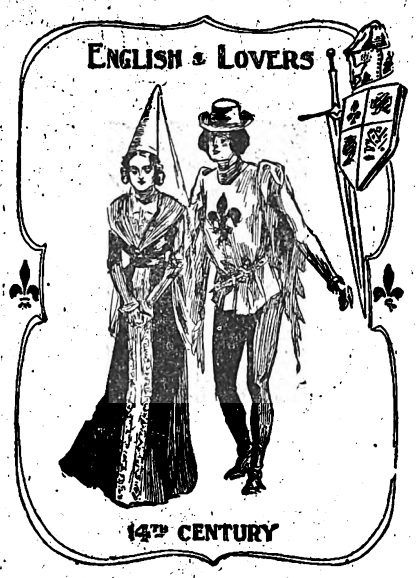
I knocked at the door of his studio.

"Not just now, dear; I'm busy," came in Jack's voice from beyond the door.

Angry and indignant, for he had allowed me to spend my mornings there for two months past, I silently went to my own room.

I was angrier still when ten minutes later his door opened to admit Miles Griffith, a fellow from the Artists' Club. Then I was ready to cry with vexation. They had always petted and spoilt me, mother and Jack, and let me have my own way, so that I could not bear even this little neglect gracefully.

Besides, we were just engaged, and Jack, it seemed to me, wasn't acting just as he ought to under the circumstances.



At last I was determined to be mean enough to listen and hear if I could what they were talking about so earnestly in the studio.

Me, I found out at once, for Jack had just spoken my name as I guiltily put my ear to the keyhole. A disgraceful thing to do, I admit, but as I mean this to be a faithful account of my birthday, and as I really did listen at the keyhole, I record it.

"I have made a great mistake," said Jack, sighing heavily.

I couldn't distinguish Mr. Griffith's reply, but, hushing my breath, heard Jack say:

"It has always been my mother's wish. I did it more to please her, I suppose. She loves Birdie dearly, and——"

With a dry sob I fell forward on the rug. I could not have stirred then had they opened the door and seen me there.

"He has found out already that he has made a mistake, has he?" I thought bitterly, when my brain stopped whirling so I could think. It was only to please his mother that he asked me to become his wife. And to think he should reveal his disappointment to that horrid old Griffith first! Oh, it was too humiliating!

I resolved to release him at once, but again I listened, having a dim hope, I suppose, that perhaps my ears had deceived me.

"It suits my mother——" began Jack.

"That's not the thing," interrupted Griffith. "You never would be suited. She lacks expression and——"

"Yes, I know—naturalness; I know the faults—for I'm better acquainted with Birdie than you are, Griffith."

"To be sure," assented Griffith. "Mouth too large; eyes very vacant, I've noticed. I advise you to give it up."

"I'll take your advice," exclaimed Jack emphatically.

Then I rushed to my room.

So through Griffith's advice, which Jack seemed so ready to take, my brief little romance was to be shattered. Well, I would never stay and let him see my heart break, too; for I felt sure I never could live through this trouble, so dear had Jack in the rôle of lover become to me in a few short hours.

So, somehow—now it all seems like a vague dream to me—I found myself a few hours later wandering aimlessly down a strange street, not knowing or caring where my steps tended. Some workmen obstructed the pavement and I was obliged to cross the street. I remember stepping down and advancing a few steps, of hearing hoarse shouts of warning, feeling a sudden shock, and then all was blank.

When I returned to consciousness I was in a strange room; everything was strange to me.

"Where am I?" I asked, although I could see no one. "What has happened?"

"You are with friends," said a low, soft voice near me.

Turning my eyes they fell on a sweet-faced lady, not yet old, although her hair was nearly white, sitting near me.

"How came I here?" I demanded in a weak, startled voice.

After a brief consultation with a woman, evidently the nurse, the lady decided to explain the situation.

"You are weak, but I trust to your good sense to remain calm while I tell you why you are here. About a month ago you were crossing the street and my husband I and accidently ran against and severely injured you. There was nothing about you to identify you, so we brought you home."

"And this was a month ago. Has no one been here? Did you advertise?"

"No," replied the lady. "It was reported in the papers, I believe, though there was not very much about it, but I never thought of advertising for your friends. I supposed they would go to the station, and then be directed here, if you had any in the city."

"I have none," I said bitterly. "I was only a foundling, living upon charity all my life."

I was reckless. I did not think how unnecessary it was to speak of my own history to a stranger. A whole month I had lain there and no one had called. And my pale, thin hands showed how near to death's door I had been.

As I lay looking at my wasted fingers I noticed that my ring was gone. Hastily I inquired where it was.

My new-found acquaintance blushed, and then said:

"Will you allow my husband to talk with you a few moments? He has your cameo."

In a few moments a tall, handsome gentleman accompanied her into the room.

"Years ago," he began, after apologising for being the cause of my illness, and congratulating me on my recovery, "I had a pair of cameos carved in this city. They were unlike anything ever seen here. I had them set in a pair of earrings for my wife. One night our house was robbed by a trusted servant; the cameos were taken with other valuables."

"Was anything else taken?" I asked, sitting upright, forgetting for the moment my weak state.

Digitized by Google

The gentleman strove to control his emotion, but his wife was silently weeping near the window.

"Yes, our only child," he replied brokenly. "Now, will you tell me how you came by this cameo, for it is the same I to-day took it to the person who carved it for me so long ago and he recognised it at once, although it has been reset."

"Was it seventeen years ago that your child was stolen?" I asked eagerly.

"Yes. What do you know of it?" he questioned hoarsely.

"I know that I am your child!"

After I had told the story so often repeated to me by Mrs. Raynor they were perfectly satisfied that I belonged to them, and their joy beggars description.

Their story was that my father had given his wife a necklace of diamonds, and seeing how pleased her baby was with it she had shaken the stones before its eyes, and at last, in a spirit of fun, clasped it about the child's neck. But she did not understand the fastening, and as her husband was away from home and she could not get the short chain over the child's head, she was obliged to let the nurse put the infant to sleep with the glittering ornament about its neck. But the temptation proved too great for the nurse, so she had taken baby quietly out to a neighbouring jeweller's and had the necklace unfastened.

The theory we, my new-found parents and I, formed was, that becoming frightened at her own exploit, and not daring to try to replace the baby—I never can realise that that baby was myself—lest she be discovered, she concluded to abandon it entirely.

"Now, where do these people live who have cared so kindly for you? I must see them," said my mother.

Reluctantly I gave the address. Jack came straight to me after my mother told her errand, and he looked so old and worn and haggard that for a moment I was lost in pity for him.

Then I remembered the indelicate remarks he had made to Miles Griffith, and in trying to be frigidly cool I only succeeded in crying weakly,

"Oh, Jack, Jack!" I sobbed, unable to be anything but my own impetuous self; "why did you teach me to love you only to tire of me so soon?"

"Tire! How? What do you mean, dear?" he asked, taking my hands anxiously as if he feared I were not quite rational.

Then as I grew calmer I had to confess how I had descended to the contemptible business of eavesdropping and what I had heard.

"It was my birthday, Jack. Don't you remember you had Griffith up in the studio? And you told him you had made a great mistake in engaging yourself to me, and—and he advised you to give it up, and you said you'd follow his advice."

For three minutes Jack stared at me, and then he, with difficulty, repressing an inclination to laugh, said:

"My darling, how could you believe it? Now listen. As you know, my forte is landscapes. Well, I thought I'd make one more trial at portraits, so, while lately I have been entertaining you and mother so politely in the studio, I was slyly taking 'sittings.' You know your birthday, or the day we celebrate as yours, and mother's fall on the same day; so she had often expressed a wish to have your portrait painted, and thinking that you would like hers, I painted your counterfeits as best I could, and then before I showed them I sent for Griffith, the fairest critic in the club. He told me candidly that as a portrait painter I was a dead failure, and advised me to allow never the public to see my attempts. The criticisms you heard were of your picture, not you. Are you satisfied?"

"Perfectly," I answered, feeling as if now I could get well and strong at once. "But my poor birthday was all spoilt," I sighed.

"To-day is your birthday, my dear," interrupted my new mother brightly, entering the room with Mrs. Raynor, "and if the other was spoilt ask what you will and you may have it."

"I'll take Jack," I said gaily.

And so I did, "for better or for worse," a year from my eighteenth birthday

Muriel Greaves.

Your Editor Chats.

I GATHER that the new series, "Decoyed!" is very popular with my readers. At any rate, I am led to believe this by the unanimous verdict of all those who have written to me concerning it. I feel sure that as the revelations continue the interest aroused in them will become greater and greater. Our serial, "Dupes of Destiny," too, is fairly in the running as one of the best we have ever published, and just at the present time the story is at a very absorbing stage.

ON page 107 appears a reduced facsimile of the picture in colours that will appear on the cover of next week's Short Stories. Our striking cover pictures every week bring fresh readers to this paper, and I have been the recipient of many congratulations on account of them. The story which will contain the incident depicted on next week's cover will be entitled "A Fatal Fascination," and will be written by Mr. Walter J. Mowbray, whose name is familiar to you all. This tale will be a splendid one, and you will miss a treat if you do not read it.

LET me say one word in advance about our Valentine Number. This special number will take the place of the ordinary issue of February 13th, and will be an exceptionally brilliant one. It will be full of valentine stories and illustrations, and the cover picture will be a seasonable one. Three weeks from now it will be ready; next week I will tell you something more about it.

IN our Christmas Number the fifth problem appeared. "The Duty of Roger Forbes" explained how that gentleman, intending to marry on a small allowance, was suddenly confronted with the hindrance, owing to the misdemeanour of his father, of being morally bound to support his mother and invalid sister. What had he better do? Marry or not marry? This question was, in my opinion, most satisfactorily answered by Mr. Thomas Pine, 19, Cardigan Road, Kingston, Portsmouth. I have much pleasure, therefore, in awarding that gentleman the guinea I offered.

I am busily now deciding the winners in the Statue and Running Riddles Competitions, announced in the Christmas Number. As soon as I possibly can I will award the prizes.

Before I close my chat to you, I wish to make a few remarks on a subject which will interest all of you, whether you are men or women, young or old, poor or wealthy, a celebrity or otherwise. I have in store for you a very great surprise, and, I may also say, quite an unexpected surprise in every way. It is not yet time, however, for me to divulge much, but I have spoken this little foreword of advice so that you may be on the look-out for announcements of this novel scheme I have in view in forthcoming numbers of Short Stories. For your own sake, take my hint and keep your eyes open for further particulars of what will be an immense advantage to everyone concerned. It is a scheme that is quite novel, totally dissimilar to any idea ever published.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

Miss Britman's Last Lesson.

The Tale of a Lover who Returned.

"One, two, three, four! One, two, three, four!"

It was dreary and monotonous enough sitting all day in that cheerless room beside the tuneless piano, giving lessons to dull children, and Margaret Britman heaved a sigh of relief after the last pupil departed.

After sitting still for a few minutes, just to realise that her work for the day was over, she stood up, closed the piano, put away the ragged music, and busied herself tidying the room. It was little anyone could do to make the gloomy apartment bright or cheery, but what little lay in her power Miss Britman did before the coming home of Dot.

The round table was pulled in front of the fire, and the frugal tea set out, with a good deal of show and very little substance. Miss Britman knew how to make the most of the solitary muffin Dot enjoyed so, and the tiny pot of ham and chicken paste stood like an island in an ocean of china plate. The majolica teapot was hidden under a crewel cosy, embroidered in the highest of art patterns; the spoons and forks were silver in the last stage of attenuation, and the cloth, though white and fine, was darned out of all identity of the original pattern.

The few bright little water-colours on the walls only made the darkness of the drab paper more visible, and no arrangement of the scanty furniture could disguise the fact that the walls were hopelessly crooked; still, in spite of disadvantages, there was something about the little room that struck one on first entering. Perhaps it was the air of refinement struggling with the aggressive poverty; perhaps it was the pale, patient face of Margaret Britman, with its frame of prematurely grey hair and meek, sorrowful eyes.

Very slowly she moved about, for she was weary, and her thoughts were heavy, for she was anxious about Dot. She had been out as a daily governess for a whole year, but her salary was small and her wants seemed to increase out of all proportion to her earnings. Boots and gloves wore out, hats and gowns got shabby in a frightfully short time; and Miss Britman felt that she could not relax a single effort, or spare herself a single monotonous lesson, for Dot's wants had to be supplied somehow.

Just at five o'clock she came in.

"Take off your things, dear, and have some hot tea. Here are your slippers, all nice and warm."

"Thanks, dearie. Oh, it is nice to get indoors, if you could only imagine what it's like outside, auntie. Streets three inches deep in liquid glue, fog thick enough to drive a nail in and hang your cloak on——"

"Dot!" Miss Britman interposed mildly.

"Fact, auntie. I was really bewildered at Regent Circus, and had to throw myself on the mercy of a policeman; then an obsequious young man followed me all down Oxford Street, and kept bobbing his umbrella against mine."

"Oh, my darling, that you should have to endure such things!" Miss Britman cried, and her slender white fingers were interlocked nervously. "Oh, that I could spare you this, Dorothy."

"Never mind, auntie dear; it doesn't worry me in the least. Besides, I think—but wait a minute till I put away the tea-things and turn down the gas." And having done so, Dot sat down on the rug and laid her head on her aunt's lap. "I've got something to tell you, auntie."

"Yes, darling," Miss Britman said, after waiting a few minutes, for Dot was in no great hurry to begin.

"Aunt Margaret, did it never strike you that some day or other I might have a lover?" she said slowly.

"Dorothy! Dorothy! I never thought of that!" Miss Britman cried. "Darling, I can't give you to anyone; you are all I have in the world."

"Let me tell you all about it first, auntie," Dot said gravely. "It came about in the simplest way—so simple that I scarcely know how or when it began. It seems as if Mr. Ferris always came into the schoolroom, but I never thought much about it till to-day, when he looked at me so strangely, and held my hand ever such a time; then he said, 'Miss Derwent, I want to have a little serious conversation with you. May I call on you at home?' Of course, I said I should be very pleased, only I was never there in the daytime. 'Then may I call in your absence,' he said, 'and speak to your father?' I told him I had no one but you, auntie, and he seemed surprised for a moment; then he said he'd call on you to-morrow. I suppose he wants to ask your permission to marry me. What else can he want, auntie?"

"What, indeed!" Miss Britman said, a little absently. "Tell me a little about this Mr. Ferris, darling."

"There's not much to tell, auntie. He's Mrs. Carnforth's brother, and has been in India ever so long—twenty years, I believe. He's very rich and very kind, and—that's all, auntie. Just think of my marrying a rich man," Dot continued reflectively, "and having servants, carriages, lovely dresses—everything! It seems just like a fairy-tale!"

"But, Dot," Miss Britman said, after a long silence, "my dear little one, do you love this Mr. Ferris?"

"Love him, auntie? I don't know! I haven't thought much about that yet; but if he's nice and kind and rich, don't you think we might be very happy? I do so want you to have lots of pretty things—soft, dull satin, a sealskin mantle, real lace! Oh, dear! It would be nice. You'd look so sweet in a sealskin coat, auntie!"

Miss Britman sighed gently. The time had long gone by when dress had any charms for her, if, indeed, it ever had, and Dot's visions only made her more sad.

Clearly the child was slipping away from her. For eighteen years she had cherished her, and now the first person who passed by and saw her fresh, fair, young beauty, might bear her away. It was all just and natural—palpably and practically for Dot's good—still, it was bitterly hard; and Miss Britman sat by the dying fire thinking it all over, and weeping in her unobtrusive way, long after the child had laid her sunny head on her pillow and fallen asleep.

Digitized by Google

Far away into the past Miss Britman's thoughts wandered to a hushed and darkened chamber, where she bent down to catch the last faint, fluttering accents of one who was lingering on the threshold of eternity.

"My child, Maggie—my poor baby—my almost as helpless husband—you will not forsake them? Promise me, Maggie, that you will take care of them?"

And Margaret Britman kissed her dying sister's face and promised. All the remembrance of the dreary, dreadful days that followed rushed upon her—Dot, a helpless infant, her father, stricken with blindness, both depending on Maggie.

Then in the midst of it all came a still greater trial.

The gentleman Margaret was engaged to was offered a lucrative appointment in India, and he wished her to go with him. They had been engaged for three years, and now there was nothing further to wait for.

Here was a divided duty. Margaret loved the man she had promised to marry, but how could she forsake the helpless baby, and its equally helpless father? How could she keep her promise to her dead sister if she went to India?

Her lover left her in anger.

"A divided love such as hers was not worth having," he said.

"But they are so helpless," she pleaded, "only let me stay with them a little while."

"You may stay with them for ever for me," was the angry reply, and the next day came a little packet of letters and a lock of golden hair, and Margaret Britman's romance was hidden out of sight for ever.

A few years, and Robert Derwent died, leaving nothing but difficulties behind him. Miss Britman took a lodging in a distant part of the city, and toiled for the child for long, weary years, late and early, through trials that would have overwhelmed a less resolute and devoted woman; she toiled on to give her niece a good education, and enable her to earn her own bread when she should be called away.

"Can you—will you forgive me?" asked Philip beseechingly.

And now, here was someone stepping in—Philip Ferris returned from India—Philip Ferris who had said farewell to her in anger eighteen years before—the one love and lover of her life was coming to see her next day to ask for the child—the motherless baby who had so unwittingly separated them eighteen years before. It certainly was passing strange.

The next day was grey and gloomy, fog overhead, damp underfoot, cold everywhere, but Dot was in high spirits, in spite of the atmosphere.

"I dare say Mr. Ferris will be shocked at seeing what a hideous house and street we live in, auntie. I can imagine him saying, 'What a distinctly dreadful place!' In truth, I sha'n't be sorry to leave Berry Street. Now, good-bye, dear. Be very gracious to Mr. Ferris; and, oh, auntie darling! I do hope you'll like him, because, you know, we've got to live with him, perhaps."

"Dot, my love, do you really think that you like this gentleman well enough to marry him? He's old enough to be your father."

"So he is, auntie dear; but that doesn't matter much if he's nice and kind and ever so rich—and he is."

Nice and kind, and ever so rich. That was Dot's idea of a husband, and her aunt felt sad and sorry, and in some way disappointed; she did not know where the child had got such ideas. And then came the awful thought of losing her, for she remembered what Mr. Ferris had said about a divided love. She would have but a small place in Dot's new home and new life.

Never did a day seem so long to Miss Britman. She had put on her best black dress in the morning, and taken a little extra care with the arrangement of her still abundant hair; that was all the external preparation she had made for the visit, but her heart throbbed wildly at every ring of the bell or step on the carpetless stairs. But the morning passed—three, four o'clock, and she breathed more freely; perhaps he wouldn't come that day, perhaps he wouldn't come at all.

So she went on more patiently with her pupil, a dull, tiresome child.

"One, two, three, four!" she repeated over and over again. She did not hear the step on the stairs, nor a gentle tap at the door, did not observe it open, and when she looked up Philip Ferris stood beside her. For a moment her brain reeled, and she had to hold on to the back of the chair to steady herself; then she held out her hand in welcome.

"You may go now, my dear, and I'll give you the remainder of your lesson to-morrow," she said gently, and the child wriggled off the stool and departed joyfully.

"Margaret!" That was all he said when they were alone, with one hand holding one of hers, and the other on her shoulder: "Margaret!"

"You have come to speak to me about—about Dorothy," she faltered, feeling all the colour forsake her face.

"No; I have come to speak about myself and you—to ask you to forgive me, if you can; to ask you to let me make atonement for my cruelty and folly; to ask you if it is too late for us to be happy even now. Dear, I only learnt yesterday how true and loyal you had been; I fancied I alone was faithful. Can you, will you forgive me, Margaret?"

"There is nothing to forgive, Philip."

"Then it is not too late. We may be happy still."

"But Dorothy?" Miss Britman said faintly.

"Dorothy knows. It was her resemblance to you that first attracted me. But the child must not come between us and our happiness a second time, and we will both take care of her. She will like me better as an uncle than as a husband."

"But, Philip, she thought——"

"Yes, dear, but now she understands. Margaret, you belong to me, and you must be obedient, so prepare to leave Berry Street to-morrow."

"But my pupils, Philip?"

"Dear, I will arrange all that. My brave, patient Maggie, you have given your last lesson."

Hal Smith.

Digitized by Google

The Curious Case of a Man who Lost his Memory.

DID I imagine it, or was I awakened by a kiss, which fell upon my forehead with the gentleness of a snowflake?

There was an interval of several moments before I could open my eyes, and when I did so there was not a soul except myself in the room.

For some time I lay in a languid state, my brain too indolent even to trouble itself about the person who had kissed me—if it were a kiss. But at length I was aroused by the opening of a door, and a moment after a woman stood by my bedside, bending over me with a look of kind solicitude. She was young, and there was an indescribable charm about her presence. Yet, even in my indolent state, I realised that she was not handsome.

"You are better?" she said in a sweet, firm voice.

The hand which she placed upon my forehead as she spoke was firm in its touch also, and I instinctively realised that the owner possessed a resolute nature in spite of her gentleness.

"I—I have been very ill?" I inquired, in a voice which somehow sounded to me as strange and new as her own.

"You had a fall and were injured," she said, adding with an eager look which I did not then understand, "but I suppose you do not yet recall your adventure?"

"I do not remember," was my indifferent response.

"I would not try. It doesn't matter at all. Here is something you were to drink when you awoke to consciousness—if you did awake. Then you were to go to sleep directly."

With her strong, experienced arm my unknown friend raised my head to drink the cordial, which I accepted submissively. Afterwards I slept, I know not how long, and upon again awakening, my plain-faced, sweet-voiced nurse was still at my bedside. Her hand again rested upon my head while she spoke in a quiet, reassuring voice:

"The doctor says you'll soon be about again, you are so much better. He is here, and wishes to speak with you."

She paused, and a short, grey-bearded man, whose presence had not before been noticed, advanced, and I felt the power of his gaze upon me. I say power because he was unquestionably a man of great magnetic force, aside from his skill in medical practice.

"Dr. Barlow," said my nurse, and then, in her quiet way, she withdrew.

"You will be all right again in a few days, sir," were his first words, spoken with an assurance that quieted the slight flutter in my mind which threatened to confuse me.

"I am glad to hear you say so," I replied.

"You are aware that your illness was the result of an injury?" he continued, speaking in a careless tone.

I contracted my brows in a sudden spasm of thought. A strange, wild flood of questions rushed in upon my mind, and I believe the doctor's cool hand laid upon my head at that moment saved me from going mad.

"You cannot recall the event, so do not try," he quietly said.

I started up in bed, but he forced me to lie down again.

"You may get up and dress to-morrow," he added calmly.

"Tell me how it happened!" I exclaimed, the impulse to know the cause of my illness growing strong upon me.

"You were found upon the road and were picked up for dead. They brought you here and I attended you."

Again I started up in bed, and this time the doctor restrained me only partially. He regarded me with deep interest, but betrayed not the slightest sign of anxiety, although he must have been intensely anxious all the while. The flood of queries which, half incoherently, had already shaped themselves in my mind, now rushed to my lips.

"How came I in the road?" I demanded.

And before Dr. Barlow could have uttered a reply, had he tried to do so, I rapidly continued:

"And when was I found there? And whose house is this? And my pleasant-voiced nurse—who is she? Doctor, tell me—who am I?"

My brain was in a whirl as I uttered these queries, and I shivered as with the ague. But Dr. Barlow listened as impassively as though it all were the most commonplace matter in the world. His persistent calmness in a measure communicated itself to me, and his answers were given with such a reassuring voice and air that the shock to me was greatly lessened. There are few men who could have conveyed the truth to one in my excited state with such tact and gentleness.

"You met with your misfortune some three weeks ago," he said in his even tones. "This is my house, and the young nurse is my daughter. It is nothing so very unusual for a person, under some violent shock, either physical or mental, to lose for a time all recollection of past events, and even of one's own identity. You will recover in time. There was nothing upon your person to give us a clue to your name, but for the sake of convenience, since we must call you something, my daughter has called you Paul Conway. If you do not fancy the name, you may adopt any other, until your memory recalls the one to which you are entitled."

Somehow his candid statement of the situation, instead of exciting, calmed me. I lay back upon my pillow, and, overcome by the exertion, I soon fell asleep.

My physical recovery from that day was rapid. Within a week I was dressed and able to walk about my room; in another week I was strolling about the doctor's tasteful grounds, listening to the songs of birds, enjoying the luxury of the fresh verdure and June sunshine. Miss Barlow was with me frequently, and I was presently puzzled by a conviction that she watched my movements, studied my countenance, and even appeared to wish to keep me under constant surveillance. And yet she was otherwise so courteous, and in all ways so gentle and unselfish in her intentions, that as the weeks passed the sweet episode of love crept into the new life I was living. For as yet the past remained as a sealed book to me.

One day, as we were strolling down the garden path, I abruptly said to her:

Digitized by Google

"I think I am quite well and strong now, and it is time for me to go to work at something." For it had more than once occurred to me that, with other things, I had forgotten the means of gaining a livelihood which I must once have possessed.

"Perhaps you do not need to work, if you could only remember who you are. Perhaps you are a man of wealth?" said Miss Barlow, with one of her smiles which always made her plain face so beautiful.

"It will do me little good if I am, since I do not know it," I replied.

"You must remain here until you recover your memory," she said, so decisively that I looked at her in surprise.

"You wish me to stay as a charity patient?"

"No, no. You will pay my father some time. You are under under his care, you know, and he is ambitious to effect a cure."

As she said this she laid one hand in an eager, earnest way upon my arm. I felt that, looking into my eyes as she did then, she could not fail to read my heart, and in impassioned words I essayed to tell her of the deep, pure love which I felt for her. But she checked me in a hurried, anxious manner.

"No, no!" she cried.

I could see that her face had grown deathly pale, and she glanced, involuntarily as it seemed, at a ring which I had more than once seen upon her finger. I was convinced then of what I had painfully suspected before—it was an engagement ring.

"You have an attachment already?" I exclaimed, unable to keep the pain of disappointment from showing itself in my face and voice.

"Do not ask me now," was her reply, with a glance that I could not understand, while it thrilled me strangely. "Wait until you are well," she continued falteringly, "and I will tell you all. How do I know that you are free to love me? You may have a wife already. Even you do not know."

She smiled again and hurried into the house, leaving me alone to ponder upon the strangeness of my situation. As I stood under the shadow of a high-growing hedge I heard the sound of voices upon the other side.

"All I want is a good look at him," said one in a subdued voice. "I can spot him easily enough. You say this invalid guest of the Barlows is of dark complexion, and not over tall?"

"That is his description," declared the other.

"And that he came here about ten weeks ago?"

"Yes."

"You have seen him strolling about the grounds, you say? And did you notice one hand—his left one, I believe?"

"It has a red scar across the back of it. Yes; I noticed that."

"Good! Then there remains scarce the shadow of a doubt but he is the man. But I must make haste slowly. We detectives have to keep our eyes open. It is possible the Barlow girl——"

He paused abruptly, and the two men walked away, leaving me to conjecture, with my mind in a tumult, their meaning. For a long time I remained there, thinking—thinking, and gazing at my left hand with the scar across the back of it. Oh, the missing link in my memory! I began to suspect that it contained a horrible episode that would unseat my reason if it were ever recalled.

I could not quite make up my mind to tell Alice Barlow that night of the conversation which I had overheard.

Retiring early to my room, I was overcome by a sense of drowsiness, and fell asleep in an easy chair. I was awakened by a hurried knocking at my door. Flinging it open, I was confronted by Alice, who seemed clad for a journey, while her countenance was the picture of womanly strength and resolution.

"Come, Mr. Conway," she said, in low, imperative voice. "My father is at the door with his carriage, and wishes us to go with him. Hasten, if you would spare me calamity!"

"Whither are we to go?" I asked, while I obediently donned a light overcoat and hat and followed her down the stairs.

"To the railway station," was her answer.

"And thence?"

"I do not know."

I was silent until we were all three in the carriage and speeding along the quiet road.

"I suppose this is an attempt to preserve me from falling into the hands of the detectives?" I then asked.

"Then you know?" the doctor quickly asked, looking intently into my face.

"I know, from something overheard, that I am under surveillance, but why I have not the remotest idea."

"Your memory is still silent, then?"

"Yes."

"Well, well, I cannot enlighten you, except that the officers are after a man of your description. They will arrest you if you stay here, and they refuse to accept even my assurance that you have no recollection of the past. Your only course is in flight."

"But it does not devolve upon you to become a partner in my misfortunes," I remonstrated.

"You are my patient, and I shall not allow anything to happen to deprive me of the glory of curing you, if I can help it," he decisively said.

Nothing would be gained by giving in detail the particulars of our rapid flight. Dr. Barlow had shrewdly bought tickets to to a point where he had no intention or making our destination, and here he obtained others for a secluded Continental town.

Of that journey I have now only a vague recollection, for before it had ended I was again ill, and very ill. The past weeks had been fraught with a constant struggle on my part to recall past events—a struggle the intensity of which even I did not realise. And now the discovery that I was wanted for a crime I was not able to withstand. For weeks I was ill with brain fever.

* * * * *

Again in languor and weakness I awoke to a sense of my surroundings. Again Alice Barlow, calm, gentle, faithful, attended my slightest wants. What passed in my thoughts during succeeding days and weeks would fill a volume if I were to write it out. We talked of many things in a light, placid vein. Dr. Barlow told me quaint stories, and we all laughed at them, but my strength came back very slowly.

One evening I fell into a half doze, from which I was awakened by someone coming softly into my room. I knew it was Alice, and did not open my eyes, until—softly as a snowflake again—a kiss fell upon my forehead. Then I looked up into the dearest of faces bending over me, and in a moment held one of her hands in mine—the one that wore the ring. Did I say she was plain looking? Ah, she was positively beautiful then!

"May I remove that, Alice?" I asked, touching the ring.

"No, no!" she quickly cried.

"Then you still love the one that placed it there?"

She was silent, but her face answered so plainly that it was strange that I could remain so calm.

"You promised to tell me about it some day," I persisted.

"When you were well," she answered.

As she spoke her eyes met mine, and for one lingering moment she gazed, and then this strong, placid young woman was sobbing joyfully in my arms.

For days the memory of my past life had been coming back to me, and I remembered the occurrence which had caused the paralysing shock to my brain, and ended in my becoming a fugitive from the authorities. I had an enemy who, in a moment of frenzy, attacked me, and partly in self-defence and partly by inadvertence, I had taken his life. There were no witnesses, but circumstances would have convicted me of a wilful crime. In my heart, and before God, I was blameless.

"And you believed me innocent from the first?" I asked, when I had told Alice all the details.

"Yes. But I should have clung to you the same had you been guilty."

For Alice and I were betrothed before the cloud came upon my memory.

It was I who gave her the ring.

H. Kennedy.

Digitized by Google

Easily Explained.

HE: "I'm surprised that your father gave his consent." She: "Oh, he doesn't know you as well as I do."

A Difficult Query.

MR. B. (during the quarrel): "Well, if you want to know it, I married you for your money." Mrs. B.: "I wish I could tell as easily what I married you for."

Two at a Game.

HE (who prides himself on his bluntness): "I say, Miss Newton, let's get married." Miss Newton: "Oh, all right. I'm engaged to Mr. Goodwin. Who'll you marry?"

An Inducement to Marriage.

FRIEND: "You received a good many presents, didn't you?" Bride: "Yes, and just think how nice—most of them are from married friends, and we won't have to give them any in return."

Too Broad a Hint.

"HERE'S a story of a couple who married to win a bet," she said. "I'm not a betting man," he returned hastily. Soon after he took his leave, and he didn't really breathe freely until he was three streets away.

A Cooking Secret.

MR. ECONOMIE: "Did you write to that man who advertises to show people how to make puddings without milk, and have them richer?" Mrs. Economie: "Yes, and sent him a shilling." "What did he reply?" "Use cream."

A Proposed Change of Name.

SUITOR (to German governess): "Now, Miss Baum-wollerstein-er—Miss Woller-baum-erstein—confound it! Since I shall never be able to pronounce your name, will you put me out of my misery, and take mine—plain Jones?"

The Dear Friends.

MAUD: "If that young Spoonamore had been coming to see me as persistently as he's been coming to see you, I'd have made him declare himself long before this time." Irene: "Yes, dear. I presume that's the reason why he never went to see you."

A Young Bargain Hunter.

MR. DE FLIRTE: "So you've been hiding behind the screen, and have seen me kiss your sister, Tommy? Well, I've given you a shilling not to tell, you know." Tommy: "Yes, but I want two shillings. I saw you kiss my other sister when I was hiding behind the shrubs in the conservatory."

A Perversion of the Truth.

"YES," said Mrs. Catchem; "those are my daughters over there on the sofa. They have half a million between them." It was not until they were married to those daughters that the young men who overheard the remark found out that Mrs. Catchem referred to the rich old gentleman who sat on the sofa between the girls. Mrs. Catchem couldn't tell a fib, but she knew how to speak the truth advantageously

A Recipe to Avoid Marriage.

"How is it you have kept from marrying, being such a ladies' man?" Ned: "By never being in love with fewer than three girls at once."

A Matter of Comparison.

HE: "Are you happy now that you are married?" She: "Comparatively." He: "Compared with whom?" She: "Compared with my husband."

A Young Married Couple.

"WHY, Charles, if I didn't actually see you yawn just now." "Well, dearest, you know that we are now one, and I never can keep awake when I'm alone."

A Worse Danger.

SHE: "Because I cannot marry you, do not be disheartened. You must face the world bravely." He: "It isn't a question of the world—I've got to face my creditors."

Pointed.

HE: "See the ring round the moon?" She: "Yes." After a moment's silence: "George, can you tell me what is the difference between the moon and my finger?"

The Reason Why.

MRS. KINDLER (reflectively): "I wonder why a man never pays his wife any compliments after they are married?" Kindler (briskly): "He does better, my dear—he pays her bills."

That's So.

PAPA: "I think nineteen is altogether too early for a girl to marry. Don't you?" Mamma: "Well, yes; but I remember the time when I didn't, and I remember the time when you didn't."

She was Right.

MABEL: "Did you hear that Bessie Willis was married yesterday to Tom Errol?" Maud: "Really? I thought she would be the last person to marry him." Mabel: "Well, she was, wasn't she?"

A Red Letter Day.

SHE: "Do you remember, Frank, the night you proposed to me I hung my head and said nothing?" He: "Do I remember it? Well I should rather think I did. It was the last time I saw you act so."

At a Dance.

DANCER (wandering vaguely with lady in search of a vacancy for a couple in the lancers, addressing lady friend): "Are you made up?" "Well, really, Mr. Legley, your question is extremely personal!"

Hastened Footsteps.

"WHAT are you doing there, Jennie?" shouted her father. "I'm just saying good-night to George." "Well, as it takes you so long I will say it for you. Good-night, George." George went so quickly that he forgot to reply.

Just Like a Woman.

IDA: "Walter has broken the engagement between him and Della." May: "Well, I suppose she is still grateful for the boxes of chocolate he used to bring her every Sunday?" Ida: "Quite the contrary. She says he ruined her teeth."

Conceited Hubby!

SHE (after marriage): "You told me that I was your first love, but I have found a whole trunkful of letters from all sorts of girls, just bursting with tenderness." He: "I—I said you were the first I ever loved. I didn't say you were the only one who ever loved me."

Wanted Further Particulars.

MR. SAMPSON (passionately): "I love you devotedly, Miss Chumley, but my pecuniary affairs have prevented my making a declaration until now. But I have put enough away now to feel justified in asking you to become my wife." Miss Chumley (hesitating, but sweetly): "I confess that I am not wholly indifferent to you, but—but——" "But what, dear?" "Would you mind telling me how much you have put away?"

Digitized by Google

AVENGED.

The Story of a Flirtation that was Repaid.

THE old clock in the wall rang out five melodious chimes as Cora Smith softly closed the kitchen door and ran to the little bedroom for her blue scarf.

"Five o'clock," she said, as the last stroke died away; "he is wondering why I don't come, and I must make haste. Madge, little Madge, are you coming with me to-night? I am all ready."

Little Madge, her twelve-year-old sister, came flying through the hall.

"Auntie wants you for a little while. Never mind if he does have to wait for you; you've waited for him many a time. Come quickly, and I will help you."

So sweet-tempered Cora Smith untied the blue scarf, and tripped away to her aunt as merrily as her little sister, albeit her heart beat like an imprisoned bird's at the delay.

The west was all aflame with the autumn sunset ere the sisters closed the cottage door behind them, and ran down the garden path towards the stile, where he was waiting—in other words, where hazel-eyed, sweet-faced Cora Smith's lover was waiting for his lady love, as she had many a night waited for him.

Almost every evening they met there at the stile—their "trysting place," he said, just half way between her home and the house where he was lodging. He had proposed it, and she was nothing loth to accede—it was so pretty and romantic.

Then Auntie Smith was not at all pleased with this dark-eyed young stranger, and, though she had not forbidden him the house, both lovers knew she preferred "his room to his company." And so, always with dear little Madge at her side, she daily tripped down the path through the leafy woods to the halfway trysting place where she met her handsome, dark-eyed lover, Neil Rowan. How her heart fluttered to-night as she thought of him, and the warm lovelight deepened and darkened the soft brown eyes!

"Neil, Neil," she said, almost unconsciously, aloud; and little Madge clasped her sister's hand closer, and looked up in her face.

"Do you love him so very much, sister Cora?"

A swift, hot colour came into the girl's cheeks, and then she paused suddenly, holding the hands of little Madge in a fervent grasp.

"Love him! love him, Madge! better than all the world—better than my youth, my life—aye, sometimes I fear better than my hope of Heaven! And I am to be his wife, little Madge, this good man's wife, when the beautiful Spring comes I shall leave you and auntie and uncle to be all his. But this is our secret, little sister, and only you can share it."

And then her hands relaxed their hold, and drawing the light scarf over her shoulders, she tripped silently on. They were almost there—nearing the edge of the wood, and the stile was but a step away. Another step forward, and there Madge held her sister back.

"Wait!" she whispered; "I can see two men on the seat, Cora. We do not want to meet strangers there."

"No, no," she replied, drawing back in the shadow of the wood; "it is Neil's friend, Willis Dean. We will wait until he goes, for I do not like to meet him."

Even as she spoke the figure rose, and the sound of his voice came on the twilight air, distinct and clear:

"And what of this love affair, Neil? When is it to end, and how? Are you really in earnest, and do you mean to marry the girl?"

Cora Smith's hand closed upon the arm of Madge till she shrank in pain while they waited for the answer.

Neil Rowan laughed softly.

"Marry her!" he repeated. "She is just the subject for a grand flirtation, and I assure you I have done the thing well. But for anything further—bah! I am going back to town to-morrow, and this is our last meeting; so be off, old fellow, for I expect her every moment."

Just for one moment Madge Smith's heart stood still in awful fear, for she thought Cora was dying. That white, ghastly face there in the twilight, that motionless figure, those tightly locked hands, it surely was not the fair, sweet maiden of a moment before. But the spasm passed, and without a word she rose and glided noiselessly away, and Madge followed her in silence.

Neil Rowan waited until the light had quite died out of the west, and the dew lay like summer rain on the grass at his feet. His cigar was smoked down to ashes, and he prepared to go.

"She isn't coming to-night," he said, mentally; "that is certain. The scheming auntie up yonder managed to prevent it this time. Oh, well, it saves a scene. I will drop a loving farewell note, and so it ends—a summer's amusement. Well, well!" and Neil Rowan strolled homeward, singing half unconsciously, "I won't have her, I know—I won't have her, I know—I don't care a straw who has her, I know."

The farewell note came to Cora Smith the following night;

Digitized by Google

but the fever-bright eyes never rested on the creamy page, for ere the insane light gave place to reason again—death sealed the white eyelids. To such natures as this girl's, love is life; and the rude blow that woke her from the one bright dream of her youth snapped the slender cord that bound her frail spirit to earth, and out of the depths of her awful grief the kindly hand of Death led her to the mountain top, where is built the city of the New Jerusalem.

Day by day, week by week, month by month, so sped the time until eight years were counted. Eight times the grass had grown over the little grave in the lonely country graveyard, and again the October winds rustled the scarlet leaves over the narrow mound.

Wonderful changes had the eight years brought. Side by side with this grave were two others, and the headstones bore the names of good Aunt and Uncle Smith. They had rested there six years; and every summer beautiful Madge Smith came down from her town mansion, and lingered in the old home a week, trimming the grasses and planting bright flowers on the mounds. Bright, beautiful Madge Smith, the heiress of all Uncle Smith's hidden wealth, the wealth he guarded so well during that toil-worn, weary life.

Three years before Madge Smith had left school, to reign queen of Society. Beautiful, strangely beautiful, with that cold, white, high-bred face, those wide, fathomless, glittering, amber eyes, a figure matchless in symmetry and grace, accomplished, polished, and the heiress of great wealth, no wonder that lovers, old and young, knelt at Madge Smith's shrine. Strange wonder, the world said, that all were scorned—not gently and with words of pity and apology, but spurned from her very feet with scornful lips and blazing eyes.

Madge Smith was an enigma and mystery to all who knew her. No warmer friend, no brighter companion did those of her own sex seek for.

But never were those lips seen to smile, or those wonderful eyes to soften, in response to any lover's; no glacier was more frigid than she to all men.

All? Nay, Dame Rumour had plenty of gossip just now. Only a few weeks since a new arrival appeared on the scene of action.

Neil Rowan, merchant and millionaire, entered the list of Madge Smith's adorers—not for her wealth surely, Mrs. Grundy acknowledged graciously. He had enough of his own. It was genuine love that this handsome man of Society felt for beautiful Madge.

A wonderful change had come over the fair lady since his appearance. Bright before, she was brilliant now—sparkling, witty, bewildering; and the world looked on in amazement to see the flush stain her white cheek, and the bright smile that lighted her eyes at his approach.

And did he not recognise her, you are wondering? Nay, how should he? Sweet Cora Smith and the summer in the country were forgotten things with this man. He had broken half a dozen silly hearts since then, and left them all with Time, the great healer. He had flirted with Society's queens and village maidens innumerable, and left the past all behind him. And now he came and laid the first pure, real love of his lifetime at this woman's feet. So he told her one autumn night in the beautiful drawing-room of her stately home.

How her hands trembled and her eyes shone as she listened!

"Wait," she said; "I will give you my answer to-morrow night. It is my birthday, and I shall give an entertainment. You will come; I will answer you then. Be in the library at ten, and you shall hear my answer."

And the night came, and he was there waiting. He paced the room impatiently. Would she ever come, this girl that was dearer than his life? Yes, she was life to him.

"My beautiful queen!" he said softly. And just then he heard the light ripple of a woman's laugh in the adjoining room. Her laugh; he knew it among a thousand; and her voice. She was speaking loud and clear.

"There, Mr. Maesfield, you must excuse me for a minute. Mr. Rowan is waiting for me in the library. You know I am to give him his answer to-night."

And the other's voice, speaking tenderly, said:

"And I can guess that answer, little Madge. You are going to marry this man and leave us all."

She laughed softly.

"Marry him? No, indeed, sir! He is just the subject for a grand flirtation, and I assure you I have acted my part well. But for anything further—bah! Yet, he is expecting me, so by-bye till I come again," and she tripped lightly through the half-open door.

A white, ghastly, shivering figure stood by the library window.

"For Heaven's sake, Madge, tell me you were jesting!" he cried, as brilliantly, glowingly beautiful, she glided into the room.

"Not so, my friend," she answered lightly; "I spoke the truth. If you overheard my words I need not repeat them. It is my answer."

"But you gave me hope; you led me on; you have given me reason to think you loved me!" he cried passionately. "It is the one love of my life! I have centred every hope and thought on you, Madge, and for my sake, for God's sake, do not wreck my life!"

She was very pale now, and her eyes were black and glistening.

"Neil Rowan," she said slowly, "I have prayed for this hour for eight years; but never in my wildest dreams did I think my prayer would be so fully answered. When I saw the hue of death, the white agony, on my only sister's cheek—when I saw her writhe in speechless agony at the words she heard eight years ago to-night, I vowed to avenge her, God being my helper.

"Again, when I heard the thud of the earth upon her coffin, I vowed that vow. God has brought it about even sooner, more complete, than I thought. If I have given you one hour of such agony as she suffered I am content. If you could live and suffer it for countless ages I should be better content. My work is ended. Good night!"

Two hours afterwards the sharp report of a pistol rang with startling distinctness through the crowded drawing-room.

All present sprang to their feet except Madge Smith. Perhaps her cheek paled a little—I cannot tell; but the light of her eye never changed, her smiling lips never relaxed, as she gazed upon the blood-stained body in the library.

Neil Rowan had taken his own life, and Cora Smith was avenged.

Avenged—fully and adequately.

May Harvey.

HANDWRITING DENOTES YOUR CHARACTER.

And if you wish to learn what this is send a specimen of your handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope, to RANKE, 23 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. A reliable delineation of your character will be sent in return.

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID NEW SERIAL. YOU CAN START TO-DAY.

Dupes of Destiny

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT

By Blanche Eardley, Writer of "The Bond Between."

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS IN THIS STORY ARE:

SIR CYPRIAN RUST, who has inherited the baronetcy and estates of Sir Basil Wingate, though he is not the legal heir.

MARCELLA RUST, his daughter, a very lovely girl, who is greatly in love with

PHILIP NULLIUS, the curate of Crawley Village, where the home of Sir Cyprian, Wingate Court, is situated.

LADY VIOLET FRAYNE-LENNOX, whom Marcella believes to be her aunt. She is a very beautiful woman, and loves her niece dearly, but Sir Cyprian has, for some reason, immense power over her, which he uses to further his own ends.

EDWARD DAY is an orphan whom Lady Violet has befriended. He, however, in making unreturned love to Marcella, insults her, and Lady Violet refuses to have anything more to do with him.

CALEB J. JOHNSON, a City magnate and millionaire, who marries Lady Violet, though he knows that her husband is still alive. This husband, MAJOR RICHARD FRAYNE-LENNOX, is a good-for-nothing, who has been turned out of the Army. Lady Violet believes him dead.

TWENTY-SECOND CHAPTER.

"Don't Send Me Back!"

"MARCELLA left the Court!" Lady Violet murmured. "What can it mean? What has sent her away?" Then turning to her new-made husband, she said quickly:

"Caleb, I cannot go away; I must stay and wait. I could not bear to be away from London when Marcella needs me, and I feel somehow"—her voice faltered slightly—"that she wants me badly!"

They returned to Grosvenor Place instead of going to Dover, as they had intended, and it was a strangely quiet bridal couple that sat in the brougham.

The financier was wondering as to his next move concerning his agitated bride. She had apparently forgotten that she had promised to love, honour, and obey him only a short time since; and Lady Violet was oblivious to everything and everyone except that something had happened to the girl she loved—that while she had been making preparations for her wedding with the "Gold King," Marcella had been driven to flight from the Court; and knowing what life could be made for any creature upon whom Sir Cyprian's hatred fell, Lady Violet shivered lest Marcella had incurred that bitter enmity of the man she called "father."

When she and Mr. Johnson were left alone by the curious servants, who knew that something unusual had stopped the honeymoon, Lady Violet turned to him impetuously:

"Forgive me for appearing neglectful, Caleb," she said, with a faint attempt at a smile, "but I cannot go away until I am sure of what has happened to Marcella."

"I understand," he replied soothingly, "but because the girl has had a tiff with her father, you must not imagine all sorts of wild things. Marcella is high-spirited, you know, and I daresay Sir Cyprian is not too easy-going himself."

She raised her brows. "What do you know of him? I thought you only met him for the first time here."

A slight flush stained the face of her bridegroom, and for a moment he hesitated, then before she could repeat her question, he answered quickly:

"I know of him, and am also a reader of character. I should say it was an unfortunate thing that Miss Marcella's mother did not live."

A spasm flitted across the pale, beautiful face of Sir Cyprian's sister-in-law.

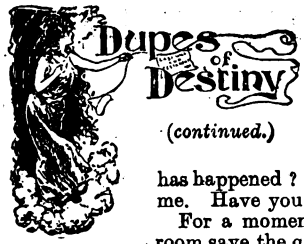
"If Marcella's mother had lived, her life might have been very different. But now I am only anxious to know the worst. Marcella is not the type of girl to be hysterical because her father disagrees with her. I'm afraid—that—that——"

Before she could finish the words in her mouth, there was a violent ring at the hall-door that chased the colour from her face, leaving it a sickly sallow.

"It is Marcella," she said, clasping his hand tightly. "Please, Caleb, let me see her alone!"

As he left the room a tall, slight figure flew past him, and the next moment he heard the sound of two women's voices, one deep and tender, the other frightened and tearful.

Digitized by Google



(continued.)

Lady Violet drew the girl to her with a passionate gesture. "Darling — oh, darling — tell me — what does this mean?" she said quickly. "Why have you run away from the Court like this? What has happened? For pity's sake, Marcella, tell me. Have you quarrelled with Sir Cyprian."

For a moment there was no sound in the room save the quick, uneven breathing of the two women; then Marcella raised her white face from Lady Violet's shoulder, and looked at her with a puzzled expression in her wide eyes—eyes so strangely like those of the woman whose arms were round her. But they looked hunted, as though they had last gazed upon an object of loathing and dread.

"Aunt Violet," she whispered hoarsely. "I can never go back to the Court again—let me stay with you. It would kill me to return."

Lady Violet's grasp tightened on the trembling girl's shoulders. Her face was deathly pale, and in her dress of dove-coloured crêpe de chine—which was a travelling dress as well as wedding garment—she presented a startling figure of daintiness, compared with the dishevelled appearance of the girl in her arms, whose tear-stained face and desperate eyes made her look haggard and worn.

"What has made you feel like this towards your home?" Lady Violet said slowly. "Has anything so dreadful happened, or is this only the result of a disagreement with your father? Have you discovered anything that makes life with Sir Cyprian impossible? Because, my darling girl," she went on pleadingly, "I am afraid, without some good reason, your conduct will be looked upon as childish and petulant."

"I have discovered nothing about my father," Marcella began slowly, and she did not notice that Lady Violet breathed a sigh almost of relief at her words, "but I have been insulted in my father's house by a man to whom I have already made plain that his attentions were odious, and instead of protecting me, my father only appeared to think that I was putting on a coquettish reserve, and he encouraged this hateful creature in his attentions. And," she went on passionately, "they both knew that I had promised to marry Philip Nullius."

Lady Violet started. "They, dear? Who, then, was the man that made you leave your father's roof?"

"Edward Day," Marcella said wearily. "I hate him!"

"Edward Day!" Lady Violet repeated. "Edward Day! Why, I did not know he had dared to annoy you again, let alone in your own home!"

Marcella opened her eyes. "Did you not receive the letter I wrote you, telling you that he was staying with us? I thought you so unkind, Aunt Violet, to have ignored my request to send for that hateful Edward Day, and make him cease annoying me."

The face of the older woman paled.

"I was not aware that the wretched young man had dared to thrust himself upon you at the Court," she said, in a low, ominous voice, "and no letter reached me from you, dear; only your telegram of the other day."

"I sent no telegram," said Marcella hastily; then the eyes of the two women met, and their faces blanched.

"Auntie—oh, I am afraid," Marcella breathed. "Why does my father insist on treating my wishes so callously? I would do anything on earth for him, if only he would not compel me to be with that hateful Edward Day."

"Edward Day!" Lady Violet exclaimed again. "How came he to be staying at the Court? I did not know of it."

"I told you in my letter," Marcella said. "You did not answer it, and I thought you had forgotten me in the preparations for your wedding with Mr. Johnson. Oh, Aunt Violet!" she said bitterly, "I was almost jealous of him when father told me about your engagement. It was wrong. I know, but I had loved to think of you only as my own property."

"So I am, dearest," the older woman replied passionately. "You come first with me always—whatever happens—always remember that, Marcella. I only live for your happiness, child, and separation from you is agony to me." She threw a hasty glance at the closed door. "Mr. Johnson is a sensible man—he will always be glad for me to have you near me, should it be impossible for you to return to the Court. I received no letters from you, darling; they must have been intercepted, and mine to you—but by whom and for what reason I cannot imagine."

"Edward Day must have known that I would write to you, Aunt Violet, and probably he stopped our letters. He knew, and so did father, that I had promised to——" She paused, and over the clear pallor of her skin, a rosy flush mantled.

"That you had promised to marry Mr. Nullius, the curate?" Lady Violet finished softly.

"How did you know?" Marcella cried in surprise. "Since you did not get my letters, who could have told you? Neither father nor Edward Day would accept what I said as being a serious truth—even Philip they seemed to laugh at, and when he went away so suddenly for his holiday, I can't help feeling that they had some secret up their sleeves, for one night I heard them laughing.

"It was when Dr. Slade left, and they were in the library after dinner. I was passing by the open door, when I heard Edward Day say: 'To the curate's pleasant holiday; may it prove as entertaining as he anticipates!'

"Then father laughed, and added: 'And as interesting as we have reason to believe it will be shortly.' So you see, Aunt Violet," she finished sadly, "something is happening that we cannot imagine; they are in league with each other against Philip and against me! Oh, it is a bitter thing for a daughter to say of her father—but I don't trust him, Aunt Violet. I am afraid of what lies in the future."

Lady Violet opened her mouth to speak, then closed it again. She was thinking about the conversation she had overheard in the train some days ago, and which she had allowed to slide into the recesses of her memory, owing to the subsequent events that had followed in its wake.

She reproached herself bitterly for having let her own affairs blot out the fact that Marcella's lover was in some danger. She had been selfish, and had only sought her own peace of mind, while the happiness of the girl clinging so tenderly to her was in jeopardy.

Every moment made it more desperate—more urgent the need for action. That Edward Day had linked his crooked interests with those of her brother-in-law, pointed too obviously to danger for Marcella and the man she loved.

But how could she stave off the evil without revealing to the girl the source from which she had obtained her information? To do that would be to betray more than was wise—more than she dared.

"Tell me what occurred at the Court that made you decide upon such an extreme step as running away, darling?" she said presently.

"It was this," Marcella replied, speaking in a low, hurried voice. "After dinner Edward Day followed me into the drawing room—and in spite of my having spoken to him of my engagement several times, dared to again make love to me. I repulsed him, and then he laughed, and said he had my father's consent, and that he intended to marry me. I tried to leave the room, but he stopped me—and then—and then——"

"Yes," Lady Violet breathed hoarsely. "What then? For Heaven's sake tell me, Marcella."

"He dared to kiss me!" the girl went on, with crimsoning cheeks, "and when I appealed to my father for protection when he entered the room, he only laughed and said that since I permitted the curate to kiss me, it was prudish to object to my cousin, who had asked his permission to pay his addresses to me.

"Oh, Aunt Violet, I don't know what I did," she cried passionately, "but I know I struck someone—Edward Day—and then I found myself in my room. I must have fainted. The first thought I had on regaining my senses was to come to you—to beg you to let me stay with you until Philip is able to marry me. I don't care how poor we are—I would willingly work myself rather than live at the Court."

Digitized by Google

Lady Violet's mouth had shut with a click while she had listened to Marcella's story, and her recital of the blackguardly conduct of the man who still presumed to masquerade as her nephew. She drew the girl to her with a protecting gesture.

"That man, Edward Day, is not my nephew, dearest. Acting in a moment of youthful enthusiasm, when returning from abroad years ago, I adopted the child of a dying woman among the third-class passengers. It was foolish of me to foist him upon my friends as a nephew. Most people knew that years before my half-sister had gone abroad, and they naturally concluded that Edward Day was her child.

"The morning he dared to insult you in my house, I informed him of his true position, and told him to leave my presence. That he should have presumed to follow you to the Court! I can hardly credit such impertinence. I will speak to Sir Cyprian about it. I am glad you came to me, darling. It was your father's telegram that stopped me, as Mr. Johnson and myself were going away!"

Marcella clung to her silently. "And I interfered with your honeymoon! What must you think of me for worrying you, Aunt Violet?"

Lady Violet bit her lips. In her heart she was glad that she had not gone away. She was not in love with the Gold King, but had allowed herself to be married to him through sheer lack of will to oppose him.

"Your—Sir Cyprian will be here soon," she said gently. "His telegram was sent from a station on the way up, so he has probably started."

"I don't want to see him," Marcella exclaimed. "I would rather never look into his face again, Lady Violet. I am afraid of him—there are strange things happening at the Court besides my own troubles! There is a mysterious woman in a locked corridor and the other day I saw a strange man—a man with a black beard——"

Lady Violet stopped the words on her mouth by placing her hand on it with a swift gesture. Her own face was the colour of chalk, only the vivid line of her scarlet mouth showing up the inky coils of hair, and the gleam in her brilliant eyes.

"Hush!" she whispered—and Marcella almost fancied that she heard her teeth chatter—"there is someone outside the door. I saw it moving a moment ago, and your voice carries so remarkably."

They moved apart and glanced silently at the door. Lady Violet was the first to pull herself together.

"It must be Mr. Johnson," she said with a faint smile. "I asked him to wait until I had seen you alone. He probably is tired of being out in the cold; I will open the door and let him in."

But before she could put her words into practice, the door was opened from the outside and a man came into the room. Marcella's eyes sought those of her aunt in a horror of apprehension; the man, smiling at them blandly, and stroking his silk hat with one white hand, was Sir Cyprian Rust!

TWENTY-THIRD CHAPTER.

Between Two Stools.

SIR CYPRIAN was the first to break the silence. He put his hat on a chair, unbuttoned his coat, then bowing towards his sister-in-law, said politely:

"Ah, my dear Violet! Charming as ever, I see! The interesting widow robed in her bridal gown of pearl-tinted hues. A most refreshing sight after a long, tiring journey. I wish my naughty little Marcella looked as dainty as her more mature, but equally beautiful, aunt."

Lady Violet looked at him contemptuously, but the hatred in her voice when she spoke was apparent only to the man.

"I do not for one moment suppose that you came here, and waited outside my door"—with dry emphasis—"for the express purpose of complimenting me upon my appearance, Cyprian. Such Arcadian simplicity would be most foreign to your nature."

Sir Cyprian smiled and rubbed his hands thoughtfully. "Smartness was always your most salient point, my dear Violet. You really excel in crispness of dialogue occasionally. But I will acquaint you and my silent little girl over there—who has not greeted her father with that loving abandon so precious to parents—with the real object of my inopportune visit. I have come to take back to the Court my runaway daughter. She has been very troublesome lately, and given me grave cause for anxiety, but I will say nothing about that—now."

Marcella, like one roused from a trance, turned to Lady Violet, and cried passionately:

"I, can't go back, Aunt Violet. Don't let me go—let me stay with you—I cannot go back—now!"

The arms of the older woman closed round the trembling figure tenderly, and over the girl's head her eyes met those smiling and apparently fathomless depths of Sir Cyprian.

"I wish you to grant me the favour of keeping Marcella with me," she said quietly. "She may return to the Court later on if you wish it, and she feels she could be happy; but just now, in her run-down state, I fear it may be the worst thing imaginable to force her into obedience. She is utterly unnerved, and has received some severe shock to her system."

"I am sorry to appear ungracious," he replied, a certain hard note stealing into his voice, "but it is my wish that Marcella accompanies me back to-night. You are right in saying she has nerves; I have been watching for some time the increased loss of self-control and restraint, and feel that it is my duty to watch over her, since she is my daughter."

Lady Violet flashed a passionate glance of hate at him, as she said:

"And you guard her by allowing her to be deliberately insulted by Edward Day in her own home. I turned him out of my house for his ill-bred manners, and told him the truth about his obscure parentage in the hope that it might teach him a lesson in humility."

"Edward Day asked my consent to speak to Marcella," Sir Cyprian said coldly. "I gave it, and she was to blame if he imagined that, being something of a coquette in her treatment of his sex, she was not serious in repulsing him. As to his parentage, surely you are wronging your half-sister in denouncing him?"

"I must tell you that you cannot get me to believe that you are ignorant of the fact that Marcella has promised to marry Mr. Nullius," she retorted, "and now that this young clergyman has gone on a holiday at your instigation, you try to undermine her strength of purpose by countenancing the attentions of another man.

"As to Edward Day being my dead half-sister's child, that is an idea brought about by people whom I have never troubled to contradict; in fact, he is the child of a miserable woman who came from Australia on the same liner as myself some years ago. She died, and in a spirit of charity I took the boy and brought him up as my nephew. But now I bitterly regret it, as I see that his unknown parents left him a heritage of vice and ill-principle. So you see that the creature you have forced upon your daughter, is in no way a fit associate for her."

While she had been speaking Sir Cyprian's face had flushed, then paled, but whether with anger or surprise Lady Violet could not decide. She knew that he had winced when she had mentioned the curate's holiday, but also that he had grown almost livid when he had learnt of the obscure origin of Edward Day.

"This is no doubt very interesting," he said, after a pause, "but it in no way influences me from insisting on my daughter returning with me to the Court. Remember, I have my answer ready, should you push me too far by your opposition.

"I might also discuss a few things with Marcella and your new husband, Mr. Caleb Johnson, that would interest them largely. You must choose now whether I take the extreme course, or you let Marcella return with me. She is utterly under your influence—it rests with you to counsel her rightly."

Digitized by Google

(continued.)

"I think Sir Cyprian is right, Violet," said the voice of the financier behind them. "After all, Marcella will be able to write and tell you how she is getting on; and, perhaps, when she is better, he may allow her to come and stay with us."

Lady Violet turned a haggard face towards Marcella, who had remained motionless during the conversation. "Until we may arrange something else, darling, perhaps you had better go," she whispered. "I will watch over you, and see that you get my letters.

"Don't fear, and, above all, keep brave and collected. Be careful, and don't do anything rash, or lose your temper in any way. I mean to find out a great deal, and you must not be impatient if I do not press Sir Cyprian. He is a dangerous man to thwart."

Marcella clutched her nervously. "Then I must return there where everything will remind me of past pleasures," she answered in a low voice. "Why did you not defy him to speak? He is cruel to threaten you like that."

A strained look stole into Lady Violet's face. "He has the whip hand, darling, at present. But now go back. There is nothing to fear since Edward Day begins his secretaryship with Mr. Johnson to-morrow, and perhaps when Mr. Nullius returns your—Sir Cyprian may be in a different mood."

Reluctantly Marcella obeyed. There seemed nothing else to be done, and she yielded with as good a grace as she could, under the circumstances. When she left the room with her aunt to have a little lunch, Sir Cyprian laughed slightly as he turned to Caleb J. Johnson, who had watched with inscrutable eyes the scene between his new-made bride and the baronet.

"Women are hysterical creatures," he said lightly. "I wonder at your putting your head in the noose, Mr. Johnson."

The financier laughed. "I fancy I shall not regret it," he answered drily. "You must have been very happy in your first marriage, Sir Cyprian, to withstand temptation a second time."

The Baronet started slightly. He was longing to ask Mr. Johnson what he had been doing with such a shady companion as the man with whom he had seen him in Piccadilly some days ago, but an intangible something held his tongue.

Caleb J. Johnson would be a difficult man to corner into an admission—and Sir Cyprian did not feel at home with him.

The cool, calculating eyes of the financier were like gimlets—they pierced him. But his voice was cool and even as he said lightly:

"I suppose you have many needy hangers-on to your charity now you are such a wealthy man, Mr. Johnson?"

The financier's lips parted in a strange smile. "'Needy,' yes, 'hangers-on' no. I am too busy to worry myself about failures, Sir Cyprian. I am only concerned with the successes."

"The man I saw you with in Piccadilly the other day did not strike me as being much of a success." Sir Cyprian laughed carelessly. "I thought him, in fact, the seediest-looking individual I have ever seen. He might have committed a crime; he looked so hang-dog."

The financier turned sharply and glanced intently at the fair, unconcerned face of the man opposite him. Something in the manner of his questioning warned him that it was no idle thought that had suggested it. What lay behind that smiling exterior? he wondered. Surely the man was not known by the baronet as his sister-in-law's first husband?

Aloud he said: "You are right, Sir Cyprian; he was rather a low-down sort of chap. I knew him in Australia when I was there years ago. He owed me money once—but now has paid it back in another way."

Sir Cyprian was silent. He did not dare to press the question further, lest he should appear too anxious. He longed to ask the name by which the financier had known the seedy-looking stranger.

As though divining his thoughts, Mr. Johnson said: "His name when I knew him was Dick Richards—probably not his own"—and he smiled grimly as the memory of the bloated, drink-sodden derelict of a crack cavalry regiment rose before his eyes.

"By the way," Sir Cyprian began suavely, "since we may almost call ourselves connections, Mr. Johnson, let me condole with your loss of the Mona Lisa. A very strange robbery, that only an unusual sort of thief could have thought of it. My daughter, Marcella, told me about it, and of your brilliant method of concealment. I thought it very clever at the time—and yet in spite of all that, it went shortly after. Sad pity!"

The financier's face clouded. "Thanks," he said curtly. "It certainly was a great mistake to let it go. But Scotland Yard has been following up a very slight but important clue, and I fancy we shall have the clever perpetrator of the robbery by the heels very soon."

There was a movement at the door. Lady Violet and Marcella stood on the threshold. Marcella looked more composed; Lady Violet had the look of one whom Time had touched heavily. Sir Cyprian turned as they entered. His eyes were shining, and the expression of his mouth was urbane and debonair.

"Ah, here you are at last!" he laughed, addressing Marcella, but keeping his eyes on Lady Violet. "You are just in time to hear Mr. Johnson tell us of the clue the police have found concerning the robbery of the Mona Lisa. They are on the track of the leader now, so Mr. Johnson says."

"I am so glad," Marcella breathed, clasping her hands and looking at the financier, who was now her aunt's husband. "I always felt somehow that I was to blame for that, Mr. Johnson. I brought bad luck to it."

Sir Cyprian laughed again. "It was bound to go whether you saw it or not, Marcella. But I am anxious to hear of the clue that Scotland Yard has got hold of. Is it anything to do with finger prints, Johnson?"

"No," the financier replied shortly. "It is something that was picked up behind one of the heaps of cushions and the side of the divan, over which the picture hung in the recess. It had lodged between one of the pieces of the woodwork, and might never have been noticed except for the lucky chance of moving the whole thing."

"Well, what was it?" There was a note of impatience in Sir Cyprian's voice. His interest was flattering to the financier. Only the pale, silent bride he had married that morning appeared to be as keen on the subject as himself. She was gazing with rapt eyes upon the man she had promised to love, honour, and obey, and in her eyes there lingered a look of fear and horror!

"It was a very rare coin!" the financier went on. "I am not a judge of them myself, but I know they are considered very valuable; and the police say that the man who planned the robbery, and who is, I think, a man they want badly, is identical with that notorious chief of burglars they know by the sobriquet of the 'Spade'—the coin they found was a spade guinea."

"A spade guinea!" cried Marcella. "Why—how strange, I——" A sudden crash drowned the words on her lips. A tall vase on a pedestal against which Sir Cyprian had stood, had swayed, then fallen into a hundred pieces on the ground.

"I must apologise for my clumsiness," he said in a tone of regretful dismay, turning to Lady Violet. "I can't imagine how it happened."

She returned his gaze steadily. His eyes were still smiling, but his underlip was not quite still. "I understand," she said coldly; "please don't apologise—it was an accident that was bound to happen."

When the carriage was at the door to take them back to the station, Lady Violet drew Marcella aside, and whispered:

(Continued on page 125.)

Digitized by Google

The most effective, convenient and cheapest article for scouring, cleaning and polishing purposes.

SPARKLA

MAKES TIN LIKE SILVER, COPPER LIKE GOLD.

Cleans and brightens Copper, Tin, Pewter, Brass, and all metal wares. For washing dishes, kitchen utensils, and for all general household cleanings. Removes rust, stains, tarnish. Cleans gas and cooking stoves, machinery, bicycles, dairy utensils. For the house, shop or factory.

Sold by all Grocers, Ironmongers, Oilmen, Stores, &c.

ONE PENNY PER TABLET.

GIGANTIC PRIZE SCHEME

120,419 PRIZES. VALUE £25,969.

Cash Prizes up to £100 each. Great numbers of Watches, Cycles, Sewing Machines, Timepieces, Dress Lengths, and thousands of other costly and useful articles.

Collect the Wrappers of SPARKLA and send them to the address below.

Wrappers of Watson's Matchless Cleanser and Watson's Nubolic Soap may also be used by competitors.

Full particulars with each tablet of any of the three articles.

Every Competitor in our last Prize Scheme received a Prize.

JOSEPH WATSON & SONS LTD.,
Whitehall Soap Works, LEEDS.

If you wish to EAT WELL
— TAKE —

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

You will EAT WELL,

because by their specific action on the digestive organs Beecham's Pills remove the sensation of fulness and oppression commonly experienced, give the appetite "edge," and restore the stomach to healthy and natural function.

Sold everywhere in Boxes price 1s. 1½d. (56 pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 pills).

The 5 MINUTES PAIN CURE FREE.

THE WIFE OF THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF writes: "Countess Roberts will thank the Linel Co. to send her another bottle of Lineel Liniment, which is most excellent. She encloses 2/9."

LINEEL LINIMENT

Cures RHEUMATISM	in 5 minutes	Cures TIC	in 5 minutes
Cures NEURALGIA	in 5 minutes	Cures SPRAINS	in 5 minutes
Cures LUMBAGO	in 5 minutes	Cures BRUISES	in 5 minutes
Cures SCIATICA	in 5 minutes	Cures CRAMP	in 5 minutes
Cures GOUT	in 5 minutes	Cures STIFFNESS	in 5 minutes
Cures HEADACHE	in 5 minutes	Cures RHEUMATIC DEAFNESS	in 5 minutes
Cures FACEACHE	in 5 minutes
Cures TOOTHACHE	in 5 minutes	Cures ALL NEUROTIC And MUSCULAR PAINS	in 5 minute
Cures EARACHE	in 5 minutes

Cures COLDS and COUGHS in three or four applications to throat and chest.

LINEEL LINIMENT

Nearly 200,000 Free Bottles of LINEEL LINIMENT have been sent out within the last month, in response to as many letters, which can be seen at the Company's Offices. And in no single instance that has come to our knowledge has it been known to fail in absolutely curing pain in five minutes.

YOU ARE NOT ASKED TO BUY

Simply send a penny stamp for postage, mentioning this paper, and a Free Bottle will be sent by return post. Every day we receive extraordinary and grateful letters, testifying to the efficacy of LINEEL LINIMENT in curing pain. It would cost a lot of money to publish all these, and it is much more convincing and satisfactory to send you a free bottle, so that you may test it yourself.

Sold at all Branches of Boots' Cash Chemists, and by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ and 2/9 per bottle.

LINEEL PILLS Are the best remedy known to Medical Science for INDIGESTION, CONSTIPATION, LIVER COMPLAINTS, and BAD COMPLEXION.

Sold at all Branches of Boots' Cash Chemists, and by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ and 2/9 per box.

WRITE FOR MEDICAL LEAFLET

The LINEEL CO. LTD., 16 Bevis Marks, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Secrets of Youth.

How to have a beautiful face and figure. How to have beautiful eyes and hair. How to curl the hair naturally without curling pins or tongs. Little people can be made tall. Noses that are red or ugly shape can be cured, and looks greatly improved.

This Pretty Book will be sent FREE. Ask for "BEAUTY'S BOUDOIR." Stamp must be sent for postage. Peralia Perfumery Co. (Dept. 14) 73 Camden Street, North Shields, Eng

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Stores, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

An admirable Food of the

EPPS'S

Finest quality and flavour.

COCOA

Nutritious and Economical.

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

FREE TO YOU.

To advertise S.L.S. Records we are giving away our noted Phonographs for a limited time. Absolutely not a penny to pay for one. Write, giving full address and nearest railway station; enclose stamp. Mention this paper.

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128 CITY ROAD, LONDON.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: 'Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 17 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Ross Hill, Torver, Coniston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

PAWNBROKER'S SALE

Every article in new condition.

SUITABLE FOR PRESENTS.

A full list sent post free on application.

SAVE £ d $

13/6 Gent's magnificent 18-ct. Gold-cased Chronograph Stop Watch, jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper, 10 years' written warranty; also fashionable curb (pocket to pocket) double Albert same quality (stamped and guaranteed), with handsome seal attached; three together.

12/6 Lady's handsome 18-carat gold-cased Keyless Watch, jewelled movement; exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also fashionable long watch-guard, same quality (stamped and guaranteed) elegant West-End pattern the two together

14/9 Furs.—Magnificent Alexandra Dagmar necklet and muff; beautiful real Russian sable hair, worth 4 guineas, not been worn; sacrifice for 14/9; approval willingly.

19/6 Genuine Italian Mandoline, by Stridente, Naples; fine tone; 21 ribbed, real rosewood, pearl and tortoiseshell inlaid, in saddler-made case; approval.

21/- Fine Old Violin, by Pietro Antorious; magnificent rich solo tone; in perfect condition, with fully mounted bow and case; approval.

10/6 Lustrous diamond and ruby Half-hoop Ring, set with 5 matchless doublet rubies and 8 real diamonds; solid gold, hall-marked.

7/6 Curb Chain Bracelet, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case.

6/9 Brooch; very handsome 18-carat rolled gold, 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls in case.

21/- Lady's solid gold Keyless Watch, jewelled in 10 rubies, beautifully engraved case, splendid time-keeper; 10 years' written warranty; week's free trial.

8/6 Fashionable Long Neck-chain; genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished; very choice design.

9/6 Organ Toned Melodeon; magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, and 4 acting stops, including Tremolo and Diapason action; rich powerful tone, perfect order.

9/6 Necklet with Heart Pendant, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern; heart set with pearls and turquoise.

12/6 Magnificent 5-row Pearl Collarette; finest quality, mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case.

Any of the above articles sent on approval willingly.

R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller, 284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent Books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

Page Woodcock's Pills

50 years' increasing British reputation has proved them to be the safe, sure and speedy remedy for Wind on the Stomach, Indigestion, Biliousness, Sick Headache, Palpitation, Depression, Nervousness, Languor, &c. Sold by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ & 2/9, or post free for price from Page Woodcock, Ltd., 14 and 16, Euston Buildings, N.W. (late of Lincoln).

Gorilla Packet, 4D.

Post free.

Contains 50 different stamps, including rare set of THREE different BORNEO & LABUAN (all with GORILLAS design, usually sold at 2d. and 3d. each), SOMALILAND (fort) Columbia, Jamaica, Korea, Senegambia and Niger, Chili, Port Congo, Cape, Borneo (Dyak), rare set of 7 different PHILIPPINE ISLES, &c., &c. MONEY BACK if not satisfied. Postage abroad extra. If you are a stamp buyer, you need our new price list, a handsome book of 72 Pages, 150 Illustrations. Thousands of Bargains. Sent Gratis and Post Free on Application.

ERNEST WOOD & Co.,
Importers,
Chorlton-cum-Hardy, MANCHESTER.

SPECIAL PICTURE POST CARDS. Foreign Views. Full size. Grand value. Packet of 10 different, 4d. post free. 100 different, 2/6, post free.

ERNEST WOOD & Co., Chorlton-cum-Hardy, Mchr.

Beauty.

ICILMA FLUOR CREAM is unrivalled for the Complexion, Bust, and Hands. Preserves the Skin from the effects of hard water, sunburn, or cold winds, keeping it soft and clean. Price 1s Send 2d. stamps for two samples (different scents). Icilma (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Rd., Lond., W.C.

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1½d. tins everywhere.

Digitized by Google

"Remember, on no account let your father know what you think of anything he says or does. He may do many things to tempt you to lose your self-control. But don't be led into any trap; keep cool, my darling, and don't forget that you have me behind you. Keep your ears and eyes open—and be brave, my dearest. Perhaps all may yet be well!"

She drew the girl into her arms and kissed her tenderly. Her heart ached to cry out to her brother-in-law: "Do your worst. Betray my secret to my husband—shame my motherhood before my child—and then let me keep her if I can"—but she knew that she would lose not only Marcella, but everything else, too; and a break from the girl now would mean needless agony and heart-wringing.

She could perhaps serve her better by hiding her secret in her own heart a little longer. So she had no other course open to her but to let the one creature she most loved on earth return to the shelter of a roof she feared and dreaded.

She sat by Marcella in the carriage, as she had insisted on seeing them off, and under the fur rug they held each other's hands tightly.

Sir Cyprian laughed and chatted gaily. He was solicitous and considerate to his sister-in-law—and tenderly soothing to his daughter. He patted her softly on her arm, and spoke about the lost roses on her cheeks with anxious care. But under his touch the girl shivered.

At the station they reserved a first-class compartment. As the train was getting up steam, Marcella put her head out of the window, and bent down to Lady Violet. "Find Philip," she whispered softly. "I want him—I love him." Lady Violet's eyes flashed with understanding.

She moved her lips, and they formed the word "Yes."

Standing behind his daughter in the carriage, Sir Cyprian caught that look on Lady Violet's face, and his mouth grew savage. The next moment it smiled.

The train snorted and the engine shrieked; they steamed out of the station slowly. Then Marcella fell back in her seat, wan-eyed and listless.

Sir Cyprian looked at her thoughtfully, then he rose from his corner at the further end of the carriage, and, leaning towards her, pulled her sharply by the wrist towards him.

"Sit here, where I can see your dutiful face," he snarled between his teeth. "I have something to say to you!"

TWENTY-FOURTH CHAPTER.

Johnson to the Rescue!

WHEN Lady Violet Johnson—to give her her new name—arrived at Grosvenor Place, she went straight to the drawing-room, where she knew she would find the financier, Caleb J. Johnson, waiting for her. The bridegroom was waiting to take his bride on a prolonged honeymoon. She shivered and drew her priceless furs closer. They were a present from her husband.

"Ah, here you are, Violet," he said briskly. "I hope there will be no more interruptions to our wedding-day plans. We have just time to catch the evening mail boat to Boulogne, unless we stay and dine first, and go on by the midnight boat."

She noticed that his tone was that of the lord and master already. She had become this man's chattel—the law had given him the right to compel her to do his bidding, and he showed the usual want of understanding concerning the delicate fabric of a woman's highly-strung organisation.

She recognised that the financier differed in no way from the rest of his sex. It was the brute instinct—the dominant sway of the male animal over the female.

She looked at him critically. His ugly face with its fascinating smile, repelled and attracted at the same time. She wondered whether she could surprise this man—throw him off his guard, and force him to own himself beaten.

She came forward slowly, looking at him with a half-thoughtful, half-playful smile.

"I am sorry the day's happenings have been a nuisance to you, Caleb, but I am afraid there is yet another disappointment for you. I cannot go to Calais to-night—or to-morrow night either."

He started and flashed a sudden glance at her. Had she learnt anything of the means by which he had won her?

"Why not?" he said aloud. "You are not the woman to play with me, Violet. Why have you decided to leave me to continue a lonely honeymoon? Remember, I am your husband!"

"I cannot go with you," she said steadily, "because I have promised Marcella to lose no time in searching for the man she loves. He has gone away, and she fears there is danger for him. I know there is danger for him. I wanted to ask you to help me find him—to restore him to her in safety. Then—then we would go away together if you like."

"So you put the love-affairs of a girl like Marcella before your duty to me," he said slowly. "It is absurd—impossible that I should allow such a thing. Let the young man alone—he is probably playing his own game somewhere, and Miss Marcella had better learn the lesson of patience while she is young. If I refuse to countenance such folly—what then?"

She shrugged her shapely shoulders. All her old spirit was returning under the lash of the man's anger; she was beginning to be herself.

"Nothing can move me from my resolution to do all I can to help Marcella," she replied coldly. "And if you fail me I must find someone else. But I swear that I shall be wife in name only to you, until I see the happiness of my niece assured, and not even then if you attempt to thwart me. Marcella is the only creature I love—nothing matters so long as I can bring some joy to her!"

Caleb J. Johnson was silent. He had never before had the tables turned upon him like this. That he should win the prize for which he had planned and intrigued, only to be cheated at the last moment, was a bitter humiliation—one he could hardly believe true, had not the woman who was his wife spoken them.

"Those are strange words, Violet, from a wife to her husband," he said coldly. "I am to be put on one side for the sake of a boy and girl love affair. You make terms and conditions with me as though I were a lackey. Am I to understand that you married me only for my money?"

Her lip curled. "As you married me for my position, or title and social status, please don't attempt that tone with me, Caleb, it is rather hackneyed."

He grasped her wrist savagely in his strong brown hand. "You say the truth. I did choose you for your beauty and capacity to bring the best people to my house; but now I would not care if you were a pauper with no Society friends. I love you, Violet; I love you as I never loved when a boy!" He drew her to him roughly. "Do you understand?" he said hoarsely. "I love you, Violet, and this is our wedding day!"

She shrank from his touch, as from contact with a fiery furnace. She had not guessed that such a calamity should befall her for the financier to love her in this half-savage way.

She had been prepared for a marriage of convenience, but this! She drew in her breath quickly. A solution out of the difficulty suggested itself to her mind.

She turned her face to him. His laboured breathing showed that he was still under the influence of his passion.

"Caleb," she said swiftly. "If you would grant me the great favour I have asked—if you will leave me here and find Philip Nullius, the curate whom Marcella loves—then, if you return successful, I may greet you not coldly, as an unwilling wife, but with love for you. Yes, Caleb," she finished with a flush on her cheeks, "if you bring him back alive and well I may love you."

He smiled grimly as he released her. "You may love me! That is the bait you hold out, is it? You women have wonderful ways in turning a man to your own purposes." He looked at her curiously. "Your love for Marcella stands between us, yet it may be the means of making you love me."

She put out her hand hesitatingly. "You will go—you will look for Philip Nullius, Caleb?"

He smiled. "Have I not a reward to win? And I am fool enough to want that reward, Violet, more than the success of my new prospectus even!" Then he became once more the business man with the old inscrutable eyes

Digitized by Google

"Tell me how and where I am to begin looking for this young man? I suppose I shall find him enjoying himself in a rectory, and he will resent being found."

She shook her head. "No, no, Caleb; there is something behind his disappearance. I did not tell Marcella for fear of terrifying her, but I will tell you what I know."

Then briefly, and leaving out her reason for being in the train with the two men whom she had followed, she told him of the scraps of conversation she had overheard about Philip Nullius, and the address they had mentioned as being the place where he would be found.

He made a few hurried notes in his pocket book; "18 Lillie Road, Leyton," and "Water Grange," he murmured. The evidence of mystery in the case began to interest him. He was fond of unravelling other people's secrets. "What was the principal man—the man who seemed to be the leader in the business—like?" he said after a pause.

"He had a black beard and wore blue glasses. I could not see much of his face," she replied nervously.

"Had he anything distinctive about him?"

She shook her head. "Nothing." For many reasons she did not wish to discuss the man with the black beard. She only wanted Philip Nullius to be rescued from any danger. There might yet be time to help him without a public scandal.

"Why not get Sir Cyprian to do this?" the financier said suddenly.

She flashed a glance of horror at him. "He hates the curate," she said coldly, "and has other plans for Marcella."

"And you object to the police taking it in hand?"

She made an impatient gesture. "That would be to disclose much that is better concealed; whereas, if you go quietly and find him, you will do Marcella a great kindness, and prevent a very nasty scandal; besides"—she hesitated—"besides winning my everlasting gratitude."

He laughed shortly. "Ah, so it has dwindled from 'love' to 'gratitude' already, has it?" He took her hand in his, and gazed at her with a cynical smile. "There is certainly no fool like an old fool," he said.

He kissed her gently on her forehead. He was putting a great restraint upon himself in leaving her in so cavalier a fashion.

"Good-bye, Violet. This is a strange honeymoon, but I shall get some amusement out of it perhaps. You will stay here, I suppose. By the way, you have told me everything about this young man, haven't you?"

She nodded. "Yes, you know everything. Good-bye, and I shall pray that you don't get there too late."

As the financier left his bride's house a quiet figure darted from under a lamp-post and followed him swiftly. The Dovermarle Hotel was soon reached in a hansom, the silent figure seated on the back rail. Then a few moments later the financier stepped into the hansom again, giving an address to the driver that made the silent listener outside smile slowly.

"The Chief was right. His wire came just in time. It would have been awkward if this had been sprung upon us suddenly. Forewarned is forearmed."

When in a first-class carriage at Liverpool Street Station the financier took his forty minutes' nap, the shabby stranger was in a third-class compartment in the same train, still smiling with the air of a man who had done his duty.

It was near midnight when Mr. Johnson arrived at his destination, and his first thought was to put up at the Station Hotel at Leyton. His unknown companion in the meantime was walking with the steps of one not a stranger to the country, in the direction of the village.

TWENTY-FIFTH CHAPTER.
"Water Grange."

"DEAR SIR,—Hearing that you are staying in Leyton for a holiday, I am presuming on a mutual friendship with the Rev. James Cray, of London, to call upon you this evening. I am here for a few days, and would like to be of some service to you if I could. My old friend placed the facts of your romantic history in my possession, and I take a particular interest in a man who has, through sheer force of pluck and brain, worked himself from a foundling hospital into the Church. My friend, Sir Cyprian Rust, has given me your address. I am, faithfully yours, EDWIN BOULTER."

Philip Nullius read the letter of his unknown correspondent, who wrote from a house called "Water Grange." The letter was that of a man of culture, yet there was something about it that made him wonder as to the personality of the writer.

It was now ten days since he had left the place where the lady of his dreams dwelt, and being in honour bound not to write to her, had kept his word to Sir Cyprian, who had impressed upon him that he trusted in his word.

His object in waiting so long was to see the friend of whom Sir Cyprian had spoken as being likely to help him to a living.

And now this letter had arrived—and the time of waiting had ended.

Punctually at seven the small maidservant knocked at the door. "Please, sir, a gentleman to see you," and immediately upon her words a man came into the room.

He was tall, of great muscular strength, and his face was of a dull reddish colour—unhealthy and vicious in expression. But it was his eyes that made Philip Nullius take a sudden deep dislike to him. They were of an ugly, greenish hazel, and the lids were innocent of lashes.

"This is a pleasant surprise, Mr. Nullius," said the stranger, in a hearty tone. "I am glad to look you up, and hope we shall be friends."

Philip bowed coldly; the stranger's pale eyes were watching him with curious intentness. They noted the brown colour of his strong young neck, the size grip of his big, capable hands. They were the hands of a man who did more than preach in a pulpit.

"You are Mr. Boulter, I suppose," Philip said quietly. "I am surprised that you should have gone to so much trouble to look me up."

Mr. Boulter flashed a look at him. "Not at all," he answered easily. "I told Sir Cyprian I should be down this way. My uncle, the Vicar of the next parish, has a charming place near here, 'Water Grange.' I am staying there, and came with an invitation from my uncle to ask you to accompany me back to supper."

Philip hesitated. He felt inclined to refuse the invitation, and afterwards he wished he had. But the longing to once again talk to his equals—to discuss those things that were dear to his heart, made him yield.

Besides it had been so very lonely in his rooms, and the thought that the uncle of this unprepossessing man was perhaps the clergyman who would help him to his heart's desire, filled him with a sense of elation.

"Thank you," he said simply. "I will come with pleasure."

A slow smile crept across Mr. Boulter's rather coarse mouth. "That's right!" he said heartily. "You will have a warm welcome."

Outside they stepped into a shabby old trap, driven by a man whose face it was too dark to see.

"Home, John!" cried Mr. Boulter, and Philip fancied that his imagination had played him a trick in thinking that the coachman had chuckled softly when he replied, "Home's the word, sir."

* * * * * *

The following morning a tall man with an ugly, unattractive face played a tattoo on the door of No. 3, Lillie Road.

"Is Mr. Nullius staying here?" he asked.

"No, sir," the woman answered, "a gentleman called for 'im last night, and they went away together. He left no address."

The man turned away.

"Gone, and left no address!" he muttered. "Then I am too late! He has been lured to 'Water Grange.'"

As he prepared to turn back, and ask the landlady the way to "Water Grange," he stopped and gazed down the narrow street. A trap was dashing up at full speed, as though the driver were flogging his steed on a matter of life and death.

And the colour in the financier's cheeks paled to a ghastly green as he saw the face of the man who was driving.

(Another grand instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

ANÆMIA.

BY MRS. ADA S. BALLIN,

Editor of "Womanhood," and of "Baby: the Mothers' Magazine."

ANÆMIA, or bloodlessness, is one of the commonest troubles of the present age—so common, in fact, that it seems to me that quite two-thirds of the girls one comes in contact with in towns are affected with it. The complaint can hardly be called a disease in the ordinary sense of the word, but is rather a debilitated state of the body, which lays it open to the attacks of most other kinds of diseases.

Symptoms.

The condition in question is characterised by a deficiency in the number of red corpuscles in the blood. There is very often pallor of the cheeks and lips, but in some cases these may be of a natural colour, and lead even the patient to believe that she is not anæmic, when the real state of the case can instantly be discovered by examining the gums and the insides of the eyelids. These, instead of being of a good deep pink, are pale and yellowish-looking. The tongue is apt to be pale and flabby, and indented by the teeth; the sufferer is readily fatigued, troubled with breathlessness on going up and down stairs; she very often suffers from palpitation or pains about the heart, which may lead her to believe that she is suffering from some disease of the heart. She suffers frequently from headache, pains in the back, and languor, and soon becomes very tired by any little unusual exertion. She may even faint, and thus cause considerable anxiety to her family. There are frequent eruptions on the skin, which may be either of an irritating kind, or simply acne either in the form of blackheads or pimples, or both.

There are two kinds of anæmia—one the common kind of which I have spoken, and another called pernicious anæmia, which is a fatal disease, and most difficult of treatment, but is happily rare.

Pernicious Anæmia.

In such cases there is wasting, and yellowishness of the skin, which assumes an almost transparent waxen hue; but these cases, of course, demand the most skilled medical attention and nursing within reach, and do not come within the province of this paper. I may, however, remark that the best remedy to improve the condition of the blood in these cases, which is now being very largely prescribed by the medical profession, is Hæmatogen, manufactured by Messrs. Nicolay and Co., 36, St. Andrew's Hill, London, E.C., which contains, in a purified form, hæmoglobin, the natural colouring matter of the blood, rich in organic iron and albumen, as well as the mineral salts, including the phosphates of soda and potash which are found in meat. It is far better to give a preparation like this, which is a food and nourishes the blood, than to give iron in a mineral form, which so often upsets the digestion. Hæmatogen contains nothing besides what I have mentioned, except chemically pure glycerine, which is in itself nourishing, and a very small proportion of the best Malaga wine, which is used as a flavouring.

Ordinary Anæmia.

Is a condition of everyday occurrence, in which the doctor is rarely called in, or if he is, he just prescribes for the time being, and after a few weeks the patient is apt to get as bad again. Any line of treatment for ordinary cases of anæmia must be persistently applied, and, although occasional visits to the doctor, if there seems anything out of the way amiss, are desirable, the treatment can only be properly carried out at home.

The Causes.

The causes of anæmia are chiefly bad ventilation, insufficient or unsuitable feeding, want of exercise, and sedentary occupations, or that overwork of the brain just now so common in young ladies at high schools and preparing for examinations.

General Management of Health during Anæmia.

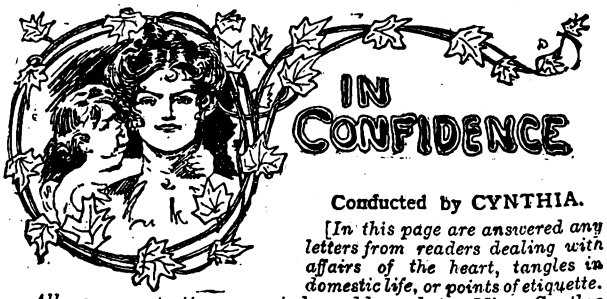
All anæmic persons should be in the fresh air as much as possible, so that the blood may become oxygenated, and an anæmic girl who is not really ill should take exercise for at least an hour twice daily. Walking, cycling, swimming (if the heart is not weak), rowing and tennis are all suitable. Eight hours' sleep is not too much, as the brain, being badly supplied with blood, needs extra rest, and in some cases even nine hours' sleep may be indulged in with advantage. The bedroom, however, should be well ventilated, and here I may mention that it is a great mistake to keep a gas jet burning, as it destroys the oxygen in the air; anæmic persons need very much oxygen, which is essential to keep the blood pure. In order to keep the blood pure also, the skin should be kept healthily active, and a daily bath is essential.

Meals should be regular, and in many cases it is desirable to take extra nourishment between the ordinary meals.—Plenty of meat and green vegetables should be taken, cocoa instead of tea, and wholemeal bread instead of white.

Iron as a Medicine.

Iron is a food to all anæmic persons, and must not be regarded by them as a medicine only to be taken temporarily, for in most cases it is necessary to persevere in taking iron for a period varying from two months to five or six years. I am strongly opposed to the ordinary methods of giving iron in anæmia, which are very frequently worse than useless, as the iron is so often decomposed, or in a form that is indigestible, when the patient takes it; while when given in a pill such as Blaud's pill, it is apt to pass through the body quite undigested, and a patient might as well swallow a bullet. As ordinarily given, also, iron is very apt to cause constipation, and for these reasons Hæmatogen, which I have mentioned above, should invariably be given in preference to other preparations. It is best to begin with a teaspoonful dose, taken half-an-hour after breakfast and half-an-hour before lunch and dinner. The object for giving it before meals is to stimulate the appetite and assist the assimilation of other food, but if taken before breakfast it is apt to prove rather aperient. In cases, therefore, where the girl has a tendency to constipation, it is a very simple remedy to take the Hæmatogen half-an-hour before breakfast, as well as before the other meals. The dose should be gradually increased to a tablespoonful. When this is taken for a few weeks the effect is really remarkable; the quality of the blood rapidly improves, the sallow cheeks grow rosy, and the pale lips red, while the feelings of languor and depression pass off, and the girl grows cheerful, bright, and fit to take her place in the world.

Digitized by Google



Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

The Impossibility of Loving Two Men.

"QUEENIE" writes to know if it is possible to love two young men with equal affection? —"No, QUEENIE," it is not. Either you love one better than the other, or you really are not in love with either. You merely have a liking for them. Put yourself to the test. Try to imagine that one of them has proposed and you have accepted him; think over his character generally; then ask yourself if you would like to spend your life with him. If you do this with all seriousness—as you would do before accepting an offer of marriage—you will not be long in discovering the true state of your feelings.

Differences with a Sweetheart.

"J. A. C." has a whole lot of complaints to make against his sweetheart. To begin with, she objects to his playing football, which is "J. A. C.'s" favourite hobby. She has only called him "dear" three times, and never of her own accord told him that she loves him. She holds that a girl who tells her mind to her boy means nothing. "J. A. C." wants to know if I think she really loves him.

* * * * *

Well, if she objects to your playing football, I should think she does feel a sort of ownership of you, and, therefore, I suppose, loves you. The fact that she has not called you "dear" shows nothing. It may mean simply that she is a sensible girl, who doesn't believe in mere spoken love. Again, even if she has never told you she loves you, her anxiety to have you always with her shows that she really is fond of you. If it is not her nature to gush, you should not expect her to do so. After all, surely people can love each other without telling each other of it every other minute.

Troubles of a Young Old Maid.

"AN OLD MAID."—You are twenty-six, and all your previous love affairs have ended badly. Now you feel it time that you met some man whom you could really love and marry. You are fascinating, and not a love-sick maiden, or given to worrying.

* * * * *

Well, what can I advise you? You certainly do seem to have had a lot of bad luck in your love affairs. From what you tell me I think you cannot have really cared for any of the young men to whom you were engaged, or they would not have left you in the way they did. It must be that you think too much of the opposite sex. As you seem to have attracted so many men in the past, and are still as fascinating as ever, I can only advise you to keep up a cheerful countenance, and hope that you will soon attract somebody else. When you get him hold him as fast as you can. By the way, don't start calling yourself an old maid yet. That old maid idea grows on one, and should not be encouraged.

A Reque t to Correspondents.

MAY I ask a favour of my correspondents? In writing to me, would they oblige me by stating the point on which they want advice in as few words as possible? This week several readers have written me letters of eight pages each. Though no doubt the details given me are of interest to the writer, they do not affect the point on which my advice is asked, and make matters difficult to understand. In stating the position of a love affair it is not necessary to give the ages, occupations, and family history of everybody concerned, unless they bear on the question.

An Unworthy Friend.

YOUR dearest friend, "TROUBLED ONE," is indeed not worthy the name of a friend. I must say you were indiscreet to confide in her your love of a man to whom you had never spoken. Nineteen is very young, and you will most probably meet someone who suits you far better than this man. I should let it stand as it is. To write and explain to any man that you are "passionately in love" with him, would only be to place you in a very awkward position, and as things stand you surely can carry it off as a joke. No nice-minded girl would care to be thought pushing or forward.

The Duties of a Lover.

"SAXON."—You admit that you have given the girl you speak of good cause for offence, and I should suggest your writing to her first, if you really wish to become reconciled. But neither of you seems to have acted in the past as people really fond of each other. If a man really wants to meet a girl, "SAXON," he doesn't miss his train, and when she telegraphs him to go and visit her, he doesn't have prior engagements with friends. My only advice is, decide whether or not you really love the girl, and if you do, write to her to overlook your lack of attention, and if you should come together again, don't have quite so many other friends, and keep your appointments with her, even if earthquakes intervene.

Too Sensitive by Half.

YOUR conduct, "CLAUDE," is very foolish; I will not use any harder expression. You are dearly in love with a girl who, you believe, would make you an excellent wife. She is domesticated and loving, but she has not had the opportunity of educating herself to a great extent. She is doing her best to remedy this defect, and your friends tell you that your choice is a good one. But you are afraid of what your fellow-clerks might say, so you propose to break off the engagement. Perhaps you will see how unmanly and foolish your conduct is when you read it in black and white. Trust to your mother's instinct; she, who has your welfare at heart, advises you to marry the young woman, and a mother's love makes her far-sighted.

To Renew an Acquaintance.

"HARRY" says that he passed a young lady who bowed to him, without noticing her. It afterwards occurred to him that she was none other than a girl he loved when a boy. How can he remedy his apparent slight?—I should advise you to send a line to the lady on general subjects, wishing her the compliments of the season, and mention, incidentally that it only occurred to you after she had passed the other day that the young lady who smiled so sweetly was none other than herself, your early love, and attribute it to your short-sightedness. If you word it very nicely, she may overlook your offence, and perhaps ask you to tea, in which case you will be able to resume the love-making operations you had to break off previously.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A NEW MAGAZINE
FOR BUSY MEN AND WOMEN

The Magazine which tells you everything about the

ART SCIENCE THOUGHT POLITICS
MUSIC

DRAMA
LITERATURE
NEWSPAPERS MAGAZINES REVIEWS AND INDUSTRIES

OF THE WORLD.

Ready February 12

SIXPENCE.

C. Arthur Pearson Limited, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

The Light-Running

YŌST Typewriter

Noted for Beautiful Work.

YŌST Fountain Pen

For Rapid Shorthand. 10/6.

33 1-3% off Gold Mounted Pens. Send for Price List.

EMPLOYMENT

SITUATIONS found for Competent Operators and Shorthand Writers. No Fees.

MACHINES lent ON HIRE for Practice at 7/6 per week.

50 HOLBORN VIADUCT, E.C.

ONCE BITTEN TWICE SHY: ° °

say those who have used Foreign Metal Polishes.

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH is British all through.

FREE FROM ACID, POISON and GRIT.

Manufacturers—
THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH CO. Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

DELICIOUS WHOLESOME PURE

JOHN HILL & SONS

16 GOLD MEDALS & HIGHEST AWARDS

THE "TUDNO" CAKE.

Splendid for daily family use, of choicest quality and Genoa character,

8d. per lb.

SEND 3D

"ROTHESAY" RICE.

A delightful plain cake, rich and fragrant. A ½lb. sample sent free on receipt of 3d. in stamps to cover postage.

The "TUDNO" Cake & Biscuit Factories, Ashton under-Lyne.

THE BEST DRESSED MEN OF THE DAY WEAR

'OCEANIC' BOOTS

AND PAY 10/6 FOR THEM.

Manufactory:
NORTHAMPTON.

SCRIVEN

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE

The purest and most efficient Remedy procurable for
COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, CATARRH, WEAK LUNGS, and CHILDREN'S COUGHS.

BRONCHITIS AND ASTHMA

Veno's Lightning Cough Cure

Produces its most brilliant effect in Chronic Bronchitis and Asthma. It effects astonishing cures in the worst and most persistent cases.

Rev. W. W. TULLOCH, D.D., Bonar Bridge, Sutherlandshire, writes: "July 22nd, '03.—I have been a martyr to asthma all my life and lately to chronic winter bronchitis. I have found Veno's Lightning Cough Cure a valuable medicine."

CHILDREN'S COUGHS

Mrs. ADA S. BALLIN, 5, Agar Street, London, Editor "Womanhood," and a great authority upon children's diseases, writes:—"Veno's Lightning Cough Cure is an exceedingly successful remedy; it is very pleasant to take and the relief it gives is very rapid. The preparation is perfectly safe for children."

W LASCELLES-SCOTT, F.R.M.S., in his Certificate of Analysis mong other things says:—"I have pleasure in certifying that in my opinion VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH COUGH is an exceptionally pure, safe, and effective preparation

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES 9½d. Regular Sizes, 1/1½ and 2/9.

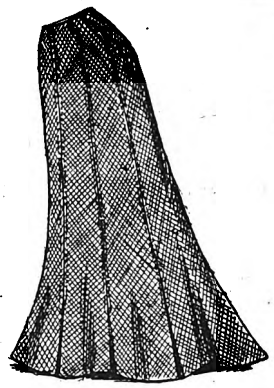
Ask for VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE at Chemists and Drug Stores, or post free from the VENO DRUG CO., Hulme, Manchester, England.

J. G. GRAVES' COSTUMES

J. G. GRAVES' Handsome Fashion Book of Mantles and Costumes is sent Post Free, and fully illustrates the present Season's Designs. All Garments are sent subject to approval, and accounts may be paid by Easy Monthly Instalments, or Important Advantages to Cash Customers.

ASK FOR CATALOGUE No. 4.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., Sheffield.



GIVEN AWAY

With next week's

Home Notes

(No. 525),

A PAPER PATTERN OF THIS WINTER SKIRT.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

Price ONE PENNY.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache and Neuralgia.

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Kaputine is not a single crude drug such as has been condemned as dangerous by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients, having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The SAFE Remedy.

Kaputine is the only preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and infirmaries. Proof positive of its superior and sterling qualities.

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1½; Samples 1d. each.

Kindly mention this paper.

TO CURE SICK HEADACHE.

Sick headache means an overtaxed stomach and a derangement of the digestive organs.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

have proved themselves a boon for removing that distressed feeling and discomfort. A dose will remove the immediate cause, and if repeated for a few days will enable your system to work normally.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

27 JAN 1904

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 787.] Week Ending January 30th, 1904. [One Penny.

A Fatal Fascination.

The Story of a Secret Marriage.

"Yes. My life was rather lonely until you came, Ashley. My father has always been very kind to me, and I have had few wishes which he has not gratified. But—well, there was always something wanting. I suppose, having no mother, I felt the want more keenly. A girl needs a good mother, for a good mother always understands. And I do not even remember mine."

The speaker was a tall, dark, slender girl of nineteen, with deep, eloquent eyes and rich olive complexion. As Ashley Arlington looked down at her, he inwardly admitted she had been appropriately christened—Gypsy.

Colonel Powyss—her father—was a fine, tall, soldierly-looking man of fifty. He had seen a good deal of service, particularly in India, but had lately handed in his papers and retired to his fine old estate in Warwickshire. He loved his daughter—his only child—very dearly.

But Gypsy had always felt the need of a mother. When Ashley had come into her life six months before, the old need seemed to be partially supplied, for the fine, stalwart young man by her side had wrought many wonderful changes in the warm, impulsive heart of sweet Gypsy Powyss.

"Does the Colonel ever mention her to you?" asked Ashley after a pause. "I have never seen a portrait of her at the Hall."

Gypsy sighed.

"No," she said, with a little troubled drooping of her pretty mouth, "he never alludes to her. When I began to think for myself, I asked him about her. But he seemed so ill at ease and gave such evasive replies to my questions that I allowed the subject to drop. The only thing he has told me is that she died in India when I was but a year old.

"As for her portrait, I am not surprised that you have never seen it at the Hall. Ever since I can remember, my father has had it in his own private study. As soon as we came here, after my grandfather's death, dad had the picture hung in a quiet little room on the ground floor, with a door leading into the garden.

"I wonder if he is there now. If not, I may get you a glimpse of the portrait, for the door is glass-panelled. Let us walk under the wall of the old house, and perhaps we may see it."

They got up from the low, rustic seat in the little arbour, skirted the pretty flower-filled garden, and moved along in the cool shade of the stately building. Presently Gypsy stopped.

"Look," she said, "there it is. Isn't she lovely?"

The sliding glass door was half open. Ashley Arlington looked through and his eyes fell on a picture hanging on the wall. For some minutes he never spoke. Gypsy had slipped her hand through his arm and gazed from him to the picture in pleased anticipation.

"Pity that one so beautiful should die so young," he said at last, and his voice touched a tender chord in the girl's breast. "I do not wonder that the Colonel mourns her even after so many years. But I must go now, darling. The governor wants me this afternoon. My horse is at the gate. Good-bye, sweetheart. I shall be over again in the morning."

With a tender pressure of the hand and a fond look into her eyes, he took his leave, and returned to Arlington House, the country seat of his father, Sir Hugh Arlington.

Those were happy days for Ashley and Gypsy—days that seemed all too short-lived. For what is more difficult of computation than time, or what so elastic as an hour? The sky was blue and sunny. And then, as so often happens, a cloud, no bigger than a man's hand, showed itself above the horizon and threatened to mount even to the zenith where the sun shone.

One day Ashley Arlington received an anonymous communication that filled him with vague uneasiness. It couldn't be true, of course. But there the thing was, and it wouldn't let him rest. He was a true Englishman—honest, upright, open as the day—and a few days later he presented himself to Colonel Powyss.

The old warrior received him with cordiality, for he liked the young man, and had already given his consent to Ashley's engagement with his daughter. But something in the young man's face made him grow suddenly silent. He felt something was coming—something he had for years dreaded and feared. But he was prepared. With a courteous gesture, he motioned Ashley to a chair.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"You wish to speak with me," he said calmly. "The truth is in your face. Can I help you in any way?"

Ashley moved uneasily in his seat. It seemed difficult to begin. Finally he drew from his pocket a letter.

"Colonel Powyss," he said unsteadily, "I have received an anonymous letter which contains some reference to yourself. I have shown the letter to no one, nor have I even mentioned its existence or its purport. You are an older man than I, and it has required some little temerity on my part to bring myself to speak of it to you. But the light is always preferable to the dark, and Englishmen should be afraid neither to speak nor yet to listen. I will read the letter to you, only remarking that I place no credence in the statement it contains, and bring it to you for no other reason than that you should know you have an enemy of this sort—an enemy who has not even the courage to append his name to his accusation."

He paused and opened the letter. Colonel Powyss straightened himself. His splendid face and soldierly figure were well under control. But in his heart there was dread—shame—bitterness. The voice of Ashley, reading, fell on his ear, and he listened.

"DEAR SIR,—I understand you are engaged to Miss Powyss, daughter of Colonel Powyss, of Powyss Hall, Warwickshire.

If rumour also speak correctly, your father, Sir Hugh Arlington, is a gentleman who prides himself upon his lineage and the unimpeachable purity of his descent.

It might, therefore, save you much future annoyance and humiliation if I let you into a little secret which has for years been so jealously guarded by Colonel Powyss.

The lovely woman whose portrait hangs in the study at Powyss Hall was never the wife of its present owner, and—well, you can guess the rest. You may now see that Miss Gypsy Powyss is scarcely a fitting wife for an Arlington.

"ANON."

Ashley's voice had scarcely ceased before Colonel Powyss was on his feet. There was an angry light in his dark eyes that boded ill for someone.

"Let me see the letter!" he demanded.

Ashley handed it to him without hesitation. Colonel Powyss critically scanned the handwriting, but it was evident from the first that it was quite unknown to him. He passed the letter back with a baffled gesture.

Ashley took it, quietly folded it in two, and dropped it into the fire which burnt in the grate. The Colonel watched him.

"Ashley, my lad," he said, touched deeply by the action, "you are a worthy son of your noble father. I wish I could tell you everything—everything. But I cannot do that, neither to you nor to any living creature. Can you be content if I give you my word, as a gentleman and a soldier, that this letter is a lie?"

He looked steadily into the young man's eyes. Ashley held out his hand.

"I never doubted it, sir," he said.

"Thank you."

Both men had risen, but now, as though by common consent, they resumed their seats. After a brief pause, the Colonel commenced to speak.

"It is more than probable," he said, "that your anonymous correspondent, finding you quite unmoved, may write again. If that, too, fail, he may even write to your father. I am bound to admit that, at present, I can produce no document to refute this false statement.

"I think, therefore, that I had better procure the necessary papers from India to show that I was legally married. I am rather afraid, however, that this may occupy some time, since I must also admit that my marriage was a secret one. Briefly, the facts are these: Little more than twenty years ago, while stationed in India, I first met the lady who soon after became my wife. I was only a captain then, and she—a governess.

"You start? Yes, she was a governess. But she was also the daughter of a greater house than the one in which she served. Ruin had come o that house, through the recklessness and extravagance of its male members, and she—a lovely, innocent girl—was sent out penniless into a world that cares little for the fate of such human sacrifices. What wonder that she dropped the name that spelt disgrace and adopted a better and a purer—the name her dead mother had borne!

"And I—well, it is an old story. Love is quick to grow, and in less than three short months, she had promised to become my wife. But my father was a man of strong prejudices. Blood was the one essential in his strict code. I knew him well enough to feel convinced that to marry a governess, even though that governess were a lady, would be to excite his anger and probably involve me in disinheritance.

"Do not misunderstand me. Had there been no other way, I would willingly have relinquished my expectations in that quarter. But I should spend many years in India, and I argued that a secret marriage might serve to link us together until such time as I could overcome the scruples and prejudices of my father.

"So one lovely morning, we went separately to a little English church among the hills in that land of many races, and were quietly married by an old priest. His own fee and that of the witnesses was sufficient to insure the secrecy of the ceremony. In one house there was some speculation as to the mysterious disappearance of a governess, but conjecture was always wide of the truth and the subject lost its interest before the orthodox nine days were half over. We had a pretty little cottage in one of the lovely valleys among the hills, and no one guessed the truth until our little Gypsy was born. And even him I pledged to secrecy. So the time went by, till Gypsy was just a year old. And then—then—I lost her."

A grey shade came into the Colonel's face as he uttered the last words. It was plain that some strong emotion was stirring within him. Ashley Arlington felt touched. Rising from his seat he went softly over to the Colonel's chair and took one hand in his.

"Colonel Powyss," he said, "I esteem you above all men. Thank you for your confidence. Good-bye."

A moment later and he was gone. Colonel Powyss heard his departing footsteps and a deep groan escaped his lips.

"Would to God that were all!" he said hoarsely. "How can I tell him that the truth—the truth—is worse, if possible, than the lie he has heard?"

He bowed his head upon his hands and let his thoughts go back to that far-off time when his little daughter was born. Yes, someone had found out his secret then. A brother-officer—one, Rupert Rivers—while strolling among the hills, had stumbled upon him as he came out of his cottage in the valley.

He had always disliked Captain Rivers, and it galled him to prefer a request of any kind. But many things were involved, and he did it. Rivers acquiesced readily enough, and, for a time, matters went on as before. And then, one day, when his little Gypsy was just a year old, he received a blow that well-nigh bereft him of reason.

Picking his way along the valley one dark night, he found no light in the little window to welcome him. No footfall responded to his knock, no soft words fell on his ear. The cottage was as dark as the valley, and a great fear came into his heart.

Forcing the door he went in, groping his way to the little sitting-room that had been to him a very paradise for nearly two years. A little baby-girl softly sobbing on the floor. And a letter.

Yes, a letter—stained and blotted as though with many tears. She had brooded long over his unwillingness to boldly proclaim her his lawful wife, forgetful that this very unwillingness was for her sake as much as for his. And brooding had bred suspicion, and suspicion distrust. He was ashamed of her. She would go away.

Someone had been kind to her, had sympathised with her in her loneliness, and she was going away with—his brain reeled as he read the words—with him. Could it be true? Oh, why had she not told him she was lonely? The hours he had spared her were few, he knew, but she had not realised how difficult it was for him to slip away from headquarters and come to her. With whom had she gone? She had not said. Was it Rupert Rivers?

Digitized by Google

He must find out. Early the next morning he went to the railway station. Yes, a lady, accompanied by a gentleman, had left the day before. They thought the lady answered to the description he gave, but they couldn't be sure about the gentleman. Then, with white drawn face, he went to the barracks. Lieutenant Fernley was the first officer he met. Captain Powyss put his question and received the reply without flinching. Captain Rivers had obtained leave of absence for a week. Then it was he. But who was this coming in at the door? Rupert Rivers himself! Captain Powyss looked bewilderingly into the other's smiling face. Then, without a word, he drew him out of earshot.

"My wife!" he demanded, in a hoarse whisper, "Tell me—what have you done with her? Tell me, or, by Heaven, I will kill you as I would a dog!"

And Rivers had slowly taken the cigar from between his lips and had looked in blank amazement into his accuser's face.

"Powyss," he said, "what on earth do you mean? Is anything wrong, old chap? Tell me! Don't look like that."

"Then it wasn't you?"

Once more Powyss looked searchingly, dully, into the other's face. Then he turned away with a groan. He could think no more. Back to the little cottage in the valley, to his pretty little baby-girl. And the sight of her, innocent, helpless, motherless, had wrung the tears from his eyes. Snatching the frail form in his arms, he sobbed over it as only a strong man sobs. And then he grew calmer and quieter.

It was not difficult to find a good ayah for the little girl, and the cottage in the valley was still kept on. But his wife never came back. Once, when on a visit to England, he had confessed the whole miserable story to his father. At first the latter had been very angry, but the realisation of his son's sorrow and humiliation soon touched a tender spot in the old man's heart, and he had forgiven him.

It was a miserable story. But, at least, they had been legally married, and this anonymous letter was an infamous lie. It was his duty now to prove it such, if only for his daughter's sake. Her mother had carried with her the certificate of their marriage, and, hitherto, he had seen no need to supply himself with a copy. But he must do so now. The next day he summoned his solicitor, and communicated his wishes in the matter. Cable messages were dispatched, and, later, a trusty agent. And when, at the end of six months, the latter returned, he brought with him—nothing. The little church among the hills had been burnt down five years before, and all its registers destroyed.

Search as they might, no trace could be found of the two witnesses, and the old priest had long since been dead. Plan after plan had been resorted to, effort after effort made, but Colonel Powyss' marriage was without record, save for that old-time certificate that his wife had carried with her on the day of her flight. What had become of her? Was she alive? He did not know, but, even if she were, she would probably be the last person to come within his reach.

And then another anonymous letter came for Ashley Arlington, and, with it, a covert threat that, should he still disregard the matter, the writer would appeal to Sir Hugh.

Almost in despair, the Colonel went from one place to another, finding nothing, yet always seeking for what he did not find. And then a new and unforeseen event occurred that changed both retrospect and prospect and sent a shaft of light streaming through the darkness of the years that had gone between.

It all happened in a few minutes. A dark night and the heavy tramp, tramp of men who carry a burden coming through the garden. Colonel Powyss opened the sliding door of his private study and looked out. Seeing his tall figure, silhouetted in the doorway, the bearers made towards him.

"A gentleman, sir—thrown from his horse and dragged along the road. We don't think he's dead, sir, so thought you'd let us bring him in here, while we fetch the doctor."

The Colonel opened the door wider and stepped back. There was a couch in the room, and upon it the men put their burden. Colonel Powyss looked down on the white face. The eyes slowly opened and looked up into his.

"Good Heavens!" he gasps. "Not here—not here—anywhere but here!"

"Rivers!"

"Go away. Where are the men? Tell them to take me away from this house. Oh!"

Colonel Powyss needed no doctor to tell him the man was dying.

"Rivers, old fellow," he said gently, "I'm afraid your time's come. Meet it like a man and a soldier. Remember how we fought side by side in the old days. Remember——"

"Stop! I wish to God I could forget! I remember—I remember how I tempted that innocent young wife of yours, till I even made her believe that wrong was right and right wrong. I remember how she ran away with me, and how, before the train had reached its destination, the horror, the revolting horror of what she was doing, came upon her and made her strong again. I remember how she spurned me when she alighted on the platform, and bade me go back to my regiment. She could never return, she said. She had forfeited all in her weakness, her folly. She must go back to the life she led before she met you. And she did go back, as pure as she was then—I swear it!—and for aught I know she is a governess to this day.

"Once I saw her, quite by accident, and renewed my old fascination. But she treated me with contempt.

"Then I told her of you and of her daughter, and threatened to ruin her daughter's happiness if she did not come to me. But still she spurned me. And then—then I wrote those anonymous letters. I can't say much more. She made me mad when she left me standing like a fool on that station platform. I went back to the regiment, and met you. She had made a fool of me, but I hid it from everyone. I don't know where she is now. I don't—I can't see you, Powyss. The light's going down or something. Give us your hand before I go.

"Say you forgive me, old comrade. They're calling the roll, and my name comes next. Stop the drums. I can't hear your orders, Colonel. Your hand—quick!"

The struggle in the Colonel's breast was only a little less prolonged than in that of the dying man. His hand met that of his enemy and rested there. A grateful glance, a penitent sigh, and the soul of Rupert Rivers went to its account.

It was a week later, and Colonel Powyss was sitting on a chair in his little study. The day was warm and bright, and the door into the garden was slid half open. Many things were in the Colonel's mind, as he gazed up at the lovely, girlish face that looked down at him from the painted canvas. She had realised in time. Thank God for that! Oh, that he might find her. The eyes seemed to implore him as he looked into them.. How like her the picture was! He had had it painted from a photograph ten years before, and seemed never to tire of gazing at it. And since Rivers had made that confession to him, the face seemed to have become even more beautiful in his eyes. In a rush of tenderness, he stretched out his hand to the sweet face.

Digitized by Google

"My lost wife!" he said, as if imploring her. "Will she ever return?"

There was a sound behind him. Turning quickly, he saw, standing in the doorway, a woman, pale, grief-stricken, ill-clad, repentant. Speechless, he gazed at her, and she seemed to droop before him as though with shame. The lovely eyes filled with tears, and the head sank slowly on the thin breast. And then both speech and action returned to Colonel Powyss. With a cry he sprang towards her, and, sharply closing the door, folded her in his arms.

"Ruth," he said, "you have come back to me?"

"Do you want me after—after——"

"Hush, dear. After to-day is all the after we need think about. I know all I need know, and I desire to know no more. Want you, Ruth? Of course I want you."

The woman laid her head on his breast and began to cry.

"I don't deserve it," she sobbed. "I wouldn't have come back now, only he threatened my little Gypsy."

"He is dead." The Colonel spoke the words slowly.

"Dead?"

"Yes, he died in this very room no more than a week ago. He told me all, and—and I forgave him."

For some minutes there was silence, and then she said:

"I managed to get along in my old occupation as governess until a year ago. And then I had a severe illness, and grew very poor—dreadfully poor—and——"

"Hush, hush, Ruth! Let us talk no more about it. Come upstairs with me. I think I can manage it without your being seen. And then, when you have changed your dress and removed the traces of travel, we will go and see Gypsy."

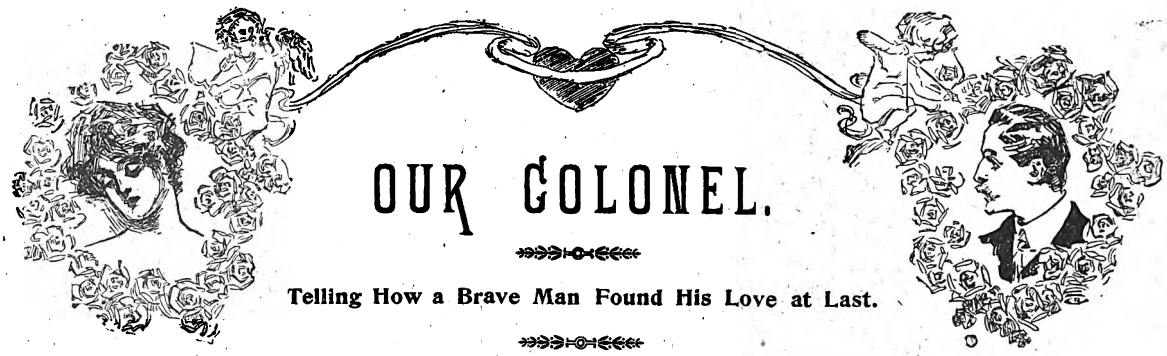
And, an hour later, Gypsy's arms were clinging about her mother's neck, and the Colonel could do nothing but gaze at the two with undisguised affection. He told Gypsy that he had been mistaken, that her mother had not died as he had imagined, but had suffered many things in the years of their enforced separation.

But of Rupert Rivers and his fatal fascination, he told neither her nor any living creature.

And when Gypsy Powyss and Ashley Arlington stood together at the altar and voiced the vows that were to unite them for ever, the Colonel's long-lost wife formed a conspicuous figure in the group.

For returning loveliness had come with returning happiness, and many were heard to declare that she was "a finer woman at forty than most women at twenty-five."

Walter J. Mowbray.



OUR COLONEL.

Telling How a Brave Man Found His Love at Last.

"OH, here comes our colonel! Isn't he splendid?" Thus spoke my wife.

"Whose colonel?" said I; and, without awaiting a reply, added: "What! this fellow?"

My tone was a little contemptuous; for, though Agnes and I are so secure in each other's affection that not the slightest taint of vulgar jealousy has touched our lives, all the world knows how it grates a little on a certain one of our constituent parts—self-love, perhaps—when the fact is revealed that the contemplation of our image, as the one big image, and the acceptance of our perfections as the sum of earthly excellence, do not shut out from that somebody's eyes other images, with their attendant attractions.

Thus, my wife's complimentary adjective "splendid" prompted the derogatory tone of my remark regarding the gentleman who was approaching, though the brief survey I made of the object himself certainly did not justify any word of slight.

As the colonel passed, his eye rested momentarily on my wife's face with the well-bred glance of interest an appreciative man is apt to give to female beauty—for Agnes is very handsome, coming of a handsome family—I summed up his outward presentment as well as the short time would allow.

Not over medium height, a somewhat spare, but compact, sinewy figure, erect and soldierly walk, quiet, dark grey eyes—a face that looked young, despite touches of grey in the hair. In the brief glimpse some other look in the face struck me—that of a man of force, of nerve, of one who had suffered, who had met boldly, or would so meet, if called upon, trouble, danger, death.

"He looks like a gentleman. Who is he? Whose colonel?" said I, breaking the silence.

Agnes laughed.

"I don't know who he is. Helen and I call him our colonel, because he looks so much like a soldier. He lives in the next street, I think, as he passes every day. We have made a guess that he is a soldier. I don't know why, except that he seems different from other people. Perhaps he is a general."

Here the subject dropped, our conversation turning to the more personal and practical matter of birthday presents for the children, the search for which had brought us out together.

Digitized by Google

No further mention was made of the colonel, and, in the absorption of business, he had passed from my mind, when, several months after my first view of him, there was a second meeting which brought him into closer relations.

Just in the dusk of the Spring evening my wife, her sister Helen, and myself, were standing on a street corner awaiting a tram to take us homeward. Agnes and I were in close conversation about some domestic matter, Helen a foot or two from us.

Suddenly there was a slight scream. Turning, I saw Helen's face, white in the growing shadow, a rough-looking man quite close to her, then—what was it?

"Good Heavens!" cried Helen, "the Bible is John's."

Something shot between them, and the man went down with a thud, as if a thunderbolt had struck him. Then a flash in the dim light, a smothered "Oh!" and my startled senses told me that a knife had been driven home somewhere.

This was all instantaneous. Instinctively I sprang forward and struck with all my force the man who had the knife, with the satisfactory result of seeing him go down. Then a rush of people, a closing in on the group, hurried words, a rough seizure of the prostrate men, and, in course of time, an elucidation of the mystery.

Two drunken roughs had crossed the street, and in passing, purposely or otherwise, one had rudely pushed against Helen. At the same instant, a gentleman coming the other way was abreast of the party, and had promptly knocked the ruffian down. The latter's companion, with the murderous instinct of his class, immediately drew a knife and struck full at the breast of the intruder, who, fortunately, by a quick drawing back into a defensive attitude, received the thrust in his arm.

The stranger stood quietly, clasping with his right hand his wounded left arm, until the assailants were in process of being carried off by the police, when he asked if someone would be kind enough to tie a handkerchief tightly round the arm "Above the wound," he said, in as self-possessed a tone as if the cut were a mere scratch.

Helen sprang forward first, and then I saw clearly the gentleman's features. It was on my lips to say "It is the colonel," for he it was.

There was a gleam in his eyes, a look, weak as his paleness showed he was becoming, of the man ready and accustomed to face danger.

And Helen's eyes—they were literally stars, soft, glowing stars. Helen admires true courage, and the colonel's introduction in this heroic guise brought the colouring of romance.

The result of our exciting meeting was that, finding the gentleman was only temporarily boarding with strangers I insisted on taking him to my own residence, where, duly installed, the medical attendance and nursing necessary in what proved an ugly and troublesome wound ensued.

On reaching the house we made a formal introduction of ourselves to each other, he handing me his card, on which was written in a bold hand "Roger Markham."

While the doctor was dressing the cut I noticed several scars, one on the shoulder, evidently from a gunshot wound; and a reference to them as indicating military service brought out the quiet answer that he had been in the Army as we had supposed.

"That scar you see there was received in one of the skirmishes that were scarcely battles but more a series of hand-to-hand fights just before the surrender. It was from a pistol-shot fired by a mere boy, whom, in a second, my horse trampled down. It is a sad memento to me, the boy looked so young and bright and handsome; but the shot made my bridle arm useless, and I could not check my horse. I would have saved him if I could. His face haunts me as of one uselessly sacrificed on the very threshold of peace."

In subsequent conversation, during our guest's convalescence, we gathered many interesting incidents of raid and battle and siege, though so modestly given, so far as any part he himself had taken in scenes of daring and blood, one might have supposed him a mere spectator. In answer to questions as to his rank, we learnt that he was colonel in the 71st Lancers.

"Didn't I tell you so?" said Agnes to me that night. "Mark the infallible instinct of woman."

As time passed this unerring feminine insight elucidated another fact. It was that our colonel—for we felt that he was "ours" now, weak and wounded as he was—had fought another fight, and had lost, and yet conquered.

In the battle royal, a woman's beauty and tender care had proved weapons strong enough to subdue the bold heart that had made its way into the very citadel of her own breast.

The situation became patent, and a month before the colonel left us to resume the routine of boarding-house life, the fact that he and Helen loved each other was tacitly accepted by our circle, and it pleased us.

After he left us, his nightly visit was regarded as a part of the course of life.

Now, what demon of circumstance possessed me I know not, but one night I remarked that such and such a battle was one of the fiercest in the whole war.

Digitized by Google

"Ah," said the colonel, "I don't like to think of that time. It brings up that young, gallant face—strangely familiar it grows, too. And, by the way, I have the boy's Bible at my rooms; it came into my hands after the skirmish. I wish so much I could find his relatives!"

"Has it no name in it?"

"It had, but the name is partly obliterated by a splash of blood. The leaves are cut as by a sabre, and I judge the stroke that cut them wounded the boy also. You can see 'John,' and underneath, 'from his mother,' that is all."

I noticed Helen's face pale a little as she asked in a low voice if he wouldn't bring the book down some time.

"Certainly," he said.

On the next night, after some little conversation, Markham, rising and going to where Helen sat, took a seat beside her, remarking:

"I brought this memento with me, Helen."

He unloosed the wrapper carefully, and in a reverent manner, as though it were something from a grave, handed the volume to Helen.

From my absorption in the financial column of the paper, I was startled by a sound that was a wail and a shriek combined—the cry of a breaking heart.

"Heavens, Roger! there is blood between us! It is John's."

The colonel caught the fainting girl as she fell. Mechanically I picked up the book, and Agnes and myself stared at the page with its smear of blood and handwriting of the dead mother, so familiar to both.

The situation was dramatic—utter silence broken at last by Markham, who, in a strained voice, suggested that we should remove the unconscious girl to her room. We carried her up, and stood silently until the restoratives Agnes applied began to show their effect, when I took Markham by the arm and led him downstairs.

"This is unutterably horrible!" he said.

In a few words I explained to him that John Bernard, whose name blood—his own, perchance—had blurred, was the only brother of Helen and Agnes, who, but six months before the war ended, getting involved in trouble reflecting on his honour, had joined a Boer regiment at the front, and that, in spite of persistent inquiry and search, nothing had been heard of him since his last letter in March.

His fate was a tender subject with us, and almost unconsciously we had hoped he might yet report to us. We had heard of such cases. But this awful token settled the matter. That the circumstances had not been mentioned sooner was because family pride shrunk from revealing the cloud which had been brought on it, hence all that had been said was that a brother had been lost in the war.

In a few moments the colonel, pale and agitated, took his leave.

In the morning he called. He and Helen had an interview in which we afterwards learnt, while heroically confessing that her heart was entirely his, she told him that with the ghost of her dead brother between them, and the feeling that through him, though unavoidably, the death-blow may have been given, there was nothing for them but to part.

Within a week I read aloud from the list of passengers on a Liverpool steamer the name "Roger Markham."

Helen, just a shade paler, said:

"He has gone, then. He said he would leave as soon as he could settle some affairs. He——"

Here her voice broke as she realised that the severance which would be for all time was actually accomplished, and with an agonised cry, "How can I bear it?" rushed from the room.

What the poor, gentle, torn, but stout heart went through in the lonely hours of that night none but Heaven can know.

The doom of parting had been fixed, but while one city or one continent held them, a word, a tick of the telegraph wire, would have brought him to her side, or her to his—at least in that hour when Death should come to bridge the chasm and lay the ghost that barred their communion in life.

But Helen was strong and brave, and fought a gallant fight with herself, no trace showing to the world of the terrible strife. To us there was an added gentleness, a paler cheek, a deeper look in the soft, dark eye, but there was also that constant activity, an increasing devotion to the daily duties of life that both showed the true, brave, healthy woman, and took away all fear that she would fade beneath the blow which might have crushed a more fragile nature.

What of him—the wanderer?

No tidings reached us to tell how his high spirit and gallant heart fretted and chafed; only at intervals there came, in packets addressed to me, with no scrap of writing within, a curiously-shaped leaf, a shell of exquisite tint, a lustrous stone, a quaintly-carved fan—tokens that his restless feet had touched the far-off shores of India and China, and trodden through African wastes.

Once a huge lion-skin was sent to me, and we knew whose hand had laid the forest king low.

Outwardly these tokens moved Helen but little; we could only read in the glow of her face a sort of loving satisfaction in the knowledge that he yet lived and—remembered; and later, after an event which I am about to mention, we saw an occasional gleam of something born of the whisperings of Hope to her hungry soul.

* * * * *

Two years to the very day after the colonel's departure in the hot June afternoon, the door of my private office was quietly opened and closed, and I heard a man's footstep approaching my desk, which was in a corner of the room.

I sat with my back to the door, thinking in a dreamy way of the drama of whose closing the day was the anniversary. As the noise of the steps ceased I turned with a start, and there surely stood a ghost.

Gaunt, with unkempt hair and beard, in a foreign, half-ragged costume, the handsome face hollowed and haggard, but a live, proud look in the dark eyes, by all that was good or bad, it was John Bernard, or his ghost.

My eyes must have expressed my mental uncertainty—never a word could I say.

A smile spread over the worn features, and my visitor, moving to the desk, said, in a quiet, repressed voice:

"Don't be scared—it is John."

Putting his hand into his breast-pocket and producing a package, which he laid on the table, he continued, in tones with an intense ring in them:

"There is the paper they said I stole, and with it the confession, signed, sealed, and witnessed by the American Consul at Rio, of the man who did steal it. I got on his track just after peace was declared, and I swore to myself that never should word be heard from me at home, living or dead, unless it could be with honour restored. And here I am, worn out, dirty, ragged, but with my name clear."

Here the poor fellow, weak and nervous, burst into tears.

I, who had as yet uttered no word, jumped up, threw my arms round him, and am ashamed—no, not ashamed—to say, strong, big, hulking fellow as I am, that I could not speak a word for the next five minutes.

But we recovered our equanimity, and after a free and divided use of my handkerchief—an article John was temporarily short of—got ourselves more into the appearance of men.

As may be imagined, I was moved by more than the mere return of John and the fact of his redemption from disgrace.

A thousand bewildering possibilities loomed up, and John, the colonel, and Helen, were so tangled in my thoughts that I was in doubt which to do first—go home, or start for the Continent. I startled the clerk in the outer office by calling out to him to run down quickly and get me a ticket for Paris.

"A what, sir?"

"Oh, a cab, I mean."

The day was not late, and John expressing a wish to drive first to Mr. Selwyn's, if that gentleman still lived, and give him the papers, we went there at once.

"I have brought you something, Mr. Selwyn," I said.

The banker glanced over the stolen paper, read the other intently, and, though he was evidently shocked to see the signature that of his former confidential clerk, the pleasure he felt in John's clearance and return was unmistakable, and the rough, hard-featured man of the world came near disgracing himself as badly as I had.

Digitized by Google

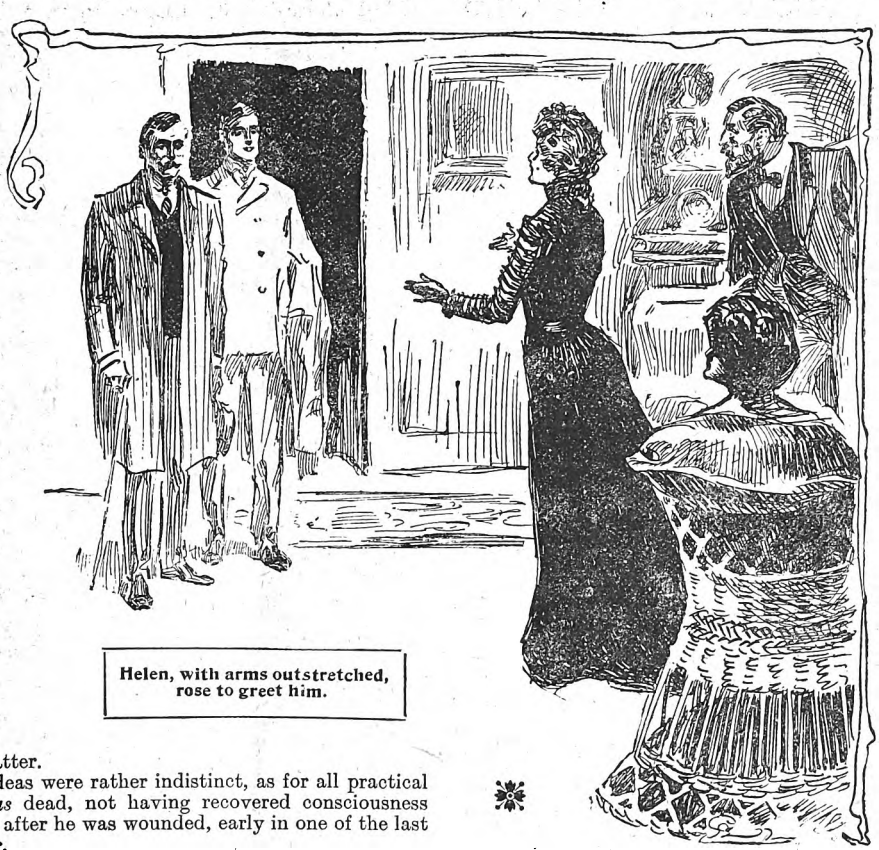
As fast as the cabby could take us home we went, and then ensued a scene not to be described.

My impression is that both Agnes and Helen swooned, while John and I demeaned ourselves in a very unmanlike manner.

Tempests, whether of Nature or of the human economy, cannot last; the reaction comes, and in due course we quieted down and listened to John's story.

Naturally, the part which was of most personal interest came first, and he told us how, by accident, as he lay in a small farmhouse, recovering slowly from wounds, he learnt who it was that, to shield himself, had wronged him; how, when scarcely able to drag himself along, he had struck the trail; how through weary days, which grew into months, he had followed the doubling tracks of his enemy, who, as though conscious of the sleuth-hound behind availed himself of every disguise and expedient to help his flight. At last, in Brazil, he had run him down.

After hearing this part of his story, handing John his Bible, which he recognised with open-eyed astonishment, and telling him that its return had convinced us he was dead, I led him to talk of his fighting career, and especially the closing portion of the latter.



Helen, with arms outstretched, rose to greet him.

He said his ideas were rather indistinct, as for all practical purposes he was dead, not having recovered consciousness for many hours after he was wounded, early in one of the last fights of the war.

"But!" broke in Helen, excitedly, "you remember just before you were wounded, and you saw who wounded you, did you not? And didn't you shoot somebody, and didn't somebody ride you down?"

"Why, you weren't there, were you?" said John, glancing inquisitively at his sister. "Yes"—turning round and showing his left cheek—"there's a mark of a hoof; somebody did ride me down. The fact is that, while the incidents of that day were most bewildering to me, there were some pictures stamped on my memory, never to be effaced. But among them all, when I try to recall those scenes, as I have hundreds of times in the lone night hours, comes up the figure of one man. He embodies all my ideas of a soldier—of war—and his face, as I saw it that day, haunts me. I am troubled with the thought that he was killed. I hope not; and if what I hope is true, I would give years of my life to know it."

Agnes and myself exchanged glances, while Helen's eyes had an untranslatable gleam—pride, hope, love, brightened, dimmed and softened them all at once.

In a low tone, she said, "Tell us of that day."

"Well, our men were posted behind a stone fence facing one of the country roads, along which the British were expected to march in an attempt to flank our forces. Behind us was a brigade, on which we were to fall back if attacked in force, or which would be thrown forward to help us.

"After waiting several hours, listening to the roar of artillery in the distance, suddenly a picket dashed in, calling out, 'Cavalry!' In a few minutes a cloud of dust rose on the road facing us. Our commandant ordered us to lie flat down, and thus hidden by the wall, the commandant posting himself behind a tree for observation, we waited.

"Nearer rolled the dust, and soon could be heard the sound of iron hoofs, then of voices, occasionally a careless laugh. I remember the merriment jarred on me, and I could not help feeling how much more like straight-out war it would be to stand up and let them see us. I suppose something must have attracted attention, for clear, sharp, and stern came the word 'Halt!'

"Immediately we were ordered to rise, aim, and fire. There before us, perhaps a hundred yards off, was a small body of horsemen, somewhere from fifty to a hundred, evidently a reconnoitring party. As the fire of three hundred Mausers belched on them one would have thought they would be swept clear away; but on the instant we were greeted with a return fire from carbines, and, amid the din, the order 'Charge!' rang out clear and distinct.

"Before we could reload they were upon us, over the low fence, slashing with their swords, and cutting their way right through us. I was back some twenty yards from the fence, excitedly trying to reload.

"Everything was in confusion—the confusion of hand-to-hand fighting. The time was only a few seconds, and one couldn't make many observations; but in that brief space I could not help noticing the officer in command of the enemy—I don't know his rank. He was the first over the fence, mounted on a splendid horse, and as he called to his men to follow him, his sword sweeping like lightning, his eyes aglow with the fire of battle, he reminded me of a picture I had seen of the god of war. In even that moment I was fascinated, and it flashed through my mind that a leader like that I would follow anywhere.

Digitized by Google

"Plunging, rearing, the rider sweeping his blade, bayonets flashing and pistol-shots rattling all about him, the horse came straight towards me.

"Instinctively I fired my pistol, without aim; the next instant the steed had trampled me down. Almost as I fell, I felt myself seized by the jacket and dragged along, and knew nothing more until I awoke in a small room in a farm house.

"I learnt afterwards that when the skirmish was over, our men had been hastily withdrawn, leaving the dead and wounded on the field.

"The kind people who cared for me told me that I had been carried there the night before, accompanied by an officer with his arm in a sling and suffering from several wounds. He didn't think I would recover, and had tried to find out my name, but there was nothing about me to indicate it. By-the-way, where did you get my Bible?"

Helen, incapable of speech, silently drew a little case from her breast, and handed it to John.

"Heavens, that is the man! He brought you the Bible—did he? Where is he?"

"I will tell you all about it in your room, John."

And I told him.

"Why, this is like a novel," said John. "The colonel—Helen, confound the man who kept me wandering over a continent to try to redeem my name, and thus separated two such noble souls! But you must fatten me up and get me well now. I have another mission."

The aspect of affairs was certainly improved; but with the fading out of the blood-splash that had separated her from her lover there came across Helen that shade of restlessness, that touch of unquiet, that betokens a mind ill at ease—a chafing against the decrees of silence and absence, which, bravely submitted to while they seemed just, were doubly hard to bear when the circumstance that enforced them no longer existed.

Many a consultation, in our anxiety about Helen, did Agnes and I hold as to how to discover Markham's whereabouts. To write to every British consul, to telegraph to every European hotel, to employ trained detectives—schemes without number did we devise and discuss, reckless of the financial ruin the expense would have entailed.

One night, towards bedtime, John, who had in his few weeks of rest recovered his condition and good looks, remarked, in a quiet voice:

"Well, I will bid you good-night and good-bye. To-morrow morning I leave for the Continent," stooping over Helen and kissing her tenderly. "Keep up your spirits, sister; I will bring him back to you."

"Why, John," I say, "how will you find him—where will you look for him?"

"I don't know," the young man responded; "but I will find him—my tracking experiences will serve me."

* * * * *

So on the morrow John went, and we settled down to our old life with this new disturbing element—waiting for news. Letters came regularly, but one after another summed up "no clue yet, but be patient."

At intervals came too, those reminders, anonymous but with no shadow of doubt as to their sender, from far-off climes. The wrappers were duly sent to John; but as the postmarks were sometimes months old and never the same, they were mere tokens of where the wanderer had been.

Ah, here was one from Algiers!—that was getting nearer—and I forthwith cabled John, "Algiers, September 5th," nothing more. In a week I had a wire which I didn't show even to my wife, from Algiers, "Left here a month ago; no trace yet."

On that very day a dainty little sketch of a face like an angel's came, and the postmark was "Rome." I cabled again, "Rome, September 28th."

The scent grew warmer, and even across the ocean I felt the hunter's blood astir in my veins. But this waiting was dreary.

Time rolled on. Not a message from John, except that, in a letter from Rome, whither he had gone on receiving my last dispatch, he said that he had struck a trail which was "very wide," and therefore uncertain, but which he hoped would sooner or later narrow down to success, and that he was about starting for Vienna first and Paris afterwards.

A month or so later—it was early in December—on entering my office, I saw a cablegram on my desk.

For the first time I was afraid; something told me this was a message of life or death. But I tore off the envelope.

"Found. Ill, but recovering. No danger. Start home in a week. Will write."

Had a thousand electric needles been stuck in me, I couldn't have been more excited than I was by that message of life. Did I jump or knock over the chairs, or what? I don't know.

I was in a whirl of excitement, and the clerks were assuredly justified in the belief they may have had of lunacy, intoxication, or similar explanation of lost equilibrium in the usually staid head of the concern.

I couldn't bring my mind to business. I must have time to think how to break this news to Helen. She is strong against grief; perhaps joy may overcome her.

I took a day's holiday, planning over and over what I should say; and, after all, when I entered the house at the usual hour, at the very first glance at my face, Helen's greeting was:

"You have had news. What is it? Don't be afraid to tell me."

I simply handed her the message. She read it.

"From Paris? I knew it would come sooner or later."

Retaining the paper, she looked at me with such a look as can come only in the eyes of a true, brave woman, fed with the food of undying faith.

There is no creature made of God stronger than a good, hopeful and trusting woman!

There was nothing now but to await the end. The wanderer was ill, but there was the assurance "no danger." "Start in a week." We counted the days, the hours. "Will write." A letter would come first.

The letter did come, and this is it:

"DEAR RONALD.—I wrote you from Rome in October, just before leaving there, but too hurriedly to give you any details. From what I learnt during my stay, the colonel must have left on the very day I arrived. I could find no trace in my wanderings about day after day, and was feeling very desperate, when accidentally I strolled into the rooms of young Wiswall—you know he is there, and he is doing some good work, too. We were glad to see each other, and talked for hours about—well, everything, almost.

"Just as I was about going, he said, 'By-the-way, there was a good fellow here a week or two ago—though you don't know him, I expect—Markham, of London.' 'Markham—Roger Markham! The one man in all the world I want to see!' 'Well, he is gone, left—let me see—ten days ago for Vienna, or Paris, I don't know which, and I don't think he did himself; and, come to consider, I doubt if he cared. He said he was just passing away the time—intended strolling over the Continent a while before returning to England.

Digitized by Google

"The next day I was off to Vienna, where it is only necessary to say I met with no trace whatever, though I spent several weeks in the search. To Paris next, reaching there on November 21st. That is one of my calendar days hereafter.

"I felt very sick at heart, though, when I thought of the wilderness of civilisation I was about to try to penetrate, for I had learnt that this search for anybody in big cities isn't like my old trailing experience. How should I start? Ah, the police—they keep track of strangers! Accident, or Providence, solved the difficulty sooner than gendarmes or a system of espionage.

"On the very night of my arrival, restless and disinclined to sleep, I wandered out, strolling listlessly along. The clocks were striking twelve, when suddenly there was a rumbling sound, a glare, the sound of rushing feet, cries of 'Fire!' The excitement stirred me; I would see how they managed such things in Paris. I ran swiftly through the nearest streets in the direction of the light, and on turning the corner, there burst on my view a sheet of flame—a tall building all afire, only a row of windows at one end visible—several hundred people moving about aimlessly, or staring helplessly at the blaze—policemen shouting orders, women and children half dressed, evidently awakened just in time for escape; not an engine near, though there were sounds of rushing wheels in the distance.

"I stood excited and fascinated. Suddenly a scream—a woman's voice crying out that her child, her little Viola, was left behind. Almost as she speaks a child's face appears at a window in the far end of the burning building; a lovely little scared face framed in curls, with the fierce flames scarcely three feet off. A thrill of horror goes through the increasing crowd—no human help seems possible. Oh, for a ladder, but before any can reach the spot, even if only minutes, hope would be gone.

"All at once, from the fascinated, frozen crowd—frozen with horror, in face of the burning heat—a figure springs forth—flies, it seems to me, towards the narrow, unburnt space of wall at the end—the one yet untouched row of windows, across which in a few seconds the blaze would sweep. Then swiftly climbing, seizing on every projection of balcony and cope, drawing himself up with incredible agility, this figure—man it must be, and yet what being of mortal mould could climb by the side of that seething flame without literally roasting—moved, almost seemed to glide up the wall, and amid breathless silence hurls himself in through the open window.

"Then cries break forth. Of what use? It is two lives instead of one. In a moment the man appears at the window. Heavens, as I live, the face I saw on the battlefield, the look of daring no danger could daunt, the light of battle in the eyes, but nobler, higher, as this fight to save was grander than the fight to kill! That face, the colonel's, as it showed from the window, I shall never forget. I find him, but only to see him die, for the fire already licks the lower windows, and no ladder, no rope, no help.

"Remember this all takes place in seconds.

"The colonel throws a swift glance towards the ground, as though measuring the chances for a leap, then disappears. What ages of horror the seconds seem! He comes again; steps out of the window backward, takes hold of the sill with his hands, and feeling his way with his feet, deliberately, as it looks, commences the descent step by step.

"The people, now swelled to a multitude, hold their breath, gazing with strained eyes at the spectacle, expecting momentarily to see the brave man succumb to the terrible pain and drop to the pavement with his burden, for he comes not alone—he has a child with him. With a sheet snatched from a bed he had fastened the little one close to his side that would be unexposed to the heat, with her face towards him.

"But he gallantly endures the frightful heat. Now his feet touch the top of the first-storey window; below him all is ablaze—his clothing is on fire!

"With a quick motion, throwing one arm round the child, and putting his left hand before his eyes, he makes a backward spring, lands fairly on his feet, clear of the blaze, totters, falls.

"A dozen hands seize him, coats are thrown over his burning clothes he is dragged out; strong arms swiftly but gently carry the double burden away from the blistering heat; the child is loosened and snatched to her mother's arms unhurt, not a hair of her head scorched; while he, with hair singed, face blistered and blackened, the flesh showing raw and red from shoulder to finger-ends, and down to his very feet, all along his left side, where the clothing was burnt off, lies giving directions calmly and quietly.

"And what a scene it was! After the first simultaneous shout that burst forth as the saver and the saved touched the ground, a hush of awe settled on the multitude, broken only by the sobs of women and the husky voices of men praying to the good God and all the saints that the life of the brave man might be spared.

"The engines, now arrived, had all the space near the fire to themselves, and when the maimed form was lifted into the ambulance, a thousand feet followed reverently to the hospital, and there, until the sun rose, men and women waited to hear the tidings of life or death.

"I accompanied the ambulance, and on mentioning that the gentleman was an Englishman and a friend, I was admitted. I stood silently while the surgeons dressed the wounds, trying to gather from their faces the decree of Fate. When the work was completed, the colonel asked in steady tones if his injuries were serious. 'Fear not to tell me,' he said. 'Death and I have met too often for him to have any terrors for me.'

"A few whispered words between themselves, and one, a man grown venerable in practice, leaning over, said: 'In nine cases out of ten I should say death, but your nerve and self-possession are in your favour. You must have held your breath, as no signs show of internal injury. Are you a soldier, sir?' 'I have seen service.' Impulsively I sprang to the old surgeon's side. 'Will good news hurt him?' 'It may do him good.'

"Turning to the cot, I knelt down and said, 'Colonel Markham, I have come to take you home. I am Helen's brother. She is well and is waiting for you.' Not a word, but in his eyes 'the light that never was on sea or land.'

"The next morning the old surgeon said, 'He will get well, I think, because he has willed it; but it will take all his strength to stand the shock.' I determined to say nothing until I knew certainly the best or worst. To-day it is announced that in about a week he will be in a condition to travel, and, if we get him home safely, and you want to see a hero, I will show you one. "JOHN."

* * * * *

On Christmas Eve a hansom stopped at our door. The bell rang. Two men walked in—one, a handsome youth, with exultant tread; one, scarred, with stiff, slow step, but erect in mien. From our circle a woman rushed forth with a face as of one transfigured.

Albert Allen.

PEARSON'S DREAM BOOK.

Giving the Interpretation of Dreams by Magic Ciphers, by the Square of Fate, by a Table of Dreams, according to Days, &c.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, Price 1s.

Some of the subjects are: Dreams and their Mystic Reality—Distinction Between Real and Idle Dreams—Historic Evidence of the Uses and Interpretations of Dreams—Rapidity of Dreams—Inspiring Power of Dreams—Dreams within Dreams—The Dream Proper—The Oracle—The Warning—Instances of these, &c., &c.

At all Booksellers, or Post Free for 1s. 2d. from 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A MARRIAGE - - AND A WILL.

The Story of a Misunderstanding.

"THE young scoundrel!" shouted Uncle Philip, waving the sheet of notepaper frantically in the air. "Not one penny of my money shall he have! I'll send for my lawyer this instant, and alter my will! Confound it! I'll send for Ethel, and see."

He sat down and rang the bell violently.

"My niece," he said shortly to the servant, and buried himself again in the letter.

Happily, at this moment, the desired personage floated in, a jaunty hat set back on her wind-tossed curls, and her fair young face all aglow with good spirits and healthful exercise. It was not an easy task—even for old Uncle Philip—to dash all that bloom and brightness aside, perhaps for ever.

"My dear," he commenced feebly, "I—I—confound the young reprobate! He was not worthy of you."

The young girl put a pair of soft arms round his neck, and murmured some cooing words, meantime letting one white hand wander slowly but surely towards the letter. A moment later she held it triumphantly out of his reach, and, with a merry laugh plunged into its contents.

Uncle Philip watched her, half curiously, half despairingly, as she read, but when she turned the page, he turned away with a heart-felt groan.

"It's come!" he gasped, wiping the perspiration from his brow. "For goodness' sake, Ethel, don't faint!"

Ethel did not faint, but all the bloom vanished from the sweet face, and the letter fell from her shaking hand.

It had only one brief paragraph:

DEAR UNCLE.—I married the daughter of your old friend, Mr. Richards, yesterday; and I can truthfully say that I have never seen a fairer or sweeter bride.

That was all, but it was enough, when, not two months before, the writer had placed, with his own hands, a sparkling engagement-ring on little Ethel Stringer's finger! It glittered there now; but Ethel drew it off, with a look like a wounded animal in her brown eyes. She sent it to him with her congratulations and not one word of reproach. But not so with Uncle Philip. He gave his nephew a piece of his mind, and the next day called Ethel into his library and showed her his new will.

"Everything goes to you, my dear," he said, chuckling complacently. "And for that dishonourable rascal of a nephew, let him take his fair bride to his sanctimonious father. I wash my hands of them both."

"Oh, Uncle!" faltered poor, tender-hearted Ethel imploringly; and then she stopped, stifled by her tears.

"Well, what now?" queried Uncle Philip, resignedly. "Women never are satisfied. Speak up, my dear, speak up."

"If you would only forgive him," said Ethel, pleadingly. "Perhaps he loved Mr. Richards' daughter——"

"Love be hanged!" broken in Uncle Philip explosively. "I beg your pardon," he added, "but love is no excuse for dishonour. He talked to you of love when he was here."

Ethel winced perceptibly.

"He can never get along without your help," she continued.

"I know it," said the old man grimly; "and I am glad of it."

"He is your only brother," pleaded Ethel piteously.

Uncle Philip blew his nose with savage emotion.

"I told him that I'd wash my hands of him if he adopted the ministry as a profession," he growled, "and I kept my word."

"But you'll forgive his son," said Ethel coaxingly.

"No, I will not!" replied the old gentleman emphatically. "My money goes to you—I'll not leave him a penny."

Ethel drew her graceful figure up to its full height. Her dark eyes were flashing ominously.

"Do you think I will take your money?" she asked. "I—your niece by adoption—rob your own brother's son? If you will not leave it to them, you cannot leave it to me; for I refuse to take it. I thank you for all that you have done for me; but, when you are dead, I will not have your money. I would sooner die than touch it!"

That night Uncle Philip died—"of heart disease," the doctor said, "caused by too much excitement."

About a week after his death, the chief mourners gathered in the great, oak-panelled library, to hear the reading of the will. The lawyer rattled the papers on the desk with nervous fingers, and a dead silence had fallen upon the anxious-faced group. It was evident that they were awaiting someone. Suddenly a tall, determined-looking young man rose. With a brief apology he left the room and inquired of a servant for Miss Stringer. He was told that she was in her boudoir, and hastened there, but, for a moment stood petrified in the doorway. Ethel was standing, with her face half turned towards him, by a secret panel that she had just slid from the old wainscoted wall. In her hand she held a sealed document, to which she was about to apply a lighted match.

"It is the safest way," she murmured. "He is gone, and they will never know."

Suddenly the already scorched paper was snatched from her hand. With a low cry, she turned and saw her false lover, Walter Clifton.

For a moment he stood looking at her in horrified silence, and then he broke out in a torrent of passionate, angry words.

"So this is why you sent me my ring!" he said hoarsely. "You feared the old man might disinherit me, and you forgot your honour in your greed for gold. Take the will," and he flung it at her feet, "and the gold if it will serve to satisfy you."

He turned on his heel and was about to leave the room, but, on second thoughts, came back.

"I came here to make an explanation," he said coldly, "and even your falseness shall not deter me.

"Knowing my uncle to be opposed for some reason to my father's profession," he continued, "I never thought it necessary to mention the fact that I was following the same calling. In my last letter to him I thoughtlessly remarked that I had married the daughter of his old friend, meaning that I had read the marriage service over her. I hope you understand."

He would have said more, but the girl's white face alarmed him. This last startling announcement had been too much for her; clasping her hands, she swooned away.

The young man rang peremptorily for her maid, and then, not daring to trust himself in her presence, rushed away.

"Miss Stringer is ill," he explained to the impatient assembly in the room below.

But a moment later the brisk little maiden rushed in, her cap all awry, and the scorched document held tightly in her hand. The lawyer's eyes sparkled as he took it.

"It is the missing will," he said, and then he checked himself and sent orders for Miss Stringer to make her appearance, if it were possible for her to come. Ten minutes more and the trembling, white-faced girl was almost carried in.

The lawyer stood up, with a preliminary cough that was echoed by an impatient murmur all through the room.

The old gentleman had left all his personal property, excepting a few trifling legacies to distant relatives, to his adopted niece, Ethel Stringer.

There was a dead silence for a moment after the sonorous voice of the lawyer ceased.

Then a tall young fellow rose and made his way through the mourners to the side of the newly-made heiress. "Ethel," he said, "I've been a brute. Can you ever forgive me?"

And Ethel hid her happy face on his shoulder; and, not long after, the young minister was married in reality.

B. Jephson.

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID NEW SERIES. BEGIN READING TO-DAY.

A Striking Series of Astonishing Revelations.

Told by the Decoy Herself.

SYNOPSIS.

VIVIENNE D'ALTON, who in this series tells the story of a certain period of her life, is a young lady who has been educated in Germany.

Until the time when the story commences, she has never seen her father since he placed her at the school in Bochum.

Her mother is dead, and she has no brother or sister. Hence, she seems quite alone in the world.

But one day her father sends a message to the school that he wishes his daughter to leave and to meet him at Rotterdam. Vivienne is greatly delighted at the news, and while she sails down the Rhine to meet her father, conjectures as to his appearance.

The person who announces himself as her father at Rotterdam is not in the least like the handsome gentleman she had pictured to herself, but is short and stout.

They drive to a large mansion, where Vivienne is enthusiastically welcomed by a Mrs. Sherwood, "a bosom friend of her mother," who requests Vivienne to call her "aunt."

Vivienne takes an instantaneous dislike to "Aunt Flora."

A Mr. Gilbert Graysworthy comes to dine at the house, and incidentally mentions that round his waist he carries a belt containing fifty thousand pounds' worth of diamonds.

A day or two later Vivienne is shocked to learn that Gilbert Graysworthy has been found murdered in the street! There seems no motive for the crime, for his money, his watch and chain are still upon his body.

Aunt Flora shows great annoyance that Vivienne is so concerned in the gentleman's death.

She and Vivienne leave Rotterdam for England.

On the passage across Vivienne sees a person whom she believes is Annchen, a maid whom she greatly dislikes, talking to a man whom she has seen before under very suspicious circumstances.

She also meets a Viscount Broomville, a fellow-passenger whom Aunt Flora seems to wish to impress.

He announces that he is going to call upon Mr. Beverley D'Alton regarding some business affairs.

He does so, and relates how he was attacked in Rotterdam by persons whose evident intention was to rob him of the diamonds he carried about with him.

He is advised by his host to invest a large sum of money in the New Barbary Land Development Co., in which Mr. D'Alton is interested.

Some days later, Vivienne takes a surreptitious walk in the evening. She is amazed to see Viscount Broomville shadowed by the two birds of evil omen she had seen on the Harwich boat. The man is about to strike the Viscount when Vivienne utters a timely shriek of warning and thereby saves the Viscount from being murdered. The man is able to make his escape.

FOURTH EPISODE.

The Decoy Spreads her Net.

I BELIEVE all London was talking about our forthcoming reception. At least, Aunt Flora said so, and, judging by the wonderful amount of viands and flowers that were ordered for the occasion, it is certain that a good many tradesmen would be discussing it with pleasure.

Lady Windelmore spent most of her time in taking me to call upon her aristocratic friends, and my father certainly did a great stroke of business when he thought of invoking her aid, for I am sure that it was due to her influence, rather than to his money, that so many titled people accepted the invitations sent them, thus putting the stamp of success upon my début as a hostess.

Aunt Flora was less happy than she ought to have been, seeing that she was being kept in such luxury as many a princess might envy. She did not venture to be openly antagonistic to Lady Windelmore, but she never lost a chance of sneering at my social chaperon, and as I liked the Countess much better than I liked my putative aunt, it often happened that the latter and I did some verbal sparring, in which I always took her ladyship's part.

"I suppose it would be too much to expect such an aristocrat to take her déjeuner with us," was a remark made by Mrs. Sherwood when she joined my father and myself on the morning of the important day to which we had all looked forward with some anxiety.

"Her ladyship breakfasted with us yesterday," I retorted. "And if she wants to keep herself fresh for this evening, why shouldn't she?"

"Very true," put in my father. "Flora, you are not the sweet-tempered person I imagined you to be when I arranged for you to be my daughter's daily companion."

"Oh, father, please don't find fault!" was my hasty interjection. "You cannot expect anybody of Aunt Flora's age to be absolutely amiable, nor even congenial. Now, if you would get me a companion just fresh from school, like myself, I daresay Aunt Flora would be glad to be relieved of the worry I must be to her."

If I had wanted to pay Mrs. Sherwood off for being ill-natured, meddlesome, and sneering, I was certainly successful, for she was simply furious. But I was not prepared for the retaliating attitude she assumed

Digitized by Google

Turning to me with a face which was absolutely livid with mortification, she said, in tones which showed she was putting a greater restraint upon her voice than upon her words:

"I suppose, Miss D'Alton, you intend that remark to be a veiled threat of dismissal. But be good enough to understand that nothing you can do or say will insure my departure from this house until I am ready to go. And perhaps it will be just as well to inform you that you will find it vastly to your own advantage to be civil to me."

Knowing that Mrs. Sherwood was no relation of ours, and that, therefore, she had no claim upon us, I considered her speech more than impertinent, but was both vexed and surprised when my father hastily added:

"And I think, Vivienne, that if you accept Flora's information as final, it will save considerable future awkwardness."

I certainly could not understand why my father permitted this woman's vulgar domineering, until it struck me that perhaps he was in love with her, and intended to make her absolute mistress of his hearth and home as soon as he had seen me married to the titled husband he was anxious to secure for me. However, if one stopped to worry over every inexplicable thing which occurs in our lives, one might always be worrying, and I resolved to concern myself no more about Mrs. Sherwood and her vagaries than was absolutely necessary.

To tell the truth, I was glad to escape from the breakfast-table, for I feared lest something should transpire about my last night's adventure, and, apart from my own objection to discovery, I had been urged by Lord Broomville to say not a word about the attack upon him which I had frustrated, as he thought there would be a better chance of discovering his pursuers if he showed no signs of being on the alert.

"Oh, by-the-bye," said my father, probably by way of changing the subject to a pleasanter atmosphere, "did I understand that you were going out with her ladyship this morning?"

"Yes, father," I answered brightly. "We promised to call upon the Hon. Mrs. Rogers. She is not well enough to come here this evening, but some visitors of hers are coming."

"Oh, indeed, who are they?"

"Just the kind of people you like me to invite. The two young ladies are both pretty and smart, and their brother has just inherited a huge fortune from an uncle whom he never saw."

"Well, I expect you will be able to make things pleasant for the young people, and if they are strangers to London, I daresay they are glad to be invited."

"They are simply overjoyed. In fact, Sophie and Maude, the two sisters, have never been to a really big party in their lives. The brother, Mr. Melrose, has seen a good deal of the world, but he was quite pleased when I asked him to come back to lunch with us."

"Clever girl! You do my hospitable instincts all the credit I expected. So we are to expect Mr. Melrose to lunch, eh?"

"Yes, and while he is here, I wish you would give him a little advice about investments. He said something about wishing he knew what you would think about him selling a lot of shares which only bring in three per cent., and I told him I was sure you would help him."

My father was really phenomenally kind, I thought, for he positively beamed at the idea of being able to do a good turn to an absolute stranger, and even Mrs. Sherwood looked so sweet over it that I was ready to forgive her former peevishness.

* * * * *

Alan Melrose quite won Lady Windelmore's heart by his buoyant spirits, his devotion to his sisters, and his unaffected courtesy. He wasn't exactly handsome, but he was much more manly than an insipidly perfect specimen of masculine beauty would have been, and, besides being good to look at, he was such a capital talker that when he sat down to lunch with us, he soon had us all laughing at one of his witty sallies.

I had never seen my father in such a good humour, but I could not help noticing that he seemed curiously anxious to please this stripling, whose fortune of £200,000 was quite a small one compared with his own.

I also observed, with a little inward mortification, that he was not content to offer his guest the best of what there was on the table, but that he indulged in the very parvenu-like habit of mentioning the most expensive viands in a most ostentatious way.

"You'll take one of these pigeons, won't you?" he urged presently, with a benevolent smile. "I can recommend them as better than any others you could get in London. My chef prides himself upon pigeons à la Moselle."

The remark brought a certain conversation back to my memory, and I inquired:

"Are they some of Kaspar's pigeons?"

Considering what an absolutely unimportant question I was asking, its effect was nothing less than marvellous. Mrs. Sherwood had a sudden fit of coughing, which compelled her to cover her face with her handkerchief. But I was sure that she brought on the coughing for no other reason than to hide the flaming colour which betrayed most unaccountable agitation.

My father, on the other hand, turned lividly pale. His knife dropped from his nerveless fingers, and he glared at me as though he thought I had levelled either a threat or an insult at him. He also did something else. He banished for the time being all the love and gratitude which had been accumulating ever since he spoke so kindly to me in Rotterdam, and it seemed to me that I caught a momentary glimpse of the man as he really was.

But it was only momentary, for, by what appeared to be an almost superhuman effort, he regained his composure, and, heaving a sigh of relief, said faintly: "There! Thank goodness, it has left me again. But I got a fright when my old heart pain came back so suddenly. I had hoped I was rid of it for ever."

Of course we all expressed regret to hear that my father apparently suffered from a dangerous malady. But, though it may sound unfilial to say so, I believed no more in his sudden attack of heart pain than I did in Mrs. Sherwood's attack of coughing, and I was exceedingly puzzled at the disturbance I had caused by merely mentioning Kaspar Krause's pigeons.

* * * * *

Our reception passed off with great éclat, and, much to my secret surprise, my personal success was phenomenal. I have learnt to put its true value upon the share of beauty with which Nature has blessed me, and I know now that the splendour of my surroundings and the well-advertised announcement that I was one of the richest heiresses of the day, had much to do with the fulsome attentions of many of my admirers.

But none of the latter could be accused of being mere fortune-hunters, for, in conformity with my father's strict injunctions, not a man was invited to our house who had not either present or prospective riches.

Yet, amid all the glitter and gaiety, I felt a certain amount of uneasiness which I found it difficult to conceal.

Why did not Viscount Broomville put in an appearance? He was invited. And he accepted the invitation with a great show of pleasure. Yet he neither came, nor sent an apology. Could it be because he thought the service I had rendered him the other evening was not sufficient to exonerate me from the charge of having behaved like a girl of no social training at all?

Of course I knew that I shouldn't have gone out late at night by myself. But I could not see why Viscount Broomville should take such a high and mighty view of the case, so I frankly told myself that his lordship was both priggish and ungrateful, and I tried, but without success, to forget all about him.

Mrs. Sherwood was not inclined to be confidential with me. But Lady Windelmore was very communicative, and when we were talking over all that had happened at the reception, it seemed perfectly natural to ask her if she had heard anything about him.

Digitized by Google

"I read in this morning's Post that he had suddenly gone abroad," she answered. "But no matter what his hurry was, he ought to have found time to apologise for not coming, and I am so cross with him that I shall tell him so when next I see him."

"Well, never mind him. We have a lot of people coming in this afternoon, and one more or less does not matter."

I said this with a great assumption of carelessness. But I kept returning, in my thoughts, again and again to Viscount Broomville. For, after all, I could not reconcile my personal impressions of him with his apparently cavalierish behaviour, until it suddenly occurred to me that the pursuit by "the bird of evil omen," as I always mentally called the big Dutchman, might have had something to do with the matter.

It was somewhat disappointing to think that he would run away rather than take steps to catch his enemy while he could. But as "he who fights and runs away may live to fight another day," it might be mere worldly wisdom that was at the bottom of it all.

There were other people to amuse me, too, notably Alan Melrose, whose ingenuous admiration was very flattering, and to whom my father seemed to have taken a great liking.

The latter, with his usual kindness, gave the youngster all the advantage of his own ripe business experience, and I incidentally overheard them discussing the wonderful prospects which awaited the New Barbary Land Development Co.

"I'm afraid it's too late to get you in," said my father; "I've given the tip to several old friends, and they will resent it if I allow them to be forestalled by a young fellow of no commercial experience whatever."

"Now, look here, Mr. D'Alton," was Alan Melrose's coaxing rejoinder, "you can't go back on your word with me. Only last night you said you thought you could squeeze me in, and there is nothing to stop me from investing this minute, if there's half a chance."

"But the share list closes to-day."

"Why, it has never been advertised!"

"Of course not. We don't believe in over-capitalising, to begin with, and we have had to keep the whole thing as dark as the grave, or there would have been a positive bombardment for shares. As it is, we have kept the business in the hands of a few, and those few will make their money ten times over, if they choose to sell out within a month from now."

I am not sure that my father or his companion had noticed that, after fetching a book, I had quietly sunk into the depths of a luxurious lounge chair. But their talking prevented me from paying much attention to my book, and as it did not seem to matter whether I heard the conversation or not, I did not trouble to interrupt it.

When Mr. Melrose spoke again, his voice betrayed keen disappointment.

"It will be really hard lines if I am floored over this," he said; "for after what you told me the other day, I rushed round and realised everything I had, with the result that I have sought you this afternoon, prepared to invest eighty thousand pounds in the Development Co."

"What a rash youth! Suppose things go wrong?"

"They won't. Everybody says you are the greatest financial genius alive, and that anything you back is bound to succeed."

"Ah, well, I suppose wilful youth must have its way! But don't forget that I have done my best to dissuade you from speculating."

"And you will really help me in this?"

"I can only do it in one way. I had intended reserving a certain number of shares for myself. But, as you are so anxious to join us, I will let you have my reserve stock and——" He stopped suddenly.

"Please, miss, this lady is very anxious to see you."

With these words Susan handed a card to me, and, even as it still lay on the silver salver, I caught the name "D'Alton" on it.

The visit was a bit ill-timed, as it prevented me from hearing the issue of the interesting conversation between my father and young Mr. Melrose.

In fact, they became suddenly silent, but not before the former had uttered a sharp exclamation of annoyance.

Still, I was interested to know that somebody of the same name as ourselves had called to see me, and immediately fell to wishing that she might prove to be a relation, for it seemed

I caught a glimpse of my father's face. It wore the same horror-stricken look as it had a few days before.

Digitized by Google

to me that in spite of our wealth, my father and I were a curiously isolated couple.

"Miss Helena D'Alton," I said aloud. "Yes, Susan, ask the lady to come up here. Father," I continued, as Susan went off to do my bidding, "do you know this Miss Helena D'Alton?".

I had risen from my chair and looked round the alcove behind which I had been sitting. But my father had evidently not been pleased at being disturbed, for he was already taking Mr. Melrose out of the room by way of a door which led towards his own private suite. Just as he turned to close the door behind him, I caught a glimpse of his face, and was concerned to see that it wore the same ghastly look which came to it when he had the heart attack a few days ago.

He was evidently in a rather alarming state of health, and I was feeling considerable anxiety on his account when Miss D'Alton was shown into the drawing-room, which, by-the-bye, was much less frequented by either my chaperons or myself than the smaller room which we called the morning-room.

Miss D'Alton proved to be a sweet, white-haired old lady of dignified carriage and handsome presence, who looked at me with fast gathering tears in her eyes.

"Her mother over again," she whispered, as if to herself, and a sudden rush of tears came to my own eyes as I noticed the yearning look of affection she bent on me.

"Pray sit down, Miss D'Alton, and tell me why you have come," I said impulsively. "Did you know my mother?"

"My dear child, I was her godmother. We D'Altons and the Collingwoods were neighbours, and nothing delighted the two families so much as to notice the dawning affection between my nephew, Beverley D'Alton, and my godchild, Helena Vivienne Collingwood. Well, they married, and lived happily together until your mother fell ill, while you were just a baby. Beverley took her abroad, to see if the change would restore her to health, but without avail. Since her death he has never communicated with any of us, and my letters to him have always failed to reach him. The only letter from any of us which did not come back was one in which my housekeeper, who is also my friend, wrote to say that I was dying, and that as I was the last of the old family, she hoped my nephew would come to the funeral. He neither answered the letter nor came to the funeral, and we were both so upset that we never wrote to tell him that I made a miraculous recovery."

"Perhaps," I said somewhat shamefacedly, I must admit, for this narrative did not put my father in a very good light. "Perhaps your letters never really reached my father, for he was always travelling about."

"He got the letters right enough, or rather, he might have done if he had not sent them back, for they were all sent through the solicitor who did his business affairs for him until he realised his English property, and transferred his patronage to somebody else. However, that is neither here nor there. When I heard that he had come to live in London, I made up my mind to call and see you, and here I am."

I was enchanted with the dear lady, and insisted that she should dine with us.

"I am sure that both father and Aunt Flora will be delighted to see you," I added.

"Flora? Who is Aunt Flora?" was the puzzled rejoinder.

"Why, Mrs. Sherwood, my mother's old schoolfriend."

"Humph! That's funny. I never remember hearing of her. Still, I should like to see the lady, and I hope Beverley will feel as kindly towards me as I do towards him."

But, much to her disappointment and my vexation, the coveted meeting did not take place that day, for it transpired that my father had had a sudden business engagement which would keep him from home till after midnight, and that Mrs. Sherwood had such a frightful headache that she could see nobody.

My new-found relation left me at seven o'clock, saying that she would dine with us another day, and when I gave her an affectionate kiss, I little guessed all that was going to happen before I saw her again.

(Another instalment of this exciting series next week.)

Coming! Coming! Coming!

In a few weeks' time there will be announced in this paper a competition which will be of boundless interest to every individual reader of Short Stories. It will appeal to all and sundry. It is of quite a unique description, and its novelty will be one of the chief reasons for the tremendous success I am confident it will prove to be. Very likely you are all making wild guesses as to its nature, but I should be greatly mistaken if any of you hit the idea on the nail. Tell your friends about it; tell them to keep their eyes fixed on the succeeding numbers of this paper, for it will be to their advantage to do so. An opportunity lost is seldom regained, and I have in store for you an opportunity which none of you can afford to lose.

Result of the "Statue" Competition.

The Prize of £2 has been awarded to the competitor who sent in what the Editor considered to be the neatest and most nearly correct solution, and is therefore sent to:—Miss Florence Moore, 111 Bordesley Green Road, Birmingham.

The five splendid hand Cameras, with complete photogr phic outfit, have been awarded as follows:—Mrs. Emmeline Bright, Bryn Hafren, Newtown, Montgomery; Mrs. May Darling, 13 Hancock Street, Rusholme, Manchester; Miss Hogg, 15 Mid Street, Fraserburgh, N.B.; Miss M. A. Tyler, 77 John Clay Street, South Shields; John Stackey, Summerdale Villa, 24 St. James' Park, Tunbridge Wells.

The competition was a by no means easy one to judge, as all competitors seemed to have taken very great trouble in arranging the various pieces. I must congratulate the winners, and especially Miss Moore, on the exceptionally painstaking way in which they put together their picture of the waltzers.

About Our Valentine Number.

The week after next will appear our grand Valentine Number. This will be, without exception, the finest penny number of Short Stories ever issued.

Do you want to send your lover a valentine? If so, the best one you can send him or her, the one that is most likely to be appreciated, is a copy of our Valentine Number! Everything in it will be appropriate to the season. Don't forget that it will take the place of the ordinary issue dated February 13th. I should advise you to place your order for it in the hands of your newsagent at once. Give him special injunctions to retain for you as many as you require.

The Eighth Unsolved Love Problem.

Next week I shall publish the eighth Unsolved Love Problem. A guinea will be offered to the reader who, under the conditions to be published, sends in what I consider to be the best solution to the query put forth.

I shall announce as soon as I can the name of the winner of the seventh problem.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

The Romance of a Thirty-Guinea Watch.

LIONEL STAFFORD sat before an easel in his modest little studio and regarded the face on the canvas before him. Brushes and palette were in his hand, and the paint upon his fingers told of a long day's work.

His inspection appeared to afford him some satisfaction, for his eyes rested lingeringly on the fair, girlish face that shone from the canvas. But the expression on his face was not wholly due to artistic triumph. There was a queer light in his eyes that told another and a different story. Months past he had fallen hopelessly in love with the daughter of a great London financier.

It had all happened while he was engaged in painting her father's portrait. A friend of his had recommended him—a comparatively unknown artist—to the financier, and he had obtained the commission. It was there he had met beautiful Ida Crossley, and from that hour his heart had gone out of his keeping.

Strangely enough, the girl seemed to be attracted towards him also, and they found many little opportunities for closer intimacy while the obscure young artist waited the leisure and convenience of the prosperous city magnate.

Thus it came about, as it so often does, that love—unsuspected by all else—crept into the house and took his throne in a girl's heart after having secured the same lofty position in that of a man—and that man our friend, the artist.

And now he was painting from memory the portrait of his beautiful love, Ida Crossley. It was a gloriously lovely face, full of sweetness and tenderness, from which two deep violet eyes shone out like pansies through the summer mist. It was small wonder that he loved her, or that, loving her, he found pleasure in painting so lovely a face.

But he was dreadfully poor. That was the drop of wormwood in the love-cup that embittered the whole draught. To approach the great financier as a prospective son-in-law would have been madness. True, he was a rising man, but the process was a slow one—a painfully slow one—and he chafed against the bonds that held him, as most of us are prone to do at one time or another.

Ida was more philosophical. That was all right, she said with confidence; he was making a name for himself, and—well, she could wait.

She seemed very calm about it all—too calm, Lionel sometimes thought—and went on with her life in precisely the same way as before, showing no sign, pretending to be exceedingly happy and satisfied with her surroundings. There were even times when a vague, unworthy suspicion entered Lionel's head that she was almost callous. He had yet to learn that beneath the mask of indifference many a woman may hide a heart that longs and yearns for what it has not—that the eyes that look so calm and clear often shine the brightest when tears lie trembling just beneath the lids.

* * * * * *

A year had gone by, and Lionel Stafford was slowly but surely gaining ground in his profession. But he still had a pretty severe time of it, for there were many others in the field who, like himself, had set their faces fameward, and thus became his competitors.

For some time he had been putting an odd sovereign or two by whenever he could spare them from his still modest earnings. To-morrow was Ida's birthday, and it was for her he had thus scraped together this little heap of gold. To-day he went to his little hoard, and counted the shining pieces one by one. Thirty-one! That would buy her a present suitable to her position.

He could ill afford so large a sum; but love often overleaps discretion, and who among us can throw the first stone of reproof at such an offender? Just thirty-one. Then it only needed an extra half sovereign to make up the thirty guineas he had to pay for the present he had ordered.

Putting the money carefully in his breast pocket, he went out of his studio and turned into the Strand. A short walk brought him to his destination. Yes, the work had been done, and Lionel Stafford yielded up his precious thirty guineas to a prosperous firm of jewellers for a tiny morocco case containing a little gold watch.

When he got home he unfastened the case, and looked at the pretty trinket within. The inspection pleased him for the jeweller had carefully followed his instructions. On the back of the watch three letters shone out in tiny diamonds. The stones, though small, had been set close together, and the three letters formed the name which of all names he loved best—Ida.

The next morning, by some mysterious law of attraction, which we do not feel ourselves called upon to explain, Lionel Stafford and Ida Crossley made an early morning call (quite casually, of course), upon a mutual friend—a Mrs. Lennox, whose husband was an intimate friend of the great financier.

The amiable lady saw well how matters stood with the young people, and, with astonishing disregard to the laws of social equality, winked (if so charming a lady could do so vulgar a thing) at the secret love-making that took place under her roof. Discretion, therefore, is not always the attendant of perception, but again we leave the casting of the first stone to him who is without sin. Anyhow, here they were—all three chatting in the cosy sitting-room of Mrs. Lennox's house.

Presently that lady excused herself for a few moments, and the lovers were left alone. Lionel immediately went over to Ida, who rose from her chair as he approached. Taking her in his arms he kissed her, and wishing her many happy returns, handed her the precious little packet he had brought. Unfastening the case, she gazed at the gift within, and took it in her hand to look at the name—her name—on the back. Her deep violet eyes were swimming in happy tears as she lifted them again to his face.

"Oh, Lionel!" she exclaimed. "How good of you, dear! But you must have denied yourself many things to get this for me."

Digitized by Google

The young man laughed gaily as he again kissed her sweet face.

"Not I," he said lightly. "You don't know how I'm getting on. I shall be an R.A. in three years' time. Sovereigns are not so precious as they used to be, darling. And I am determined to win fame and fortune before I've done with the world."

Poor Lionel! It was not quite true. Yet what else could he say? What man would have admitted that he had denied himself to purchase his gift? And how could Lionel know that these very words of his—born of the thoughtful delicacy that comes of loving—would one day weigh heavily in the balance that was to measure out his first great sorrow? How strange it is that words which give us untold pleasure when they are uttered revive in after years to add to the bitterness and humiliation that an unkind Fate has brought us!

* * * * * *

It was three months later, and Lionel Stafford sat alone in his studio with his head buried in his hands. Things had been going very badly with him of late. The very progress he had made seemed now to have deserted him. He knew he possessed talent, though he was no egotist; but it was, or seemed to be, almost hopeless to gain recognition.

Two years before an artist friend of his had gone to America, where he had succeeded beyond his most sanguine expectations. His letters to Lionel were full of tempting inducements to follow his own example, and Lionel had almost begun to think that he, too, might find in the new world the success that seemed out of his reach in the old.

And then had come that last cruel blow, that had left him almost without hope in the world. It had just fallen. A brief, tear-stained little note that had cut into his heart like a surgeon's knife. Once more he picked it up from the floor, where it had fallen, and read it through. His face was very white now, and his lips twitched pitifully.

"DEAR LIONEL," he read. "My dear father has just died suddenly. Just before his end he called me to him, and had a short conversation with me about his business. As you will soon learn, my circumstances are now greatly altered. And I think, all things considered, my only course is to release you from your engagement. It pains me greatly to do this, but I have no other alternative. Good-bye. Your old-time "IDA."

That was all. Altered circumstances! Yes, he supposed they were altered. She was the heiress of the wealthy financier—a prize which nobler suitors than he might win. She had had a conversation with her father "about his business." Yes, that was it—"business." He rose from his seat, and, with set face, paced up and down the floor of his studio. Ida—his Ida! He had never dreamt she could be so cruel, so heartless, so mercenary.

Perhaps she had thought him mercenary. A deep flush dyed his pale cheek—a flush that made him pause in his walk. Could that be so? It looked very much like it. Once more he sat down and tried to think collectedly. Should he go and see her? At first he thought he would.

But the wound he had received was aching, and he shrank from a scene which, in all probability, would but deepen it. No, he would go away—to America—hugging all that was left of his idol to his heart, and set himself to work with grim determination. Yes, he would go the very next day.

He took up a pen to write a reply to the girl who had so heartlessly cast him off for the sake of her "altered circumstances." But, after two or three unsatisfactory lines, he tossed down the pen, threw the paper into the fire, and determined to make no sign. He could not even show her how deep had been the stab she had given him.

For, in spite of her desertion of him—in spite of the low value she put to his love for her—he knew deep down in his own heart that he loved her still.

Two days more, and he stood on board the great Atlantic liner Orpheus, and turned his back on the land that had given him birth. A new life was before him—a new life and a new world—and he must forget all that had been left behind. Work was before him—hard, persistent, dogged work—and, perhaps, fame!

* * * * * *

It was a bright, sunny day in June, two years later, when a traveller alighted from the Liverpool express at Euston Station, and made his way through the streets of the busy Metropolis.

Two years had made a difference in Lionel Stafford. There was an air of prosperity about him that contrasted favourably with his old days of struggling poverty. But success had not changed him except in appearance. He was just the same impulsive, generous, kindly Lionel as he had been of old.

And his heart? No, that had not changed either. Often had he reproached himself that he had not seen Ida before he left England. She might have loved him all along, and a few words, kindly spoken, might have broken down the resolve she had so hastily formed.

How different the world would seem if we all anticipated these "might have beens," and acted so as to avoid them. But the thought of Ida never occurred to him in any other form than as the wealthy and beautiful heiress of Adam Crossley, the great financier. He had never even inquired into the circumstances attending his sudden death.

He had read little on the voyage out, for he had had little inclination even for that most harmless pastime. And when he had landed in New York, he found little leisure for anything but his work. So she was always the rich heiress, and he wondered as he walked along the busy streets whether she had married some titled aristocrat or some great city magnate like her father. Conjecture is often wide of the truth, as he was soon to discover.

A sudden idea came to him. Hailing a hansom, he directed to be driven to the house of his old-time friend, Mrs. Lennox. No letters had passed between them during his two years of absence, and he smiled to himself as he anticipated the pleasant greeting which was in store for him. But he miscalculated his reception. Mrs. Lennox was polite to a degree, but all her old warmth of manner seemed suddenly to have frozen up. In vain Lionel Stafford tried to break through the ice. In vain he endeavoured to fathom its cause. And then, when he had despaired, it all came out. They had been silent for some few minutes when the lady suddenly asked:

"Do you know, Mr. Stafford, where Miss Crossley is?"

Lionel started.

"I? No. Why, don't you? I should have thought all London knew where so wealthy an heiress lived."

There was a note of bitterness in his tone, which was quite lost on the astonished Mrs. Lennox.

"Wealthy—heiress!" she gasped. "Whatever are you talking about, Mr. Stafford? Surely you are not ignorant of the unhappy circumstances connected with Adam Crossley's death?"

It was now Lionel's turn to evince astonishment.

"Mrs. Lennox," he said, "believe me, I know literally nothing of the affair. As I presume you know already, Miss Crossley wrote to me immediately after her father's death, voluntarily breaking off our engagement, and giving as her reason for so doing her 'altered circumstances.' Of course, I saw at once what she meant. She had suddenly become a rich heiress. I was a poor, struggling artist. I——"

"Stop! Oh, for pity's sake, stop!" The voice of Mrs. Lennox checked him ere he could proceed. "Oh, what a dreadful mistake! And I—I must tell you the truth. Poor Adam Crossley died a ruined man. No one suspected it, not even his most intimate business acquaintances. Nor was that all, for strange rumours got abroad concerning his sudden and unexpected death. The papers took it up, the medical certificate was called in question, and a post-mortem disclosed the fact that death had been due, not to heart failure, as had been believed, but to a powerful narcotic. Poor Ida was penniless, homeless. These were her 'altered circumstances.' Oh, Mr. Stafford, why did you not go to her?"

Digitized by Google

There was a dead silence. At the first word of the sudden revelation, Lionel Stafford had caught his breath. His face was very white, and as they had done that dark night in his old studio, his lips twitched with the effort of self-control. Presently his voice broke the silence.

"Where is she — now?" he asked hoarsely.

But Mrs. Lennox only shook her head. She was crying now—crying at the memory of that sad-faced, desolate girl whom she had seen two years ago.

"I wish I knew," she said. "We offered her a home here with us, but she would not accept it. She said she meant to earn her living as thousands of other girls had to do. Still we tried to persuade her, until one day she disappeared altogether. Mr. Lennox has sought everywhere for her, but without success. I tremble to think what has become of her. She was so unfit to fight with the world. Yet she was too proud to do anything else."

Ten minutes later a remorseful and almost despairing man staggered from the house, out into the big, pitiless city, to seek the girl he loved and whom he had in his ignorance deserted.

Taking her into his arms he kissed her passionately.

* * * * *

Of the thirty days which Lionel Stafford had allotted as the duration of his stay in England, five-and-twenty had slipped by without the discovery of the smallest clue to the whereabouts of Ida Crossley. She seemed to have disappeared from the very face of the earth. Yet she was close at hand all the time. So great is the mysterious gulf that separates rich and poor.

Almost in despair, Lionel trudged through street after street, made endless inquiries of likely people who stared at him curiously, but could offer no help. And then, one day, he stumbled upon something that set his pulses beating madly, though his heart grew sick within him.

He had listlessly picked up a copy of The Exchange and Mart, and was idly looking down the closely-packed columns of advertisements. Suddenly he stopped. One brief paragraph had caught his eye.

"To be sold. Lady's gold watch. Name of 'Ida' in diamonds on back. Must sell. Will take £5. Urgent. Address No. 23,907."

The words swam before his eyes as he read them again. "Must sell. Will take £5. Urgent." Could anything be more pitiful than that? In a fever of excitement, he wrote a brief note to the owner of the watch, adopting another name, and directed it to No. 23,907.

How he got through the remainder of that day, and more than half that which followed it, he never knew. Hour after hour he hung about the offices of the great advertising medium, worrying the officials with his persistent inquiries and hoping to see her come herself for the letters.

But she never did. The letters were removed by a messenger, and, returning the following afternoon to his hotel, he found a reply awaiting him. With a great choking sensation in his throat, he wrenched open the envelope and ran his eye down the letter within.

"Yours truly.—IDA CROSSLEY."

Ah, it was she then! He looked at the address. "97 Harley Street, Bow, E." In an instant he was out of the hotel and in a hansom. Rattling along, quivering with pent-up excitement, remorse, hope, longing—and then—and then—he was face to face with a sad-faced, violet-eyed girl, whom he only dimly recognised as the happy, light-hearted maiden of long ago.

"Lionel! Oh!"

But she was in his arms. Her head was on his breast. Once more the glorious violet eyes shone like soft pansies through a summer mist.

"Ida," he breathed penitently, "can you forgive, darling? I thought you were rich—that it was your riches that had come between us—and I went off to America two days after your letter reached me. And—and all the while you were poor! Oh, is there—is there forgiveness for me?"

Ida Crossley drew his face shyly down to the level of her own and kissed him lovingly.

"Poor old boy!" she murmured. "We have both of us suffered much—you in your loneliness—I in my two years' fight as a music-teacher in this dreary, unappreciative, unlovely old parish of Bow. There is nothing to forgive. I, too, was wrong to let my foolish pride dictate so cold a letter to you. Let us try and make amends for all that has gone by."

Again he kissed the face so close to his own.

"Will you come to America with me?" he pleaded.

"If you wish it—yes."

"I am making a name out there, darling."

"I knew you would do so one day, Lionel, wherever you were."

"I sail in four days, sweetheart."

"Oh!"

"And a special license is obtainable in three," he added.

There was a pause. There was a blush on Ida's cheek when she lifted her eyes to his.

"I suppose you must have your way?" she said.

So, in three days' time, it was, for both of them, once more a case of "altered circumstances."

M. J. W.

Digitized by Google

Imperious Miss Chalmers.

Telling How a Girl Chose Between Love and Social Position.

MARGARET CHALMERS was a tall, well-built, handsome girl, just twenty years old, but by her conversation and manners she seemed to be ten years older.

Her regal pose and figure were the envy of most of her girl friends, and the desire of many of her male friends.

Muriel, her sister, was the greatest contrast possible. Of slight build and demure manner, she seemed always in the shade when Margaret chose to shine. Sweet is the adjective I think I should apply to Muriel.

However, you would have to go a long way before you would find a girl possessed of such beauty, or of such a queenly figure, as was Margaret Chalmers. So thought Harvey Jefferson, who was passionately attached to Margaret.

Now there was a very warm corner in Margaret's heart for Harvey, but she was not going to let that warm corner get any warmer if it were possible to prevent it. Her reason being that Harvey was only an underpaid clerk in a Government office, which position, Margaret concluded, was not nearly good enough for her.

Harvey Jefferson was a great friend of the Chalmers family, although they one and all knew his would-be secret. In her heart of hearts Muriel sympathised deeply with Harvey, for she knew her sister as he could not with his eyes blinded by love.

And now I am going to tell you another secret, but this is a real secret, although it is a sad one. Muriel loved Harvey. Nobody knew it but Muriel, and she pretended that she did not, but she did; she knew it only too well, as her aching heart would often tell her.

How deeply it pained her nobody knew, to see Harvey gazing at Margaret with an expression which she, Muriel, would have given so much to be able to inspire. Her heart was full to overflowing with repressed feeling, and all the time she smiled gaily.

Harvey had always treated her like a sister, and had confided in her his love for Margaret, little thinking that every word was a stab. And now he had come to her to say that that very evening he was going to ask Margaret to marry him.

Then he had come from the drawing-room where he had been alone with Margaret, with a look of abject agony in his eyes. How she had longed to take him in her arms and comfort him. How dearly she would have loved to have been able to have smoothed out those lines of pain from his troubled face. And all the time Margaret's voice could be heard rising high in song, apparently he was forgotten already.

And this was what took place in the drawing-room.

As Harvey entered Margaret knew what was coming, and forced that warm corner far from her. Wealth and position must be hers, whatever the cost may be. She must enjoy life, surely 'twas for that she had been created. She did not understand the perfect happiness and enjoyment that true love would bring, no matter what the position might be.

"Margaret," said Harvey, "I have come to tell you I love you. I want you to be my wife, dear."

He blurted out the words as quickly as possible, and then stood still, waiting for the answer to issue from those full, rich lips.

"Oh, Harvey, now you have spoilt everything. Whatever did you want to say this for? I like you, in fact, I am fond of you; but I could not marry you."

"Could not marry me?" Harvey repeated the words in a dumfounded kind of manner.

"No, I could not," she cried petulantly. "Why should I, you have nothing to induce me to?"

"But I love you," he said simply.

"Pshaw!" she ejaculated, and then speaking very rapidly she cried: "You say you love me, Harvey, and I think you do. But what I mean is that you surely do not imagine that we can be married and live in an exceedingly quiet manner such as your position would enable you to?"

A pained expression crossed his face, but he said nothing. He stood as one in a dream.

"Go away, and do something great," she cried. "Make a position, get to the top of the tree, then come to me again."

Very sound advice, no doubt, but was the inducement offered sufficient alone?

Harvey stood watching her, unable to speak. He could not understand. He offered her love, she asked for position.

"Well, then," he said eventually, speaking very slowly, as though he thought over each word before he uttered it. "If I can come back to you with a good position you will marry me?"

"Yes, Harvey."

"Then you do love me?" he cried eagerly.

"I like you very much, Harvey," she replied. "And I will marry you when——" She did not finish her speech, but expressively shrugged her shapely shoulders to indicate her meaning.

"Very well, Margaret. I was going to tell you that I have an appointment offered me in the Embassy at Paris, which may prove a stepping stone to a great position. I will endeavour to make one. I shall leave London very shortly, and I will say good-bye now."

He watched her intently as he spoke, and paused, seemingly waiting for some response. But none came, and he continued:

"I would rather not see you again before I go. You understand, Margaret, don't you?"

"Oh, quite," she cried, relieved to find that he was taking things so calmly. Naturally she was unaware of the tumult of feelings that existed beneath his placid exterior.

He stepped towards her, as though he would have taken her in his arms, but she held him away.

Digitized by Google

"No," she cried. "Not till you come again."

Then he went out, leaving her alone, and she devoted her attention to a new song.

"Oh, Muriel," he groaned, for they met outside in the hall. "She seems heartless. I believe she cares for me, but she cares more for position than love."

"Poor old boy," cried Muriel, sympathetically. "What shall you do now, Harvey?"

He briefly outlined his plans.

"Going away?" she cried, with wide open eyes.

"Yes," he muttered mechanically.

"To make a position for Margaret?"

"Yes," he repeated, gazing somewhat curiously at Muriel, who was still regarding him with those sorrowful blue eyes.

"Oh, I hope you will be happy, Harvey, I hope you will be happy." And then she fled from him up the stairs.

He gazed after her retreating form somewhat surprisedly before going in to make his adieux to the Chalmers family.

He said nothing of his interview with Margaret to either Mr. or Mrs. Chalmers, but simply told them that he would be leaving England for Paris very shortly.

One and all wished him the best of luck. He did not see Muriel again, but sent her a short note of farewell, which she tenderly placed, bedewed with her tears, with a few other relics of Harvey which she had accumulated; and they were sacred to her.

"Oh, she's not worth it, she's not worth it!" Muriel wailed again and again, as she lay face down on her bed, drenching the delicate coverlet with her tears.

She took his photo and passionately kissed it ere she locked it away with the other things.

"Why should he care for you," she said to her reflection in the mirror, "when he sees Margaret every day of his life? Oh, why was I not beautiful that he might have loved me?

"No one shall ever know," she cried. And somehow she seemed comforted with the pain of her sorrowful secret.

Time went by; the Chalmers family heard from Harvey occasionally. Margaret had more letters from him than anyone else. How carelessly she took them and read them, much as she would have taken up a newspaper, and how Muriel grudged those written words.

But with Margaret the coolness was only at first. After Harvey had been away some months that warm corner seemed to spread all over her heart, and she longed for him. But she repressed these feelings, and would not admit of them even to herself.

It is possible to be hypocritical with one's own self, and this was the state of affairs with Margaret Chalmers.

She became more than ever the belle of her particular set, and indeed wherever she visited. She was more than ever admired and envied, but the admiration and envy seemed to have lost its pleasure; to be envied was a pleasure to her before she knew the real state of her feelings towards Harvey.

In his last letter he had said that he was getting on, but very slowly. Promotion was very difficult to obtain, but still he did not despair; he would make it come to him.

And now as to Harvey Jefferson. He had gone away with his heart seemingly torn in shreds. He felt that life without Margaret was not worth living.

In Paris he threw himself heart and soul into his work, and speedily earned the commendation of his chief. Thus a very favourable report of him was forwarded to headquarters, although he knew it not. His chief was well aware of Harvey's desire to return to England if possible, and was even then using his influence to obtain an appointment for Harvey.

Occasionally a letter would come from Margaret, but most of his knowledge of her since his departure was gleaned from letters from Muriel, who was proving herself a most indefatigable correspondent.

Thus he found himself looking very eagerly for Muriel's letters, and she kept him very well informed, although it cost her considerable pain in doing so.

But one day a letter came from her which caused his face to blanch, and the veins to stand out on his forehead. But let us hurry back to England, in order that we may better understand.

About six months after Harvey had gone away, a family by the name of Devereux had taken a large house near to that of the Chalmers, and the families speedily became intimate.

There were two daughters and one son in the family, but it is with the latter that we are more concerned. His name was Reginald, and he was possessed of considerable wealth besides being the heir to his father's large estates and riches. Also, Reginald Devereux was a good fellow, and the possessor of equally good looks.

Almost as soon as he met Margaret Chalmers he fell deeply in love with her, but he managed to keep this knowledge to himself, until one evening at Margaret's home the two were left together, and then he told her of his love.

Even Margaret was somewhat taken by surprise, so well had he kept his secret. She thought for a few moments, whilst he waited anxiously. She quickly reviewed the position and prospect, and then put her hands in his, and said that she would marry him.

And that was what Muriel's letter to Harvey had said. And that was why he spent the evening in the Champs Elysées without one thought of dining. He wanted to think.

Why was he not more upset at the news? He reproached himself when he discovered that he was not stricken down with the sudden blow. Could it be that he did not care so much for Margaret as he had thought, and her absence had brought this truth home to him? Was that the reason?

It never occurred to him that his idol had been shattered that evening in the drawing-room when Margaret had preferred position to love.

Her letters, which had been carefully worded, had unconsciously enhanced the dormant feelings. And now she had not even written to tell him of this decision.

Pshaw! What did it matter? This Devereux had wealth and position, and that was what she wanted, so why need he worry?

That very same day his chief acquainted him with the fact that he had been appointed to a Secretaryship in the Foreign Office in London, the result of his good services in Paris. And that estimable gentleman went away wondering why the dickens young Jefferson did not seem so gratified as he expected.

Harvey was not to leave Paris for a month to come, he was informed. In the meantime he would still be attached to the embassy.

Why, he asked himself, why did he immediately sit down and write to Muriel, telling her of the good news?

If you had asked him, he would probably have replied that he always told Muriel everything.

Digitized by Google

But then, again, why was he so impatient to get her reply? This I do not think he could have answered so readily.

Her letter came, a long, warm letter, with tender sympathy and congratulation both expressed in her own sweet, womanly way.

"Dear old Muriel," he muttered.

The month rapidly passed by, and Harvey was back again in London. Before proceeding to his old home, he had reported himself at the Foreign Office.

He found his new chief to be a most affable man, who gave him all the information that he was seeking. Lord Harbury, who had obtained the appointment for him, had not been able to tell him much concerning it, beyond the fact that it would be a very good thing for him.

He was now gratified to find that he would commence with a very handsome salary, and that his prospects were of the brightest.

Then he hurried down to his home, or, at least, where his home had been in days gone by.

He came quite unexpectedly, for no one knew of his return. He called on the Chalmers and found that only Mrs. Chalmers was at home. She cordially welcomed him, for she had taken the place of his dead mother as near as it is possible for another woman to do.

He acquainted her with his good news, and she was as pleased as if he had been her own boy.

"Were you surprised to hear of Margaret's engagement?" she asked, for the understanding between Margaret and Harvey had been kept a secret, and only Margaret, Harvey, and Muriel shared it.

"I was rather," said Harvey, but ere he could say another word, the door opened and Margaret herself swept in.

Immediately Harvey commenced to tremble, and a dark flush spread over his face. But Margaret was not in the least nervous, although a strange feeling of joy crept over her.

They shook hands in the commonplace manner, and gradually Harvey regained his composure and chatted affably with Margaret.

In a few moments she saw the difference in him, and strove to reassert her influence over him with many winning ways, but to no purpose.

Then she endeavoured to make him jealous. She spoke of her future husband, showed Harvey his photo, but in all Harvey seemed only glad that she was apparently happy.

"If only he were in a better position," she murmured to herself as she gazed at Harvey.

She felt in her heart of hearts that the nearest approach she had to love was all for Harvey. But he was poor, or, at least, he was not opulent. Neither could he put her in the position that Reginald Devereux could.

Harvey had said nothing to her of his promotion and bright prospects, knowing that Mrs. Chalmers could tell her, if she were desirous of hearing.

Muriel, he learnt to his disappointment, was not expected back until after tea, she having gone to a bazaar.

"She will be delighted to see you," said Mrs. Chalmers.

After tea Harvey went out, saying that he would call back again later on in the evening. He went straight to the building where the bazaar was being held, to wait until Muriel should come out. One by one, in couples and groups, people issued from the hall, and then, at last, came Muriel.

That same little figure, with its sweet, winning face. He watched her standing in the light of the lamps in the doorway. What was this strange feeling that came over him as he gazed at her? Why was he so intensely glad to see her? And why did he press so eagerly forward as she came out into the dark, tree-lined road?

"Muriel," he said.

She gave a little start of surprise, and then she looked up into his face, and immediately her eyes lit up with pleasure.

"Harvey!" she cried. "Oh, it is good to see you again."

She stood holding his hand and devouring his face with her eyes. Then she suddenly blushed at her eagerness, and released his hand.

"Shall we go on home?" she said in rather shy tones. "You are coming to see us, are you not?"

"I have been already," he replied. "And then I came along to meet you, Muriel."

"To meet me?" she cried quickly.

"Yes, Muriel, because I felt I wanted you. Oh, my dear, I loved you all the while and did not know it! What I mistook for love I offered to Margaret. Muriel, dear, dare I hope?"

He quickly read his answer in the lovelit eyes that were turned up to his in shy eagerness; the next moment he was raining kisses upon her.

When Harvey had written from Paris to tell Muriel of his promotion, he had not been able to give any details, and had only said that he had obtained a better appointment in London. Thus, she was quite unaware of the great lift up the ladder that he had been given.

"We shall not be able to make a great show, shall we, Harvey?" she asked softly.

"Why, little woman, I forgot to tell you all about my new appointment." And then he told her of all the good fortune that had come to him.

Now comes the sad part of my story.

That same evening, before Harvey had said anything to either Mr. or Mrs. Chalmers of his desire to become their son-in-law, Margaret had manœuvred matters so as to be alone with him.

"Mother told me of your promotion," she said, standing close to him, and placing her beautiful face near his own.

"Did she?" he muttered lamely.

"Yes, Harvey, may I congratulate you?"

"Why, of course," he replied.

"Don't you remember, Harvey, what we agreed upon before you went away?" She stood so close to him that her heaving breast pressed against him, and her hair was soft against his face.

For one mad moment his arms were raised to clasp her to him, whilst she looked into his eyes with a triumphant fascination, and her breath fanned his cheek. She threw her arms about him, and clung closer to him in wild abandon, whilst she passionately whispered her intreaties in his ears.

He stood half dazed with the awful temptation, almost yielding, and then the vision of Muriel came before his eyes, and he thrust the temptress away from him.

"And this is your trust to Reginald Devereux?" he said scornfully. "And would have been mine, too, I suppose, if I had been in his place."

"No, no, Harvey!" she cried. "It is you I love, and always have loved. Oh, don't leave me, Harvey!"

"You love position more, Margaret, and I have learnt what true love is," was his stern reply.

And then he left her.

In less than two months' time Muriel and Harvey were married, and if there are any who doubt about choosing between love and position, let them just call on either Mr. or Mrs. Harvey Jefferson, or Mrs. Reginald Devereux.

E. Newton Bungey.

To Those About to Marry.

DON'T let the knot be tied without knowing something about the character and disposition of each other. This you can find out by sending a specimen of your handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope, to RANEE, 23 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. In return an accurate delineation of your character will be sent. If you both obtain these delineations, and then compare them, you will be able to decide whether a happy marriage is likely to result.

Digitized by Google

£500 IN CASH PRIZES

1st Prize, £250.

2nd Prize, £100. 3rd Prize, £50.

AND 100 PRIZES OF £1 EACH.

SPLENDID NEW WINTER EVENING CONTEST.

Below you will find twelve sets of letters, numbered from 1 to 12. What you have to do is to find the longest word entirely composed of the letters in each set, not necessarily using all the letters. In each case, you must write (in ink), in the space left for that purpose, the longest word you can make. The word containing the greatest number of letters will be the correct solution. If two or more such words of the same length can be made from a set of letters it is only necessary to put down one of these words. Only one word may be written on each line.

When you have filled in your solutions, get a copy of next Friday's PEARSON'S WEEKLY, in which you will find the full conditions and another Coupon.

The first prize of £250 will be given to the competitor from whom the Editor of PEARSON'S WEEKLY receives the best list under the published conditions. The second prize of £100 will go to the person from whom the Editor of PEARSON'S WEEKLY receives the next best list, and the other prizes will be awarded in order of merit.

Every member of a household may compete, but no competitor may send in more than one complete set of pages.

Example:
ECCJLUZ: JUGGLE (The Z is here an unnecessary letter and is ignored.)

FIRST LIST.

1. AELP .....
2. GIKN .....
3. EHOPK .....
4. ACFNY .....
5. AABDLORR .....
6. ADEHRT .....
7. ORRWY .....
8. DEINPS .....
9. FGHIT .....
10. EILNNT .....
11. EILLMR .....
12. EGLN .....

Name .....

Address .....

.....

The full conditions, together with the second list appear in PEARSON'S WEEKLY, published on Friday next, Jan. 29.

Digitized by Google

Stuff and Nonsense.

SAID he, "Matilda, you are my dearest duck." Said she, "Augustus, you are trying to stuff me." She was too sage for him.

The Best of Many.

HE: "And what do you think of the engagement ring I sent you?" She: "Oh! it's splendid. I have never had such a fine one before."

Time Changes Things.

TED: "Tom is engaged to the prettiest girl in town. He takes all his friends round to see her." Ned: "That's only natural. As soon as they are married he won't let one of them come near the house."

A Cautious Lover.

ETHEL: "I know he is a financier, but he is not a speculator." Maude: "How do you know, dear?" Ethel: "He didn't buy our engagement ring until he was quite sure that I would accept him."

They Fell to Arms.

MISS BUTEE: "Newspaper work takes in almost everything, doesn't it?" Spacer (moving up closer to her): "Well, yes, our profession does embrace a great deal." Then the light got so nervous it went out.

Used to It.

ELLA: "How long did it take Fred to propose to you?" Stella: "He talked about twenty minutes." Ella: "That's an awfully long time." Stella: "I know it seems so; but, then, you must remember he is a lawyer."

He Hadn't the Courage.

SHE: "Mr. Trotter has been sitting over in that corner all the evening; I wonder why he doesn't come and talk to me." He (Trotter's rival): "I told him that his trousers bagged at the knee, and he dare not walk across the room."

Why She Refused Him.

THE IMPECUNIOUS EARL: "Surely, you cannot think I would marry for your money?" The Heiress: "Certainly not, my lord, but everybody else would think so, and it would break my heart to have you regarded with unjust suspicion."

How Small He Felt!

"Do you think, Miss Fanny," he said, "the time will ever come when women will propose to the men?" She lifted up her beautiful eyes and looked him squarely in the face. "Never, Mr. Smith," she replied, "if they are anything like you."

A Reason for her Request.

WIFE (to husband): "Arthur, love, I want you to give John a good scolding to-morrow morning." Husband: "What for? I am perfectly satisfied with the fellow." Wife: "Well, you know, he has to beat the carpets to-morrow, and he strikes ever so much harder when he's in a bad temper."

Surely.

HE (indignantly): "I hope I know my own mind!" She (sweetly): "Yes! You surely ought to know as much as that!"

Uncomplimentary.

MR. STUCKUP: "Why, it's years since I've seen you, Miss Rood. I haven't altered much, have I?" Miss Rood: "No, I'm sorry to say."

Quite True.

"Do you love me?" said the paper bag to the sugar. "I'm just wrapped up in you," replied the sugar. "You sweet thing!" murmured the paper bag.

No Cause for Alarm.

CHAFFEE: "Miss Goldielocks asked me what I thought of you last night." Brann: "Is that so?" Chaffee: "Yes. But don't be alarmed, I didn't tell her."

Proof Positive.

MISS SINGER: "I wonder if that rich uncle of mine remembered me when he made his will? I used to sing to him." Mr. Law: "I'm sure he must have. He hasn't left you anything."

A Small Share.

KATE: "And so you are married? Keeping house, I suppose?" Maud: "Not exactly. There is a lady from Ireland who keeps the house, but she allows us to eat and sleep in it."

A Soft Answer Turneth Away Wrath.

POLLY (to her fiancé): "Tom, you danced four times with that girl Jenkins and only twice with me." Tom (slyly): "Well, it takes quantity, you know, to make up for quality."

He Wasn't Very Happy.

NEWLYWED: "Why, I never thought of saving until I got married." Bachelor: "And do you now?" Newlywed: "Oh, yes, indeed! I'm continually thinking how much I might save if I wasn't married."

A Likely Reason.

WINKERS: "Why is it that women always dislike a prominent man who is an old bachelor?" Blinkers: "Because they can't say that he would never have amounted to anything if it had not been for his wife."

She'd Trouble Him No More.

MOTHER-IN-LAW: "It is so kind of you, Harry, to take the trouble to drive me home." Son-in-Law: "Don't mention it. It is no trouble at all. On the contrary, it is the most delightful drive I have had for some time."

Preferred to Have Witnesses.

LIGHTLOVE: "At last, dear Sophia, we are alone, and I can tell you that I lo——" Sophia: "Oh, please, no, Mr. Lightlove—don't tell me here." Lightlove: "Why not? There is no one to see us or overhear us here." Sophia: "That's just it."

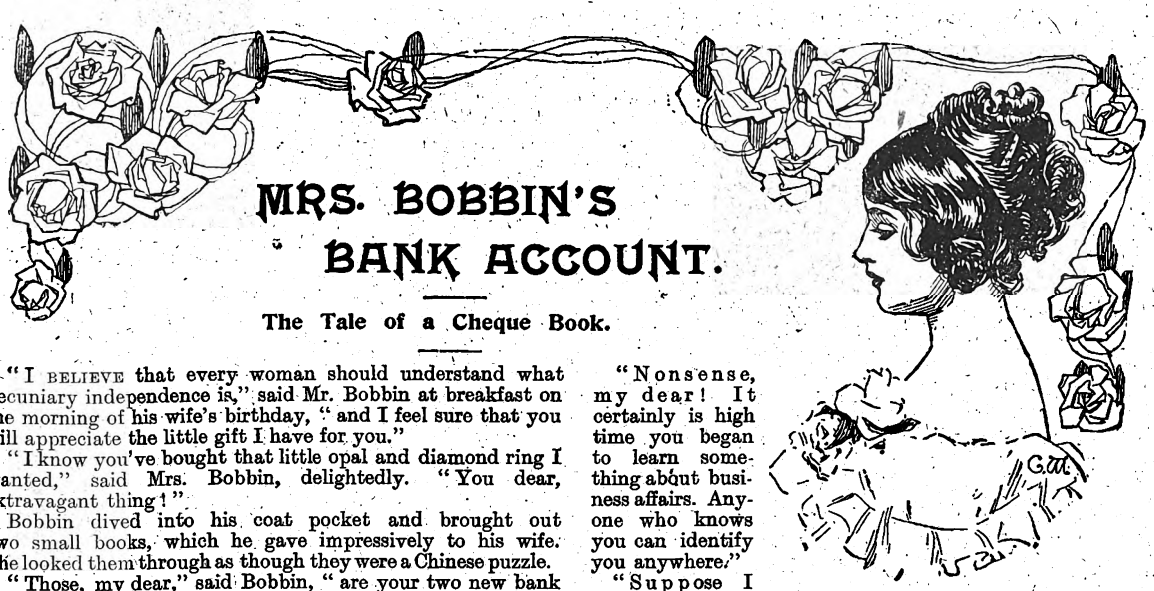
He was Exceptionally Original.

MISS CAUSTIQUE: "So you are engaged to that Mr. Atkinson, are you? Now, tell me honestly, what can you see in him that distinguishes him from all other men in the world whom you have ever met?" Miss Passee (with unlooked-for frankness): "He asked me to be his wife."

An Effective Remedy.

"I HOPE," said Mrs. Allkrect to her daughter Jennie, "that you did not allow your cousin John to kiss you on the cheek when you bade him good-bye at the station last night?" "No, indeed, I didn't, mamma." "Well, that's one of his habits, kissing girls on the cheek. How did you manage to prevent him from kissing you on the cheek?" "Easily enough. I held up my mouth for him to kiss."

Digitized by Google



MRS. BOBBIN'S BANK ACCOUNT.

The Tale of a Cheque Book.

"I BELIEVE that every woman should understand what pecuniary independence is," said Mr. Bobbin at breakfast on the morning of his wife's birthday, "and I feel sure that you will appreciate the little gift I have for you."

"I know you've bought that little opal and diamond ring I wanted," said Mrs. Bobbin, delightedly. "You dear, extravagant thing!"

Bobbin dived into his coat pocket and brought out two small books, which he gave impressively to his wife. She looked them through as though they were a Chinese puzzle.

"Those, my dear," said Bobbin, "are your two new bank books. I have deposited for you at the Rattlethem Bank the sum of fifty pounds as your birthday gift, and hereafter I shall give you your monthly allowance also in the shape of a cheque, which you can deposit and draw against in due form."

"Oh, isn't that lovely!" said Mrs. Bobbin, trying to conceal her disappointment about the ring. "Do I simply show these at the shops when I want to buy anything?"

"The small book," said Bobbin, "is your deposit book, in which will be recorded any amounts which you may wish to—er—save. You will find that having a bank-book will cause you to save money almost unconsciously. This long book is your cheque book, on which I have had put your monogram in gold."

"And pink leaves, too!" said Mrs. Bobbin. "Just my colour! What do I do with this? Oh, isn't it sweet!"

"They get those things up very nicely at the Rattlethem Bank," said Mr. Bobbin. "I believe they have more ladies among their depositors than men, and they have clerks specially selected for their politeness and their courtesy in explaining matters. These cheque-books are rather a pretty idea. When you want to draw a cheque you tear out one of these and enter the amount on the counterfoil."

"And spoil the book!" exclaimed Mrs. Bobbin.

"That's what it is made for. See, these perforated lines show where you tear it off. This place is for the number of the cheque, and this for the date. Here is where you sign your name, and on this line you write the amount of money you wish to pay out."

"But I'm not going to tear out one of those pretty cheques!" exclaimed Mrs. Bobbin. "I'll get money from you whenever I want it, or else I'll have things charged!"

"That is not exactly the idea, my dear," said Bobbin, looking a trifle uneasy. "I want you to learn to take care of your own bank account and your own money. Of course, you'll have to draw cheques."

"But I never, never could draw, Albert, it was always my very worst lesson at the convent—it was——"

"Ha, ha, ha! You don't understand; to draw a cheque is to write it out—to fill it up—see?"

"And I can go anywhere and spend a cheque?"

"Well, if you're known it will be all right, otherwise you'll have to be identified."

"Oh, how perfectly horrid! I am sure I never can do that. Why, Mrs. Sniffington had to go to the police-station to identify her purse. That's where you have to go to be identified, Albert!"

"Nonsense, my dear! It certainly is high time you began to learn something about business affairs. Anyone who knows you can identify you anywhere."

"Suppose I want to pay my fare on the car or pay a cabman. Will he be able to identify me?"

"Oh, you don't use cheques for such small amounts as that. You just ask me about it any time you want to draw a cheque, and I'll let you have the benefit of my advice."

"Well, just let me have twenty pounds this morning," said Mrs. Bobbin, "for I've got to go to town and get some things. I don't want to spoil the book until I have had it awhile, anyhow!"

So Bobbin gave his wife the money and she started for town. Looking out of the bus she saw the Rattlethem Bank, and she decided to go in and see what it was like. It was a beautiful white marble place, with young men clerks at work behind plate-glass partitions. Then there was an inviting little carpeted inclosure, where she saw several women sitting at small desks writing or counting money.

Mrs. Bobbin walked in and said to the young man at the nearest window: "Will you be kind enough to let me have some notepaper and envelopes? I have a few letters to write."

He looked at her strangely. "We have nothing but the official paper, madam," he said, "and it is against our rules to use that even for our own correspondence."

"I think that is very odd," said Mrs. Bobbin, "my husband told me that you were specially courteous to ladies here."

"Are you a depositor?" asked the clerk.

"I beg your pardon. Am I what?" said Mrs. Bobbin haughtily.

"Have you an account here?"

"I am a member here," said Mrs. Bobbin, drawing out her books and confronting him with them triumphantly.

"Oh, a new account!" said the clerk, smiling. "I see. Are you Mrs. Bobbin?"

"I am Mrs. Albert Hollingway Bobbin," said Mrs. Bobbin, drawing herself up. "Do you wish to identify me?"

"Oh, not at all! Not at all!" said the clerk. "Is there anything I can do for you, Mrs. Bobbin; would you like to meet our cashier, Mr. Knockem."

"Certainly not, sir," said Mrs. Bobbin grandly. "I should like to—to—draw a cheque!"

"Very well, madam, you will find a table and chair opposite, with writing materials upon it. When you have made out your cheque you can give it to the cashier, fifth window to the right. He will let you have the money."

"What money?"

"The money your cheque calls for."

"But I don't want any money. I simply wish to draw a cheque."

Digitized by Google

"Oh, very well! I beg your pardon. Be seated, madam. The small table opposite."

Mrs. Bobbin sat down and took out her new book, toying affectionately with its pink pages. Then she tried one of the pens. In the date line she wrote "Thursday afternoon," in a sprawling, angular hand. Then she signed her name with a flourish.

"Is this correct?" she inquired of the young man at the window. He looked it over with a carefully suppressed smile.

"Er — you've got the things in the wrong place, but if you just write the amount and the name of the person you wish to—"

"Dear me, I shall never understand it!" said Mrs. Bobbin desperately.

"Shall I fill it in for you?" asked the young man politely.

"If you will be so kind," said Mrs. Bobbin.

"To whose order?" asked the clerk.

"Oh, it really doesn't matter," said Mrs. Bobbin.

"To the order of bearer, shall I write?"

"That will do very nicely."

"Now the amount—what shall it be?"

"I don't care," said Mrs. Bobbin. "You see, I have twenty pounds that my husband gave me this morning. If you'll just draw the cheque I'll be so much obliged. I have an engagement with the dressmaker at twelve."

"Then I'll leave the amount blank?"

"Just as you please," said Mrs. Bobbin, graciously. "I'm so much obliged. Good morning!" and she turned to go.

"Here's the cheque," said the clerk, waving it through the window.

"Oh, do I take it with me?" inquired Mrs. Bobbin. "I thought I left it here."

"Not unless you wish to draw some money."

"Oh, thank you so much! Good morning."

That evening Mrs. Bobbin had a lesson in drawing cheques from her husband, when she had shown him the fruit of her morning's interview in the Rattlethem Bank, which document he carefully destroyed. For the first time he made his wife understand that she personally had some money at her disposal in the bank.

Next morning she visited her dressmaker and then proceeded to do some shopping. She explained at the grocer's shop where she was a frequent customer that she wished to pay her bill with a cheque, and the manager filled it in for her and had her affix her signature.

"Now, you'll send these things home just as though they were paid for?" she said to the manager, who had dealt with ladies who had bank accounts before.

"Precisely the same, madam," he said smilingly. The bill was for five pounds, and he knew that Bobbin was good for it. Mrs. Bobbin felt so elated over her success that she went to her milliner's and bought two hats for four guineas, and then found that she had no money for luncheon. She had given the milliner a cheque for the hats, and she told her of her predicament.

"I will cash a cheque for you with pleasure," said the milliner.

"Can you make it out for me just as you did for yourself just now?" asked Mrs. Bobbin.

"Certainly," said the milliner, "how much would you like?"

Madam thought that ten pounds would be sufficient, and when she received the crisp notes she felt effusively grateful.

"I shall pay you this to-morrow!" she exclaimed as she went out of the shop, putting the money in her purse.

A few days later Mrs. Bobbin had a visit from one of the bank clerks. He told her that she had overdrawn her account, but she indignantly denied it, and showed him that her book still existed as a proof of her financial soundness.

"You can see for yourself that it is quite full of cheques!" she said indignantly. "I never heard of such a thing! Certainly I have money in the bank!"

"On the contrary you owe us money, Mrs. Bobbin. You have overdrawn. Can't you understand?"

"I shall certainly tell my husband about this!" exclaimed Mrs. Bobbin.

"He may be able to explain it to you, and please make the amount of the overdraft good as soon as possible."

When Bobbin came home there was a stormy half hour, tears, and much explaining. As a result of it all, Mrs. Bobbin never renewed her bank account. She says that money is good enough for her, and that when she paid people with cheques it always seemed as though she still owed them the cash.

"Besides that," she said to her husband, "I never had any pocket-money, and as for that birthday present, I never saw it! And I had nothing but trouble all the time. But those pink cheques do make the loveliest curl papers you ever saw!"

Harry Richardson.

A New Magazine Is Coming

ITS NAME.

THE RAPID REVIEW.

ITS PRICE.

Sixpence.

ITS DATE.

No. 1, February 12th.

ITS PUBLISHERS.

C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Proprietors of Pearson's and The Lady's Magazines, etc.

ITS OBJECTS.

THE RAPID REVIEW will give you a full and readable summary of all the principal magazines, periodicals, and newspapers in the world—both in literature and pictures. The whole thought of the whole of the world every month.

Fuller Particulars Next Week.

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID SERIAL.

Dupes of Destiny

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT

By Blanche Eardley, Writer of "The Bond Between."

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS IN THIS STORY ARE:

SIR CYPRIAN RUST, who has inherited the baronetcy and estates of Sir Basil Wingate, though he is not the legal heir.

MARCELLA RUST, his daughter, a very lovely girl, who is greatly in love with

PHILIP NULLIUS, the curate of Crawley Village, where the home of Sir Cyprian, Wingate Court, is situated.

LADY VIOLET FRAYNE-LENNOX, whom Marcella believes to be her aunt. She is a very beautiful woman, and loves her niece dearly, but Sir Cyprian has, for some reason, immense power over her, which he uses to further his own ends.

EDWARD DAY is an orphan whom Lady Violet has befriended. He, however, in making unreturned love to Marcella, insults her, and Lady Violet refuses to have anything more to do with him.

CALEB J. JOHNSON, a City magnate and millionaire, who marries Lady Violet, though he knows that her husband is still alive. This husband, MAJOR RICHARD FRAYNE-LENNOX, is a good-for-nothing, who has been turned out of the Army. Lady Violet believes him dead.

TWENTY-SIXTH CHAPTER.

The Secret of the Letters.

As the trap drew nearer it gradually slowed down, and at last came to a standstill in front of the financier, who had gazed with fascinated eyes upon the face of the man driving.

It was not what would be termed an ordinary face, but the expression on it was the first thing that arrested the onlooker. It was daring, defiant, and yet curiously humorous, as though in his secret mind the man knew himself to be a hopeless scamp, yet had sufficient grace of humour to be eternally a jest to himself.

In figure he was largely made, cast in a slighter mould than the financier, but more sinewy than the latter, and he was burnt to a deep tan that showed like black against the gleam of two rows of even teeth.

Such was the man whom Caleb J. Johnson, Lady Violet's bridegroom of a day, stared at, as though he were a ghost risen from the dead past.

The stranger sprang lightly from the trap, and glanced carelessly at the door of No. 3 Lillie Road, then, after a moment's quiet cogitation, he removed his glance to the figure of the financier, and for a wild moment Caleb J. Johnson hoped that he was not recognised—that the years had so changed him as to make him appear a man apart from what he had once been when he had worked side by side on the gold claim with the lithe-looking man whose cool eyes pierced his secret, as they ran quickly up and down him, to eventually meet his own in a long, steady glance of recognition.

"So," drawled the stranger slowly, "they talk of truth being stranger than fiction, and by gum, it's true! Of all the spots in the world where I one day hoped to renew our friendship, the village of Leyton is the very last where I expected that most enjoyable re-union to take place, Mr. Jerningham."

"Hush!" replied Caleb J. Johnson, finding his tongue loosened by the mention of the name he had cast aside for ever. "I won't pretend not to know you, Rayne, although the years have changed you less than they have me—but it's no use our quarrelling in a village street over what took place more than twenty years ago."

He held out his hand—that slow smile, which his shareholders pronounced so irresistible, touching the corners of his mouth.

"Come, Rayne, let bygones be bygones! We were young in those days and our blood was unruly, but now we are men of the world!"

The man Rayne laughed sardonically, yet a glance of unwilling admiration shot from his eyes as he gazed at the well-to-do figure of the man he called "Jerningham."

"You can't carney me, Jerningham," he laughed. "I'm not the man to forget; you wronged your friend as you did your wife. We both trusted you in those days, and how did you treat us? You robbed me of my share of the money we made together; and you robbed your wife of her happiness and life.

"Ah!" he exclaimed passionately, "she, that beautiful woman who left everything for you, and refused to be comforted by other people who knew her value—now you talk of letting bygones be bygones!" He laughed bitterly. "Have you ever troubled to find out how Helen died?" he asked in an altered voice.

Digitized by Google

(continued.)

The financier coloured slightly. This raking-up of the tatters of a cast-off ghost was not to his liking. But the man in front of him was not one whom he wished to provoke. That he knew him still as "Jerningham" argued well for his dual rôle as the Gold King and financier of several companies. He must see that he did not betray himself to Rayne as Caleb J. Johnson. Then the fat would be in the fire.

"Helen died in England—so I learnt," he said quietly. "I have often reproached myself for having failed in my duty as a husband to her. But—well, I was a rough, jealous brute in those days, Rayne—and——" he paused significantly—"you were a handsomer chap than myself."

A dark flush mounted the tanned cheeks of the man who listened to him with such bitterness in his eyes.

"You mean to insinuate," he burst out suddenly. "Why, Good Heavens, man, she was an angel! I reverenced her as one. I even went to the length of tracing her after she left you, or rather after she was deserted by you. She did not die in England, but on board a liner among the steerage passengers and she gave her life for your son."

"My son! What do you mean?" Caleb J. Johnson said, paling strangely. "I have no son!"

"Helen—your wife died," repeated the man doggedly, "and left a son. I learnt so much, and then lost all trace of them. Of course, it never occurred to you, Jerningham, to look for a possible son, did it?"

The financier was silent. His thoughts had flown back to the woman whom he had so recently married under the name of "Caleb J. Johnson." Did she learn his secret, he could see the scorn and loathing in her patrician face.

"I knew nothing of this," he said hoarsely; "believe me, or not, as you like, Rayne—it is the truth. I will seek out my son now, unless he is dead."

"Unwanted children always live!" returned the other sullenly. He was beginning to feel the influence of the financier's personality and his anger was melting.

"I will also pay what I—I—borrowed from you," continued Caleb J. Johnson, following up this advantage. "I have made just a little money, enough to live quietly on—and you shall have your bit back. I will see to it when I return to town? What is your address?"

Rayne hesitated. "Write to 'R,' c.o., Post Office, Leyton," he said evasively. "That will find me."

"What are you doing here?" said the financier abruptly.

"I drove over from the country to get something a friend of mine left in his rooms at No. 3 Lillie Road here."

The financier started. That was the address where the curate lived in whom his bride took such an interest. "What did this backwoodsman want with him?" he wondered.

"Ah!" he said carelessly. "I came down here to call on a young chap in this street about—about some work I intended getting for him—but I'm afraid I made a mistake in the address. I must return to town and wire to him."

"Well," said the other hastily, "I won't stop now. I have a lot to do, and will drive in later and do my friend's commission. You are returning now, aren't you?" he went on anxiously, "and that money—the money you borrowed"—with a sarcastic grin. "On second thoughts you had better send it to me at my address. It is 'Water Grange'—don't forget.

"I have not much faith in your word, Jerningham, but if I find the money is not returned, I shall trace you to your London home, where there is probably a second 'Mrs. Jerningham.' She would be interested in her husband's treatment of his first wife!"

He drove off smartly, before Caleb J. Johnson could do more than note the address, which he did with a thrill of satisfaction.

The taunt about the second wife he could afford to ignore, since he was glad to find that his identity with the Gold King, Caleb J. Johnson, was not suspected by his old mate, who in the past had worked with him on the claim that had made the fortune he had stolen from his partner afterwards. Once the money was paid back, he would be square with Rayne.

In the meantime he must try to save that poor chap, Philip Nullius, from the fate of which he seemed in danger.

Rayne had carelessly told him his address as "Water Grange." Then he was concerned in the concealment of the curate; it was at his room that Rayne had intended calling for papers, but had decided to wait, fearing that his old enemy should watch him.

He would see that this time he outwitted the man who had sprung such a surprise upon him. It gave Caleb J. Johnson a sense of glee that in a way he would get his own back!

He knocked at the door of No. 3 Lillie Road, and, telling the landlady that he had called for the papers of his young friend, went into the sitting-room that Philip Nullius had lately vacated. He was interested in the curate, since he was Marcella's lover, and a special protégé of his bride, and it was with a feeling of curiosity that he opened a small case containing papers, letters, and one or two memoranda.

"I wonder what kind of a chap this Nullius is!" he murmured. "If you want to know a man's character, it is always safe to read his letters."

With that cynical speech, he undid a packet of letters. They were from Marcella—only a few girlish notes, and two letters that breathed a deep tender love.

The financier's eyes softened. He liked Marcella. She was a good sort of girl—well plucked too, to bolt from that slimy baronet as she did. Another bundle of papers attracted him. They were tied up with strong ribbon, and on the outside wrapper were the words, written in a clerical hand:

"These are the only papers relating to the obscure parentage of Philip Nullius, the foundling, born on board the liner from Australia, twenty-five years ago. The name of the mother is unknown, but her only possession at the time of her death was the few letters found sewn in her dress."

"So these interesting documents are supposed to throw light on the poor lad's birth!" Caleb J. Johnson murmured. "I'm afraid he is no one of any importance, poor chap. The heirs to titles are not usually born in the steerage of Australian liners."

He opened the packet with gentle fingers. After all, they had once been cherished by some woman who had thought well of the writer, who in turn had probably cast her off. He was not so sure that the curate was a fit match for the only child of Sir Cyprian Rust.

In one envelope there was a cutting from a paper. He drew it out curiously. It was torn across and one half was missing, but the financier read the words "living child—heir—if a boy. Address Samuel——" Then it broke off suddenly.

With a new interest he drew out one of the letters. It was old and very yellow with age. There was no date, or address, and no beginning except the words: "My darling!" he turned to the signature; he was now intensely interested, and a strange idea seized him that he was looking back, as it were, into his own past. A foolish thought, but it gripped him for all that.

Then, as his eyes fell on the name at the foot of the letter, the room seemed suddenly to whirl round and round the Gold King's head, and his heart began to throb so loudly that he was afraid lest it would suddenly stop altogether.

The name scrawled at the bottom of that poor little love-letter was one he knew well. It had been a nickname of his own. It was "Cabel," the word "Caleb" slightly altered. His first wife had always called him that for fun, and he had stuck to the name in the first days when he had cared for her.

And this letter—what did it mean by being in the possession of a friendless boy! He had written it—he, the Gold King, to his dead wife. Whose hand had dared pass it on to a stranger?

He stared round the room, a new wonder dawning in his eyes.

Digitized by Google

A stranger—he had said—a stranger! But the wrapper said "the woman gave birth to the boy"—then—oh, Heaven! the curate—the foundling—were one and the same as his lost son! The neglected sea-waif whose father's behaviour had killed his mother!

He fell into a chair. His limbs were trembling and the moisture stood on his brow in drops.

Suddenly he started up with a cry:

"'Water Grange'! He is there—perhaps hurt! Perhaps——"

Then with a hoarse shout he seized his hat, and tore out of the room.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CHAPTER.

Philip Finds an Ally.

WHEN Philip Nullius woke the morning following his invitation and acceptance of the same, the evening before, to visit the vicar who lived at "Water Grange," he sat up and gazed round him with puzzled eyes.

He was not in his dingy bedroom at 3 Lillie Road, and he wondered whether he had dreamt the proceedings of the night before. His head ached, and somehow a sensation of heaviness seemed to lie upon him.

As he grew more accustomed to his surroundings he saw that he was in a large, bare-looking room, with little furniture in it, and any there was had an old, worm-eaten appearance.

The bed on which he was lying was strangely built, being a large four-poster, with heavy brocade curtains that smelt of an odour of long ago. The one window, though large, was strongly shuttered, both inside and out, the only light in the room coming from several ventilation holes.

Philip frowned and sprang out of the bed. He was puzzled as to his presence in the strange room, and meant to find out what had happened that he had not left "Water Grange" when he thought he had.

He remembered meeting several men who had all been most agreeable and pleasant, and though he had not liked them particularly, he had had no cause to complain of his welcome not being hearty. In fact, once or twice it had struck him that there was an ironical ring about the congratulations and greetings.

Even the white-headed vicar—the uncle of the man he had distrusted—had not entirely satisfied his idea of what a clergyman of the church should be. There had been a veiled levity throughout in his manner, despite his courtesy.

"This must be a stupid joke," Philip muttered. "I'll very soon get those shutters open, then I shall see what time it is by my watch."

He made several futile efforts to let in the light, but in spite of exerting all his strength, the shutters remained firmly closed.

Thoroughly alarmed by his failure, Philip turned away to seek his coat, where he knew he had put his watch on going to bed.

"This might be a prison," he thought. Then paled a little. It was an odd coincidence his having said that, for it grew more and more like one, as his eyes pierced the dim light for the place where he thought his clothes were.

After a few moments he realised with a flash of horror that they had gone, to the very last particle of attire he had had, together with his watch, and in their place was an old dressing-gown.

"What's the meaning of this?" he thought. "Surely theft can't go on in a clergyman's house in this wholesale manner—unless"—he paused for a second to recover from the shock the sudden thought gave him—"unless I have been lured into a trap, and this is really the house of a gang of thieves! But surely there is nothing they can get from me! Why, even if it should be so, should they imprison me?"

No, there must be some awful mistake; probably lazy

How to Become a Millionaire.

There are as many recipes for the performance of this trick as there are for the making of cakes. "Practise all the virtues," says one. "Deny yourself," advises another; "fight against every instinct of your nature which costs either money or time; work and save; and when you are very old and about to die you shall have the gratification of being envied for your riches." Another man who has amassed more than a million by trade and is still under fifty, says: "Never manfuacture anything; buy cheaply, sell dearly, and give no credit." A Chicago millionaire attributes his success to his habit of regarding every man as a thief until he has proof of his honesty—a cynical perversion of the older and more charitable plan of regarding every man as honest until he proves himself the reverse. Clearly, the wise ones who would teach us how to become millionaires are very numerous, and no two of them tender the same advice.

All these teachers may be right, though it is more probable that all of them are wrong. But one thing is sure—no man ever yet became a millionaire as a result of following advice, however good that advice might be. Another thing equally certain is that no dyspeptic has ever been known to acquire a fortune; his headache, weariness, and depression make it impossible. It would seem, therefore, that a good first step towards success is investment in a bottle of Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup, and so insure freedom from indigestion.

"For sixteen years I suffered from indigestion, at times so severely that I could not work." Thus writes Mr. Joseph Mullens, of the Post Office, Tatsfield, Surrey, on October 16th, 1903. Mr. Mullens continues: "Whatever I ate was sure to cause me great pain. I was much troubled with violent headaches and dizziness. As if this were not enough for me to endure, I suffered from frequent attacks of biliousness, which badly affected my sight. Some medicine prescribed for me by a doctor having failed to do me any good, I was induced to try Mother Seigel's Syrup, and very soon found relief. The pain after eating, the headache, and dizziness all left me. Soon I could enjoy my food as I had not done for years, and a very few bottles were sufficient to make me as well as ever I was in my life. I would not on any account be without some of the Syrup at hand in case of need."

Many people are prevented from acquiring wealth only by ill health, while some who acquire it lose their health in its pursuit, and so derive no benefit from their success. The remedy is to act as Mr. Mullens did.

Domestic Friction.

"The longer I live," writes "A Countess" in the Outlook, "the more convinced I am that breakfast is the cause of more domestic friction than can be accounted for by mere incompatibility of temper. It is not in human nature," she adds, "to be amiable in the early morning." Why it is so, is easy to understand when we remember that nine people out of every ten suffer from indigestion in one form or other. To awake in the morning fagged and worn out, dull of head and weary of limb, and with a taste in the mouth that makes breakfast a mockery, is certainly not conducive to good temper and geniality. The fault is not with the breakfast, but with the stomach that should call for and digest it. Thousands of dyspeptics have proved the power of Mother Seigel's Syrup to cleanse and tone the stomach, liver and kidneys, sharpen the appetite, assist digestion, even the temper and invigorate the system. Says one of them, Mrs. Holloway, of 3, Church Street, Henley-on-Thames: "I used to suffer such dreadful agony from indigestion. For years my life was a misery. After doctors' treatment had failed, my son's wife made me try Seigel's Syrup and gradually the pain subsided. All the other ailments followed, and soon I was as well as ever.[12] servants who had taken his clothes out to brush—but again, why had he stayed here at all?

Digitized by Google

Dupes of Destiny

(continued.)

He remembered that, contrary to his usual custom, he had been prevailed upon to drink some wine! He began to see now that the wine had been drugged, but why?

Feverish to find out the worst, he rang his bedroom bell, then went to the door to open it, but it was locked.

"Very well," he said with firm lips. "There is to be trouble, is there? Then I shall not go under without a fight!"

He went to the bell and pulled it again several times; then slipped into the dressing gown and waited.

His nerves were strung to an unusual pitch of excitement, and as the moments went by and no answer came to his repeated ringing of the bell, he went to the door and kicked it with all his strength; he had been left his boots, and he used them to good purpose, for soon after the key turned in the lock, and two men entered. They were the "cleric" of the night before, and the man who had called for him at 3 Lillie Road.

Philip looked at them haughtily. "I wish to know the meaning of this extraordinary proceeding," he said haughtily. "I came here as a guest last night, thinking I was in the company of gentlemen—and now on coming to my senses—after the drugged wine you gave me—I am absolutely without any clothing, and the windows are locked and the shutters made fast, also the door. Will you kindly tell me the meaning of this poor jest?"

"Don't be alarmed, Mr. Nullius," said the "vicar" gently. "No harm is intended you, and you are only detained here to sign a paper promising to keep a certain bargain. I am sorry you are frightened, but it is my strict duty to carry out my orders concerning you."

"Orders from whom, and why this secrecy?" demanded Philip.

"I am to ask you to sign a paper saying that you will never return to Crawley, or attempt to see the daughter of Sir Cyprian Rust; you must also resign your curacy at Crawley. Miss Rust is engaged now to her cousin, Edward Day, and if you sign that paper I am to see that your expenses are paid wherever you wish to go, provided it is not in England."

"And if I refuse to sign such rubbish, and refuse utterly to relinquish my right to Marcella Rust's hand, what then?" said Philip hotly.

He had not anticipated such a proceeding on the part of Sir Cyprian; he had, in fact, trusted him implicitly. But now, even Marcella, his loved one, they wished to make out false! He laughed the idea to scorn. His beautiful love to be anything but true and noble! Still, in his heart there rankled a soreness that Marcella had not attempted to write to him, and find out his address.

He looked steadily at the man who had posed so successfully as a clergyman the night before, and said:

"What if I refuse to put my name to such a paper, and instead demand my liberty? How will you prevent my getting it?"

The man laughed softly. "Why, Mr. Nullius, you will be kept here till you arrive at a more reasonable frame of mind. We don't mind how long we keep you here. But very soon you will find this basement getting very damp, and it will not be so comfortable as a cosy vicarage."

"Oh, but this is nonsense!" Philip said. "I shall be missed, inquiries will be made, and what then? It is impossible to hide people in this way!"

"Nothing is impossible to a determined man, Mr. Nullius," laughed the other. "I regret that you should be placed in such bad quarters, but it is the best I can do for you—will you sign that paper or not?"

"Never!" returned Philip hotly. "I will never sign away my liberty or my happiness for anyone; and if you think you can bully me you will find you have got hold of the wrong man. I can fight—and I will, too; you will not conquer me."

"We may not conquer you, Mr. Nullius," said the "vicar" sarcastically, "but this room might; the damp is fearful, it soon—kills—and bodies would rot in no time down here."

Philip made a sudden leap to the door. His brain was on fire, and he longed to get out, to fight his way so that he could come face to face with the smooth-tongued villain who was Marcella's father. As he grasped and flung the second man out of his path, the other cried roughly:

"Look out, Boulter! He's a sharp one, worse luck. I'll soon settle him in a way he won't like."

Boulter made a plunge towards the daring curate, but as he raised his hand to clutch Philip back before he escaped, the latter turned and dealt him a stinging blow between the eyes. It was utterly unexpected, and Boulter, with a muttered oath, fell back into the arms of the man who had watched, with keen eyes, the encounter between the curate and his hireling.

Philip, once outside, pulled the door to quickly and locked it, then stood in some hesitation as to his next move. He did not know in the least where he was, and to attempt to get out of the place in that wretched dressing-gown would be an act of madness. Yet, on the other hand, if he stayed where he was, he would be subjected to probably far more stringent treatment by his captors.

As he stood straining his ears to catch a sound from the room within, and to be prepared for an attack from the passage from where he knew the other men of the strange company would come, a light step broke the stillness, and as it drew nearer Philip guessed that it could not be that of a man. Yet how should a woman be living in such a place as "Water Grange" unless she were a party to what went on within its walls?

Yes, it was a woman, and as she came nearer Philip saw that she was young, and her face was pretty in a fair, baby-style, but her blue eyes looked moody, and a petulant expression lurked at the corners of her mouth.

When she saw Philip—a somewhat startling figure wrapped in a dingy dressing-gown and crouching against the wall, she uttered a stifled cry.

"Goodness! Who are you? What are you doing there?" she demanded, her voice trembling in spite of her effort to keep it calm.

"Please don't betray me," Philip whispered. "If those men in that room hear you they may stoop to any outrage. I came here as a guest last night—and now——" he finished bitterly—"I am a victim to a piece of black villainy."

While he had been speaking, the girl's face had slowly changed from fear to an expression of intelligence, and understanding.

"I see," she said slowly. "Now I know why they wanted to get me off to bed last night! They are up to some of their pretty tricks again."

Philip's face cleared. "Then you are not one of them?" he said in a tone of relief. "Thank Heaven!"

"Me—one of them!" ejaculated his fair companion. "Not much! I only came here myself yesterday morning. The beauty who runs this charming place is my honoured and respected father!"

The irony in her voice was not lost on Philip. He looked at her incredulously. "Your father! But surely you are not—not——" His voice trailed off into a murmur as he read the increased expression of hate in her large blue eyes.

"No, I'm not!" she said shortly. "I am glad to say that I don't often honour my parent with my presence, but when I do it is because I am on my last legs for a penny, and this is better than the workhouse! But tell me," she went on quickly, "what happened in there," with a nod at the door, "and who are the men, or the man?"

Philip listened for a moment; no noise came from the inside, but down the passage along which the girl had come, he heard a low, peculiar whistle.

TWENTY-EIGHTH CHAPTER.
The Man who Passed.

THE girl heard it, too, for her face blanched, and she cast a hasty look behind her.

Digitized by Google

PAWNBROKER'S SALE

Every article in new condition.

SUITABLE FOR PRESENTS.

A full list sent post free on application.

SAVE £ d S

13/6 Gent's magnificent 18-ct. Gold-cased Chronograph Stop Watch, jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper, 10 years' written warranty; also fashionable curb (pocket to pocket) double Albert same quality (stamped and guaranteed), with handsome seal attached; three together.

12/6 Lady's handsome 18-carat gold-cased Keyless Watch, jewelled movement; exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also fashionable long watch-guard, same quality (stamped and guaranteed) elegant West-End pattern the two together

14/9 Furs.—Magnificent Alexandra Dagmar necklet and muff; beautiful real Russian sable hair, worth 4 guineas, not been worn; sacrifice for 14 9; approval willingly.

19/6 Genuine Italian Mandoline, by Stridente, Naples; fine tone; 21 ribbed, real rosewood, pearl and tortoiseshell inlaid, in saddler-made case; approval.

21/- Fine Old Violin, by Pietro Antorious; magnificent rich solo tone; in perfect condition, with fully mounted bow and case; approval.

10/6 Lustrous diamond and ruby Half-hoop Ring, set with 5 matchless doublet rubies and 8 real diamonds; solid gold, hall-marked.

7/6 Curb Chain Bracelet, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case.

6/9 Brooch; very handsome 18-carat rolled gold, 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls in case.

21/- Lady's solid gold Keyless Watch, jewelled in 10 rubies, beautifully engraved case, splendid time-keeper; 10 years' written warranty; week's free trial.

8/6 Fashionable Long Neck-chain; genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished; very choice design.

9/6 Organ Toned Melodeon; magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, and 4 acting stops, including Tremolo and Diapason action; rich powerful tone, perfect order.

9/6 Necklet with Heart Pendant, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern; heart set with pearls and turquoise.

12/6 Magnificent 5-row Pearl Collarette; finest quality, mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case.

Any of the above articles sent on approval willingly.

R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller,
284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

PART 1. READY JANUARY 26.

Ask Your Newsagent

to let you see a copy of PART 1. of

PEARSON'S HOME MANAGEMENT

Edited by ISOBEL of "HOME NOTES."

To be issued in TWELVE FORTNIGHTLY parts.

Price 7d. net each.

This work is the most thoroughly up-to-date and exhaustive work on HOUSEHOLD MANAGEMENT ever published, and contains 12 Beautiful coloured illustrations, upwards of 4 full-page Illustrations, together with a very large number of Cuts in the Text.

The parts may be obtained at all Railway Book stalls, Booksellers and Newsagents, or of

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD.,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Secrets of Youth.

How to have a beautiful face and figure. How to have beautiful eyes and hair. How to curl the hair naturally without curling pins or tongs. Little people can be made tall. Noses that are red or ugly shape can be cured, and looks greatly improved.

This pretty Book will be sent FREE. Ask for "BEAUTY'S BOUDOIR." Stamp must be sent for postage. Peralia Perfumery Co. (Dept. 14) 73 Camden Street, North Shields, Eng

TO CURE DRUNKARDS

without their knowledge, send stamp for FREE TRIAL PACKAGE of a wonderful remedy that has saved homes. Send no money. Address in confidence. WARD CHEMICAL CO., 51 Century House, Regent Street, London, W.

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1¾d. tins everywhere.

To Asthma Sufferers.

Instant relief is gained in all cases of Asthma, Bronchitis, Croup, and Whooping Cough, by the use of POTTER'S ASTHMA CURE. Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists in Tins at 1/-. Test it free of charge. Send post-card to POTTER & CLARKE, Wholesale Druggists, Artillery Lane, London, E., for Free Sample. Kindly mention this paper.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

Page Woodcock's Pills

50 years' increasing British reputation has proved them to be the safe, sure and speedy remedy for Wind on the Stomach, Indigestion, Biliousness, Sick Headache, Palpitation, Depression, Nervousness, Languor, &c. Sold by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ & 2/9, or post free for price from Page Woodcock, Ltd., 14 and 16, Euston Buildings, N.W. (late of Lincoln).

SMITH'S

Ask your grocer for

EPPS'S

(The most nutritious)

COCOA

And take no other.

FREE TO YOU.

To advertise S.L.S. Records we are giving away our noted Phonographs for a limited time. Absolutely not a penny to pay for one. Write, giving full address and nearest railway station; enclose stamp. Mention this paper.

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128 CITY ROAD, LONDON.

SULPHOLINE LOTION

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED).

Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil, invaluable for children and invalids; ¼lb. 1/4; 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mrs. CONYERS, Chagford, R.S.O., Devon.

Digitized by Google

"Ah! they are on the look out!" she murmured. "There is a way of communication with the front of the house from any room. Look here,——" Turning to him suddenly, with a flush on her cheeks. "I'll stand by you. I don't know who you are or what they are doing with you, but I am pretty sure that they are in the wrong, and you in the right. Follow me as quietly as you can; I'll hide you."

Without daring to speak his gratitude to his imperious young benefactress, Philip followed closely on her heels. She led him down a few steps, then pushed a door that opened on to a flight of stairs, that when mounted led into a small room, plainly but comfortably furnished.

"Stay here," she said in a low voice, eyeing critically his strong, handsome face, which not even his incongruous garb could conceal. "This is my own particular room; no one ever dares to come into it, not even the manservant. I tidy it myself, and always keep the key in my pocket, so you need not fear an interruption."

Philip put out his hand. With the exception of Marcella, his own dear love, he had never felt such a wave of admiration for anyone, save this strangely free and easy, yet haughty girl, with the bitter mouth and wistful eyes.

"I can't thank you," he said gratefully, "but, believe me, I feel your kindness awfully, Miss—Miss——"

A sudden flush stained her creamy skin. "My name's Lottie!" she said carelessly. "You may call me that if you like. And you don't owe me any thanks," she went on hurriedly. "It's lucky I happened to be out of an engagement—my tour broke up rather suddenly.

"I'm on the stage," she explained in answer to his look of bewilderment, "and had I kept on tour, I would not have been obliged to come to this hovel, but my money was all used up, and so I came to my natal place. I'm glad I did now!" She finished with a vivid smile. "I have been of some use at last. Tell me who the men were in the room you got out of, and what happened. It will help me to find out where your clothes are likely to be."

Very quietly and briefly Philip explained what had taken place, and how he managed to knock down the man called "Boulter;" they had turned the key in the lock.

She listened with an intent look on her face, her mouth dimpling suddenly as she learnt of Boulter being knocked down.

"Well, the 'Vicar,' you will be interested to hear, is my adoring, and adored father," she said calmly. "What he's doing out of prison I don't know! He ought to have been there years ago—and Boulter is his right hand—or in this case his left.

"They are birds of a feather, and I'm glad that for once he's got what he deserved. He's a dangerous man, and I wouldn't give much for your life if he could find you after that. Now I'm off. Don't make the slightest attempt to stir out of the place or show yourself at the window. I won't forget you!"

With a brief nod she went out of the room, and closing the door, locked it; then slipped the key in her pocket, and ran down the front staircase—not that by which she had brought her protégé up from the underground passage.

In the front room she came face to face with the "Vicar" and the man Boulter. They both looked furious, and were speaking in an undertone to another man:

"He's in the place somewhere—a man can't escape in the open clad in a dressing-gown, and when I get hold of him, Mr. Philip Nullius shall pay for this little joke! I was inclined to be lenient to him at first, but now—I wouldn't give much for Miss Marcella seeing her lover again."

Lottie paused in the doorway. "Marcella"—it was a name not easily forgotten; one that she had taught herself to hate, because of what it had meant for her.

A woman of that name had encouraged her lover, afterwards her husband, and finally won him by her beauty from the woman who had married him! It was a strange coincidence that the name of the woman the handsome stranger loved, should also be "Marcella."

"Has anything happened to upset you, 'Vicar'?" she said aloud, coming forward leisurely to the table. "You look as though you had not had a pleasant morning."

The man turned on her with a snarl. "Mind your own business, Miss," he retorted, then stopped abruptly. The man Boulter had touched him with his elbow.

"Oh, Lottie," he said in a changed voice. "I have been wondering whether you have seen anything of a gentleman who is staying with me now. He is a bit of an invalid, and I have promised to look after him until he is stronger. He slipped out of his room this morning, we find, and is nowhere to be found. Have you been anywhere near the spare room?"

Lottie shook her head. She was watching him keenly, for all her apparent nonchalance. "The spare room—that's rather vague, isn't it? There are so many spare rooms here, 'Vicar'—Water Grange is full of them."

The man flushed angrily, and bit his lip. He dared not say it was the room in which no guest would stay willingly for half an hour, and Lottie knew the cause of his discomfiture, and was secretly amused at it.

"It doesn't matter which room," he said sharply. "It's enough to know that he has escaped—I mean gone away—and I am quite certain the man is in one of the rooms in the Grange. Already Wallis and Mouser are searching for him."

Lottie yawned. "Oh, well, you don't want the whole household to turn out and look for an old fogey in a dressing-gown, do you, 'Vicar'? Why don't you get the police to help you?" she added maliciously.

"You little cat! Get out of the room, or I'll throw you out!" shouted her irate parent.

Once in the hall with the door shut, Lottie's face relaxed into a smile of irony. "So the whole house is searching, eh, 'Vicar'! I don't fancy they will touch my room. It will be quite a pleasure to do an honourable, decent action towards a poor wretch who has fallen into your unholy hands!" Her face flushed, then paled with a sudden thought.

"Yes—I'll get him safe away, then go myself. He seems a good sort, and he's handsome, too. I wish Fate had intended me to meet such a man earlier, instead of that craven cur, Edward."

She bit her lips as the face of the man she had once loved so dearly rose before her. Now the scales had fallen from her eyes she knew that the object of her love was only after all a poor, pitiful wretch with feet of very indifferent clay.

But such is the strange perversity of a woman's heart, that despising, hating, and loathing, as she did, Lottie knew that did Edward Day come to her, and, putting his arms round her, beg her to take him back, she would forget the past ignominious neglect and deceit she had suffered at his hands, and welcome him with an open heart!

As she went softly up the stairs she met the old manservant, Wallis, with a bundle of clothes in his arms.

"What's that, Wallis?" she said good-humouredly. "Getting your trousseau ready?"

The man grinned. He was a rough, surly specimen of humanity, but he always unbent a little under Lottie's careless banter.

"No, missie; it's the master's two suits of clothes I'm taking to his room; they needed brushing badly."

Lottie noted the old man's heavy breathing, and said:

"I'm going upstairs, Wallis. Those things look too much for you. I'll take them in less than half the time."

Before he could stop her she had seized the bundle from his arms, and ran lightly upstairs with it.

On the landing she paused, and a slow smile parted her lips.

"A very good idea," she said softly. "I have not learnt the art of making-up for nothing. You have suggested a very clever trick to me, Wallis. I thank you most heartily! For once in a way the 'Vicar's' vestments will be used in the furthering of justice."

Some time between the hour of twilight and night a tall distinguished looking old man, with white hair and clad in clerical dress, strolled along the road that led into Leyton village. He was deep in thought, and did not note a man, large of frame and haggard of face, who passed him with unseeing eyes, and halting steps.

(Another grand instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

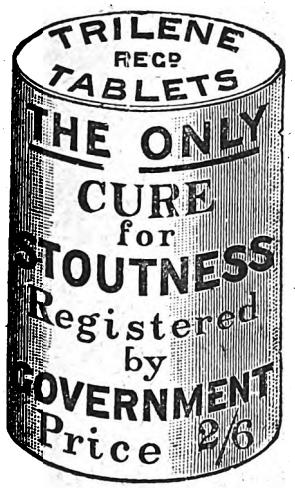
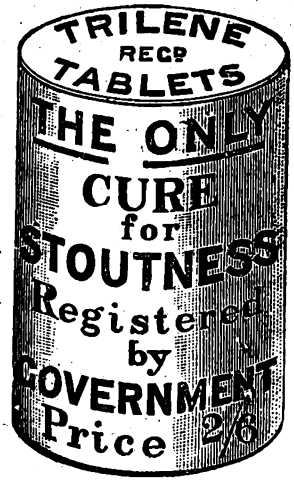
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to Mr. T. Wells, THE TRILENE CO., 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"37 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.
Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.
"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

MRS. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

MISS NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."
"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

MR. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Liatorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18lb. during the cure.

MR. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st 3lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

MRS. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

MRS. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagillt, Wales, writes Nov. 22nd, 1898: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

MRS. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

MRS. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9½st. and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

MRS. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have done a world of good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

MRS. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 28. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st.. You may use this if you like."

MRS. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

MISS JANE CARTER of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest value. I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

MR. THOS BLAKELY, of 37 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

MISS F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

MISS PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

THE TRILENE COMPANY, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Renewing an Acquaintance.

I AM glad, "HARRY," that my advice brought about the happiness of your friend. As to your own case, if the young lady agreed to go out with you when you asked her before, why should she not be agreeable to do so again, if you liked each other? The fact that you have not seen her for some time does not prevent your writing. She would, in fact, be rather pleased to hear that you have not forgotten her. It would be nicer if you knew her parents. Perhaps she will ask you to go and have tea, or something of the kind, so that you will have the chance. Write to her, and leave it to her to decide whether she wishes to see you again, and if so, how the matter can be managed.

A Leap Year Chance.

THE young man who won't propose comes along once more this week. "SNOWDROP" has been going out with him for three years, but he has said never a word about engagement, though they are both very fond of each other, and their parents are quite willing. What is "SNOWDROP" to do?

* * * * *

Well, "SNOWDROP," this is the first Leap Year for eight years. Though I do not believe in ladies taking advantage of that superstition, which says they may propose to the men, it might be a very good opportunity in your own case, as you are both such old friends. In any case, you might hint to him that it is Leap Year, and that you feel rather inclined to avail yourself of it. Then who knows but that he may not save you the trouble?

Faint Heart Again.

"ROBERT" says he is in an awkward position. At the place where he works there are several girls employed, and he is much in love with one of them. He is afraid to tell her this in case his love is not returned, which, he says, would make things uncomfortable for him, as they work very near to each other. On the other hand, if he does not do so, somebody else may step in. The girl is at present free from sweethearts.

* * * * *

Be bold, "Robert," but discreet. Seek an opportunity for a quiet conversation with the girl, either by asking her out for an evening or in some other way. Then see how the wind blows. You should soon be able to judge whether or not the girl is interested in you. If she is, then ask her permission to see her more often. I quite understand that you do not like to blurt out that you are in love with her without ever having seen much of her. That certainly would make a man look foolish if the girl happened to be attached in another direction. But you had better be quick about it, or certainly somebody else will come along. Remember the proverb about "faint heart."

Two to Make a Quarrel.

"IRISH LASS" tells me that she and her young man have quarrelled over the photo of another man. I am sorry to hear it, for I must say that quarrelling over so trivial a matter speaks badly for them both. Remember a breach is very easy to make, and very difficult to heal. I should either see him or write to him, and tell him you are lonely and miserable, and, if he really cares for you, he will be glad enough to be friends again.

A Very Contemptible Man.

YOU tell me, "ANXIOUS ONE," that you were introduced to a young man at a bazaar, and went out with him several times, and then you found out that he was going out with other young women as well. You said you would have nothing more to do with him if he was going to treat you like that. He now seeks mischief with everyone you go out with. You ask if I consider it is a right spirit for any young man to have. No; I think he must be a very mean, despicable young man. You were quite right to give him up. Your letters are by no means a trouble; write as often as you like. I am only too pleased to be able to help you.

The Girl and Parents Problem.

"DAVID" is worried over the question of introducing his loved one to his parents. While they are willing that he should marry, the girl's parents are not, so that the two are not yet engaged. In this case, would it be advisable for "DAVID" to introduce her to his own family?

* * * * *

I think it would be a most admirable thing for "DAVID" to do. The fact that the girl knew his people, and that they approved of her, might be the very thing needed to make her parents consent to an engagement. I know a girl who was engaged to a young fellow, and the sole objection her father had was that he knew nothing of the young man, or his family connections. The young man's answer was to invite the girl and her mother to his parents' home, which turned out to be a very nice one indeed. This at once satisfied the stern father, who, seeing that the young man was well connected, gave his consent. This example might apply in "DAVID'S" case.

Marriage by License.

"H. F. G." writes: "Can you tell me what details are necessary in getting married at a registrar's office? She is eighteen, I am twenty."

* * * * *

You may be married by certificate or license. If by certificate, you must give formal notice to the superintendent registrar of the district, both parties having lived there for seven days. You must make a solemn statement that there is no legal obstacle to the marriage, and carry out other instructions which the registrar would give you. The certificate would then be issued within twenty-one days. After the twenty-one days, the wedding may take place at a registry office. You simply make a mutual declaration, and in most cases the bridegroom places a ring on his spouse's finger. If a license is required, it must be obtained at either the Faculty Office, 23 Knightrider Street, E.C., or at the Vicar General's Office, 3 Creed Lane, Ludgate Hill. A license costs thirty shillings, and stamp duty of twelve and six. You must also make a declaration on oath as to there being no legal obstacle, and also must have lived fifteen days in the parish where the marriage will be celebrated. This latter you may dispense with by obtaining a special license, which, however, costs about £30.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Something more about Our New Magazine.

READY FEB. 12TH.

READY FEB. 12TH.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

The Magazine which Tells You Everything.

ARE YOU A BUSY MAN?

Then THE RAPID REVIEW is just what you want. It won't waste your time; it won't bore you; it won't be heavy, dull and verbose. But it will give you monthly a brief and intellig.nt review of the world's doings in every branch of progress and thought. It will put the world's politics clearly and concisely before you. And it will keep you up-to-date in literature, drama, music—well, in everything.

ARE YOU A BUSY WOMAN?

Then if you wish to keep well-informed on the subject of woman's work and progress, and have little time to spare, you must read THE RAPID REVIEW. The Rapid Review makes a special feature of "Woman's Interests," and that feature contains a brief and bright summary of woman's doings all the world over.

IT WILL SAVE YOU TIME.

How? THE RAPID REVIEW will be filled with interesting extracts from all the books, newspapers, journals and magazines published every month. That is to say, by purchasing The Rapid Review you will have purchased all the current literature, all the current thought and every topic of interest, and you will have got it in a brightly summarised form. Thus will you save time.

IT WILL SAVE YOU TROUBLE.

It will save you the trouble of wasting time at the bookstalls and libraries in looking for what publications you want. It will save you the trouble of reading both sides of a political question in two different party organs. It will save you the trouble of hunting up last month's papers to see how such and such a thing began. It will save you trouble in a dozen ways, because it is going to miss nothing and is going to put everything concisely and clearly.

YOU CANNOT AFFORD TO BE WITHOUT IT.

Digitized by Google

"The Most Perfect Form of Cocoa."

—Guy's Hospital Gazette.

Fry's

PURE CONCENTRATED

Cocoa

"I have never tasted Cocoa that I like so well."

Sir CHAS. CAMERON, C.B., M.D.,

Ex-President of the Royal College of Surgeons, Ireland.

Ask for the

"FIVE BOYS" MILK CHOCOLATE

"Highest Standard of Purity."
A. B. GRIFFITHS, Ph.D., &c.
Analytical Chemist, London.

"Unrivalled as a Chocolate Confection."
MEDICAL MAGAZINE.

BRITISH MILK AND BRITISH LABOUR.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 788. Week Ending February 6, 1904. Price One Penny.

"MY LOVER!" SHE GASPED.

(A Dramatic Incident from the Story, "A Thief in the Night." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE

The purest and most efficient Remedy procurable for
COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, CATARRH, WEAK LUNGS, and CHILDREN'S COUGHS.

BRONCHITIS AND ASTHMA

Veno's Lightning Cough Cure

Produces its most brilliant effect in Chronic Bronchitis and Asthma. It effects astonishing cures in the worst and most persistent cases.

Rev. W. W. TULLOCH, D.D., Bonar Bridge, Sutherlandshire, writes: "July 22nd, '03.—I have been a martyr to asthma all my life and lately to chronic winter bronchitis. I have found Veno's Lightning Cough Cure a valuable medicine."

CHILDREN'S COUGHS

Mrs. ADA S. BALLIN, 5, Agar Street, London, Editor "Womanhood," and a great authority upon children's diseases, writes:—"Veno's Lightning Cough Cure is an exceedingly successful remedy; it is very pleasant to take and the relief it gives is very rapid. The preparation is perfectly safe for children."

W. LASCELLES-SCOTT, F.R.M.S., in his Certificate of Analysis among other things says:—"I have pleasure in certifying that in my opinion VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH COUGH is an exceptionally pure, safe, and effective preparation

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES 9½d. Regular Sizes, 1/1½ and 2/9.

Ask for VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE at Chemists and Drug Stores, or post free from the VENO DRUG CO., Hulme, Manchester, England.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache and Neuralgia.

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Kaputine is not a single crude drug such as has been condemned as dangerous by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients, having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The SAFE Remedy.

Kaputine is the only preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and infirmaries. Proof positive of its superior and sterling qualities.

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1½; Samples 1d. each.

Kindly mention this paper.

J. G. GRAVES'

TOOLS & MACHINERY.

Send for No. 2 Illustrated Catalogue of TOOLS FOR ALL TRADES; also, Machinery of every description. Approval before purchase. Terms to suit customers' own convenience.

Profitable Agencies offered to persons in regular employment

WRITE FOR TERMS AND PARTICULARS.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., Sheffield.

Home Rupture Cure.

Marvellous Blessing to Those who are Ruptured. Proofs so Positive and From Such Reliable Sources as to be Free From All Doubt.

Dr. W. S. Rice (Dept. 431), 8 and 9, Stonecutter Street, London, E.C., has the distinction of perfectly curing even the most difficult ruptures of long standing. He does this without causing the patient one bit of pain, absolutely without danger and without the loss of a moment's time from work. He does not use the knife, and sends his method and treatment direct to the sufferer's home, where it can be used without assistance, and brings immediate relief. Dr. Rice has cured hundreds of old men who have been ruptured 30 and 40 years. Never before have such letters of testimony been received as Dr. Rice receives every day. Mr. James Cole, 13, Holdick Street, Midland Road, Peterborough, was cured at the age of 66 years. He writes Dr. Rice as follows:—"I had a bad rupture, and when I saw your method of cure advertised I was rather doubtful as to permanent cure; but I am thankful I tried it, for I do not feel anything of the rupture now. It was just the treatment I required to effect a cure." It will pay anyone who is ruptured to write to Dr. Rice for a sample of his method, which will be sent free by return of post. Investigate fully his method of cure. Do this at once. Don't delay in a matter of such importance. Write to-day. Thousands of cases cured.

MR. JAS. COLE.
From a Photo.

An admirable Food of the

EPPS'S

Finest quality and flavour.

COCOA

Nutritious and Economical.

SONGS COPIED

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page.

Mrs. CONYERS,

Chagford, R.S.O., Devon.

Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

BODLEIAN LIBRARY 13 FEB 1904

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

No. 788.] [One Penny.

Week Ending February 6th, 1904.

A Thief in the Night.

Telling of a Case of Self-Sacrifice.

Containing the Incident depicted on the Cover.

"Do I love Cousin Gerald?"

Madge Hargraves was looking at her reflection in the mirror during the delicate process of setting that dainty hat on the well-poised head with its luxuriant growth of dark brown hair, when this thought flashed across her mind. A rich crimson wave swept quickly over the lovely face; it seemed like a wave of fire passing over it, so hot was it, and she retreated involuntarily from the mirror.

"Do I love Cousin Gerald?"

She sank into a chair and pressed her cool hands to her burning face, trying to hide herself from herself. The fleeting vision of her crimson face had imprinted itself on her brain with marvellous vividity and she could not shut it out.

Gradually her face became cooler and the rapid beating of her heart gradually steadied into the regular pulsation. She uncovered her face and stood once more before the mirror, surveying her reflection with a fixed gaze.

"Yes, I do love Cousin Gerald!" she murmured determinedly. "But does he love me?"

This last inquiry brought a troubled expression to the lovely countenance. For the past fortnight Gerald Hargraves had been in the old country house which was commonly designated "home" by three persons—Madge Hargraves, her cousin, and his father, Robert Hargraves. Madge had been left an orphan at an early age, and the custody of the child, with the care of the large estate to which she was heiress, was left to her father's brother, Robert Hargraves. The latter, with his son, had taken up his quarters in the old house and had ruled as master.

It had been a good thing for Robert Hargraves, for he was comparatively poor and had not had the same "luck" (as he termed it) as his elder brother.

The two children had grown up together for a few years, but as Gerald was five years older than Madge (her father having married later in life), the lad went away to school while she was still a small girl, and afterwards he went into the world to make his own way.

From one cause and another the cousins had not seen each other for five years, and that meeting had been, as events were proving, a fateful one. Madge had looked eagerly for Gerald's coming this time, but his behaviour had mystified and vexed her. At one time he would be all attention, as if—yes, she could say it now!—as if he loved her, and then he would change suddenly. It was through pondering over this fact while adjusting her hat that Madge had unconsciously asked herself the all-important question and had received her answer.

All-important question? Was it? Was it not equally important, perhaps more so, to inquire whether Gerald loved her or not? Madge felt her face grow as cold as it had become hot a few minutes earlier, and her lips trembled.

"Perhaps he has given his love to—to someone else!" she told herself, and the sun seemed to hide itself behind a cloud. "And perhaps I have unwittingly shown my own feelings to him."

It was humiliating and she felt inclined to take off her hat and plead a headache in order to avoid the promised walk with Gerald.

"That would be cowardly," she said, drawing herself up proudly. "The Hargraves are not cowards! Their history is full of heroic deeds and sacrifices; they have fought for their country, and they have suffered torture and death rather than betray a son or a father. And even in modern times their records are not void of instances of self-sacrifice."

Three minutes later she was on the lawn in the front of the house where Gerald was to await her. He was not there when she appeared, but she saw him approaching at a quick walk from the farther end of the mansion. How noble he looked! In Gerald Hargraves the girl saw all the noble qualities of the ancestors of whom she had been thinking, and it was with difficulty that she could repress the delight which his coming aroused within her.

"How I envy a man, whose privilege it is to show his affection while a woman must remain without emotion, though her heart be breaking, till the man she loves makes his——"

"I am sorry to have kept you waiting, Madge," cried the young man. "I fear that I am not the most punctual of mortals."

"It is my fault, Gerald. I must have taken longer than usual in putting my hat on."

"The result justifies the delay," he remarked, bowing gallantly. His eyes shone with such a light of admiration that Madge was forced to lower hers.

Digitized by Google

"I think that this is a lovely day for a walk," returned Madge, uttering a commonplace to hide her pleasure at the compliment. "It is years since we went to the White House, and I shall be delighted to see the old place again, with all its associations of Charles I. and other well-known personages! Let us go at once and make up for lost time—my lost time," she added with a laugh.

"Which I have to help to make up," he remarked, his eyes twinkling. "Well, I am willing to do anything—for you."

Madge's heart beat violently against her side, but she was prevented from giving any reply by the arrival of a telegram, brought to him at that psychological moment by a footman. Gerald opened the envelope hastily and read the contents; he looked perplexed for a second, and then said abruptly: "There is no reply."

"Is there any bad news, Gerald?" she asked him anxiously, as the footman retired.

"No, Madge, not that I can understand," he replied somewhat absently. "I don't comprehend the message exactly, and I fancy it has reference to a letter which has been sent to me but which I have not received. Perhaps the letter will arrive by the evening post—got delayed somehow. Now, off we go!"

Madge perceived that her cousin was a little worried in spite of his attempt to appear gay, but the exhilaration of the walk and the companionship of a lovely, vivacious girl had their effect in time, and he chatted freely.

Madge Hargraves was delighted; it seemed that the old, vacillating behaviour of her cousin had disappeared, and her pulse quickened as the thought came to her that Gerald might take advantage of some shaded nook to declare his love.

She had heard and read how these critical moments come to some women, and she was as romantic as most of her sex; she longed for it with that curious, timid shrinking from the possibility of the realisation of that blissful moment for which she was, with human inconsistency, ardently awaiting.

And, as is so often the case, it came when least expected; and it terminated as she could not have anticipated.

She had ascended a low bank in order to obtain a view of the lower country that stretched away on the other side. "Oh, it is a splendid view, Gerald!" she called out, as she turned to look at him. To her surprise, he was gazing at the telegram with a white face and an anxious expression. At the sound of her voice he folded the paper and made as if to spring up the bank in order to stand by her side.

It all happened in an instant; in half turning, her foot slipped and she staggered and fell. Madge uttered a little cry as she felt herself going, but a second later she fell full into the open arms of Gerald, who clasped those arms about her.

She felt that there was a stronger pressure than even the exigencies of the case warranted, and her eyes lifted swiftly in order to look into his. Their faces were close; he bent slightly and kissed her passionately.

"Madge, Madge!" he cried hotly. "Oh, Madge! You are safe and in my arms, and I wish I could always have the right to hold you thus!"

Madge hid her face against his shoulder. All her doubts and fears had vanished; he loved her, and she was passing through that ecstatic time when a woman hears the declaration of love from him whom she loves and admires as the best and noblest of men.

And then came the bitterness of disappointment; in the midst of her ecstasy she was driven to the opposite emotion. Surely, but few women pass through such an experience.

Gerald stood her carefully on her feet and released her. His face was fully evidence of his agony.

"Forgive me, Madge. I ought not to have said it," he stammered. "I have no right to speak words of love to you."

The flush of shame mantled her cheeks; she was tortured by the remembrance that she had shown her sentiments plainly to Gerald, who was now disclaiming her, as it were.

"What do you mean?" she gasped, with trembling lips.

"Forgive me, Madge," he begged brokenly. "I have placed you in a false position, and I am to blame, but my love gained the mastery, and I forgot myself!"

"I do not understand it," she said dully, passing her hand over her eyes as if to clear away the obscuring mist. "That you love me, and yet——"

"I love you, but I cannot ask you to be my wife," he cried. "I have no right to do so. Nay, by every right I ought to go away and never see you again. Yes, I love you—how can I help it? But you must forget that and try to act as if I had never lived."

"How can I do that?" she burst forth passionately "You have won my heart and now you reject it. Oh, Gerald, to think that you, you, should have brought this humiliation upon me."

"No, no!" he shouted, raising his hand with the action of one who is warding off a blow. "I have been wrong; I cannot ask you to be my wife. I cannot explain; you must forget me. Oh, if I had not come."

"It would have been better for both of us." Almost as soon as the bitter words were uttered she regretted them. "No, Gerald, I am glad," she added, placing her hand on his arm and saying the words with ineffable sweetness. "You know that I love you, and a woman gives her love only once. Whatever happens, I shall love you. If you are in trouble, let me help you, Gerald. Yes," she urged, as he turned his head to hide his emotion. "Let me help you, Gerald, for the sake of old times, and—and the present."

He did not answer, and she continued:

"What is it, Gerald? It is"—she spoke fiercely as the thought came to her—"is it my money? Are you placing that as a barrier between us? You must not do it; I will give it all away rather than let it be an obstacle."

"That might have presented itself as an obstacle, Madge, had there not been others. No, I have not given myself to another woman. I am free, and I love you, but that must be the end of it. I cannot tell you more."

"Is it that telegram?" she persisted, with the tenacity of one who sees happiness just beyond her reach and is striving to grasp it.

"Partly," he said briefly. "I cannot tell you. You must think what you will of me."

"Let us go back now," she requested warily. "The sun has gone in; it is going to rain."

Yet the sun was still shining brilliantly, a fact which she noticed as they retraced their steps, but which she did not realise, so deep was the sorrow that filled her soul.

They parted in the wide hall; Madge went to her own room, and Gerald made his way to his father's study. The girl flung herself on a couch, and, burying her face in her hands as she lay flat on the piece of furniture, sobbed bitterly, her one thought being: "What parts Gerald from me?" If she could have witnessed the interview between father and son, which was taking place while she wept, she would have had the reply; but she knew nothing of it, she did not hear the father's parting words: "That is the last chance, and it is that or ruin!"

Digitized by Google

The cousins did not meet again that day, for Madge kept to her room on the plea of a severe headache. Heartache would have been a better description. On the following day they met just as Gerald was going out, and a formal "Good morning" was all that was said. Gerald avoided her gaze.

"I must try to get my colour back by this evening," Madge murmured, as she stole away to the picture gallery. This place had exerted a strange fascination over her of late. "The tenants are coming to-night for the annual rent dinner, and as I shall be the mistress on the next occasion when they pay their rent, I ought to be with them to-night."

She went into the gallery and passed an hour in studying the pictures of former Hargraves. There was one upon which her eyes rested longer than upon any other; it was the portrait of a young Hargraves who had taken the side of the Lancastrians against the Yorkists in the war of the Roses, and the record of him was that he had preferred death to the betrayal of his father.

"It is like Gerald," she mused, clasping her hands. "He looks brave and noble, and would be incapable of any mean or wicked action. So it would be with Gerald. Yes, I must trust him, and this mystery will be cleared one day."

She felt comforted, and left the gallery with a somewhat lighter heart than when she had entered it.

The rent dinner was one of those customs which are gradually dying out. The farmers and tenantry generally paid their rent once a year, after Michaelmas, and when the harvest was garnered or sold. The old-fashioned farmers put their money in the bank at the market town, but they seldom had a cheque-book. When they had a large bill to pay, they went to the bank, signed a form of withdrawal on the spot, and received the money wherewith to pay the debtor or his representative when necessary. When the rent was to be paid, these honest folk made a journey to the market town for the express purpose of drawing the £60, or £100, or £150 in notes or cash, instead of using the new method of handing over a cheque to the landlord. They had very little faith in cheques; notes and gold were what they recognised as valid, and it was usually gold.

The tenants trooped into the Hall and filed into the room where Mr. Hargraves sat in a big arm-chair at a table, and received their money, while Madge performed the task of entering the receipts in the cash-book. This was a new duty for her, and it was undertaken at the express wish of her uncle and guardian. After the payment of rent, the tenants made their way to the dining-rooms where their wives awaited them, and prepared to do ample justice to the good things which they knew awaited them.

Madge and her uncle remained behind in the apartment with the money. It was carefully placed in a strong cabinet which had been made on purpose for such occasions during her father's lifetime. It was strong inasmuch as the doors were of sheet iron incased in wood, and the sides and other parts of the cabinet were similarly constructed. The style of the cabinet was that of Louis Quinze, mingled with Buhl. It was scarcely a pure design of any period, and for that very reason it was an attractive article.

"I wonder how much money that cabinet has had within its doors since it was first placed here?" observed Mr. Hargraves, as he locked the door. "Now, my dear, make yourself pretty, and then come with me into the dining-room to do the duties of hostess."

"Make myself pretty?" echoed Madge, in laughing inquiry.

"Ah, that's where I made a mistake and betrayed that I am not a young man," laughed her uncle in reply. "I ought to have said, 'make yourself even prettier, if you can.' That's it."

"Do you think that the money is safe there, uncle?" asked the girl hesitatingly.

"Safe!" cried the old man, opening his eyes widely. "Why, no one but a timid girl would express the slightest doubt. You will learn, my dear, that the people of rural districts are honest. They do not lock, bolt, and bar their houses as town people do. At the seaside, do not the house-holders leave the doors open, although there may be thousands of town visitors in their borough? Nobody would attempt to rob us. And suppose that someone did make the attempt? This is an inner room, with little chance of being entered save through the door, and to reach that door the robber would have to pass through a large part of the house. Then, without the key, that cabinet wants some opening. No, you may rest easy. I wouldn't have thought of such a thing, and I declare you will make me nervous. Come!"

Feeling rather ashamed of herself, Madge ran to her room, performed a little act of embellishment here and there, and descended to the dining-room.

Gerald was there and he seemed to be in high spirits; this shocked Madge at first, but later on it stimulated her to fresh activity. The tenants and their wives were a good-natured, jolly class of people, and the evening was full of enjoyment for them. They trooped off merrily, with various presents for the children, who were not permitted to share the entertainment given to the elders.

Madge Hargraves felt worn out when she retired to her own room; her uncle had given her a glass of wine to assist in the process of inducing sleep, but instead of taking off the effects of over-fatigue it really excited her. She partly undressed, slipping on a dressing jacket, but she felt that it was useless to go to bed for a short time. She picked up a book and began to read, and the next thing that she remembered was awaking with a start to find that she had been dozing in the chair. It was two hours at least since she had retired.

It seemed more impossible than before to go to bed and rest; she felt nervous, excited, and paced the room uneasily. Suddenly the thought of the cabinet came to her, and she recollected, too, that she had heard half of a remark passed by one of the farmers as he had left the Hall. Some rough-looking fellow had been seen, so she now understood, not far from the Hall, and the farmer had congratulated himself that he had not met the fellow by himself or he (the farmer) might have lost his rent money! Suppose that man should have got into the house?

The dog would bark, she decided; and yet the man might be able to silence the animal. Madge could not rest; she must go downstairs to the apartment.

She descended the stairs noiselessly, if her uncle heard her, he would laugh immoderately in his good-humoured fashion. The dog? The creature was silent, somewhere. Was her surmise correct?

She reached the corridor and the door of the apartment, and her heart almost stopped beating as she gently tried the handle of the door and found that it yielded. She pushed it cautiously open.

There was a light in the room. She pushed the door open farther. The light showed her the figure of a man, who was trying to wrench open the doors of the cabinet with a crowbar.

Digitized by Google

He was dressed roughly, and the farmer's remark darted across her mind. Near him was a bag—a burglar with a burglar's outfit!

In her excitement Madge made a movement which caused the man to turn hastily. The light which illuminated his features also fell on hers, and there came into that man's countenance an expression that was something more than the fear of an ordinary housebreaker caught red-handed. Madge also felt that the face was not strange to her, although she could scarcely recall it for the moment, but in an instant the truth came despite her incredulity, and the name of her cousin came from her palsied lips in a low wail.

"Gerald! My lover!" she gasped.

She tottered into the room. Gerald Hargraves, for it was indeed he, rose and stood motionless before her; his garb was strange, his face even had been made up to some extent. A thief, caught in the very act!

"Gerald, oh, Gerald!" wailed the girl, pressing her hand to her heart as though she would prevent it from breaking. "Why did you do this? If you wanted money, why did you not ask me? But to do this—this, is too dreadful."

Gerald's face twitched with the intensity of the mental agony he was suffering, but he did not speak.

"You want money," she said feverishly. "You cannot get it like that. I have a duplicate key; I will get it."

She hurried from the room. Gerald remained motionless till he heard her coming again, when he aroused himself by a violent effort, picked up a bunch of keys that lay at the back of the bag, and dropped them into his pocket.

Madge ran into the room, opened the cabinet, and pointed to the gold that lay inside.

"Take what you want—it's mine!" she commanded. Her voice was hollow. "I will explain it all to uncle."

Gerald hesitated for a moment. "I may as well be hanged for a sheep as a lamb," he remarked with a hoarse, mirthless laugh, and he tumbled most of the money into the bag.

He dared not look at her; he picked up the bag, heavy with the weight of the ill-gotten gold, and passed out of the room. Madge stood like a statue, her unseeing eyes fixed on the door through which he had passed, and so she remained till Mr. Hargraves, pale as death, hurried in.

"Madge, my child, what is this?" he cried. "I could not sleep, and I fancied that I heard a noise. I hurried—I saw a light from this room in the corridor—I—Oh, Madge, what is it? Housebreakers?"

"It is nothing!" protested the girl, coming to herself. "I found him—I mean, I wanted the money. I would have done anything for Gerald. No, no, I don't know what I am talking about! I wish——"

And she fell into the old man's arms in a swoon.

It was twenty-four hours before Madge recovered consciousness, and it was nearly a fortnight before she could leave her bed. She had asked questions of the nurses, but they soothed her and said that she would know all in good time. Had they rightly understood, they would have told her sooner. She asked for her uncle, and they said that he was ill; she cried as she thought of the blow to the old man to learn that his son was—Oh, no, no! She could not bear it!

When she was seated in a chair, they said that someone wished to see her, and the good old country doctor told her gently that it was Gerald and that he had news for her. She braved herself to see him, and the doctor retired to a discreet distance, so that he might be out of hearing and yet within call if he were wanted.

Gerald came forward and knelt by her side. "Don't shrink from me, Madge!" he intreated. "It was not I who was the culprit, but the story is a shameful one for me to tell. Listen quietly while I tell it."

It was his father who was to blame; the old man, as trustee, had spent certain moneys belonging to Madge, and he was being dunned for another sum, hence the telegram. The only way out of the difficulty, and to avoid disgrace, was to steal some of the rent money and make certain marks that would indicate that a housebreaker had been at work. In that way the money would go into Mr. Hargraves' pocket and the guilt would be fixed upon some unknown person. The old man could not do it himself, he contended; it required a younger and more active man to buy the outfit, to make the marks on the doors of the cabinet, and generally to do all that was necessary to create an alibi and fix the guilt on the unknown. He asked Gerald to help, and so acted upon the young man's affection that, in order to spare him the disgrace, Gerald weakly consented to do it. He never intended to break open the cabinet; he had the keys ready.

"Can you forgive me, Madge? It was weak, but I did it for his sake, and I felt that I could afterwards return the money to you secretly. I was weak, but my punishment has been great! I have come to clear my character, for I can do so now, to all. My father is dead! The shock brought on a fit, from which he recovered shortly before his death, and in that conscious interval he insisted on making a full confession of having hired someone to rob the cabinet."

"Did he mention who it was?" asked Madge suddenly.

"No, and nobody knows save you and I now."

"I am glad for both our sakes," she murmured. "I am so sorry, but I forgive poor uncle. Let him rest. It was noble of you."

"I don't think so," he returned mournfully. "I was weak."

"You sacrificed yourself," she answered in her feeble voice.

"I am glad that you forgive me," he said quietly, a glad light shining in his eyes. "I can go away happy now."

"But I shall not be happy if you go away," she pleaded.

Their eyes met. She held out her hand, and he took it. And he was holding it an hour later, when the doctor protested that he really must interfere now, he couldn't allow it any longer.

Geo. Day.

A Twentieth Century Brigand.

In the Spanish mountains, beyond the reach of the arm of the law, there lives a brigand, Don Q. by name. Many tales—strange tales, blood-curdling tales—are told of him and of his doings.

Don Q. is not a petty pilferer. He holds captives to ransom, and it is his boast that, once he has fixed the sum, he never lets a prisoner go till it has been paid in full.

Patriotic to the backbone, Don Q. is capable of the deepest cunning. He never forgets an insult, never trusts a stranger, and rarely makes a friend. He will sacrifice a dozen lives without scruple if it be necessary to do so to secure a desired end, but on occasion he can be courtly and chivalrous. To do a woman in distress a service he is ever willing to risk his life.

A series of stories about this awe-inspiring person by K. and Hesketh Prichard is now appearing in Pearson's Magazine. In the February number the most exciting story yet published appears, entitled, "How Don Q. Paid for his Cigarettes." His method will be found very unusual.

Digitized by Google

A Wandering Fortune.

The Tale of a Plucky Girl and an Honourable Man.

"Oh, of course! Everybody is down on me because I didn't choose to cringe to a capricious old grandfather. A girl mustn't show any independence of spirit nowadays," cried the girl vehemently, her lip curling scornfully as she surveyed her uncle and aunt.

"He was unjust all the way through. He wouldn't associate with his own daughter, my mother, because she married the man she loved; he was unjust to my father, because dad—dear old dad—was not rich; and he has been unjust to me, because he had me educated so as to become a worthy heiress to Lexworth Hall, and then he cuts me off!"

The girl's eyes were flashing, her bosom heaving; she had drawn herself up to the limit of her medium height, and her hands were tightly clenched.

Mrs. Warner, her father's sister, glanced at the girl and then at her own inferior half; Mr. Warner shuffled his feet uneasily and said nothing. Mrs. Wynne, the girl's mother, sat trembling in a corner; she was a timid little woman, quite the opposite of her daughter, and most people marvelled how such a weak, yielding creature could have so bold and outspoken a daughter.

"It's your own foolishness that has done it," cried Mrs. Warner, rather angrily. "You were the heiress to a magnificent property and a handsome rent-roll. You had the thing in your own hands. You knew that the old gentleman was a crotchety person, and all you had to do was to put up with his whims till it pleased Heaven to take him from this wicked world! Yet, what do you do? You contradict him and fly in the face of Fortune; he threatened more than once to cut you off, and this time he sent you home. You refused to give in or pretend to give in, and he is seized with a fit of apoplexy and dies. Unfortunately, he had altered his will, and the fit took him before he had time to repent, so here you are, almost penniless, when you could have avoided it all."

"I don't care," retorted the girl defiantly. "He was a tyrannical old man, who simply tried to force me to do things because he knew that I didn't want to do them. That was all. He wouldn't let anyone have a mind of her own; it must be just as he desired. And I couldn't yield to that. No man should have it in his power to act so arbitrarily. There wasn't one person who had pluck and independence enough to cross him, except me, and my nature couldn't stand it."

"See what your daughter has brought down on you, Dora," sneered Mrs. Warner, turning to her sister-in-law. "You began wrong, my foolish brother and you, when you named her Chris. It's a boy's name, and she has been a boy ever since in reality, and you two encouraged her. Well, who is to earn the living now? There is no more money coming. Will you do it?" she asked sarcastically, turning to Chris Wynne, who still retained her defiant attitude.

"Yes," declared the girl boldly. "I know what you are thinking about, aunt! Mother has been living with you, and has been able to pay her own expenses; but now you are afraid that you will be asked to keep her free of charge. Don't worry about that. We shall not stop here, and if we cannot earn a living, you will not have to support us. Do you know," she added, with a mischievous twinkle in her eyes, despite the gravity of the situation, "there is at least one thing we can do."

"What's that?" demanded Mrs. Warner sharply, falling into the trap.

"Starve, auntie, dear!" said Chris, with a demure air.

She bowed with mocking courtesy, but there was a world of determination underlying the words. Timid Mrs. Wynne rose and followed Chris out of the room, while Mrs. Warner sniffed contemptuously and tried to smother the uncomfortable feeling that had struck her somewhere in the region where most people keep a heart.

"And she'll do it rather than ask us for anything," ventured Mr. Warner uneasily. "Weren't you rather sharp, Louisa?"

"Don't talk nonsense!" snapped Louisa, trying to smother her own fears by answering shortly. "It's a great pity that she wasn't a boy. You see," she continued, telling him the story as if he were a stranger, "Mr. Lexmore was as irascible as you can imagine; he was angry because he had no son, and he crushed the spirit out of his wife and daughter. I'd like to see the man who would do that to me!"

"Exactly, my dear," ventured Mr. Warner again. "Then why are you so down on Chris?"

"Don't interrupt with foolish remarks," said Mrs. Warner, glaring at him. "You don't understand. Well, when his daughter grew up, he determined that she should marry a title, and she went and fell in love with my brother and plucked up just enough spirit to defy the old man in that way. I am not surprised, for my brother was as handsome and lovable a man as I have ever seen.

"Old Lexmore was furious and cut her off, but when he found that there was a probability of his having a grandson, he came round sufficiently to see his daughter and make promises. Then another disappointment fell on him; the child wasn't a boy, but that girl who has just gone out of this very room. Old Lexmore was furious and wouldn't have anything more to do with them.

"They decided to name her Chris; that was because her grandfather's name was Christopher, and there is a girl's name Christine, and both are often called Chris for short. So they had her christened just 'Chris,' and they seemed to delight in developing her independent nature and her boyishness.

Digitized by Google

"And then, one day, old Lexmore nearly ran his horse over a girl of six. He growled at her that she should have got out of the way, and the little girl looked fearlessly at him, and boldly told him that he had no right to ride his horse just how and where he liked, and that she would call a policeman.

"The child's behaviour touched his flinty heart in some unaccountable manner; he asked her name, found out that it was his own grandchild, and finally took her in hand, thinking that she would carry out his wishes, if her mother didn't. He wouldn't see the mother or father, and they gave up the little one for her own welfare.

"And so it went on. They often quarrelled as she grew up, but it always ended all right. I am sure that it was a good thing for Dora after my brother died. But this time things went farther than usual, and that unfortunate attack of apoplexy spoilt everything. The old gentleman altered his will, leaving everything to a son of an old college friend, although he hadn't seen that friend for years. And Chris has the mortification of knowing that by her foolishness she had rendered her mother and herself penniless.

"She doesn't care, she says. Well, she will learn to care. She should have given way and been all humility, and cringed to him, as she calls it. Isn't the fortune worth all that? Confound the man!" she continued, looking up; "if he hasn't gone and left me talking to the air!"

It was perfectly true; her husband had heard the story so many times that he was tired of it, and had slipped out unobserved.

In another room of the same house, Chris Wynne and her mother were talking gravely. The girl had her arm round her mother's waist, as if to protect her, and the elder woman was glad to lean, figuratively, on her tomboy of a daughter.

"I don't blame you at all, my dear," said Mrs. Wynne, in answer to a question from Chris. "If you don't wish to do a thing, say so, and don't be hypocritical. Be as true as your father was, Chris, dear, and you will find me quite ready to bear the consequences. My father's action was unjust, but we must not judge others too severely, Chris, as we hope for mercy ourselves. Let us try to forget the past, or the disagreeable part of it, and think of the future."

Chris kissed the sweet-tempered, meek little woman lovingly.

"I am not so much concerned about the future, mother," she said. "When I was in London three years ago, with grandfather's cousin, Lady Hartfield, she warned me that something like this might happen, and said that she would help me, if I wanted help. She is poor, as peeresses go, and, what is more, I wouldn't impose on her good nature; but she can assist me materially in getting a post as companion. I am more fitted for that than anything. So I can earn enough to keep us both."

"But——" began Mrs. Wynne, and then her remonstrance was cut short by a kiss.

That very evening Chris wrote to Lady Hartfield, and she went to bed to dream many things, prominent among which was the brief love affair of that London visit three years ago. What had become of Captain Hamilton? She had never heard of him since then. She told herself that she had not loved him, and yet why was it that life had not been so bright during those past three years, and why did she have that strange pain at her heart sometimes? She awoke at that juncture and was angry with herself when she found that her eyes were wet with tears.

Chris had to wait more than a week for a reply, and then she found that Lady Hartfield was in Switzerland; however, she was able to say that she had recommended Chris to a wealthy lady who was just returning to England. An appointment was arranged, and in less than a month Chris had entered upon her duties, and her mother was comfortably lodged in rooms away from her sister-in-law.

Chris Wynne had an agreeable position with Lady Braxton, who, growing to like the girl, treated her more as a daughter than as a paid companion. Lady Braxton lived a retired life, generally speaking, travelling a great deal, and usually seeking places where the majority of wealthy people did not go. As the months passed, and winter came and went, she began to think that it might, after all, do her good to see a little more society, and that it would be better for her companion.

"She is a dear girl," she mused one day; "high-spirited and beautiful. She bears the loss of that money with great bravery, and I am becoming really fond of her. I'll go about a little more in Society."

She was as good as her word, and thus it came about that, during the approaching summer, she accepted an invitation to spend a few weeks at Gorseton Park, the residence of an old friend, and Chris went with her.

There was a houseful of guests, among whom were several young ladies, and there was a constant round of visits. There were several good families in the district, each having its numerous visitors, and the exchange of courtesies and invitations was continual. Owing to Lady Braxton's influence, Chris was well treated everywhere and by all except a very punctilious or snobbish person here and there, so that she was spared the common experience of being constantly reminded that she was "only a companion." Life was bright, and Chris was happy, except on infrequent occasions, when the haunting memory of three years ago came back with special vividness.

Chris was seated in a window, behind a loose curtain, reading Tennyson, one lovely morning about a week after their arrival at Gorseton Park. She was deep in "The Princess," when her attention was distracted by the abrupt entrance into the room of Miss Bertha Ross, whose none-too-musical voice made itself heard and felt—as another guest unkindly expressed it—as soon as she was well inside.

"I say, have you heard? There's a party coming over this afternoon from the Manor, and I understand that Captain Hamilton is one of the guests. You remember him, Bella, don't you? Oh, ever so handsome! He has been away for a long time—should say it was close on three years, in India, so they tell me, fighting the border tribes. What a nuisance those tribes always are, whether in India or elsewhere. Well," she rattled on volubly, "Captain Hamilton is there, and he has expressed his determination to run over here. He knows Sir Richard Gorseton, it seems. Now, ladies,—unmarried ladies, I refer to—here is a chance for you. Young, handsome, rich, noble, and a bachelor!"

Some of the ladies laughed; the others did not look approvingly on Miss Ross' conduct. There was a general chatter among the various groups, to one of which Miss Ross attached herself, and Captain Hamilton was forgotten by all save one. Chris had felt her cheeks burn at the remarks of Miss Ross, and Tennyson had no more attraction.

Captain Hamilton was coming! Chris turned hot and cold alternately. The incidents of three years before came back to her with affrighting vividness, and she placed her hand over her heart as if to steady its tumultuous beating. She sank back on the couch and closed her eyes.

Digitized by Google

Captain Hamilton had told her that he loved her; she had accepted his love and had said that she loved him. And then—ah me!—her happiness had turned her brain, it must have been so! She had been so excited and so glad, but her old independence had gained the upper hand and she had resented his natural, lover-like objection to her accepting so much attention from others. Yet he was right to an extent, she admitted it now; where he erred was in attaching so much importance to the acts of a high-spirited girl.

To punish him, she had flirted violently with another man; she had grown reckless and had carried the flirtation to the extent of giving him every waltz on her card on that fateful evening, almost ignoring her lover. She had retired with Arthur Macey to an alcove after the last dance but one of the evening, and there Captain Hamilton had found them, just as Chris was pinning a flower into Macey's coat.

Hamilton, in his mad rage, had not noticed the expression of regret and fear on Chris' face as she listened to the mad outpourings of this man whom she had so thoughtlessly and so unintentionally encouraged. He saw only the scene, and, with words of scorn, he had turned on his heel and left them. Chris had not seen him since.

Lost in her reverie, Chris was aroused by an increase of the clamour of conversation in the room from which she was screened by the gauzy curtain. She sat upright and then bent deeply forward over her book. Someone had entered the room with Sir Richard and Lady Gorseton, and that someone was being introduced as "Captain Hamilton"!

He knew some of the guests, so that the necessary introductions were soon over. Captain Hamilton had walked over, hoping to catch the male guests most of whom were out, however.

Poor Chris did not dare to look up; she waited in agony for someone to call her and introduce her, but Miss Bertha Ross, who had taken the task of introduction upon herself, as an old acquaintance of Captain Hamilton, ignored "the companion." She was no friend of Miss Wynne! At first Chris did not realise that she was to be passed over, but when Hamilton sat down and began to talk, the truth burst upon her. The bitterness of her position stung her. Of course, she was not entitled to the honour of an introduction; she was only a hired companion!

A moment before, Chris was hoping that something would happen to prevent her from being brought face to face with Captain Hamilton, and now that the wish had been realised, she was angry. She shut her eyes to prevent the tears of mortification from welling to the surface, then she rose quietly and passed out through the open window.

Captain Hamilton had seen the figure behind the curtain and had wondered who it was. It struck him that there was something familiar about the poise of the head. He kept a look-out from the corner of his eye, and when the form rose to its full height and passed out of sight through the window, he started.

During the rest of that brief visit, Captain Hamilton was a little absent-minded, and he breathed a sigh of relief when he had said "Good-bye." He looked about for Chris; he knew it was she; but he could see no trace of her.

How terribly unhappy Chris was all that day! She complained of a headache in the afternoon, and kindly Lady Braxton ordered her off to bed. She did not know whether Hamilton came again in the afternoon or not; she only knew that she was miserable with the double experience of that morning, and she wondered how she could avoid him in future.

"He will triumph over me politely!" she cried. "It will be his revenge for three years ago, and I am now altogether beneath him in social standing!"

There Captain Hamilton found them, as his betrothed was pinning a flower into Arthur Macey's coat.

Her heart told her that she was wronging the man, but another paroxysm of perversity had taken possession of her, and she refused to listen.

In the morning a change came. Chris had regained her usual equanimity and was prepared to meet Hamilton with perfect self-possession, but that was not all. A letter was brought to her, the envelope of which bore the die of the solicitor who had conducted all her grandfather's business, and that letter contained the most startling news. She had to read it three times before she could properly grasp the contents.

Her grandfather's property had been left to Mr. Geoffry Boyd; this gentleman had been away, but now that he was back again, he had declined to accept benefit from an act of injustice; he had enough money of his own, and did not want that which belonged of right to Miss Wynne. With sublime ignorance of legal formalities, he had instructed the solicitor to tear the will up and so undo the wrong; and on being informed that this could not be done, he had ordered the solicitor to prepare the necessary documents for signature in order that he might make the property over to Miss Wynne!

Digitized by Google

Then she was an heiress again? An heiress in spite of herself, it seemed! Who was this Mr. Boyd and how could she thank him? But ought she to accept the gift?

The news of this romantic turn of affairs created a sensation at Gorseton Park, and the two or three persons who had snubbed her now declared that she was indeed a charming girl. Chris had become attached to Lady Braxton, and decided to stay with her for a time. The Gorsetons made her very welcome, and the future seemed very bright once more for Chris. That was what outsiders thought, but the brightness was marred for Chris by a cloud that would not vanish.

If Chris had had to attend to the formalities, she would have been busy, but the solicitor attended to all and came down to Gorseton Park when it was necessary to consult her or to get her signature. She had such confidence in the elderly gentleman, who was so extremely delighted at her good luck, that she did not trouble to read the documents and contented herself with adding her bold, flowing signature to such papers as were presented to her.

Only one thing puzzled and vexed her; Mr. Boyd did not wish her to write and thank him. He seemed to be a gruff sort of a man to do things in so off-handish a style. So Chris had to transmit her expression of gratitude through the lawyer.

It was a fortnight later when she saw Captain Hamilton again; he came unexpectedly to her side while she was walking in a secluded part of the grounds of Gorseton.

"Pardon my intrusion on your privacy, Miss Wynne!" he said politely. "I could not resist the temptation of renewing our acquaintance, of making an apology, and of conveying my congratulations! I was not aware that you were at Gorseton Park till—till after you had vanished through the window. And I am glad indeed to learn that an act of injustice has been rectified."

"Thank you!" she said frigidly. "It is very good of you. I hope you are quite well?"

She could have bitten her tongue the next moment for this cold speech. Hamilton paled slightly under his bronze, but he answered with perfect equanimity:

"I am quite well, thank you, Miss Wynne. Are you walking about the grounds? May I come, too, and enjoy the pleasure of a chat?"

"I am sorry, but I am going in now." Why would this perverse spirit gain the upper hand and make her say things which she regretted immediately? "I expect you will find more agreeable company, Captain Hamilton!"

And with a cold bow she left him. In the house she found the solicitor awaiting her; there was a document to sign and some instructions to be obtained.

"I think that will be the last thing to be done in order to complete the transfer of the estate, the stocks, and the money from Captain Hamilton to you, Miss Wynne," observed the solicitor absently, as he searched among his papers for one that he missed. "What has become of it now?" he continued, puckering his brows. "Oh, here it——"

"Who did you say was transferring this property to me?" interrupted Chris in a strange voice. "Captain Hamilton?"

"Eh? Er, bless my soul!" gasped the elderly gentleman in his vexation. "Oh, dear, he will be cross! He has been most particular that you should not know! However came I to be so foolish as to betray the secret?"

"Please explain this to me, Mr. Gower!" said Chris peremptorily. "You ought not to have kept me in ignorance of it. How was it I did not see his name on the documents? Why has he been called Boyd?"

In a great state of agitation, Mr. Gower explained. Hamilton's name was originally Boyd, but he had inherited a fortune from his mother's brother, who had stipulated that he should take his name of Hamilton, so the nephew was now Captain Geoffry Boyd Hamilton. (Chris remembered now that the first name was the same, which had not occurred to her previously.) Hamilton had made the property over to her. Chris had not troubled to read the documents, and, where it had been necessary for both to sign, Hamilton had taken care that she should sign first. Old Lexworth had not heard that this young man had changed his name, so he had called him Boyd in his will.

Chris was consumed with remorse; how good, how noble he had been, and how shamefully she had treated him. She left the solicitor abruptly and hurried out in search of Geoffry. She saw him and hastened after him; and it was not till she had caught him up and stood facing him, her cheeks aglow, her breath coming quickly and making an irresistible picture, that she realised exactly what she had done. She was throwing herself at this man!

"Well?" he inquired, fixing his keen eye upon her. "Have you decided that I cannot find better company? I cannot, that's a fact!"

"Oh, why did you do it?" she burst out. "I don't know how to thank you—I—oh, I believe I shall hate you, there!"

"And as for me," he said deliberately, restraining himself only by a great effort, "I am certain that I shall love you more every day. Oh, Chris!" It sounded like a wail. "Have these three years tortured you as they have me?"

She tried to withstand his piercing gaze, but her eyes drooped; in a moment he had sprung forward and was clasping her convulsively to his breast.

"I'll never let you go again!" he said with fierce earnestness. "And I won't let you get away from my grasp till you name the wedding day. No! I don't care who is coming. I'll hold you till you name it."

"Next year, then," she cried, trying to escape, so that her blushes might not be seen.

"Next fiddlesticks," he cried. "I say the end of next month; that's time enough for you to get ready and I won't wait another minute!"

And she had to consent.

F. Brewster.

To Those About to Marry.

Don't let the knot be tied without knowing something about the character and disposition of each other. This you can find out by sending a specimen of your handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope, to Ranee, 23 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. In return an accurate delineation of your character will be sent. If you both obtain these delineations, and then compare them, you will be able to decide whether a happy marriage is likely to result.

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID NEW SERIES. BEGIN READING TO-DAY.

DECOYED!

Told by the Decoy Herself.

A Striking Series of Astonishing Revelations.

SYNOPSIS.

Vivienne D'Alton, who in this series tells the story of a certain period of her life, is a young lady who has been educated in Germany.

Until the time when the story commences, she has never seen her father since he placed her at the school in Bochum.

Her mother is dead, and she has no brother or sister. Hence, she seems quite alone in the world.

But one day her father sends a message to the school that he wishes his daughter to leave and to meet him at Rotterdam.

The person who announces himself as her father at Rotterdam is not in the least like the handsome gentleman she had pictured to herself, but is short and stout.

They drive to a large mansion, where Vivienne is enthusiastically welcomed by a Mrs. Sherwood, "a bosom friend of her mother," who requests Vivienne to call her "aunt."

Vivienne takes an instantaneous dislike to "Aunt Flora."

A Mr. Gilbert Graysworthy comes to dine at the house, and incidentally mentions that round his waist he carries a belt containing fifty thousand pounds' worth of diamonds.

A day or two later Vivienne is shocked to learn that Gilbert Graysworthy has been found murdered in the street! There seems no motive for the crime, for his money, his watch and chain are still upon his body.

On the passage across to England Vivienne sees a person whom she believes is Annchen, a maid whom she greatly dislikes, talking to a man whom she has seen before under very suspicious circumstances.

She also meets a Viscount Broomville, a fellow-passenger, who announces that he is going to call upon Mr. Beverley D'Alton regarding some business affairs.

He does so, and relates how he was attacked in Rotterdam by persons whose evident intention was to rob him of the diamonds he carried about with him.

Some days later, Vivienne takes a surreptitious walk in the evening. She is amazed to see Viscount Broomville shadowed by the two birds of evil omen she had seen on the Harwich boat. The man is about to strike the Viscount when Vivienne utters a timely shriek of warning and thereby saves the Viscount from being murdered.

Vivienne's début into Society is a phenomenal success, as at a reception given by the D'Altons many of the aristocracy are present.

A young gentleman named Alan Melrose, with his two sisters, visits the D'Altons. This youth announces his intention of investing £80,000 in the New Barbary Land Development Co. While he and his host are discussing financial matters, Miss Helena D'Alton is announced as wishing to see Vivienne.

Mr. D'Alton's face turns to a ghastly hue, and he hurriedly shows Alan Melrose out of the room.

Miss Helena D'Alton tells Vivienne that she was her mother's godmother, and that she has never heard of "Aunt Flora."

FIFTH EPISODE.

Fraud and Ingratitude.

I saw neither Mrs. Sherwood nor my father until we met at breakfast next morning, and a glance at the latter showed me that he was certainly far from well, for his face was pale, his eyes were bloodshot, and his appetite was nil.

Nor was "Aunt Flora" in much better case. But with unusual unselfishness, she insisted that her haggard appearance was merely the result of last night's headache, and concentrated her attention upon "Dear Beverley's evident indisposition."

"You really must see a doctor to-day," she said. "Such an attack as you had last night must not be permitted to occur again."

"It will not occur again, take my word for it," was the reply. "I will go to a specialist to-day, and it will be strange if he cannot devise an effectual cure."

Fräulein used sometimes to tell her pupils that the exercise of strong will would, in many cases, cure us of all sorts of ideas concerning one's feeble health, and I thought of her when I heard my father assert that his heart attacks would not be allowed to trouble him again.

But there was a peculiarity in his facial expression, and a significance in the tone of his voice which struck me as rather remarkable, for it was as though he were speaking of a person, instead of alluding to a form of illness.

However, the fancy was but momentary, and was banished by my own anxiety, for I had seen for myself that my father was certainly ill on the previous evening. So I said solicitously: "Father, if you can really have yourself cured, pray do it at once, before your condition becomes worse! You looked absolutely ghastly last night, just after Miss D'Alton came to see us."

"Miss D'Alton!" echoed Lady Windelmere. "Is she a relation?"

"She is my father's aunt," I was explaining, when Mrs. Sherwood hastily interrupted me.

"She is nothing of the sort," she said. "She is a vile impostor, who has already swindled no end of people on the strength of her relationship to the great millionaire, Mr. Beverley D'Alton."

"And," added my father, "I am afraid that, if she ventures to show her face here again, I shall be compelled to hand her over to the police."

Digitized by Google

"But," I protested, greatly distressed at hearing all this, "she knew my mother! She was her godmother, and seemed to know all about us."

"Not all," was the reply, given with one of my father's deprecatory smiles. "What she does know could be easily learnt by anybody taking the trouble to inquire. The real Helena D'Alton died several years ago, and the fact that I was lying ill with rheumatic fever, and therefore unable to attend the funeral, put it into the head of her companion, Florence Grantham, to try and personate her, in order to enjoy the annuity which I allowed my aunt. In this fraud the woman was helped by her cousin, who acted at the time as my solicitor, and it was actually successful until I met the vicar of our family church when he was taking a flying holiday through Italy. He assured me that my aunt, the last of her generation, was really dead, and he gave me such information as made me stop the annuity, and change my lawyers forthwith."

I was dreadfully disappointed, for I had taken a great fancy to the old lady, and I was quite able to second his opinion when my father continued:

"Unfortunately, the old impostor is possessed of most fascinating manners and appearance, so that she easily imposes upon people. But as soon as ever they begin to question her deeply, she flounders in a maze of inaccuracies, for she knows absolutely nothing of my early youth, except that the Beverleys and the Collingwoods lived on neighbouring estates. Indeed, I doubt whether she ever heard even of your mother's inseparable school-friend, Flora, for she had only lived a short time with my Aunt Helena."

"Oh, well, don't bother any more about the stupid old woman now," interrupted Mrs. Sherwood. "I don't suppose she wheedled anything out of Vivienne, and——"

"She never attempted to wheedle anything out of me."

"Perhaps not. That was only because she was short of time. Very likely her principal object was to be observed coming here, and I think you may take it for granted that you have seen the last of her. Beverley, you will not delay about going to that specialist?"

"Certainly not," was the prompt response. "I shall go now, and the whole business will be settled in a few hours. By-the-bye, Vivienne, I think your friend, Viscount Broomville, has behaved very shabbily to me."

I felt my face flush scarlet at this speech, and said hastily: "Oh, father, I hope not! He seemed to be such a perfect gentleman."

"Just so, my dear. But it doesn't do to trust to appearances; not in this case, at all events."

"But what has Lord Broomville done that he can be called 'shabby'?"

"He has served me a very nasty business trick. After inducing me to go out of my way to afford him a good investment, he has broken my confidence, and turned his shares over, at a big profit, to a third party, in whom I take not the slightest interest."

"But isn't that the essence of smart business?"

"It is. But I didn't think that it would be brought into play here. As I have observed already, I expected my confidence to be kept sacred until I gave the word to let others into the secret of the great scoop I looked forward to. By withdrawing his money almost as soon as he had invested it, and by selling his shares to somebody else, Lord Broomville has broken the law of commercial integrity, and his premature action will very likely cost me half a million."

I was glad that Lady Windelmere had excused herself, and gone to her own room before this conversation took place, for I felt as humiliated by it as if I myself had been guilty of the breach of trust of which the Viscount was accused. Of course I did not know much about the flotation of shares. But I had it from his lordship's own lips that he had invested his money in the New Barbary Land Development Company, and even I realised that it was not nice for him to have behaved as he had done, especially after the great service I had been able to render him.

"Perhaps," I faltered, "he will have a good explanation to give you when he calls again."

"My dear child, if there is one thing upon which you can feel sure, it is that Lord Broomville will do all in his power to avoid meeting us again. If he were an old hand he would brazen it out. But, being a fresh recruit to the ranks of chiselers, he still has a bit of conscience left, and won't show up till he's forced."

So my ideal of noble manhood had proved himself as fictitious in value as had the sweet-looking old lady whom I would so gladly have welcomed as an aunt. Of course my father could not be mistaken. But my disappointment was none the less bitter on that account, and as soon as I could reach the seclusion of my own rooms, I indulged in the first fit of weeping I had felt the need of since the terrible fate of Mr. Graysworthy first brought me face to face with life's tragedies.

* * * * * *

"Vivienne, you have made another conquest. Mr. O'Connell is wildly in love with you."

"Oh, Aunt Flora, how can you say such a preposterous thing? Mr. O'Connell is old enough to be my father."

"Which means that he is in the very prime of life and vigour."

"Yes, he is like a prime ox at Christmas."

"I don't suppose he can help being so stout."

"Oh, yes, he can. He should eat less, and exercise more. Then he would be more presentable."

"There is no need for him to worry about being presentable. He has money enough to outweigh all other disadvantages."

"Money doesn't make up for his pronounced vulgarity. And I must confess that I think more of good family than I do of wealth."

"What better family could you have than the O'Connell's? All Ireland thinks well of them and their doughty deeds and speeches."

"Then they must have spoken very differently from your friend, who has certainly learnt his Irish accent on the Continent."

"His father had a very good appointment in Berlin, and the children naturally acquired a German accent."

"I was brought up in Germany, too, but my English was too well looked after to permit me to forget my native tongue."

"Upon my word, you would try the patience of a saint."

"If ever I meet one, I shall try what I can do in that direction. Meanwhile, be good enough to remember that I consider it no compliment for a man like Mr. Emil O'Connell to gaze covetously at me."

"In other words, miss, you are off your head with vanity and flattery. But be good enough to remember, in your turn, that Mr. O'Connell is a man whom lots of your superiors would be glad of."

"Very likely. There's yourself, for instance. I don't suppose he would come amiss to you, and I should be very pleased to see you provided with another husband."

By this time, Mrs. Sherwood ought to have known that she was no match for me in an argument, and I ought to have known that it was dangerous to provoke the antagonism of a woman whom I credited with many malignant qualities.

But there was one thing which was already impressed upon me too unpleasantly to be forgotten, and that was the security of Mrs. Sherwood's influence over my father. Nothing could shake that. And though all my wishes in other respects were granted, I knew that so long as I remained unmarried I should have to endure the daily companionship of a woman whom I almost hated, as well as that of the maid who was on such strangely intimate terms with both her employer and his lady friend.

Digitized by Google

But I could see no reason why I should endure the attentions of Mr. O'Connell, until my irate parent, prompted by Mrs. Sherwood, told me plainly that I must treat the man as smilingly and as courteously as I would treat a younger and handsomer man.

"Whether you are inclined to marry him or not," he continued, "I insist that you neither say nor do anything to lessen his pleasure in coming here."

"You surely wouldn't expect me to marry a man like that, even if he were richer than yourself?"

"Of course not. I have far higher views for you. But there is no need to hurry over finding a titled husband for you. Enjoy yourself to the full, my dear. But, remember, you are to do me a great service in return for all I do for you."

"Nothing will delight me more! What is the service to consist of?"

"Civility to my friends and obedience to my wishes. Surely that is little enough to ask of you?"

With these words my father left us, and the sneering smile bent upon me by Mrs. Sherwood was the outward indication of her triumph, for both she and I knew that she was one of the people to whom I was ordered to be civil.

Some days passed by, and my father's prophecies proved correct, for neither Miss D'Alton nor Viscount Broomville came to see us again, and I was forced to the conclusion that I had been woefully mistaken in my estimate of their characters.

This conviction helped to reduce me to a more subdued frame of mind, and Mr. Emil O'Connell found me so outwardly tolerant of his unwelcome attentions that they became alarmingly demonstrative of his desire to honour me with a proposal.

"Vivienne," said my father just as I was about to go out for a drive with Lady Windelmore, "I want you to be very careful in your treatment of Mr. O'Connell to-night."

"Oh, father," I remonstrated, "I positively loathe the man! And if you strain my obedience too far, I'm afraid I shall shock both him and you!"

"It won't be much of a strain to prevent him having a chance of proposing to you this evening, will it?"

"Oh, no!" was my delighted answer. "I shall be only too glad to circumvent such a proceeding!"

"Very well. Your best plan will be to absent yourself to-night. Plead a headache, or whatever you like. He is going to dine with us. But if you keep out of sight, I will give him his congé, and I don't think he will want to visit here again."

I was very thankful to fall in with my father's views, although I was rather amazed at his sudden change of front. However, there was always something strange cropping up, as there probably is in every phase of life, and I soon forgot all about Mr. O'Connell in the pleasure of the undoubted sensation which reigned amongst the onlookers as our splendid equipage drove round and round the Park.

Presently, Lady Windelmore expressed a wish to call at a big jeweller's shop in Bond Street, where she was having some old jewels reset, and the coachman turned the horses' heads eastwards. Of course I already possessed numerous pieces of beautiful jewellery, but I was none the less interested in the display which greeted my eyes in the Bond Street shop, and I took the opportunity of ordering one or two articles to be sent home to me.

"What a magnificent parure!" exclaimed Lady Windelmore suddenly, as she stopped in front of a heavy, padlocked case, which was used to display a suite of the most wonderful diamonds I had ever seen.

Seeing how we both admired them, the jeweller volunteered a little information.

"Such suites as this," he said, gazing at the glorious gems with pardonable pride, "such suites as this have a very limited chance of purchase, and are rarely made except to order, for only royalties or millionaires can indulge in them. This set is intended for the Empress of Russia, and will be handed over to the Tsar's envoy this very afternoon. Oddly enough, Mr. Emil O'Connell, a gentleman who made a terrific lot of money in Westralia, saw one or two of the pieces, and ordered a duplicate set exactly like this, including tiara, necklace, pendant, brooch, stomacher, bracelet, and a wonderful single-stone finger ring. He has paid a fabulous price for them, and fetched them only a few minutes before you arrived."

I couldn't help being interested to hear of Mr. O'Connell's magnificent purchase, especially as I had more than a suspicion that the costly adornments were intended for me. But I did not hint this suspicion, even to Lady Windelmore. In fact, I had not mentioned my obnoxious suitor to her that day for several reasons, and I was glad that she had to go out later to a dinner-party to which she had accepted an invitation, as she was thus not likely to notice what happened at our house when the poor man received his congé.

I should also be free to do almost as I liked, for, with the approval of her ladyship, I had declined the invitation to accompany her, on the plea that there would be no youthful guests to lend congenial brightness to the affair.

"I'll have quite a nice evening to myself!" I thought, after I was once more in my own boudoir. "Her ladyship has gone out, and both father and Aunt Flora will be occupied with Mr. O'Connell. I have a good mind to have a tray brought up here, and then I will dismiss both Susan and Annchen till eleven o'clock. Nobody will take any notice of me

A Reduced Facsimile of Next Week's Cover.

A Dramatic Episode from a Splendid Story which will appear in the Valentine Number, published next week.

Digitized by Google

for hours, and I can have another little constitutional, but I hope there won't be any mischief afloat, like there was the last time I went out alone."

This plan was duly carried out, and at half-past nine I was feeling happy and exhilarated at the prospect of indulging in what I considered a thoroughly innocent half hour's amusement, though I knew perfectly well that I was defying conventionality.

I enjoyed my solitary walk immensely, clad in the same old cloak and hat in which I left Bochum, for they were less conspicuous than the expensive things which had been lavished upon me ever since my father had sent for me.

On nearing our own house, at a few minutes past ten 'clock, I was dismayed to see two persons come into the light of the portico, and I instinctively stepped inside the gates of the adjoining house.

For the two gentlemen were my father and Mr. O'Connell, and I did not want either of them to see me. They came down the broad path together, and into the street. Both walked rather slowly, but I noticed that Mr. O'Connell's gait was extremely unsteady.

In fact, each step seemed to make him worse, and as I peeped through the trees, I could see that he began to lean heavily on my father's arm.

I was but a yard or two away from them, and could both hear and see what was going on without being observed myself.

"Come, come!" said my father. "Keep yourself straight, man."

"I don't know what has come over me," was the slow response. "I feel as if I were going to sleep."

"Well, you had better try to wake up. Ah, here comes a crawler. Let me help you in. Where shall I tell the man to drive to?"

"The Cecil. Tell the driver to hurry up. I feel half dead!"

It took a few minutes to get Mr. O'Connell into the cab, for by this time he was absolutely helpless. But the task was accomplished with the aid of the cabman, to whom my father tendered some money, saying in a loudish voice, apparently for the benefit of one or two people who lingered to see what was going on: "I'm afraid the gentleman has had a glass too much. The Cecil. Here's your fare."

Then, much to my amazement, he continued, in a much lower tone: "Lose no time. You'll find all serene at the office."

The cabman made no reply, but drove off with his insensible burden, and my father, with a curious chuckle, turned to go into the house again, leaving me thoroughly unnerved by what I had seen.

Perhaps some girls would not have been upset quite so much as I was at the sight of a drunken man being sent home alone in a cab. But I had seen very little of the seamy side of life, and I could not help connecting the degrading spectacle with myself.

I remembered that this man had probably allowed himself to be overcome by drink through disappointment, for my father had assured me that he meant to give him his congé. I also recollected that he probably carried a huge fortune, in the shape of a suite of diamonds, and though I did not like the man himself, I dreaded lest mischief should come to him through being left at the mercy of a strange cabman, who might, or who might not, be able to resist the temptation of rifling the pockets of his insensible fare.

I managed to reach my own room again without being noticed. But I felt strangely uneasy. My uneasiness was, however, destined to deepen into horror by the news that reached me next morning.

(Another long instalment of this series will appear next week.)

"I wish, sir, to ask for the hand of your daughter in marriage." "But are you in a position to support a family?" "Oh, I think so, sir!" "Yes; but you must consider the matter pretty carefully, for there are ten of us!"

Your Editor Chats.

Shortly to be Announced.

The time is now drawing near when I shall publish the full particulars of the new gigantic competition that I have in preparation for you. Before finally announcing the exact details of this novel scheme there is a terrible amount of work to be got through so as to be quite sure that there will be no hitch whatsoever in the working of it. I am pushing on as fast as ever I can with the final stages of this work, and at the very earliest moment the idea will be announced to readers of Short Stories. I cannot positively say when the announcement will be made, but at the most it will not be longer than two or three weeks, and possibly even before then. So, if you don't want to miss the chance of a lifetime, be quite sure to obtain next week's and the following issues. They will tell you more and more about the coming competition.

Next Week—Our Valentine Number.

Our next issue is the special Valentine Number. A reduced facsimile of the cover, which will be reproduced in colours, will be found on the previous page. The inscription to the picture, "He handed her the fateful valentine—the death-warrant of her happiness," is sufficient guarantee that the story it illustrates will be of enthralling interest. It will be written by one of the most popular authors of the day. Besides this story there will be many others of equal interest, in addition to our usual features. If you wish to send anyone a suitable valentine, you cannot do better than send them a copy of the Valentine Number of Short Stories.

A Guinea for a Reply.

"The Difficulty of Hugh Chester" is the title of the Eighth Unsolved Love Problem, which appears on pages 181 and 182. I will offer a guinea to the reader who sends in what I consider to be the best advice to Hugh Chester under the circumstances. My decision as to the winner will be final. Replies must be written on one side of the paper only, and should not exceed one hundred words.

Replies should be addressed to "The Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.," and must have "Eighth Love Problem" marked in the top left-hand corner. The very latest date on which I can receive manuscripts is Friday, February 12th. None arriving after this date will be considered.

Competition Results.

I hope to announce next week the names of the winners in the Running Riddles Competition and of the Seventh Unsolved Love Problem.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

REFUSED AND ACCEPTED.

The Tale of a Fortune Hunter.

"No, sir!"

That was what she said.

I rose up, trying desperately to appear unconcerned and careless. Pooh! It was of no use! Marjory Cheswick saw through me as if I had been a pair of spectacles. She knew that I would have sold myself for a postage-stamp just at that moment, and considered it a bargain. I got out of the room somehow, not in the most graceful style, I am afraid—and went home to ruminate on my dismissal.

"If Marjory Cheswick had not been an heiresss!"

That was the cry of my bruised heart during all the weary days and weeks that followed. Somehow I could not divest myself of the idea that Marjory had confounded me with the herd of fortune-hunters that had always surrounded her. There was no help for it now, however. Ah, no help for it!

"Charley's going thin—I hope he isn't going into a decline," said my mother dubiously, shaking her head. "I wish he'd consent to a tablespoonful of cod-liver oil morning and night."

"Hang cod-liver oil!" said my father, adjusting his glasses magisterially. "Charley only needs a little change. What do you say to a run on the Continent, my boy, eh?"

"Indeed, dad, I don't need any relaxation. I would rather remain quietly at home."

My father looked at me keenly. He was a man who never changed his mind; and the upshot of the matter was that on the Continent I went. An only son is always more or less spoilt, and I belong to the class of more spoilt.

Cod-liver oil! Foreign travel! What good would they effect so long as I couldn't take a tablespoonful of Marjory Cheswick twice a day, nor carry her across the Channel with me?

Once away from home I extended my route of travel considerably, and two years crept away almost before I knew it. I had not forgotten Marjory Cheswick, and the silvery "No, sir!" was as plainly imprinted on my memory as if it had been spoken yesterday.

"Cheswick! Cheswick!" People had almost forgotten the very name in the fashionable circles whose star Marjory had once been, when I returned to my native land.

"Cheswick!" said Uncle Brownson, who knew everybody and went everywhere. "The fat old man with a daughter who had property and flirted a good deal, hey? Heard he was dead; s'pose the daughter's married and gone."

"Married and gone!" I should have liked to have knocked off Uncle Brownson's rusty old wig; but, after all, the old man wasn't to blame.

I was strolling one evening through one of the principal streets leading out of the City, when I paused a moment at a brilliantly lighted corner, where three golden balls hung over my head. There was a dead-lock among cart-wheels and screaming drivers, and I mechanically turned to look at the display in the pawnbroker's window.

Surely I could not be mistaken! I rubbed the raindrops off my eyelashes, and looked again. No—I was not mistaken.

There, among battered violins, paste diamonds, and all the incongruous medley that collects in such places, hung a green-plumed canary, straining his small throat in a pagoda of tarnished gilt wire! Marjory Cheswick's pet bird! I should have known it among all the feathered denizens of the Canary Islands! But how on earth came it there?

I hastily stepped into the shop and confronted the man behind the counter.

"That cage? It's been here these six months. Redeemed—no, of course not. Fourteen shillings we lent on that cage—'tain't that sort of person redeems things. Can't tell, I'm sure, who left it here."

I slipped a gold piece across the dingy counter with trembling hands.

"Perhaps you might ascertain, by reference to your books, if——"

"Certainly, sir—certainly," said the man, clutching at the coin, while his whole visage relaxed into smiles. "Anything to oblige a gentleman. Let me see—let—me—see! Oh, here it is! January 17, Marjory Ches—Ches——"

I caught the dog's-eared volume and eagerly read the name, followed by an address entirely new to me. It was enough. I had discovered the missing link, and before the astonished shopman had recovered his presence of mind, I was once more pressing through the rain, the mist, the darkness. The mere idea of Marjory Cheswick in want—perhaps in suffering—drove me wild!

"Does Miss Cheswick live here—Miss Marjory Cheswick?"

At any other time my fastidious senses would have revolted from the reeking atmosphere of that dismal house; now I scarcely heeded the noise and squalor.

"Artificial flower maker—upstairs—top floor—back!" growled the voice of someone behind a partially open door, and I had the satisfaction of knowing that I was being thoroughly scanned by unseen eyes belonging to the voice.

Up the narrow, creaking stairs I passed.

My heart seemed almost to stand still as I tapped at the door, beneath which I had distinguished a faint, yellow line of light.

"Come in!" responded a low voice, and I obeyed.

It was a narrow room, whose sloping roof would scarcely permit a person to stand upright in any part of it—with a rusty, fireless grate, and a table where one tallow candle faintly illuminated heaps of half-finished artificial flowers upon which bent a weary, slight figure. As my step sounded on the threshold she looked up.

Ah, how changed—how faded! Yet, how beautiful still! The same golden masses of hair, braided now, instead of hanging in curls; the same blue eyes that had haunted me for ten long years.

"Marjory! Marjory Cheswick!"

She shrank back with a low cry, covering her face with her hands. Had I sought her so long to be discouraged now?

I cannot tell how it happened, nor what we said; but the first distinct recollection I have, beyond that dizzy, uncertain moment of recognition, is of Marjory sobbing with her forehead upon my arm. My life's precious jewel! I had found her at last—my constant love had met its reward.

"Oh, Charley, the only friend who found me out in adversity—the only one whose love outlasts grief, and sad, sad troubles! And I had fancied that—that——"

"That I was a fortune-hunter? So I am dearest, and I have found a fortune in your love!"

Pshaw! What is the use of going into details? Doesn't the reader know just what happened afterwards? If he doesn't I shall be very happy to see him any evening in our bright little drawing-room, where the green canary sings just as sweetly as if he had never hung under the "three golden balls," and my beautiful wife nourishes the delusion that her husband is a sort of hero.

A hero, indeed! As though any man wouldn't have passed through twice my ordeal to win such a precious treasure.

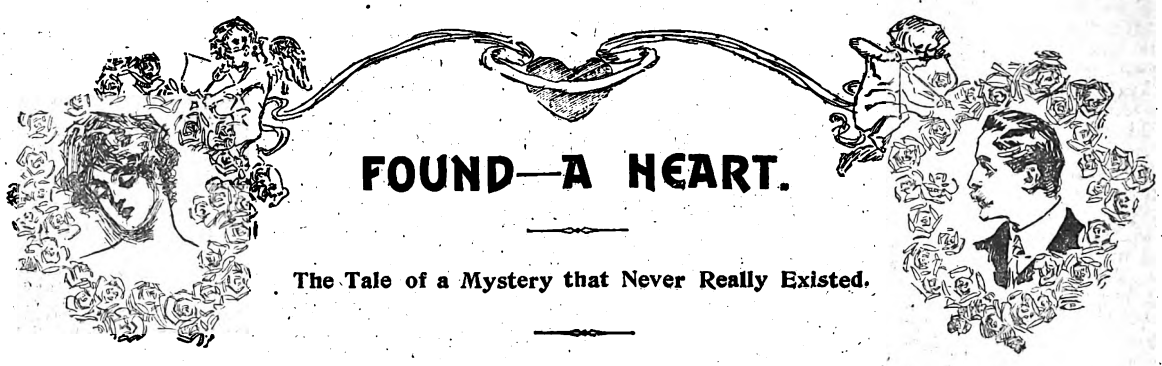
"Isn't it true, my own Marjory?"

And Marjory hides her face in her baby's neck, and says:

"Nonsense!"

Charles Malcolm.

Digitized by Google



FOUND—A HEART.

The Tale of a Mystery that Never Really Existed.

I FOUND Dolly seated on a sofa in her bedroom surrounded apparently by the whole of her worldly possessions—and they were many.

"Good gracious, Dolly," I exclaimed, as I gingerly removed a muslin dress and two hats from a chair and placed them on the already heavily laden bed. "Whatever are you doing? Preparing for a siege?"

"No," said Dolly solemnly, "I'm packing."

I looked at the motley collection and smiled.

"Why don't you take dress baskets instead of those flat things? They are much easier to pack," I said practically.

"Because," returned Dolly in disgusted accents, "I am going to stay with Aunt Dorothea and she will drive in to fetch me herself in a horrid cart, and if I arrive with a lot of luggage she fumes and scolds all the time, so I was trying to get everything in those instead, but it seems quite hopeless." And she ran her fingers distractedly through her fluffy hair, which stood out round her small face like a golden halo, and looked at me pathetically with a pair of helpless blue eyes.

Dolly Trevelyan was a spoilt child, a spoilt girl, and now that she is married to an adoring husband is more spoilt than ever.

As a child Dolly was what is called in nursery parlance "a handful," keeping the house in a fever as to what she would do next, and when she grew up and was launched into Society she developed into the most incorrigible flirt, and her unfortunate aunt lived in a state of panic that she would make some undesirable marriage, so when Dolly suddenly and unexpectedly at the end of her fourth season announced her intention of marrying the Hon. Jack Trevelyan, everybody connected with her heaved a sigh of relief.

Their engagement was a short one and lasted only six weeks, and their wedding was celebrated without a hitch. As they drove away, Miss Villiers sank into the nearest chair and said with heartfelt thankfulness in her voice:

"Thank goodness, she is safely married at last."

Personally, though I did not say so, I thought Jack far too good for such a frivolous little minx as Dolly, and it was with grim foreboding as to the future that I departed for a long visit to America. It was a year before I returned to London during which time I heard occasionally of the Trevelyans and their movements, and no hint of any pranks on Dolly's part reached me.

Although Jack's family is all that is to be desired and his prospects excellent, at present he is not very well off, and as Dolly has only what her aunt allows her, the young people's means are limited, so they are "economising" in a flat. When I heard this word in connection with Dolly I smiled, and now as I looked at her and her surroundings, I thought of it again and this time I laughed aloud.

Dolly looked at me reproachfully.

"I don't see anything to laugh at," she said with an injured air. "You might help me instead of sitting there laughing. What am I to do with all these things?"

I was about to offer some advice when a maid entered and asked if "the master" would be in to lunch. On receiving a negative reply she retired and I said:

"Where is Jack, Dolly?"

"Oh, I sent him out and told him not to come back to lunch. He is so big, he gets in my way when I am busy. You may stay, though," she added generously.

"Thank you," I answered a trifle sarcastically, "and do the packing, I suppose?"

"Well, you might help," she said. "I shall never get finished. I have to catch the four o'clock train, and it is nearly lunch time now, and I have done absolutely nothing."

"What are you going to travel in?" I asked.

Dolly looked puzzled.

"What a fortunate thing you thought of that," she said, "I had forgotten all about it, and the dress I want to wear, I think, is down at the very bottom of that"—and she pointed to one of the boxes—"I can't go like this, can I?"

As "this" consisted of a frilled dressing jacket and a silk petticoat, I told her not to be silly rather impatiently.

"Well, it must all come out again, I suppose," she said, getting lazily up from the sofa and, kneeling down on the floor, she began to drag out the contents of the box.

"Dolly, Dolly, really you are making an awful lot of trouble and crumpling everything disgracefully—you ought to be ashamed of yourself," I cried.

Dolly stopped and laughed.

"I can't pack," she said, "it's no use. Warren must do it."

"Don't talk nonsense," I said crossly. "Of course you can pack as well as anybody else, only you won't take the trouble. Here, get up and let me do it."

For once in her life Dolly obeyed with alacrity, and, returning to her seat on the sofa, she watched me as I gradually reduced the room to order—putting in desultory remarks and instructions from time to time.

As I gathered up the things that were flung on the floor, a flat leather case dropped out of the folds of a skirt and fell down. I made a movement to pick it up, but Dolly suddenly sprang at it and snatched it away before I could reach it.

"Never mind that," she said hastily, "I will put that in my dressing case."

I looked at her in some surprise—the usually cool, nonchalant Dolly looked flushed and excited as she hastily put the case into a drawer. Naturally my suspicions were roused by her evident desire to prevent me seeing what the case contained, and a hundred ideas immediately flashed through my mind. Dolly had always been a terrible flirt, and, of course, it was not unlikely that she would continue to be so even though she was married, for no one had ever given Dolly credit for much affection for anyone except herself and her own whims. And if my fears were correct, did Jack know? Poor Jack, whose devotion to his wife had been the subject of many remarks among his friends—in all probability he was quite ignorant, and I shuddered to think what would be the result when he did find out, as, of course, he would.

I determined at all costs to wring the truth from Dolly and find out whose portrait it was that she kept concealed among her things—for I felt sure that the case contained a portrait. At any rate I might be able to say something which would make her pause and think before she broke Jack's heart.

Digitized by Google

"Heartless, wicked little flirt," I said to myself indignantly, and then aloud, with all the sternness I could put into my voice:

"Dolly, whose portrait is in that case?"

"Why should you think there is a portrait in that case," she answered, "and if there is, I don't see that it is any business of yours. You should not be inquisitive."

"I am not inquisitive," I replied, swallowing my annoyance at her insolence. "But I know how thoughtless you are, and I am afraid that it is some man's portrait that you don't wish me to see—and I really do think, Dolly——"

"I don't see why you should jump to the conclusion that it is a man," said Dolly, two wicked dimples forming at the corners of her mouth, "it might be auntie's, or yours, or——"

"Don't talk nonsense, Dolly, you know perfectly well that it is neither your aunt's nor mine—now, confess, is it not a man?"

"Well, since you are so positive about it—yes."

And to my horror a distinct blush crept up into her cheeks and over her neck.

"Then let me see it."

"Certainly not, I should not think of doing so," she said in a tone of great decision.

I began to feel desperate.

"Dolly, have you thought seriously of what you are doing—of what trouble you are going into—suppose Jack were to find out——"

"Perhaps he knows already," put in Dolly.

"Then it is worse than ever, and I insist on your telling me how far this affair has gone—you have only been married a year, and yet already you have got tired of Jack—and—Dolly, I don't know what to say to you—how can you have the face to stand there and smile—you must be absolutely heartless."

"Really," she said coolly, "you are getting very excited about it. I shall begin to think you take a very great interest in Jack if you take his happiness so much to heart."

It was my turn to blush now, for inadvertently she had hit rather close to the mark. She saw her advantage at once and continued:

"Jack and I are quite old enough to take care of ourselves and our own affairs without any help or interference from outsiders, I should think."

"Dolly, I wish you would tell me how far this affair has gone. Is it really serious or only play?"

"It is really serious, very serious," answered Dolly gravely. "The most serious affair that has ever happened to me, and it has gone so far that it is quite impossible to ever draw back."

I made a movement to pick the object up, but Dolly suddenly snatched it away.

With a horrified exclamation I made a movement to open the drawer, but Dolly put her hand on it.

"I did not mean you to know about it," she said, "but since you are so anxious and have found out so much, perhaps it might be as well if you knew more—I always carry that case with me wherever I go, and I do not intend ever to part with it—I shall be buried with it—so that no one else shall ever be able to touch it—if I show it to you will you promise never to breathe a word to anyone—not to auntie, Jack, or anyone?"

"Very well, I promise, but I think you are doing very wrong, Dolly."

"Do you?" said Dolly with a curious little smile as she unlocked the case with a tiny golden key that hung on her chain amongst a lot of charms. Then she put it into my hands.

They trembled a little as I took it from her and raised the lid. Then a stifled exclamation fell from my lips.

Smiling up at me with the brave, honest eyes I knew so well, was an exquisitely painted miniature of Jack Trevelyan.

"Well," said Dolly, "go on with the lecture."

"Dolly—I—I don't understand. Why should you make all this mystery about it?"

"There is no mystery at all—I simply did not want you to see the portrait because no one but myself ever does. You made the mystery yourself by your beastly suspicions——"

She took the case away from me and looked at the picture.

"My Jack," she said softly, and in a voice that I had never heard before. Then she raised her head and looked at me—all in a moment something had come into it which changed her from a frivolous little Society butterfly as I knew her, into a woman who could love and suffer as deeply as the gravest of us—and I realised that I need have no further anxiety on Jack's account—Dolly would not break his heart for she had found her own.

For a few minutes we stood looking at one another, then, as usual, she was the first to speak.

"Now that you have found out my secret perhaps you will be satisfied. It is odd that you should never have considered it possible that I might possess a heart and a conscience as well as you yourself—and that I might love—my husband."

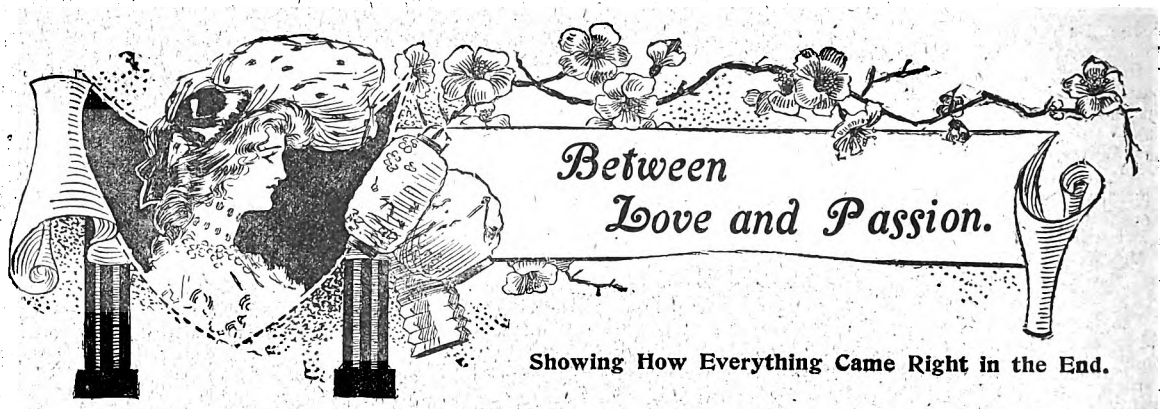
"I beg your pardon, Dolly," I said meekly. "I have misjudged you horribly, but I shall be wiser in future."

Dolly shut the case with a snap and returned to her normal light-hearted manner.

"Do you know," she said with a laugh, "I would have married Jack if he had been a chimney-sweep, and you know how I loathe smuts. And now let's get on with the packing."

B. M. Studdy.

Digitized by Google



Between Love and Passion.

Showing How Everything Came Right in the End.

My earliest recollections—the saddest and the happiest memories of my life—are centred round the little church of St. Clement's.

My father, who was rector of St. Clement's, died when I was a baby, and five years later my mother married a rich widower with one child, a boy.

Guy Vernon was three years older than I, but he had few playmates of his own age in the quiet little village in which we lived, so we became close friends and constant companions.

Many an hour we spent together in the old graveyard, deciphering the quaint, half-obliterated inscriptions on the moss-grown stones. We were full of the strange fancies and queer conceits of children who are much alone, and in our ways we were rather sober and old-fashioned, as such youngsters are apt to be.

The silence and the gravity of those earlier years always clung to me, but Guy lost much of his when he went to college, and mingled with the world. As for me, I stayed at home, as women used to do, and sometimes I felt myself akin to the fungous growth on the old stones.

We were very fond of each other, Guy and I; we quite forgot for years that we were not brother and sister. But, after awhile, Guy went away to college, and, when he came back, it was different. I began to have admirers, and I mentally compared them all with Guy—greatly to their disadvantage. He had his flirtations, too, I suppose; but I don't think they were ever anything more than the merest flirtations.

Mamma died just before Guy first left home, so papa—as I always called Mr. Vernon—and I were left alone in the big house all through the long, dull winters. The little church was my greatest consolation then; I spent hours there, playing on the organ.

Guy always came home during vacation, and we were very happy together. He was my constant attendant at the various mild festivities, such as picnics and garden-parties, with which the neighbourhood was gay, and days when nothing was going on we would stroll over to St. Clement's, and he would sit and watch me while I played the organ, or talk to me in the intervals when my fingers rested on the keys.

It was a very quiet courtship, if courtship it could be called, for we never said one word about loving each other—never uttered any pledges. But at last Guy began to see that this was what his father wanted, and it aroused all that strange obstinacy which seems to be a part of human nature. I did not blame him, for I, too, resented the calm appropriation of myself, the complacent taking for granted, which Mr. Vernon made too evident.

At last Guy came home permanently to assist his father in the management of his various business interests. The health of Mr. Vernon had been breaking for some time, and I felt very anxious about him.

I don't think Guy saw it so clearly as I—men seldom do see things as quickly as women; but I thought Mr. Vernon perceived it himself. At any rate, he handed over most of his affairs to Guy's superintendence, and I fancied that he had even hinted to his son his wish to see us married while he lived.

The only effect of all this, of course, was to widen the breach between us—that is, if you can call it a breach. It was hardly a coolness, either—simply that difference which only lovers can feel; nor was Guy altogether to blame for it. I knew I had altered, too; but I could not help it.

In the autumn it was decided that some landed interests of Mr. Vernon's in Ireland demanded immediate personal attention, so Guy made his preparations for departure.

Then, somehow, things returned to their former condition between us, and I was very happy, even though he was going away and had not yet said one word of love to me. I felt the difference—that was enough for the present; I was quite content to let the future take care of itself.

Guy went away in the evening, immediately after dinner, so I had to relinquish the hope I had secretly cherished of driving him to the station. He stood, all ready for departure, by the library fire, exchanging a few parting words with us, while he waited for the carriage to arrive.

"It's too bad you have to go, my boy," said Mr. Vernon, in a deprecating tone.

"Oh, I don't mind—it won't be so very bad; you know, I have some pleasant acquaintances there."

"Well, don't let them persuade you to stay too long," answered my step-father, glancing furtively at me. "Are there any fascinating ladies among them?"

"I believe not," responded Guy, laughingly.

"I should think you would be able to finish your business before Michaelmas," continued Mr. Vernon.

"I should think so," agreed Guy. "I'll try to be back as soon after as possible." Then, glancing at his watch, he added: "It's time for me to go."

"Good-bye, my son, and God bless you!" said the old gentleman. "You may go to the door with him, Rachel, but you mustn't watch him drive away—it's bad luck."

I am not sure whether I went myself, or was led by Guy, to the wide, stone vestibule which opened on the porch.

"You must not come any further, dear; you will take cold," he said gently. Then he stooped and kissed me.

For a moment he took both my hands in his, whispering:

"You will not forget me, Rachel?"

A gust of wind blew in my face and I was alone. A branch of the tall plant at the back of me swept across my face, and the rose in my hair—I had given him the one at my throat—fell to the ground. I picked it up. and laid it away in my prayer-book. As if I could forget!

The long weeks of Guy's absence lengthened into months. Michaelmas came and passed, but he did not return. He sent us affectionate letters, saying the business was not yet settled; but I could see his father was annoyed. In February he wrote that his work was finished, but the friends with whom he was staying wanted him to remain and see a little of the country, which he had been too busy to do previously.

Mr. Vernon was angry, but he left the decision to me, and, of course, I urged Guy to stay—I had no right to call him to my side, no claim upon his duty.

Digitized by Google

In March, however, my step-father had a slight stroke of paralysis, and I summoned Guy home. He came; but the instant I saw him I knew he had changed, and then my chief anxiety was to conceal the alteration from his father, who was not, I knew, strong enough to bear any disappointment.

With Guy came his friend, Will Marston, whose home was in Glenlough, but who had been travelling in Germany during my step-brother's long absence, so that the two had seen nothing of each other.

Mr. Marston had returned just two days before Guy left, and the latter had insisted on a visit from his friend, with whom he had been very intimate during their college days.

The doctor did not think my step-father dangerously ill, nor did he recommend us to avoid society. He warned us, however, against any excitement, anxiety, or thwarting of the invalid's wishes, and knowing the one supreme desire of old Mr. Vernon, and how little probability there was of its being fulfilled, I lived in constant dread.

In spite of his friend's presence, I could see that Guy chafed under an almost uncontrollable restlessness, which he managed to hide pretty well from the two men, though not from me. Was he longing to get back to Glenlough?

Afterwards I knew he was. Of course, it was impossible for him to go; for, as his father grew better, and became more like himself, there was a good deal of business to be attended to, which had been necessarily somewhat neglected during Guy's absence and his father's illness.

Mr. Marston's presence was a great boon to both Guy and myself during those trying days, for it enabled us to avoid uncomfortable têtes-à-têtes. Besides, he was an exceedingly agreeable man, and enlivened us very much. Indeed, if I could have got rid of the miserable sensation of living over a volcano, and in momentary expectation of an explosion, I should have enjoyed the young man's society.

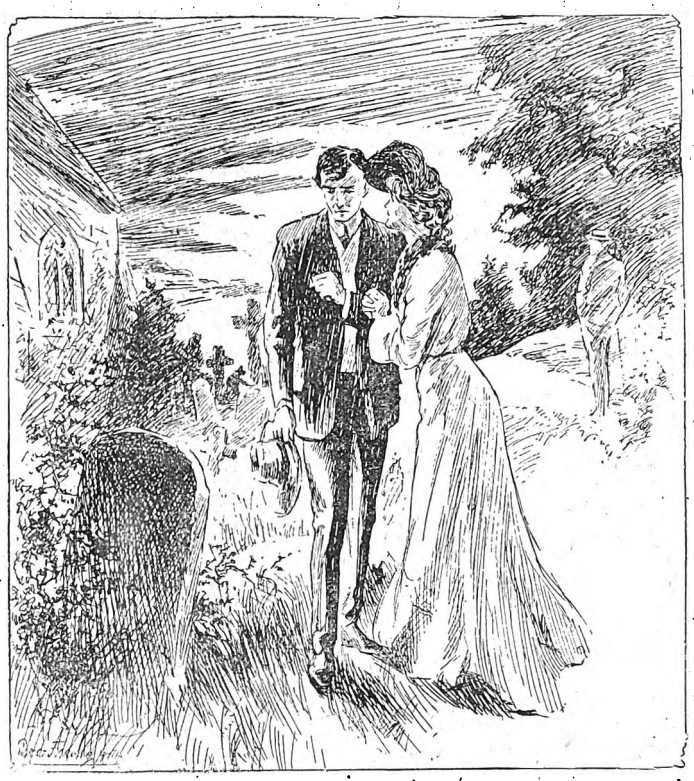
In spite of a cordial liking for his son's friend, I fancied that my step-father would have been glad to see him go; for, as his health improved, Mr. Vernon once more became anxious to see things settled between Guy and myself, and, of course, this could not be expected while the visitor remained. The invalid clearly saw that his days were numbered; and he longed, I felt sure, with what was to me a pitiable longing, to see his two nearest and dearest safely united before he left us. To die with one's heart's desire, the latest desire of life unfulfilled, seemed to me hard then—it has seemed so ever since.

If it had not been for Guy's sake I think I could have borne, to make my step-father happy, that hardest of all lots—to be the unloved wife of a husband I loved.

That Mr. Vernon had hinted to Mr. Marston his hopes and belief regarding Guy and me, was evident from some remarks the young man made a few days before his departure.

It was a perfect Spring morning, and we were walking towards an old wood that lay between us and the little church. It was a favourite walk with all three of us; but Guy had been called to attend to some important business, so we two had started off without him, he promising to join us later, if possible.

Oddly enough, that very morning's post had brought a letter in a strange hand, and, feeling that it must contain bad news, though I could not explain why, I put it in my pocket unopened. It was lying there now, and I was wondering when I should have courage to open it. You see I was peculiar.



Guy stopped before an unpretentious stone whereon was written: "Hope Anstice, aged eighteen."

To my dying day I shall never forget how beautiful the old wood looked in the soft Spring sunshine, for it never looked quite the same again.

"This is a lovely spot," said Mr. Marston, in the half-meditative, half-regretful tone one uses in speaking of a place one is soon to leave.

"Yes," I answered dreamily.

"I envy you and Guy, I believe," he went on, laughingly.

The evident coupling of our names annoyed me.

"Unfortunately, it may not always be my home," I replied with a rasped note in my voice.

"But——" began Mr. Marston, then stopped embarrassed.

"Mr. Vernon cannot live many years longer," I said sadly, "and, of course, as you know, Guy is not any real relation. Perhaps he will soon bring home a wife; but even then I could hardly stay."

"I thought there was no expectation of his bringing home a wife," replied my companion.

The young man ventured the remark rather hesitatingly, but the emphasis on the "bring" was too evident.

I frowned.

"Has Guy been taking you into his confidence? Surely I have not given you any reason to suppose such a thing?"

I tried to keep the anger out of my voice, and keep it unconcerned.

"Oh, no; but Mr. Vernon——"

"Has been telling you what he wished," I interrupted, not trying to conceal my anger now. "Unfortunately, Guy's wishes and mine do not coincide with his."

"I beg your pardon," said the young man humbly; but he gave me a side glance, and I had a wretched suspicion that he was keener sighted than most of his sex.

Of course, we talked of other things during the rest of the walk, in which, after all, Guy did not join us; but I had an unaccountable feeling that my revelation had annoyed Mr. Marston, though I could not imagine any reason why it should. I was the one to be angry.

Digitized by Google

Before we finished our stroll, however, anxiety for my step-father forced me to make a request of my companion.

"You will not mention to anyone what I have told you this morning?" I said. "It would be a great disappointment to Mr. Vernon to know it, and, coming suddenly, would be almost more than he could bear."

"Oh, certainly not," Mr. Marston made answer briefly; but I could scarcely help fancying that he disapproved of our reticence.

When we got back to the house, I went to my room, and read my letter—I might as well have all the disagreeables over in one morning.

Then I burnt it.

No one should know anything about its contents, not even Guy.

"You look tired, Miss Rachel," said Mr. Marston, at luncheon; "I'm afraid you walked too far this morning."

"Oh, no; it is only a headache," I answered smiling.

Was that all the difference it made to be heart-broken? Well, I was glad of it, for my step-father was looking at me anxiously.

I glanced over at Guy. How pale and thin he was!

In two days Mr. Marston was gone, and then I began to wonder how much longer we could temporise. Not much longer.

I was coming downstairs one morning, when I heard voices in the library. The door was ajar, and I saw my step-father sitting at his desk, speaking to good Mrs. Dent, the housekeeper, who had helped me to nurse him so faithfully during his illness.

"Send Mr. Guy to me at once," he said. "And where is Miss Rachel? I want her, too."

"Here I am," I answered gently, going into the room, while Mrs. Dent departed, looking rather scared at the unwonted severity of her employer's tone.

"I have tried to bring Guy to the point often enough—I am tired of this shilly-shallying," commenced my step-father. I trembled within me, for I knew the storm must break now. "Sit down," he continued almost impatiently.

I obeyed him, and then Guy entered. He came straight towards me.

"Please go out, Rachel," he said. "I have an important communication to make to my father."

"But I want her to stay," thundered Mr. Vernon. "Is she not your promised wife?"

"No," answered Guy sadly. "Will you go, Rachel?"

I rose at once with the words.

"When Guy has finished what he has to say, you can send for me if you want me."

Then, approaching Mr. Vernon, and obeying an irresistible impulse, I stooped to kiss the wrinkled forehead, and immediately left the room.

I went upstairs and waited, I do not know how long, but it was not very long. I opened my door and sat and listened with bursting heart and feverish anxiety for some sound.

At last it came. There was a fall and a cry.

I flew downstairs to the library. It was as I had feared—my step-father had had another stroke.

My strongest feeling was for Guy kneeling by his father's side, ghastly pale, and moaning:

"I have killed him! I have killed him!"

"Hush, Guy," I said, laying my hand gently on the poor boy's shoulder; "help me to lift him."

By this time Mrs. Dent and the servants, hearing the noise, had appeared, and I sent at once for a physician. He soon arrived, but shook his head when he looked at the sufferer.

Mr. Vernon lingered several weeks, part of the time unconscious, but clinging to his son in a way that was pitiful. It almost broke my poor darling's heart.

At last the end came, and I did my best to comfort Guy. When all was over, I tried to rouse him by calling his attention to a pile of letters he had neglected for days. He opened them mechanically, and looked at them, then he gave a low moan and gasped out:

"It seems to be my destiny to kill people, Rachel; I must go away at once."

I asked no questions, but helped him to make his preparations.

"God bless you, Rachel," he said, as he bade me "Goodbye"; "I am not worthy of your kindness."

He went to Glenlough, of course. He wrote to me affectionately from there, but he did not tell me why he stayed. So, when a widowed friend asked me to accompany her to Florence, I willingly consented. I informed Guy of my intention, and he urged me to carry it out. He did not come to see me before I went, though he sent me many kind farewell messages.

Leaving the house in care of Mrs. Dent, I put the old life behind me, and spent two happy years abroad. It was the calm after the storm. I felt that life, youthful, passionate life, was over for me. I had gone through my keenest joy, my keenest sorrow. I could never know either again; but I had won peace and content out of the struggle, and, perhaps, these were the best.

Guy did not write to me, and I was glad of it—it would only have stirred the embers of the past. I heard occasionally of him through Mrs. Dent. He was living quietly at home, alone—why, I knew. Six lines in a Tipperary paper, sent to me soon after I left England, told me.

At the end of two years' sojourn, my friend decided that she must return home. Accordingly we made our preparations.

Just before our departure I received a letter from Guy, telling me he had learnt, through Mrs. Dent, ofour intended coming, and begging us to spend a few days with him.

After a little hesitation I decided to accept the invitation if my friend were willing. I longed for a sight of the dear old house and my beloved St. Clement's, and I knew I must meet Guy some time, so I might as well get over the pain at once.

My feverish impatience during the long journey told me that the past was not as dead as I had believed it to be, but I tried to hope that a glimpse of the old things would quiet me.

When we reached our destination we found Guy waiting to receive us. He was somewhat changed—older and graver-looking—but still the same Guy to me. His greeting was cordial but not demonstrative.

Two days went by without awkwardness, thanks to my friend, who was unaware of any hidden current. Guy made himself very agreeable to her, and, when I could, I stole off by myself to spend hours filled with memories, sad and joyful, in the little churchyard.

On the third day I was sitting in the shadow of a great tree, alone with my dead, when I heard footsteps, and, looking up, saw Guy approaching. He came close to where I sat, and looked down at me sadly.

"You have a right here," he said bitterly.

I took his hand and pressed it—I could not find words to answer.

Perhaps my action emboldened him, for he went on in a less bitter tone:

"You were always very good to me, Rachel, in the old days. Will you do one thing more for me now?"

He was looking down at me and I thought I should choke—my heart had got up into my throat, and I could only answer him with a little inclination of the head.

At his next words my heart returned to its usual place and my voice came back.

"I want you and your friend to take a little journey with me; will you?"

"Yes," I answered, rising to go back to the house, and nothing more was said.

My friend was surprised when the proposition was made to her, but she readily consented; and, two days later, we were in Glenlough.

In the afternoon Mr. Marston came over to see us. He was to leave on a journey by the early evening train, and brought all his travelling paraphernalia with him.

Digitized by Google

Just as twilight began to fall, Guy asked me to take a walk. My friend declared she had a headache, and preferred to lie down, but insisted on my going; so we started, accompanied by Will Marston, prepared to take the train on leaving us. I had noticed that the railway station was beyond the church, so I was not much surprised when we turned our steps in that direction.

When we reached it, instead of going past, Guy drew my arm within his, and led me into the quiet graveyard, more quiet in the twilight stillness than ever. Mr. Marston had fallen behind, and I think we both forgot his presence for the moment.

Guy stopped before an unpretentious stone, whereon was written: "Hope Anstice, aged eighteen."

That was all.

"Rachel," he began, "I have something to say to you."

I was going to interrupt him; then I remembered that sometimes confession is almost like baptism for sin, and I simply clasped my hands pityingly over his arm.

"I don't know whether you can ever forgive me or not, dear," he went on; "but I must tell you all now. I ought to have told you long ago, but I had not the courage. Here by her grave I will confess everything.

"Once upon a time, Rachel, I believed you cared for me; perhaps I was mistaken, but that did not make my sin any the less. When I left you that night I thought we belonged to each other.

"Then I went to Glenlough, and met Hope Anstice. It was a brief and sudden passion, very unlike my love for you; it carried everything before it, and, when she told me she returned my love, but that there was a kind of engagement with a distant cousin—a sort of family affair—I begged her to put an end to all difficulties by a secret marriage.

"She consented, and the day before I went away it took place. I did not then know who this distant cousin was, but I learnt afterwards. Can you guess, Rachel? It was Will Marston."

I glanced back with a start, but Mr. Marston was strolling about some little way off, and did not seem to see us.

"Well?" I whispered, turning to Guy, who continued slowly:

"You know now why I was so changed when I came home, Rachel, and what it was I said to my father when he insisted on my asking you to marry me. It was the truth, and I could not help telling him; but the shock killed him. I was not brave enough to let you know, for I had found out my mistake; I had learnt too late the difference between love and passion. In my father's dying hours I neglected everything, even my wife, and the first news I learnt was that Hope was going into a decline. Of course, I thought it was my fault—that I killed her, too—and I hurried to her side. But the doctors said it was a foregone conclusion—an inheritance; and, indeed, she had not been very unhappy.

"When I saw her, I would have made our marriage public; but she compelled me to secrecy. That was one of the penalties I had to bear.

"'It will hurt Will,' she said, 'and he has always been the kindest friend I ever had.'

"You see, my punishment has not been light."

There was a pause, then Guy added:

"She only lived six weeks afterwards—it was what they call 'galloping consumption'; and poor Will was with her nearly all the time—she told him everything. Can you guess why I have made this confession here and now, Rachel? Can you forgive my falseness and cowardice?"

"My poor Guy, I have known this for a long time," I said gently.

He looked at me in a bewildered way, and I went on:

"Mr. Marston wrote and told her that you and I were engaged, and she sent me a letter"—I did not add "a bitter one"—"disclosing the truth."

"And you have known this all the while, my Rachel?"

For answer, I hid my face on his breast, and there, by her grave, we pledged our solemn, chastened happiness. Then I led Guy away.

"Don't you understand?" I whispered, pointing silently to Mr. Marston.

He was standing, oblivious of our presence, in the place where we had been, and I heard him murmur, as Guy and I turned away:

"She is all mine now."

Anne Chambers.

£500 IN CASH PRIZES.

CASH DOWN.	CASH DOWN.	CASH DOWN.
First Prize	Second Prize	Third Prize
£250.	£100.	£50.

AND ONE HUNDRED PRIZES OF £1 EACH.

The Editor of Pearson's Weekly is offering the above magnificent prizes for the solution of certain sets of letters which are published in that paper each week. The first list will be found in the issue dated January 21st. The coupon given in SHORT STORIES last week is also available. This competition will form a most agreeable and profitable pastime for the long winter evenings, and can be entered into by both old and young.

Everyone has an equal opportunity of winning the prizes. The first prize of £250 will be given to the competitor from whom the Editor receives the best list under the published conditions, and the other prizes will be awarded in order of merit.

Enter now for this great competition. You will find full particulars of it in the issue of Pearson's Weekly now on sale.

£500 IN CASH PRIZES.

Digitized by Google

Charming Girl!

SHE: "Why didn't you warn me you were going to kiss me?" He: "Why?" She: "I would have made it easier for you."

Two Birds with One Stone.

HE: "Will you marry me?" She: "No." He: "Then will you marry my cousin Tom? He requested me to ask you while I was about it."

A Fact.

SHE: "Yes, this is Mr. Gamboge, the artist. He is wedded to his art." He: "Judging from his appearance I should say that he didn't marry for money."

A Friend's Advice.

ENGAGED YOUTH: "Well, how am I to know whether Dora has any faults or not?" Friend: "That's easy enough. All you have to do is to ask some friend of hers who is jealous.'

All That was Left.

YOUNG TUTTER: "Did you get that box of chocolates I left here last night, Miss Clara?" Miss Pinkerly: "You left it with my younger brother, did you not?" Tutter: "Yes." Miss Pinkerly: "I got the box."

He was Proud Though Poor.

"I WANT you to understand, sir, that my pride forbids me to accept anything from you after I marry your daughter." "How are you going to live?" "Well, I thought you might make some kind of a settlement beforehand."

The Worm Turned.

"OH, Mr. Childer, you are really too young to know anything about love," said the old flirt, after she had listened to his proposal. "Yes," said Childer, smiling weakly, "but I knew you were old enough to teach me." Score even, and she never forgave him.

Silly Idiot!

HE crept stealthily to her side, and, in an agitated whisper, asked: "Can you keep a secret?" With a yearning look in her eyes, she replied: "Why, of course. You ought to know I can! What is it?" "Oh, nothing at all. I just wanted to know, you know." And as she turned away, the congealed look she gave him put ice in his veins.

She Longed to be Ashore.

"AND what are we doing now, Fred?" "Only hugging the shore, Louie, dear." "Fred,"—and she looked at him in a far-away manner—"Fred, I wish I were ashore." "Why, Louie, darling, you are not feeling ill, are you?" he asked, in a tone of alarm. Then he looked at her again, and thought he discovered a ghost of a twinkle in her downcast eyes, and the shimmer of a smile playing round the corners of her mouth. He looked once more, he was sure of it. The next moment Fred was enacting the part of the yacht, and Louie was impersonating the shore.

In Doubt.

GEORGE: "I will be a true husband to you, Mabel." Mabel: "No, George, I can't believe it. You are too good to be true."

True to Her Word.

SUE: "You said you were going to marry an artist, and now you're engaged to a dentist." Flo: "Well, isn't he an artist? He draws from real life."

He Had Expectations.

SHE: "I trust, Jack, our marriage will not be against your father's will?" Jack: "I'm sure I hope not. It would be jolly hard for us if he should change it."

The Wane of the Honeymoon.

FRIEND: "So the romance has faded already?" Young Wife: "Romance? There is nothing of the kind left, except my husband's excuses for coming home late from the club."

The Result of Short Sight.

"YOUR marriage was the result of love at first sight, wasn't it?" "Yes," replied the near-sighted friend. "I never shall forget that day. It was the only time in my life I was ever known to forget my glasses."

He was in a Terrible Plight.

BANKS: "When are they to be married?" Rivers: "Never." Banks: "Never! And why not?" Rivers: "She will not marry him until he has paid his debts, and he cannot pay his debts until she marries him." Banks: "Oh!"

He Came.

"MY love," said he, when they had just returned from their wedding trip, "if I'm not home from the club by—er—ten, love, you won't wait?" "No, dear," replied the wife of his bosom, with appalling firmness, "I'll come for you!" He was back by 9.45, sharp.

Indeed She Was.

YOUNG HUSBAND: "Now, love, which will you have—the watch, the bracelets, or the necklace?" Young Wife: "We must avoid unnecessary expense, dear. I'm sure if you buy all three the man will give you a reduction on them. I'm your own saving, economical little wifey, aren't I?"

Comforting for the Old Chap.

ELDERLY FIANCÉ: "I hope you are not impressed by the silly sentimentalists who hold that because you've been married once you ought not to marry again." Pretty Widow: "Don't let that worry you, dear. I've no such prejudice. My own dear mother was married three times, and I only hope that in all things I may follow her example."

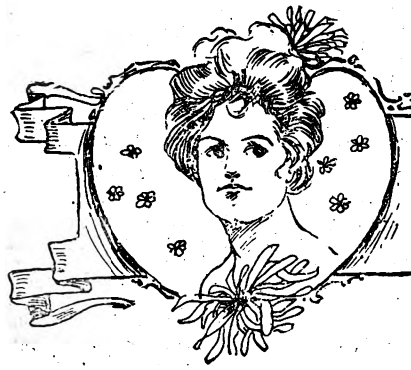
Her Reason.

HE: "I believe you cared for me the first time we ever met." She: "Why, what makes you think so?" He: "Because you kept looking at me so steadily. Every time I glanced in your direction your gaze was riveted on me." She: "Oh, but it wasn't because I had fallen in love with you. I was thinking what a pity it was there was no one near and dear to you who could tell you what wretched taste you had in neckties."

In a Dilemma.

"I HAVE come to see you, sir, on a delicate mission," said the young man. "What is it?" the old gentleman asked. "Well, sir, you have two beautiful daughters," explained the young man. "I proposed to one of them last night, and I —I——" "Which one?" interrupted the old gentleman. "Don't you know?" asked the young man aghast. "Certainly not. I've seen you with both." The young man sighed and reached for his hat. "I thought you might," he said. "I've been very attentive, and I was sometimes in doubt myself, seeing they're twins; but I got on all right till I proposed. And now—now—— Hang it all, sir, if you don't know which one accepted me, I don't! and now I've got to begin all over again!"

Digitized by Google



Unsolved Love Problems.

A Prize of One Guinea is offered to the reader who sends in the most Satisfactory Solution to the Problem. Replies should not exceed one hundred words. See "Your Editor Chats."

No. VIII.—THE DIFFICULTY OF HUGH CHESTER.

In a long chair, in the coolest of garments, with a glass of something refreshing at his elbow, Hugh Chester lay, puffing cigar smoke lazily from his lips as he dreamily gazed away from the shade of his cool verandah into the luxuriant tropical vegetation that bounded the small clearing in which his house stood on the high mountains above Colombo.

Hugh was a successful coffee-planter, and he had not become that without energy and hard work, and it was only during this hour of heat, when man and beast must rest if they would live, that he allowed himself to dream, even over the letters of the young girl who was now on her way to Ceylon to marry him.

The one he held in his hand ran as follows:

"Dear Old Hugh,—After all I am coming out by the 'Palawan' instead of the 'Somali,' which will get me out a fortnight sooner than you bargained for. I hope you will not be sorry; if you are, you will have to disguise your feelings, for I shall have started by the time you have got this. The reason I have changed my adamantine mind is that I have arranged to go out with my old friend, Kathleen Bertram, who must go by that boat to join her father. He will meet her at Colombo and take her on to Calcutta. We shall both be under the care of the captain, so you need not be anxious how I shall behave.

"You funny old thing! Why should you think I might not love you when I saw you? If you only knew what a dull, miserable life you are taking me from here! You may be sure I should find anyone charming after the loving kindness of my step-mother. And then, if you saw my clothes! Father has been quite generous. I suppose he is so delighted to get rid of the element of discord, and is anxious at the last to make up for years of miserliness. Well, you know he really has been miserly, and I have never had even decent clothes to wear before. You may imagine, therefore, how much I love you already for procuring me freedom and clothes, and even some fun, I hope.

"I'm sorry my photo will not be ready in time to send you, but I hope you will know me. If I should chance to miss you I will go straight to the house of your friend, Mrs. Grimley. That will be all right, I suppose? I am tremendously excited. No time for more.—Your ever loving, Kit."

It was more like the letter of a child going away on her first visit than that of a woman coming across the ocean to marry the man of her choice, and Hugh could not repress a feeling of disappointment that there was no hint of anything deeper, but he checked a sigh, and said half aloud:

"How ridiculous to expect her to really love me, whom she has not seen since she was a child of nine!"

And a smile came to his face as he conjured up the image of his pretty little, hot-tempered cousin throwing her doll at his head because he had suggested that her treatment of it was rather drastic for a loving mother.

Somehow he had always felt an affectionate interest in the untrained, motherless girl, so easy to lead, but so impossibe to drive; and when her father married again, and she was packed off to a boarding-school, he began a desultory correspondence with her, partly to cheer her and encourage her to work, and partly to cheat himself into the belief that he, the lonely one without father, mother, sister, or brother, had home ties in that England to which his heart still turned.

A lonely man at thirty, finding his pleasure in work, and old beyond his years by reason of his early struggle with the world, he had, after long deliberation, and in reply to miserable letters from her describing her constant quarrels with her step-mother, written her an offer of marriage, which she had accepted without a moment's hesitation. There was no need for delay, just the time for her to get the necessary outfit, and she started immediately.

Truth to say, his heart sank at times at the thought of his bold stroke for happiness, and he wondered whether he had done wisely. It was ten years since he had seen her, and beyond her school-girl letters, he knew nothing of what she might have grown into. Suppose she should find it impossible to love him? This was the thought that troubled him the most. There would be no sweet period of courtship in which he might teach her to love him; she, a mere child, would be straightway plunged into the cares and responsibilities of married life.

Then in the great stillness of the mid-day, when all the world seems sleeping, a thought came to him which made him start up with unwonted animation.

"Bravo! The very thing! I'll go and join her steamer, under an assumed name, at Aden, and make love to her till we reach Colombo. I'll see about it at once." And he summoned his bearer, and began to give him the necessary instructions about his clothes.

Under all his gravity and staidness, Hugh Chester was at heart still youthful and romantic, and the flavour of adventure and romance about this idea recommended it strongly to him, therefore it was with a light heart that he boarded the steamer at Colombo, a week later, to meet the Palawan at Aden.

The first evening that he took his seat, under the name of Hugh Chichester, at the dining-table in the huge electric-lighted saloon of the great liner, he let his eyes wander curiously amongst the guests, wondering in an amused manner if he would be able to pick out his fiancée in the crowd of ladies present; for beyond a vague remembrance of a child with a shock head of brown hair and rather light eyes, either blue or grey, he had no idea of her personal appearance, and he could not picture to himself what she might have become as a woman.

Digitized by Google

At last his eyes rested on the girl seated on his left, and a wish was immediately formed that it might be she.

She was tall and slender, with the pleasing slenderness of a girl's half-developed figure. Her face, fair and delicately tinted, was lighted by a pair of large grey eyes, with sweeping lashes, that added a mysterious depth to their colour; while the dark brown of her wavy hair gave a distinction to her appearance that was a charm in itself.

Hugh, however, sternly told himself there was only one person for him to fall in love with, and he must feel no interest in anyone till he was sure it was the right one.

Nevertheless, his heart gave a bound of joy when, as she rose from the table, the card that had marked her place fell to the ground, and he read on it, "Miss Burton." However, to make sure, he approached the captain and questioned him.

"Why, yes," he replied, "that is Miss Burton. She is under my care till we reach Colombo, where, I believe, she is to meet the man she is coming out to marry. Lucky man, I say! I wish her friend were more like her; 'pon my word, I shall be glad to hand that young lady over to her father!"

After this it did not take Hugh long to get an introduction to her, and before the next day was over they were well on the way to become friends.

The more he saw of her the more deeply Hugh fell in love with her, and the more the piquancy of the position struck him the more he congratulated himself on his lucky inspiration. As the days flew by he could see that she was far from disliking him, but he was convinced she was too unversed in these matters to see whither their friendly intercourse was leading them; and he pictured his awakening her to the true state of the case at the same time as he should reveal to her that he was her real fiancé and no stranger.

Despite, however, their intimate footing, he was always met by an invincible reserve whenever he tried to ask about her home relations and her future in India. He felt it was the one thing that made her perfect. The childish outspokenness in her letters was for him alone; for others there was a dignified reticence.

"Is that young lady a friend of yours?" he asked, when he had been on board a couple of days, as an exceedingly lively girl with merry blue eyes nodded gaily and waved her hand as she moved nearer the band with her attentive escort of chosen young men.

"Yes," replied Miss Burton, "we are old school-friends, and are now both going out to Colombo under the care of the captain."

"Oh, then she is Miss Bertram," said Hugh, without thinking, and then saw what a mistake he had made.

His companion looked at him in surprise. "Do you know her, then?" she asked.

"Oh, no," he cried hurriedly; "only I heard the captain had a Miss Burton and a Miss Bertram under his care as far as Colombo, and I guessed that must be she," and then, to turn her attention from his confusion, he added: "She seems to be having a good time," alluding to her train of young men, and her open flirtation with one of the ship's officers, which he had already noticed was the cause of much amusement to the other passengers.

Miss Burton flashed an indignant glance at him from her frank grey eyes.

"She is such a child, and has had such a dull life at home."

Hugh was pleased at her loyalty, and longed to say, "So have you, but you don't behave like that," but he recollected that she had an additional safeguard in that she was engaged, and would think it wrong to flirt. His ideas were somewhat old-fashioned.

"I beg your pardon," he replied, "I ought not to have criticised your friend's conduct, which cannot concern me. All the same, if you will excuse my saying it, as having so much more experience of the world than either of you, it would be as well if you warned your friend that she is causing remark among the passengers."

"She is going to someone who will know how to take care of her," she answered, "and I do not like discussing my friends behind their backs."

Two evenings later he was leaning over the ship's side with Miss Burton, and a silence had fallen upon them at the sight of the glorious tropical moonlight on the heaving ocean, a silence that showed an intimacy that was full of sweetness. She, feeling the balmy air laden with unspoken love, found the silence fraught with too much meaning, and said:

"Is it not beautiful?"

Hugh, however, answered with seeming irrelevance:

"To-morrow we shall be in Colombo."

For some minutes they said nothing, but at last she remarked:

"It has been a very pleasant voyage," and her voice broke over the commonplace words.

"Since Aden——" he prompted, taking her slim white hand in his, and he folded her in his arms.

Suddenly she drew herself away, stopping the very words on his lips.

"Oh, stop, Mr. Chichester, before you say one word more; I must tell you the truth about myself; I cannot keep up the deception any longer. You think I am Kit Burton. I am not. I am Kathleen Bertram."

"Good God!" cried Hugh, recoiling in horror.

"I suppose," she went on hurriedly, "you think I am very wicked to be travelling under an assumed name and telling so many lies, but it was only to please my friend Kit. Now do listen to me before you judge either of us," and she put her hand on his arm as he leant heavily on the ship's rail with averted head. His horror seemed to her rather disproportionate to her offence, yet she felt she was fighting for what was more to her than friendship.

"Kit was a dear friend of mine," she continued, "and I was delighted to hear she was going to be married and get away from her unhappy home. When we arranged to travel together she begged me to change names with her. She said she had never had any fun or freedom in her life, and was now going to be married to a man much older than herself, and she wanted to have her fling first. You must not blame her, she is such a child, and she will no doubt make him all the better wife for it. She did not want to go out labelled 'engaged,' she said, she wanted to have fun without the captain and everybody crying 'fie!' upon her. So I consented. I did not like it, but she says she has had a splendid time, the time of her life; and, after all," she added defiantly, for she began to resent his continued silence, "it has done no harm to anyone."

Hugh repressed a groan. No harm!

Then Miss Kathleen Bertram grew angry with him. What difference could it make to him? Why did he not reassure her with the words of love that she had only checked through an exaggerated idea of honour? And she cried indignantly:

"I suppose you have never got yourself into a mess through trying to oblige a friend, Mr. Chichester; and since you evidently think I have sinned past forgiveness, I will cease to trouble you with my presence. Good evening," and she sailed away with a dignity that only lasted till she reached her cabin.

Shaking off at last the icy feeling of despair that seemed to cause a physical numbness, Hugh turned and stretched out his arms to her with a gesture of love and longing, but she was gone, and he let his arms fall again to his side with a groan. What had Kit done in her wish for fun and flirting? What had he done in his romantic attempt to gain the love of his bride before they were wedded? How could he blame the girl when, after all, it was his little plot, so innocent in intention, that had turned the comedy into a tragedy?

And how was he to unravel the tangled skein? Was he bound to the young girl to whom he had practically confessed his love, and whose heart he had so successfully set himself to win, or to the light-minded little flirt who had journeyed across the ocean to marry him, and from whom he turned with a real dislike?

L. Hughes.

Digitized by Google

LORD POLLYPOD.

The Tale of a Postponed Marriage.

"Well, mum, if I had been hung for it I couldn't have helped laughing, Miss Roper was so set up about that lord. He wasn't much to look at; a slim little man, with tow-coloured whiskers; but as soon as he came along she began to feel as if the world was turned topsy-turvy.

"My Lord Pollypod was a-sayin' so and so to Maria last Sunday. My Lord Pollypod admires that flower of Maria's so much. My lord and my lord this, that, and t'other, until I was sick of it. You see, I waited at table, and showed folks their rooms, and was always doing something or other upstairs, so I knew more of it than cook and Bridget, and I took a dislike to him at once.

"He was so prim and solemn—and he took such airs, and then I did like to see Mr. Thomas Tallman go about with Miss Maria. He was a fine man if you wanted to see one, and as good as he was handsome.

"But you see, missus having come into property when her uncle, the great soap man died, got stylish, and forgot all about the Tallmans; and missus thought Maria ought to do better for herself; and when my Lord Pollypod was introduced she broke off one match and made another. I don't know how she did it; by sheer scolding and nagging, I expect. Miss Maria was awfully afraid of her mother, and she thought Mr. Tallman took his defeat too easily, as perhaps he did, and she let pride get the better of her love.

"Rich! Well, they said he was so rich that he could buy up half the country if he wanted it. It couldn't be money he was after if that was so, and if he loved her, why, that was all you could expect. And as the wedding-day came on, why, his presents showed his generosity.

"'Really, you are too generous,' I heard missus say to my lord.

"'Madam,' said he, 'these few little things are not worth mentioning between people of our wealth,' and missus laughed.

"'Certainly I have a hundred thousand pounds,' said she, 'but you must think me poor with your millions.'

"'Oh, of course not!' answered he, 'but, pray, never speak again of the few pounds I have spent; a trinket or two, a fan, some lace—bah!'

"But, really, there was a splendid bracelet—all diamonds; rings, pins. The engagement ring blazed! Such lace! Why, a queen couldn't have had finer, though poor Miss Maria hardly looked at anything.

"Every now and then some present came from a jeweller's, newer and finer than the last, and Miss Maria got paler and thinner all the while.

"At last she asked her mother if she could go down to Oakwood to see her cousin Ellen, who had a deformity in her back, poor thing, and couldn't, or wouldn't, go out much, and her mother said:

"'Yes, if you don't go to the Tallmans,' and she answered:

"'Mother, I should be ashamed to see them,' and I went with her to the station.

"'Take care of yourself, miss,' said I, as I left her in her seat in the train.

"'Nothing will happen to me, Sally,' said she. 'Things happen to those that want to live.'

"After that I hadn't much heart in helping with the wedding preparations.

"She was to come home on the fourth of the month. December it was. On the eighth the wedding was to take place. Minister was told, and company invited. Cards were out for the ceremony in church and for the reception; but, on the fourth a message came from Miss Maria. It was snowing hard, and I remember the boy shaking the snow off his hat and coat before he came into the hall. The message was this:

"'Trains stopped by the snow; cannot come to-day.'

"'Provoking!' said missus, as she read the words, and she looked worried all day. The next, and the next—the fifth and the sixth—there was no news at all. On the seventh another message came:

"'Snowing still. Impossible to come till the storm is over.'

"And on the wedding-morning another, with these words:

"'Storm over. Will come on Friday.'

"Now Wednesday was the wedding-day, and how my lord went on.

"'Postpone the marriage?' he cried. That could not be. Could he not go for her? Was it impossible? He went to the station, and found that it was. He came back in a fury, but that did no good. The church was closed. The minister went home. The guests were notified in a great hurry and my lord was in a fearful fury. He looked more than angry. He looked frightened. And it is unlucky we know to postpone a wedding.

"However, Friday came, and with it Miss Maria. She looked a little better than when she went away, and the first thing she asked was how Lord Pollypod took the delay.

"'You may have lost him by it, Maria,' said missus solemnly. 'He is in a dreadful rage.'

"Miss Maria looked as if she didn't care about his temper, and wouldn't mind his loss, but she said nothing.

"'I've sent for him,' the missus said. 'He'll come, I suppose, but the nobility are not used to such conduct.'

"'The weather behaves to suit them, I suppose,' said Miss Maria.

"And just then back came the footman.

"'My lord's compliments, and he'd drive over at once.'

"And I looked at Miss Maria and saw something in her face that made me feel like saying:

"'Oh, what is it, Miss Maria? What is it?'

"Lord Pollypod did come in less than no time; and

Digitized by Google

Miss Maria took him away into the conservatory—to explain matters, she said; she that hated so to be alone with him always. And then there came a ringing of the bell, and I went to see who it was, for though the man opened the door, I always took the card to miss or missus.

"'A bill for missus,' said Peter.

"'I should like to see Mrs. Roper,' said a young man with an envelope in his hand.

"And I showed him into the reception room, and called missus. After that ring, not one but twenty; one young man after another, one after the other, and then missus' voice, so loud that I could not help going to the door.

"'Bills for me?' I heard her say. 'I owe nothing. What does this mean? Is it a conspiracy? I've always paid cash for everything.'

"'The lady must be very forgetful,' said one of the young men.

"'Certainly we know that Mrs. Roper has always bought for cash,' said another.

"'And we liked to have an account with so rich a lady, so responsible a lady,' said a young Jewish man.

"'Perhaps if I mention that Mrs. Roper's future son-in-law, Lord Pollypod, ordered the things to be paid for to-day, Mrs. Roper will understand.'

"'Lord Pollypod!' cried missus, turning white. And she took the bills and read them aloud—bills for the rings and brooches he'd given Miss Maria; for the bracelets, the fans, the lace; bills for clothes and jewellery for himself—for everything you can think of; a bill for board at a great hotel, another for carriages and horses—all to be settled by Mrs. Roper.

"'I see how it is,' said the man from the hotel, turning to the others, 'this is a swindle, and Mrs. Roper is swindled worst of all, if her daughter is his wife. He told us, madam, that you, like many rich Americans, were glad to pay for a title in the family, and that we were to come to you the day after the wedding.'

"'Which ain't come off, thank goodness!' cried I, jumping up and down with joy.

"Just then came another ring at the bell—a gentleman, very fine and elegant, who bowed low to missus, and said:

"'Can I speak to you alone?' and offered his card.

"'LORD POLLYPOD,' was on it.

"Missus, bowing and walking into another room with him, said:

"'Lord Pollypod! I don't understand.' And he answered:

"'Madam, I fear that you have been deceived by an impostor—a servant of mine who robbed me and has travelled in this country under my name. I am George, Lord Pollypod, and the only living person who has a right to the name.'

"And then missus, with such a look, goes off into hysterics, and I see a kind of struggle in the hall, and there is the man who has called himself Lord Pollypod in the hands of the police officers.

"He had expected to be married, and off with everything three days before; and no wonder he was frightened at the delay of the wedding. But to think of how it all came about! How poor Miss Ellen, Maria's invalid cousin, who hadn't been out of the house for years, should have read in the papers at what hotel the real Lord Pollypod stopped, and that he was married, and had guessed this one was a swindler, and had got Thomas Tallman to investigate. And how Miss Maria had known it all when she came home, and had made it up with her old sweetheart, as if there had never been a quarrel. It was like a play; and I say again, I laughed heartily.

"Missus had to pay some of the bills, to be sure, but she had lots of money; and my Miss Maria is happily married to Mr. Tallman." H. Jarvis.

HER ADORER: "No, sir, it is not for the sake of your daughter's money I love her; it is on account of her sweet temper and charming manners." Her Father: "If it is not for money you wish to marry, I can let you have my niece; she has a much sweeter temper and no money whatever."

A NEW MAGAZINE.

"The Rapid Review."

EVERYONE wants to be—has to be—up to date nowadays. The man or woman who cannot talk intelligently on whatever subject his or her companions are discussing is the person who soon has no companions. As the Americans put it, he "gets left."

But the point is, that keeping well informed on topical matters takes time, takes trouble, and takes money. Few people have time or money to spare—no one goes to more trouble over anything than he can possibly help.

There is a solution of the difficulty. If you want to be thoroughly well posted up in a subject there is nothing like going to someone who knows all about it and getting him to talk to you for five minutes. He will leave you with a grasp of the whole affair which you could never possibly have attained merely by plodding through dreary yards of newspaper matter.

Why? Because he gives you only the essentials, and puts them clearly.

Now, on February 12th, the publishers of Short Stories will produce the first number of a new sixpenny magazine, THE RAPID REVIEW, which, like the well-informed friend, will give the essentials of things—of all matters of topical interest—and will give them clearly, concisely, and entertainingly.

Politics, literature, science, art, women's work and interests, country life—all these things will be found in THE RAPID REVIEW, treated in a style which will save time, money, and trouble, and which will enable you to talk intelligently on all of them.

Bright extracts will be given from all the newest books; the magazines, reviews, and periodicals "just out"—in fact, when you have read THE RAPID REVIEW you will have read all the current literature, and will know what magazines and books to buy and what not to waste money on.

Women will find a special interest in this new magazine. In the feature entitled "Women's Work and Interest" the sayings, writings, and achievements of women all the world over will be brightly chronicled, keeping women in complete and direct touch with their sisters and their sisters' advancement.

Finally, in political troubles and foreign "complications," THE RAPID REVIEW will make a point of explaining how things began, and then will put you right up to date in them.

In exactly the same fashion—the giving of bright extracts and concise essentials—will be treated the drama, music, art, country life, scientific work—everything. THE RAPID REVIEW is, in fact, a magazine which no one can possibly afford to miss.

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID SERIAL.

Dupes of Destiny

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT

By Blanche Eardley, Writer of "The Bond Between."

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS IN THIS STORY ARE:

SIR CYPRIAN RUST, who has inherited the baronetcy and estates of Sir Basil Wingate, though he is not the legal heir.

MARCELLA RUST, his daughter, a very lovely girl, who is greatly in love with

PHILIP NULLIUS, the curate of Crawley Village, where the home of Sir Cyprian, Wingate Court, is situated.

LADY VIOLET FRAYNE-LENNOX, whom Marcella believes to be her aunt. She is a very beautiful woman, and loves her niece dearly, but Sir Cyprian has, for some reason, immense power over her, which he uses to further his own ends.

EDWARD DAY is an orphan whom Lady Violet has befriended. He, however, in making unreturned love to Marcella, insults her, and Lady Violet refuses to have anything more to do with him.

CALEB J. JOHNSON, a City magnate and millionaire, who marries Lady Violet, though he knows that her husband is still alive. This husband, MAJOR RICHARD FRAYNE-LENNOX, is a good-for-nothing, who has been turned out of the Army. Lady Violet believes him dead.

TWENTY-NINTH CHAPTER.

The Writing in the Diary.

MARCELLA had not long been back in durance vile at the Court before she noticed a subtle something in the atmosphere of her father's home. Life went on just the same, with a difference, but a difference so slight, so as to be perceptible only to the most keenly sensitive nature.

Sir Cyprian was suave, courteous, and attentive as usual, but beneath the velvet glove of his polished manners Marcella knew that there lay ready for an emergency the iron hand Sir Cyprian knew so well how to wield. She had once before been brought face to face with it.

Edward Day had left the Court, and also the kindly Dr. Slade whom Marcella had liked so much; so life dragged on drearily, while she waited patiently for news of Philip Nullius.

His month's holiday was nearly over, and yet not one line had come from him—not a sign by which she might comfort herself that he was well and thinking of her.

Only one ray of comfort had she in all her secret doubts and fears. It came from her aunt, Lady Violet, who had contrived to send her a letter under cover to her maid. It had assured her of her aunt's love and devotion, and that Mr. Johnson had gone in search of her lover to bring him back in safety.

The letter had concluded with the expression of Lady Violet's constant thought and prayers for her darling's future happiness. The postscript rather puzzled her. It was: "Be careful not to wilfully annoy your father, and don't go for long rambles without your maid. Keep her always near you, wherever you are; don't be alone anywhere."

She was puzzling over the postscript one morning while turning the leaves of some book she had brought up from an old, disused cupboard. She had fancied that one or two might prove interesting. She picked up a small, old-fashioned volume, something like the neat diaries of thirty years ago; it had once had a lock and key, but the lock had long since been broken off.

She opened it curiously. The pages were stained, and a faint, old-world perfume emanated from its musty binding.

On the fly leaf was written in a dainty, effeminate hand, the words "Laura Rust."

"My mother!" Marcella murmured with a tremor in her voice. "My dear, dead mother!"

She touched the book with reverent fingers. Her girlish thoughts had always dwelt tenderly on the unknown mother.

The little jottings of every-day life were instinct with a new meaning and interest for her. They revealed the workings of a simple mind, satisfied with the solid gifts the gods gave her.

One pencilled line appealed to her passionately. It was:

"March 12th. Baby girl born. Life will begin anew for me in living for her."

"Mother—mother!" she murmured brokenly. "Had you only lived now!"

Then on through the pages of fresh maternal utterances, she came upon a line that puzzled her. It was: "Hope is killed in me—only shame and horror live! God spare my darling girl from my sorrow—shield her from learning what I have learnt. I feel at times that I cannot bear it—my brain burns and I can't think."

Digitized by Google

(continued.)

Wonderingly and fearfully, Marcella turned the pages a little further, and came upon the last notes in the diary.

As she read it, she uttered a cry of astonishment. It was:

"The end has come. They took baby from me to-day. They say she is dead. But I know that must be false. Dolly could not die and leave me!"

"Dolly!" Marcella exclaimed. "I must have had a sister then! And I was never told—oh, how cruel—how cruel! My poor, dear, sorrowful little mother!"

A sudden thought struck her. She had heard someone else speak of a child called "Dolly." Who was it?

Why—as a flash of memory returned to her—the woman in the forbidden corridor spoke of a baby called "Dolly"! How strange! She had forgotten that half-witted, gentle creature, but now all returned to her with a vivid sense of regret.

She sprang to her feet with an exclamation. As she did so there was a sound at the door, and before she could either say "Come in" or "Who's there?" it was flung open and Sir Cyprian stood on the threshold, his usually serene blue eyes fixed upon her with an expression of malicious hate.

And behind him came a tall, lean-faced man, who looked at her with a peculiar intentness that made her shrink instinctively from him.

Marcella looked in amazement from her father to the stranger with the glittering, dark eyes, whose gaze never left her face.

"Did you want me, father?" she asked slowly. "I could have joined you in the drawing-room had you sent for me; but I will go now, if you will take—your friend," with a slight emphasis on the word—"downstairs. This is hardly the place in which to receive visitors."

Sir Cyprian closed the door behind the man who had accompanied him, and it struck Marcella that something must have gone wrong with the latch, for it gave a little "click," as though the key had been turned.

"Let me introduce my friend, Dr. Winter, Marcella," her father said, ignoring her speech, and fixing his blue eyes, now so strangely cold, upon her white face. Since that day when he had brought her back to the Court, he had taken little trouble to conceal his dislike of her, even his voice, though always perfectly courteous, was chilly when he was obliged to speak to her.

Marcella bowed coldly. The face of the man with the bull-dog jaw and sinister eyes made a slight shiver run through her. She wondered to what this strange, unceremonious visit was the prelude.

"I am pleased to make Miss Rust's acquaintance," Dr. Winter said in an oily voice, which, coming from such a coarsely-built man caused Marcella to look at him in astonishment. Which was natural, she wondered, the voice or the cruel, greedy eyes?

"You have not been looking very well lately, my dear," Sir Cyprian went on, "and I thought it my duty to see a medical man about you."

"Yes," added Dr. Winter unctuously. "I can see at a glance that Miss Rust is, what shall we say—unstrung and inclined to be hysterical."

Marcella flushed angrily.

"I am perfectly well, thank you," she said curtly; "and, father," turning to Sir Cyprian, "had you desired to consult a doctor about me, I would prefer that you had asked my old friend Dr. Baxter, who has seen me before. I hate strangers."

Dr. Winter smiled, and his smile was even more oily than his voice.

"Quite so, my dear Miss Rust," he murmured, "we all hate strangers sometimes, especially when we think they will discover too much about our ailments. But I will try to take Dr. Baxter's place in your estimation."

Marcella's big brown eyes flashed haughtily as she looked at the ill-bred man before her.

"That would be impossible," she retorted. "Dr. Baxter happens to be a gentleman."

Instead of replying instantly to her, Dr. Winter looked at Sir Cyprian with a swift, interrogatory glance. His face was just a little more pasty in colour, and his beady eyes sparkled ominously.

"Come, Marcella, don't be foolish," her father interrupted quickly. "Dr. Winter is only willing to be your friend. You must not thwart him because he is not so old as Dr. Baxter. I wished for the best medical advice about you, and sent to London for it; these country doctors are no authority on illnesses like that with which you are threatened."

A little frightened at the serious tone in which her father addressed her, and somewhat ashamed of her snub, which had been received so silently, Marcella said gently:

"I am sorry I was annoyed, but you know I dislike a fuss made about my health. I am perfectly well, really; you must not think that because I don't grow rosy faced and fat that there is anything the matter with me."

Dr. Winter put out his hand. It was a white, dimpled hand, and the filbert nails were polished and well trimmed. Marcella's eyes rested on them thoughtfully.

"Let me feel your pulse, my dear," he said gently. "I am of another opinion concerning your health; but we will soon see which of us is in the right."

She drew forward the hand that had remained concealed behind her back. It still held the little diary belonging to that dead mother, whose story had touched her so keenly.

Sir Cyprian's eyes had followed her movements, and as they fell upon the book clasped in her hand his face grew suddenly ashen, and a terrified expression leapt into his blue eyes.

"Where did you get that?" he said sharply. "Give it to me!"

Marcella looked at him, startled by the sudden tone of anger in his voice.

"It is an old diary of my mother's," she faltered. "I was reading about the death of my little sister Dolly. You never told me that I had had a sister, father!" she said, reproachfully.

"Give me that book and don't talk nonsense," he answered in a shaky voice.

Something in the way he spoke made Marcella draw back her outstretched hand.

"Then since I am talking nonsense, there is no necessity for me to give up my mother's diary," she retorted. "It is mine. You could not have loved her. I have read of her sorrow between the lines she jotted down at odd intervals. My poor mother was unhappy. I know it—I feel it."

Sir Cyprian bit his lip, but the fleeting expression of terror had left his face—only his upper lip quivered.

"I don't understand, my dear child, what you are talking about," he said slowly. "That diary was a constant amusement to your mother. She used to romance in it—as you are now doing about it. Again I must request you to give it to me."

Still Marcella hesitated.

"Please let me keep it," she said in a low voice, conscious that the twinkling eyes of Dr. Winter had closely observed each gesture. "I, at least, recognise my mother's sorrow; it will be the only possession of hers that I have."

A steely look flickered in Sir Cyprian's eyes at her opposition.

"Then you don't believe me—your father?" he said coldly.

An idea suddenly seized Marcella, and she acted on it, without considering the wisdom of such a proceeding.

"I will give it to you if you promise to take me to Dolly's grave," she said quickly. "I see she died here at the Court, the diary says so, and I at least have the right to visit my own sister's grave."

Sir Cyprian was silent, then he turned to the man by his side, whose glittering eyes had never left Marcella's white, excited face.

"You hear her," he said, with a shrug of his shoulders.

Digitized by Google

"This is the way she goes on whenever anyone contradicts her or wishes her to do anything she herself does not desire. She continually worries me with these outbursts. I see she is now on the verge of one."

Marcella looked at them in surprise. She was flushed, and still angry at what she guessed instinctively to be her father's denial concerning that dear mother's sorrow, and the existence of the sister of whom she had never before heard.

Dr. Winter smiled gently. "Yes, yes," he said in a pitying tone. "I see that you have sent for me in time, Sir Cyprian. They always behave in this passionate way when opposed, and it is the usual thing for them to have hallucinations and imagine that something is being concealed."

THIRTIETH CHAPTER.

"That Way Madness Lies!"

Marcella listened to him in amazement. The audacity of speaking at her, as though she were not capable of appreciating a personal appeal, was insupportable to her proud, independent nature.

She turned to her father suddenly.

"Why do you permit that man to speak of your daughter in that way?" she demanded hotly. "Surely you will at least protect me from being insulted?"

A slow smile flickered in Sir Cyprian's eyes as he said softly:

"Dr. Winter is quite right, Marcella; you need careful nursing and guarding from all excitement; you must be a good girl, and obey those who are in authority over you. I am afraid your temper grows more and more uncontrollable every day, and the fact of your jumping to such wild conclusions about your mother proves that, as Dr. Winter says, you are suffering from a form of hallucination."

Marcella listened to him in silence, her eyes searching his face for some meaning he had not put into words. As she watched him she remembered the postcript at the bottom of Lady Violet's letter, bidding her beware of letting herself be thrown into a temper by anything that was said to her!

Had her aunt anticipated that she would be in danger of losing her temper if provoked, she wondered; and then another thought confronted her—had her father purposely brought this rude, ill-bred stranger into the house, with the object of rousing that high-spirited temper he knew her to possess?

She drew in her breath sharply as the idea took firm hold upon her, and she realised that by speaking as she had intended, she would only be playing into the hands of the man whom she had begun to fear more than anyone on earth. The man who was her father, and natural protector, but at whose very touch she recoiled as by instinct!

She raised her head, and, instead of the passion of invective and scorn Sir Cyprian and the Doctor had expected, said with a slight smile:

"Of course you know best, father. I don't feel at all ill though, and as for hallucinations, of which Dr. Winter fancies me possessed, I am afraid he is labouring under one himself in imagining me so afflicted. Perhaps, now that he has seen me, you will allow me to leave the room," she added calmly, "and if Dr. Winter is staying at the Court he will be able to watch my convalescence under his attention. I am sure he considers me an interesting case."

The delicate irony in her voice, and the steady dignity in her intelligent brown eyes, caused a dark red flush to mantle the cheeks of both men.

They were for the moment nonplussed by the sudden change in her manner and speech, having congratulated themselves upon the ingenuity with which they had roused the girl's warm blood and impulsive nature to passionate revolt and reckless denunciation of themselves.

An ugly look stole into Dr. Winter's narrow eyes as he took in the strength and pluck of the girl who could pit her wit against their cunning.

"I think it will be better if you came to a sanatorium,

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS IN THE TREATMENT OF OBESITY.

Our corpulent readers will be glad to learn how to positively lose two stone in about a month, with the greatest possible benefit in health, strength, and muscle, by a comparatively new system. It is a singular paradox that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive, and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto; yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one or two pounds daily, as the weighing-machine will prove. Thus, there is no suggestion of starvation It is an undoubted success, and the author, who has devoted years of study to the subject guarantees a noticeable reduction within twenty-four hours of commencing the treatment. This is different with other complaints, for the patient, in some cases, may go for weeks without being able to test whether the physician has rightly treated him, and may have derived no real or apparent improvement in health. Here, we repeat, the author guarantees it in twenty-four hours, the scale to be the unerring recorder. The treatment aims at the actual root of obesity, so that the superfluous fat does not return when discontinuing the treatment. It is perfectly harmless. We advise our readers to call the attention of stout friends to this, because, sincerely, we think they ought to know. For their information, we may say that on sending three penny stamps, a book entitled "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages), containing a reprint of Press notices from some hundreds of medical and other journals—British and foreign—and other interesting particulars, including the "recipe," can be had (post free) from a Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London W.C

Digitized by Google

(continued.)

Miss Rust," he said slowly. "You then would receive every attention, and a more speedy cure would be effected — mental cases always require special care."

Marcella's eyes flashed, and she bit her lips to conceal the hot torrent of angry words that rose to them. She, Marcella Rust, had been described by a low-looking man as "a mental case!" What would Lady Violet and Philip say to such a slander? At the thought of those two she loved best, she kept down her wrath, and answered sweetly:

"It is most kind of you to suggest it, Dr. Winter, but although I am sure I should, as you say, receive every attention at your hands, I prefer to stay at the Court, where, if I require it, I will ask you to attend to me."

"Come, no more nonsense of this kind, Marcella," Sir Cyprian broke in harshly, after a quick exchange of glances with Dr. Winter, who had shrugged his shoulders expressively. "What is being done is entirely for your own good. I won't have this foolish opposition—or you will regret making an enemy of me."

She looked at him coolly. "An enemy, father! Well, I am not sure that you are not right—you were also my mother's enemy!"

Sir Cyprian started as though a hand had struck him in the face, and looked at her with a white heat of passion in his eyes. Heedless of the presence of another man in the room, he strode quickly up to her, and grasped her wrist savagely.

"You dare to speak like that to me!" he hissed. "Be careful, Miss Marcella—I have let you off easily in the past—but don't go too far. In fighting me, you little fool, you dig a grave for others."

He let her go, and flung her from him. His breath was rising in short, quick gasps to his lips, and his face was livid. Marcella looked at him curiously. She did not feel the bruise on her soft, white wrist; she was too interested in watching the ungovernable rage of a man who had hitherto been the outward semblance of dignity and good breeding.

As though regretting his outburst, Sir Cyprian gave a little metallic laugh, and raised a trembling hand to his moustache.

"So you see, Marcella, it will be better for you to obey me, and do as I wish. Dr. Winter here will be your medical man, and in his care—" he paused, and a strange smile flickered across his mouth.

Dr. Winter moved closer to the shrinking girl. He also was smiling, and the expression in his eyes made Marcella's blood run cold; it was as though a creeping, slimy reptile had trailed across her hand.

"Don't touch me," she said in a loud, clear voice. "If you choose to stay here I cannot stop you—but I have at least the control of my own wishes, and I will not allow you to come near me. You hear!"

Sir Cyprian flashed a look of hate at her, as he said slowly: "I suppose your precious Aunt Violet has encouraged you to oppose me, but let me inform you, my dear child, that unless you obey my orders, and instantly do what you are told, I can make it very uncomfortable for Lady Violet.

"A certain little secret of hers is in my possession, and if you give me any further trouble, I shall consider myself free to reveal what I know, and you will have the satisfaction of feeling that it was your fault that your aunt is cut by Society. So unless you obey Dr. Winter and consent to go to a sanatorium for your health, which is all that is asked of you, I shall speak what I know."

Marcella, divided between her love for her aunt and her loathing for the man into whose care her father wished to place her, was silent.

The two men watched her curiously. How would she decide?

She opened her mouth to speak, when there came a loud, imperative knocking at the door, and the handle was turned as though whoever was outside had an urgent reason for desiring to enter.

"Who's that?" Sir Cyprian said angrily.

And to Marcella's surprise and delight she heard the voice of her own maid say:

"A telegram for Sir Cyprian—reply prepaid."

Sir Cyprian hesitated—the woman had evidently not recognised his voice. "Slip it under the door," he said, after a pause. "I will see Sir Cyprian gets it."

"But the master is in here," the woman continued, as though puzzled by the order. "I was told that he and a gentleman had come down this passage."

Marcella seized her chance. It would be awful if she heard her faithful maid going back, leaving her to the tender mercy of she knew not what.

"It's all right, Jane," she called, wrenching away the hand her father had suddenly tried to force across her mouth. "Sir Cyprian is here with his friend and myself; he will open the door, and you can then give him the telegram."

Livid with rage and baffled design, Sir Cyprian unlocked the door and flung it open.

Marcella sprang towards Jane with a hysterical laugh "Wait for me, Jane. I have finished my hunt among the old books—I—" and she shivered, "I shall not come here again."

The words on her lips trailed into a murmur as a hoarse cry from Sir Cyprian made her turn sharply to glance at him. His face was ashen, and in his eyes, which were fixed upon the orange-tinted telegraph form in his hands, was an evil look that changed the expression of his face into that of a satyr.

Then realising suddenly that the two women were staring at him curiously, he pulled himself together, and turning to the man by his side, he whispered a few words in a hurried undertone, that also had the effect of making the sickly cheeks of the doctor a yet more unhealthy hue.

Marcella sprang forward. Her father's face frightened her.

"Aunt Violet!" she gasped. "Is that telegram from her?"

Sir Cyprian looked at her as one in a dream, then with a harsh laugh he brushed past her and went quickly out of the room, followed by Dr. Winter.

Marcella stood motionless until the sound of their steps died away down the passage, then she turned to the servant, who had been looking at the unusual scene with puzzled eyes. She had been Marcella's maid for some time, and was devoted heart and soul to her young mistress.

"Tell me, Jane," and Marcella grasped the woman's arm feverishly. "Do you think that I am in any danger of going—mad?"

"Mad, miss? Why, whatever put such an idea in your head?" And Jane glanced anxiously at the tall, beautiful girl, whose face was full of fire and life.

"I don't know," Marcella answered evasively, "but I wondered whether I struck others as being the sort of person who would be likely to have hallucinations—led away by their own imaginations, you know," she explained.

"Lor' miss, what an idea to get into your head," the woman said soothingly. "There's not much like that the matter with you, though they do say"—and she paused abruptly, colouring hotly, as though conscious of having said something she could not explain.

"What do 'they' say?" Marcella demanded, with whitening lips. "You must tell me, Jane, now; if you are my friend, keep nothing from me that I should know."

"Well, miss, they do say," began the woman slowly and with evident hesitation, "that—that a relation of Sir Cyprian's did once die mad, but it was a sudden shock that brought it on, it not being inherited—so you must not think of such things, miss," she concluded, "they don't need to trouble you."

Marcella was silent. Her maid's words had frightened her more than she dared say. Suppose then that a specialist

(Continued on page 190.)

Digitized by Google

Gifts Worth £25,969

to users of Soap. You use it. Get some of the money. Save your wrappers of

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER.

THE BEST SOAP FOR ALL PURPOSES.

Equally good for Bath, Toilet, and Nursery, as well as for Household and Laundry. Made from the Purest Materials and has

THE LARGEST SALE IN THE WORLD OF ONE POUND TABLETS.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

GIGANTIC PRIZE COMPETITION

120,419 PRIZES.

FULL PARTICULARS ACCOMPANY EACH TABLET.

Send Wrappers of Watson's Matchless Cleanser, Watson s Sparkla or Watson's Nubolic Soap to

VALUE £25,969

JOSEPH WATSON & SONS LTD., WHITEHALL SOAP WORKS, LEEDS.

Every competitor in the previous competition received a prize. THOUSANDS OF COSTLY AND USEFUL ARTICLES.

Secrets of Youth.

How to have a beautiful face and figure. How to have beautiful eyes and hair. How to curl the hair naturally without curling pins or tongs. Little people can be made tall. Noses that are red or ugly shape can be cured, and looks greatly improved.

This Pretty Book will be sent FREE. Ask for "BEAUTY'S BOUDOIR." Stamp must be sent for postage. Peralia Perfumery Co. (Dept. 14) 73 Camden Street, North Shields, Eng

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

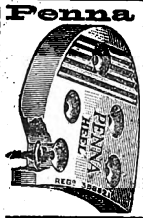
FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

Penna



Elastic Rubber Heels don't slip or splash, are up-to-date, being the Pioneer, and the heel made on purely hygienic principles to relieve the Nervous System. No rotary movement to retard progress, strain or turn the ankle. Will outwear several leather heels and save the soles from friction and wear. They are economy and comfort. Beware of clumsy imitations. Ask your Shoemaker for PENNA Heels, and see PENNA on each Heel. Ladies', 9d.; Men's, 1/3 per pair. Write for Pamphlet.—HOWISON & CO., 4 SNOW HILL, LONDON, E.C.

FREE TO YOU.

To advertise S.L.S. Records we are giving away our noted Phonographs for a limited time. Absolutely not a penny to pay for one. Write, giving full address and nearest railway station; enclose stamp. Mention this paper.

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128 CITY ROAD, LONDON.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: 'Pray send your excellent tablets directly.' Mr. Canham, 57 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Ross Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1¾d. tins everywhere.

Digitized by Google

(continued.)

like that rough-looking man, Dr. Winter, had recognised the fateful signs of that unknown relative's disease. She would be debarred from ever becoming the wife of the man she loved. She prayed that it might not be the case, for then the gates of happiness would be closed for ever!

She clutched Jane's arm anxiously. "Jane, you must always stay near me; wherever I go, you must come—you understand," she went on feverishly. "I dare not be alone. I am afraid of—of dreadful things happening that would hurt me—and perhaps others. Promise me, Jane, that you will always keep within calling distance?"

"I promise, miss," the woman murmured soothingly. "Why, here in your own father's house you are safe from everything. Don't worry, miss, I shall always be near you and then there is Lady Violet; she is just wrapped up in you, miss."

Marcella was conscious of a feeling of helplessness. She could not admit to the servant that it was in her father's house that for her the most danger lurked, and while she was surrounded by new perils, her aunt was happy in the knowledge that since Edward Day had left the Court she was free from danger. But she tried to shake off the weight of depression. She must be wary and so behave that in her conduct there could be no loophole for her enemies to seize upon.

"I want you to post a letter for me to-night, Jane," she said, after a pause. "Be very careful of it—it is important, and I do not like trusting it to the post-bag."

When her young mistress was in her own little boudoir that evening, Jane slipped downstairs with a letter in her hand.

"Poor young lady," she murmured. "I didn't like 'er asking all them questions about madness. It gave me quite a turn, it did—I hadn't the heart to tell her it was her own mother as they are saying died mad. And I pray she may never learn it—my dear Miss Marcella."

When she was beyond the gates of the Court, a shadow slipped from behind one of the stone pillars, and followed the figure of the lady's maid some distance, then, cutting across a field, the shadow waited near a rustic bridge that spanned a brook, and over which the pedestrians had to go in order to get into the village of Crawley.

Some little time later a man strolled through the gateway at the Court. He was smiling, and the expression on his face was the reverse of pleasant.

"That gave her a good shock; she will take some time to recover," he muttered. "A cold douche is not always pleasant on a chilly night." Then his hand sought his pocket and remained there.

THIRTY-FIRST CHAPTER.

On the Eve of a Discovery.

"If anyone, man or woman, who was returning home on board the Australian liner, the Asia, about twenty-five years ago, can tell advertiser anything about a woman who died among the third-class passengers, giving birth to a living child, will communicate with 'N.,' 360 Willing a handsome remuneration will be given."

The above advertisement had appeared in several leading dailies with but scant notice. People were too busy to think much about what took place among the steerage passengers a quarter of a century back.

But out of the many thousand pairs of eyes that had glanced casually at the advertisement, one pair had seen it, and, with a start, had traversed mentally the distance of time, and lived again a brief episode on board that Australian liner. Then the owner of the eyes had sat down in a humble little parlour of a shop off the Walworth Road, and painfully and with much thought, had written a note and sent it to "N.," 360 Willing.

That letter was now in the possession of the man who had inserted the advertisement. He was reading it with a cynical smile of triumph on his weak mouth, and held the half sheet of dirty paper between dainty white fingers.

"So my little bait was not dangled in vain," he sneered, lighting a cigarette and pushing away a half-finished cup of coffee. "I must pay a visit to Mrs. Robson, and see what price her valuable information will come to. I shall certainly not pay much any way—I am broke as it is."

It was now a week since Edward Day had been installed in the house of the financier, Caleb J. Johnson, as secretary, and during that time he had not once seen the man who had engaged him.

He had, in consequence, done no work of any sort except to read as much as he could glean from the Gold King's papers concerning the new mine, the "Ruby Duncoran," and his mouth had watered at the thought of so much gold passing through the hands of a man whom he contemptuously described as a "gilded bounder."

Day possessed a very fair knowledge concerning the ways of brokers and the buying and selling of shares, and had made up his mind to gradually obtain good tips from his new employer, and build up a fortune for himself.

Of the deluded chorus girl he had married in a moment of weakness, he thought no more, unless it were to revile the day her fair prettiness had lured him to commit such an error.

"I may as well hunt the old creature up," he muttered. "It probably will not result in my finding out much that is pleasant, but anyway I shall know exactly how I stand. I'm not fool enough to imagine that I shall discover myself to be the heir to a title!" he laughed bitterly. "But in spite of the drawback of birth, I shall so play my cards that I shall succeed where another man would fail.

"I am going to sound this old Johnson rotter and he may find me useful, and then reward me by leaving me half his fortune! It's a nuisance his having married that woman, Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox." And a hard glitter shone in his blue eyes. "I might have had things my own way then. But at anyrate I mean to make Miss Marcella eat humble pie for her scorn, and I fancy her father, Sir Cyprian, is not averse to correcting her himself."

He rose and surveyed himself in the glass over the mantel, with a conscious smile.

"Yes, I am certainly a beggar on horseback just now, but I mean to win the race that I've entered for. That snivelling sky-pilot, Nullius, has been cleverly disposed of in a way that reveals Marcella's father as a prince of resource; and now he is cooling his heels. I fancy that the next time I see Marcella she will have realised that 'a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush.' Then"—he laughed softly—"well, then I shall pay back a few old scores."

He arranged the carnation in his button-hole, inspected the cut of his new frock-coat, and smoothed the silk on his tall hat; then satisfied that he could in no way improve upon his appearance, he left the house in Park Lane and strolled into Piccadilly. There he took a hansom, and when the driver heard the address he looked sharply at his fashionable fare as though suspecting a joke.

"A cove like 'im to tell me to drive to the Walworth Road," he muttered. "Life's full of surprises. Anyway it's no business of mine so long as I gets my fare."

When he reached his destination, Edward Day paid the man, who looked at him curiously.

"Shall I wait, sir?"

"No, it's not necessary," he replied, then wending his way carefully through the barrows and crowds of people who thronged the pavements, he came to the address that had been given in the letter he had received.

"Ah, that's it," he murmured. "Mrs. Robson—Ladies' Clothing Bought at Reasonable Prices."

(Another long instalment of this serial next week.)

Digitized by Google

Page Woodcock's Pills

50 years' increasing British reputation has proved them to be the safe, sure and speedy remedy for Wind on the Stomach, Indigestion, Biliousness, Sick Headache, Palpitation, Depression, Nervousness, Languor, &c. Sold by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ & 2/9, or post free for price from Page Woodcock, Ltd., 14 and 16, Euston Buildings, N.W. (late of Lincoln).

PAWNBROKER'S SALE

Every article in new condition.

SUITABLE FOR PRESENTS.

A full list sent post free on application.

SAVE £ d S

13/6 Gent's magnificent 18-ct. Gold-cased Chronograph Stop Watch, jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper, 10 years' written warranty; also fashionable curb (pocket to pocket) double Albert same quality (stamped and guaranteed), with handsome seal attached; three together.

12/6 Lady's handsome 18-carat gold-cased Keyless Watch, jewelled movement; exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also fashionable long watch-guard, same quality (stamped and guaranteed) elegant West-End pattern the two together

14/9 Furs.—Magnificent Alexandra Dagmar necklet and muff; beautiful real Russian sable hair, worth 4 guineas, not been worn; sacrifice for 14/9; approval willingly.

19/6 Genuine Italian Mandoline, by Stridente, Naples; fine tone; 21 ribbed, real rosewood, pearl and tortoiseshell inlaid, in saddler-made case; approval.

21/- Fine Old Violin, by Pietro Antorious; magnificent rich solo tone; in perfect condition, with fully mounted bow and case; approval.

10/6 Lustrous diamond and ruby Half-hoop Ring, set with 5 matchless doublet rubies and 8 real diamonds; solid gold, hall-marked.

7/6 Curb Chain Bracelet, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case.

6/9 Brooch; very handsome 18-carat rolled gold, 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls in case.

21/- Lady's solid gold Keyless Watch, jewelled in 10 rubies, beautifully engraved case, splendid, time-keeper; 10 years' written warranty; week's free trial.

8/6 Fashionable Long Neck-chain; genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished; very choice design.

9/6 Organ Toned Melodeon; magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, and 4 acting stops, including Tremolo and Diapason action; rich powerful tone, perfect order.

9/6 Necklet with Heart Pendant, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern; heart set with pearls and turquoise.

12/6 Magnificent 5-row Pearl Collarette; finest quality, mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case.

Any of the above articles sent on approval willingly.

R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller, 284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

RIDER AGENTS WANTED.

One in each district to ride and exhibit a sample 1904 Cycle. Write for special offer. Highest grade fully warranted.

BRITISH MADE CYCLES.

LATEST MODELS £2 10 to £6

New Departure Coaster Hubs, Dunlop licensed Tyres, and best British-made equipment.

200 Second-hand Cycles, all makes, good as new. Great factory clearing sale at half factory prices. £1 to £2 10

We send on approval and allow ten days' free trial on every cycle. Money with carriage charges refunded without question if not perfectly satisfactory.

EARN A CYCLE taking orders from sample machine furnished by us. Our agents are making large profits. Write at once for free catalogues. Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonographs, &c., at half price.

MEAD CYCLE Co. (Dept. 44E)

85-97 Paradise St., Liverpool. 19 Charing Cross Road, London

See Page 184 for important announcement of our new publication.

CHARMS

all about them, their origin, use, power. Also health through the new Breath Force system, invaluable to the weak or ailing. Specimen copy, 4d. Publishers 'Talisman,' Harrogate

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Stores, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

If you wish to SLEEP WELL

—TAKE—

BEECHAM'S PILLS

You will SLEEP WELL,

because BEECHAM'S PILLS gently calm irritation of the Nervous system, while by their stimulative and cleansing action upon the Liver and Kidneys, Digestion proceeds with normal regularity, so that at night the tranquillised mind and body are prepared for "Nature's sweet restorer"— peaceful slumber. Should one feel restless after an exciting or convivial evening a dose of BEECHAM'S PILLS will quickly induce refreshing sleep.

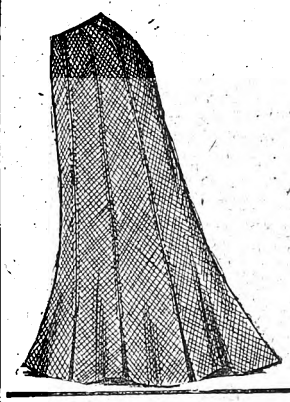
Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills), and 2/9 (168 Pills).



GIVEN AWAY

With this week's

Home Notes

(No. 525),

A PAPER PATTERN

OF THIS

WALKING SKIRT.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

Price ONE PENNY.

BORAX STARCH GLAZE

Makes Linen look like new. Imparts Enamel Gloss. Gives flexible stiffness. Prevents the iron sticking.

Sold in 1d. Packets.

Write for Free Sample, &c.,

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham.

IMPROVES ALL STARCH

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A Girl Who Doesn't Like Young Men.

"I CANNOT understand myself," writes "Q." "I see lots of young men, but I find I positively dislike them. On the other hand, I am very interested in men ten years older than myself, and find them much more attentive to me, and more fascinating than boys. What is your opinion of me, for thinking this?"

* * * * *

There are a lot of girls like you, "Q." Not every girl does care for the average young man, just as not every man cares for young girls. It is entirely a matter of temperament. If you like older men, there is no reason why your affections should not be given to one of them. Many girls marry men ten years or more older than themselves, and with very happy results. Certainly, I would not cultivate young men's society, if you dislike them. Besides, there are plenty of other girls who are different, so that we can spare one. It is just as well, though, that there are girls like you, for the sake of the old bachelors alone.

The Strange Young Man.

"RUBY" is puzzled and worried. She is in a confectioner's shop in a large provincial town. Some weeks ago, a young man, evidently a stranger, went in and bought some trifle. On the excuse of looking at other things, he stayed in the shop about twenty minutes, all the time talking to "RUBY," and trying to get intimate with her. As the proprietor was near by, "RUBY" did not dare to allow any familiarity.

* * * * *

Well, in half an hour's time, "RUBY" received a note by post-office messenger, asking her to meet the young man after she left the shop, and have tea with him. "RUBY" went, just out of curiosity, and the two got on very well together. Then the young man said he had to take the next train back to London. Without more than a short word of parting, he left "RUBY," and she has not heard a word of him since. She asks my opinion of the affair. What can the man's intention have been?

* * * * *

I think I can see through the affair, "RUBY." He was evidently a stranger in the town, and in passing the shop took a fancy to you. Just by way of amusment, I suppose, he asked you to meet him. I don't imagine he had any intentions, serious or otherwise, beyond a little harmless amusement, or you would certainly have heard from him again. I should forget all about him. But, for all you know, he may turn up again. If he does, let me know what happens. You are not the only girl who has had similar experiences. A man alone in a strange town often likes an hour or so with a chance acquaintance.

An Introduction Problem.

"I KNOW a young man by sight," writes "Muriel," "whom I should very much like to know, and I am of the opinion that he would also like to know me. You have often advised people to try and get introduced to each other by the aid of mutual friends. Now, although I first saw this young man some good time ago, since then we have come no nearer to an acquaintance. Do you think I should make the necessary overtures to get introduced, or leave it to him?

* * * * *

The latter course is, by all means, the correct one. If he is really attracted to you he will have more resources for securing an introduction to you than you to him, and, further, it is for him to make the overtures, not you. You had better wait and see whether he makes any attempts to know you, and if not, you may be sure that his feelings towards you are not so active as you imagine them to be.

Misplaced Affection.

IT seems that "Q:" has an exact opposite in "NETTY." Here is her dilemma: "I am twenty-five, but madly in love with a boy of eighteen. Of course marriage is out of the question. He returns my love, and is devoted to me. Neither of us has any means."

* * * * *

I understand your feelings, but you must control them. It is quite wrong for you to go on with such an affair, as nothing can come of it. And, later on, the boy's views are sure to alter. I cannot advise you in such a matter. It is for yourself to act as you should do, and control yourself from feelings which can only result in unhappiness.

A Changed Lover.

"RITA."—I am sorry your love affair has turned out so badly. There seems no explanation of the young man's conduct, beyond that, I fear, he has grown tired of you. From the remarks you quote, I suppose he has been hearing from other men advice against marriage and engagement, and has for a while decided to remain a bachelor. At the same time, he evidently does not wish to hurt your feelings by confessing it to you. I should wait a while and see if he alters in any way. After a time he may repent, and come back to you.

The Old Love Returns.

HERE is another phase of the "old lover" question: "MARY" and her sweetheart had quarrelled and parted three years ago. They had been very fond of each other, but the man complained that "MARY" was too sentimental for him, and did not think they would be happy together. The other day they met again. To all appearances, the old passion came back. The man was his old self, and paid "MARY" the same attentions as he used to do, and they talked of love as before.

* * * * *

Then they parted, arranging to see each other again. After a week or so, no letter came from the man. "MARY" wrote to remind him of their arrangement to meet. Again she got no answer. Then she met him in the street, and he simply raised his hat and passed on. Do I advise "MARY" to give up any hopes of a revival of the affair?

* * * * *

I do advise that. He clearly does not wish the affair to be revived. He said he found you too sentimental in the old days. Well, though on the day you met he appeared to love you as before, it is clear that on thinking the matter over he returned to his old opinion. Drop him, "MARY," as he is unprofitable to you.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"The Most Perfect Form of Cocoa."

—Guy's Hospital Gazette.

Fry's

PURE CONCENTRATED

Cocoa

"I have never tasted Cocoa that I like so well."

Sir CHAS. CAMERON, C.B., M.D.,

Ex-President of the Royal College of Surgeons, Ireland.

Ask for the

"FIVE BOYS" MILK CHOCOLATE

"Highest Standard of Purity."
A. B. GRIFFITHS, Ph.D., &c.
Analytical Chemist, London.

"Unrivalled as a Chocolate Confection."
—MEDICAL MAGAZINE.

BRITISH MILK AND BRITISH LABOUR.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE "SIRDAR" RUG-WOOL

FIRST & BEST FOR RUG & MAT MAKING
ENDLESS WEAR.
BRIGHT IN FINISH! OF SUPERIOR QUALITY!
May be had in 30 Art Shades from the principal dealers. Insist on having the "SIRDAR" & TAKE NO SUBSTITUTE.
PLAIN DIRECTIONS FOR RUG & MAT MAKING FREE.
WHOLESALE ONLY FROM HARRAP BROS BECTIVE MILLS, WAKEFIELD

REEF KNOT
REG. TRADE MARK
COMBINED
BROWNING & SEASONING.
Invaluable for GRAVIES. SOUPS. STEWS etc.
Imparts a delicious piquant flavour.
Obtainable from all the leading high class Grocers & Stores

ORDER AND BRIGHTNESS PREVAIL WHERE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH IS USED
BRITISH-ALL THROUGH.
Free from Acid, Poison & Grit.
PRODUCES QUICKLY A LASTING BRILLIANCY.
Manufts. The Matchless Metal Polish Co. Ltd. LIVERPOOL.

A TURKISH BATH AT HOME BY USING THE "IMPERIAL" FOLDING VAPOUR BATH CABINET
CLEARS THE SKIN.
Gives Health & Vigour.
CURES RHEUMATISM.
GOLD MEDAL, 1903.

SEND FOR FULL PARTICULARS TO KITCHING BROS. & CO.,
IMPERIAL WORKS, HULL.
PRICE 20/10 COMPLETE WITH STOVE.

DELICIOUS WHOLESOME PURE.
'Rothesay' Rice.

16 Gold Medals & Highest Awards
JOHN HILL & SONS
A delightful plain cake, rich and fragrant. A ½-lb. sample sent FREE on receipt of 3d.
SEND 3D.
THE 'TUDNO' CAKE.
Splendid for daily family use, of choicest quality & Genoa character. 8d. per lb.
THE "TUDNO" CAKE & BISCUIT FACTORIES, ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE.

THE BEST DRESSED MEN OF THE DAY WEAR
"OCEANIC" BOOTS
AND PAY 10/6 FOR THEM
MANUFACTORY: NORTHAMPTON.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

VALENTINE NUMBER

He handed her the fateful valentine - the death - warrant of her happiness!

No. 788.
PRICE ONE PENNY.

(A Dramatic Episode from the Story, "A Fateful Valentine." See inside.)

Week Ending
February 13, 1904.

Digitized by Google

VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE

The purest and most efficient Remedy procurable for
COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, CATARRH, WEAK LUNGS, and CHILDREN'S COUGHS.

BRONCHITIS AND ASTHMA

Veno's Lightning Cough Cure
Produces its most brilliant effect in Chronic Bronchitis and Asthma. It effects astonishing cures in the worst and most persistent cases.

Rev. W. W. TULLOCH, D.D., Bonar Bridge, Sutherlandshire, writes: "July 22nd, '03.—I have been a martyr to asthma all my life and lately to chronic winter bronchitis. I have found Veno's Lightning Cough Cure a valuable medicine."

CHILDREN'S COUGHS

Mrs. ADA S. BALLIN, 5, Agar Street, London, Editor "Womanhood," and a great authority upon children's diseases, writes:—"Veno's Lightning Cough Cure is an exceedingly successful remedy; it is very pleasant to take and the relief it gives is very rapid. The preparation is perfectly safe for children."

W. LASCELLES-SCOTT, F.R.M.S., in his Certificate of Analysis among other things says:—"I have pleasure in certifying that in my opinion VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH COUGH is an exceptionally pure, safe, and effective preparation."

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES 9½d. Regular Sizes, 1/1½ and 2/9.

Ask for VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE at Chemists and Drug Stores, or post free from the VENO DRUG CO., Hulme, Manchester, England.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache and Neuralgia.

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Kaputine is not a single crude drug such as has been condemned as dangerous by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients, having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The SAFE Remedy.

Kaputine is the only preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and infirmaries. Proof positive of its superior and sterling qualities.

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1½;

Samples 1d. each.

Kindly mention this paper.

J. G. GRAVES.

COMPLETE FURNISHING

Furnishing Requisites of every description fully illustrated and described in our No. 3 Catalogue, which we send Post Free. Special Terms of Easy Payment arranged for orders ranging from £5 to £100 and upwards. Important Advantages to Cash Purchasers.

PROFITABLE AGENCIES offered to Persons with Spare Time.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., Sheffield.

GIVEN AWAY

with next week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 527)

A PAPER PATTERN of this

JACK TAR.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY!

This Phenomenal Offer is made to the readers of "Short Stories," 13/2/1904. On receipt of Postal Order for 5/-, we will forward, Direct from our Looms to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in 30 different patterns and art colourings, to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for our goods below the actual cost of production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, thus saving the purchasers all middle profits.

OVER 200,000 SOLD DURING THE PAST 12 MONTHS.
GIVEN AWAY! GIVEN AWAY!

With every Carpet we shall Absolutely Give Away a very handsome Rug to match, or we will send 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs for 9/6.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

Thousands of Repeat Orders and Unsolicited Testimonials Received.

Illustrated Bargain Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Table Linen Curtains, &c., post free.

F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.) Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants.
WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Sale Price: 3/6 Postage 4d. extra.

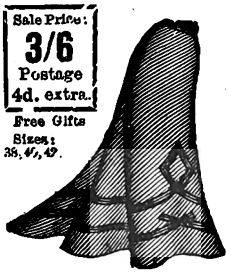
Free Gifts Sizes: 38, 40, 42.



F. HODGSON & SONS, City of Leeds, will Present

Free to every reader of Short Stories. 13/2/1904.

carriage paid, on order for 3/6, with postage, for one of Tailor Made Cloth Costume Skirts, in trimmed with mer-pings, and fitted pocket. We shall include FREE with each Skirt a Massive 18-ct. Gold Pattern Curb Bracelet, with Heart Pendant, mounted with Pearls and Turquoise, and scented with Forget-me-Nots. Cased with Pure Gold.

receipt of postal stamps 4d. extra, for our Ladies' Beautiful Serge Dress Costume Black or Navy, richly cerised silkette straps with good linenette Money willingly returned if not approved. Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Curtains, &c., post free.

Address: F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.), Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

BODLEIAN 10-2-1904 LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 789.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending February 13th, 1904.

A FATEFUL VALENTINE.

Telling of the Havoc it Wrought.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

PROBABLY no girl in the world was happier, on a certain fourteenth of February, some years ago, before the postman came, than Moyna Westwood. Indeed, she had everything in the world that could make a girl happy. Health, competence, a brave and true lover, and beauty into the bargain; youth, too, that most precious possession, the real value of which we do not know until we lose it, was hers.

Certainly no girl ever looked forward with brighter eyes and a gladder heart to the coming of the postman that morning than Moyna, and yet his coming was to bring her, though she knew it not, a year of pain and sorrow and tears, and the greatest shadow that had ever fallen upon her young, bright life. And this is the story of it all.

Moyna Westwood had been engaged, on this St. Valentine's morning, exactly three months. Her lover, Frank Tressilyan, adored her; and she was, or at least, counted herself as, the luckiest of girls in having won the love of so good and true a man. There had even been talk of an early wedding, somewhere about June or July, although Mrs. Westwood had looked somewhat askance at the choice of so early a date. But she loved her only girl, and she was very fond of Moyna's lover, and I think, but for this terrible Valentine's day, she would have given in to him, when he protested against her objections, with a very good grace indeed. But—that fateful valentine came between.

When Moyna Westwood heard the postman's knock, she ran to the door with a bright colour on her pretty face. The postman was upon the step and he handed her the fateful valentine that was the death-warrant of her happiness. No others were for her. Who else would send her valentines, now that she belonged to Frank; and this one, too, was in Frank's handwriting.

She did not open it at once. She crept away to her own room to put her lips to it, ever so tenderly, and to breathe her lover's name over it, with many a sweet and loving prefix, be assured. Then she opened the envelope. It seemed strangely thin.

A portrait and a letter fell out. Moyna Westwood picked them up with a strange tremor in her heart. She saw at a glance the letter was not in her lover's handwriting; but the photograph? It was that of her lover, standing beside a most handsome woman, who was looking up into his face with ardent admiration.

Moyna Westwood clutched at the rail of the bedstead to support herself, and looked again and yet again at the picture.

All rights reserved.]

For the moment she had forgotten the letter, which had fallen on the floor. Yes, without a doubt it was Frank Tressilyan. But who was the woman beside him?

And where was the valentine Moyna Westwood had expected from him that very morning? Was this it? If so, it seemed to her more like a cruel practical joke. But Frank would never play such a foolish, unkind trick upon her, Moyna Westwood knew. And yet it was—the address—in his own handwriting, and it was the only letter that the postman had handed her, upon the steps, that morning!

It was some time before Moyna Westwood could recover herself sufficiently to remember the letter that had fallen at her feet. Mechanically, as if in a dream, she at length stooped and picked it up. It was but brief, and in an unknown handwriting, plainly that of a woman:

"This will considerably undeceive you as to Mr. Frank Tressilyan's honour and truth, if I mistake not. The woman who is photographed with him is his wife. If you doubt this, call at 140 Guilford Street, W.C., and you shall be shown their marriage certificate." MARGARET TRESSILYAN."

Truly a fateful valentine for Moyna Westwood to receive. She stared at it amazed for some time, scarcely comprehending it. Then she thrust both letter and photograph into the envelope, not without a shudder, and put on her hat and jacket. She would go and see this woman who signed herself Margaret Tressilyan, and sift the matter to the very core. She could not cry—her sense of pride forbade that, as yet; she did not doubt her lover, and yet—the proofs of his unfaithfulness were so plain, so absolute.

The cup of happiness had been dashed from her lips in one miserable moment. The whole world had suddenly gone grey and blank for her.

When dressed, she went out and, hailing a hansom, drove straight to Guilford Street. It seemed a long journey, but Moyna Westwood was feverishly anxious to know the truth of the extraordinary story conveyed by the letter and the photograph. On the way, she looked again at the latter. It was without a doubt Frank Tressilyan's and the woman—well, to Moyna Westwood, she looked coarse and uneducated—an adventuress. She put the picture back into the envelope with something akin to a shudder. Its very touch seemed to soil her glove.

At last she reached Guilford Street, and, having dismisse the cab, rang the bell of No. 140, asking for Mrs. Tressilyan. She was ushered into a showily-furnished drawing-room. A moment later a handsome woman of thirty swept into the room, with a smile almost approaching triumph upon her face.

Digitized by Google

"You are Miss Westwood, of course?" she said.

"I am," answered Moyna with dignity.

"And you have come——?"

"I have come for an explanation of this!" Moyna held out the letter—her valentine.

"Oh!" with an unpleasant laugh—"that is very easily explained. Has not Frank told you his version?"

"I require yours first," said Moyna calmly, though she was feeling far from calm.

"Well, I didn't like to see you being made a fool of any longer, so I told him if he didn't tell you the truth, I would."

"If he didn't tell me?"

"Yes. I wrote the letter; he—Frank, my husband—addressed the envelope. Look for yourself and see."

Moyna Westwood suddenly turned sick at heart. But she strove with all her might not to show it. She dared not let this woman see she was wounded to the heart.

"I did not come here to cross-examine you," she said, after a pause; "be good enough to show me the certificate, and I will go!"

"Certainly!" retorted Margaret Tressilyan, with a gleam of vindictive light in her dark eyes. "I think you ought to thank me for my timely warning."

"That is enough. Show me your proof."

The woman took from her bosom a folded paper and laid it upon the table.

"There it is!" she exclaimed.

It was a marriage certificate, and bore the names of Margaret Vane and Francis Tressilyan. One glance sufficed for Moyna Westwood to see this. She felt that she went white to the lips, so cruel a blow was this that Fate had dealt her.

"Thank you," was all she could say.

"You are satisfied? The date was about seven years ago, the place New York."

Moyna remembered that Frank had told her he had been to America.

"Thank you," she repeated. The other woman watched her narrowly, with an evil gleam in her eyes. But Moyna Westwood was too proud to show her pain. She bowed coldly as Margaret Tressilyan rang the bell for the maid to show her out, and went away without a word.

The other woman watched her hail a hansom and drive away, from the window.

"It went home," she said triumphantly, "though she would not show it. Master Frank, that letter will prove a spoke in your wheel. I have owed you vengeance for a long time, and it looks as though I were going to pay the debt at last!"

Not until Moyna Westwood had reached home and was safely locked in her own room did she suffer herself to give way. Then the strain of the morning broke her down utterly, and she lay on her bed and wept the bitterest tears her eyes had ever shed. See him? No, never again! No explanation on his part could possibly explain away that proof that had been shown to her of his perfidy. But she would write to him.

She took off her engagement ring, and sent it back to him with a few curt words of farewell. She told her mother that her engagement was broken off, and Mrs. Westwood, seeing that she was very upset, made little or no comment, though she secretly wondered at the suddenness of the rupture and the cause of it. And then Moyna Westwood began to try to forget her lover and his faithlessness. She went out into Society, and was the gayest of the gay, except when alone. Her mother was alternately puzzled and suspicious. But knowing her daughter's pride and selfwill, she was afraid to interfere.

'Have you heard the news about Mr. Tressilyan?" remarked a mutual friend about a month later; "he has lost a lot of money and is going abroad—has gone, I hear."

Mrs. Westwood repeated this casually to her daughter, who had not been present when the remark was made, and it only elicited from Moyna a cool "indeed!"

But when alone she thought bitterly of it.

"He has had to settle the money on her," she thought, "and has gone abroad lest I should meet him." Which was a hundred thousand miles from the truth, had she only known it. But there are times when the truth is the last thing that comes to light.

While Frank Tressilyan was on the open ocean, and, later on, was trying to forget in the wilds of the States, Moyna Westwood was rapidly acquiring the reputation of a coquette. She threw herself madly into any excitement, any enjoyment that would prevent her from thinking. She gave so much apparent encouragement to two of her old lovers, that they both proposed to her, but were mortified by being unceremoniously rejected. But her gaiety was feverish, all on the surface.

At last an old family friend took her to task one day. They happened to be alone that particular afternoon, and Mrs. Vincent, who had known Moyna Westwood from babyhood, did what she had been longing and intending to do for ever so long, and spoke out boldly:

"My dear, what is wrong with you?"

Moyna looked at her in affected surprise.

"My dear Moyna, you cannot deceive an old woman like me. What does all this mean? Tell me the truth. For the last three or four months you have not been Moyna Westwood, but somebody else. Now, I am too fond of you to let you go on in this way. Tell me the truth."

Moyna Westwood broke into a flood of bitter tears, and Mrs. Vincent's arms were round her in a moment. In that motherly refuge, Moyna sobbed out her story.

"It is wicked, it is wrong of me, but I care for him still!" she moaned.

Mrs. Vincent caressed and comforted her.

"I don't believe it!" she exclaimed; "I don't believe Frank Tressilyan capable of such baseness."

"But I saw the photograph and the marriage certificate."

"Why did you not see him and give him a chance of explaining?"

"How could I? And how could he ever explain? No. It is true. If it had not been true, he would have insisted upon seeing me."

Poor Mrs. Vincent was puzzled. Truly, it did look very black against Frank Tressilyan. He had called to say "Goodbye" before going away, but from motives of delicacy Mrs. Vincent had not spoken to him of his broken engagement. Now she felt that she almost wished she had.

"I am glad you have told me, dear. I am going to think over this problem of yours. Even now I don't believe Frank could be such a scoundrel—excuse me, but it is the only word, if it is true. But I won't believe it!" she said stoutly.

"We go away next week," said Moyna; "I am glad. I am sick of London."

"Get the roses back to your pretty cheeks while you are away, and I will try and ferret out this mystery," said Mrs. Vincent cheerfully. And Moyna Westwood went home feeling brighter and happier than she had done for months.

But the problem that Mrs. Vincent had set herself utterly baffled her all the summer, though the more she thought of it the less she believed in Frank Tressilyan's baseness. She called at 140 Guilford Street, only to learn that Mrs. Tressilyan had gone abroad. So had Frank, thought Mrs. Vincent, with something like a sigh for poor Moyna.

"It can't be true!" she said to herself. She wrote often and cheerfully to Moyna, to whom her letters were a godsend. They seemed to act as a tonic, almost as efficient on one as change of air and sea breezes.

When the end of September came Moyna returned to London. Her first visit was to Mrs. Vincent.

"Just in time," she exclaimed, "and how much better you look. I am just going to call on the Marstons, and you can come with me."

Moyna was nothing loth, so they started, Mrs. Vincent pouring all the latest gossip into her ears as they went.

Digitized by Google

Ushered into Mrs. Marston's pretty drawing-room, they found it crowded, and a buzz of talk was in progress. Moyna, separated from her chaperon, presently found herself in a corner near the window, with leisure to look at the crowd. Almost the first face her eyes fell upon was that of Frank Tressilyan!

Yet was it her old lover? He looked across at her without the faintest sign of recognition. Moyna's heart almost stood still.

It beat again, however, when, five minutes later, her hostess brought Frank Tressilyan over to her and presented him.

"Mr. Francis Tressilyan. Not Frank, you know, but Francis."

"Frank is my cousin," said Francis Tressilyan, in a pleasant voice. To his stupefaction and Mrs. Marston's utter astonishment, Moyna Westwood threw up her arms with a wild shriek and fell fainting to the floor.

In a second all was confusion, but Francis Tressilyan picked her up in his strong arms and carried her into an ante-room. When he returned, a moment later, he came face to face with Mrs. Vincent, hurrying to Moyna.

"Frank Tressilyan!" she exclaimed.

"No. Francis!" said that perplexed individual.

"Don't go," cried Mrs. Vincent; "I must speak to you. I must." The truth had flashed upon her in a moment. "It is most important. Forgive me, but I will see you as soon as I have seen Moyna."

Bewildered and puzzled, Francis Tressilyan hardly knew what to do. Mrs. Vincent was a perfect stranger to him, but the name she had applied to the girl who had fainted at sight of him, and whom he had carried to the ante-room, seemed to awaken a dim recollection in his mind. He felt he had heard it before.

In a few minutes Mrs. Vincent came back.

"She is all right now. It was the sudden shock of seeing you."

"But, madam, pardon me, I have never met Miss Westwood before."

"You are Frank Tressilyan?"

"No. His cousin Francis."

Mrs. Vincent almost wrung her hands. But luckily the greater part of the guests had gone, so that her impetuous gestures were not noticed.

"Forgive me, Mr. Tressilyan," she exclaimed, "but are you married?" The abrupt question so startled Francis Tressilyan that he hesitated.

"Oh, I can see it all!" cried Mrs. Vincent, before he had time to reply. Then she sank into a chair, and she afterwards confessed that she never felt so much like going into hysterics in her life. Remembering Moyna, she pulled herself together with an effort.

"Will you sit down and listen?" she said, and Francis Tressilyan sat down. "Miss Moyna Westwood was engaged to your cousin——"

"Oh!" exclaimed her companion; "now I remember that quaint name of hers."

"Yes — yes — but let me speak! Last February she received a photograph and a letter—it was on St. Valentine's Day—and the letter was signed 'Margaret Tressilyan'——"

"Margaret!" exclaimed Francis.

"And the photograph was one of two people side by side—Margaret herself and Moyna Westwood's lover."

"No," said Francis Tressilyan, quietly; "it was myself."

"Then you are——"

"I was Margaret's husband."

"Was?"

"Yes. She died in South Africa a month ago.

"But the letter—the letter. It told Moyna Westwood that Frank had deceived her."

"It was not true. But had you only known her as well as I knew her, the woman who called herself Margaret Vane, you would not have been surprised for one moment at any act of villainy she committed. Let me tell you one thing. She had a hatred, a deep and bitter hatred, of my cousin, because he tried to prevent my marrying her; and she knew it. I was wild and headstrong, and would not listen to him until too late. I soon found out my mistake. But when Frank succeeded in separating me from a woman who was—forgive me for speaking ill of the dead—dragging me to ruin, she never forgave him."

"And so this——"

"This was her revenge—clever—to separate him from the woman he loved."

"How alike you are!" said Mrs. Vincent, after a long pause. She hardly knew what to say. Everything now to her was as clear as could be.

"But how was it that Frank never came to see Miss Westwood, to explain?"

"Moyna herself confessed to me," said Mrs. Vincent, "that she simply wrote and told him she never wanted to see him again."

"But surely——" began Francis Tressilyan.

"I think I can tell you," said Moyna from the door. The drawing-room was now quite empty, save for the three, Mrs. Marston having, with the tact of a woman of the world, withdrawn. Francis sprang to his feet.

"Miss Westwood, can you ever forgive me?"

"I have nothing to forgive anyone, except myself," said Moyna quietly. "I have heard all you have said, and had I had more belief in—in Frank—I should have spared myself this—this——"

But she could say no more. Francis Tressilyan gave her a chair and walked to the window. He remembered how his cousin Frank had spoken to him, long ago, of the charming girl with whom he had fallen in love, and he recollected the pretty, quaint name. Presently he returned to the seat he had left.

"Miss Westwood," he said, "let me do all I can to make amends for this terrible trouble."

"Forgive me," interposed Mrs. Vincent, "but did your late wife ever go to see your cousin?"

"Yes. To my knowledge she used to go to him when I was away from England, to obtain money that I sent her, and——"

Moyna Westwood sprang to her feet.

"I see it all!" she cried. "She was there on the eve of last St. Valentine, and in some way changed the letters, so that, instead of receiving one from Frank, her own came to me in his addressed envelope."

There was a moment's dead silence.

"She was capable of anything!" said Francis Tressilyan.

"Oh, I see it all so clearly!" continued Moyna, "but cannot put it together."

"Come home and we will think it out," said Mrs. Vincent.

"But Frank—where is he?"

"That is my affair," said Frank's cousin quietly. "I will have him in London before a month is over, or my name is not what it is!"

* * * * *

There is little more to tell. Francis Tressilyan was as good as his word, and before a month was over Moyna Westwood was in her lover's arms once more. His explanation was simple. He had written to her on St. Valentine's Eve, saying that he had lost a large part of his income, and should she—Moyna—decline to see him again, he should understand that their engagement was at an end. He could not ask her to marry a poor man. Before posting the letter, Margaret Tressilyan had called upon him at his chambers, and had presumably—and there was but little doubt of this—changed the contents—an artistic valentine and Frank's letter—for the photograph and her own vengeful epistle.

* * * * *

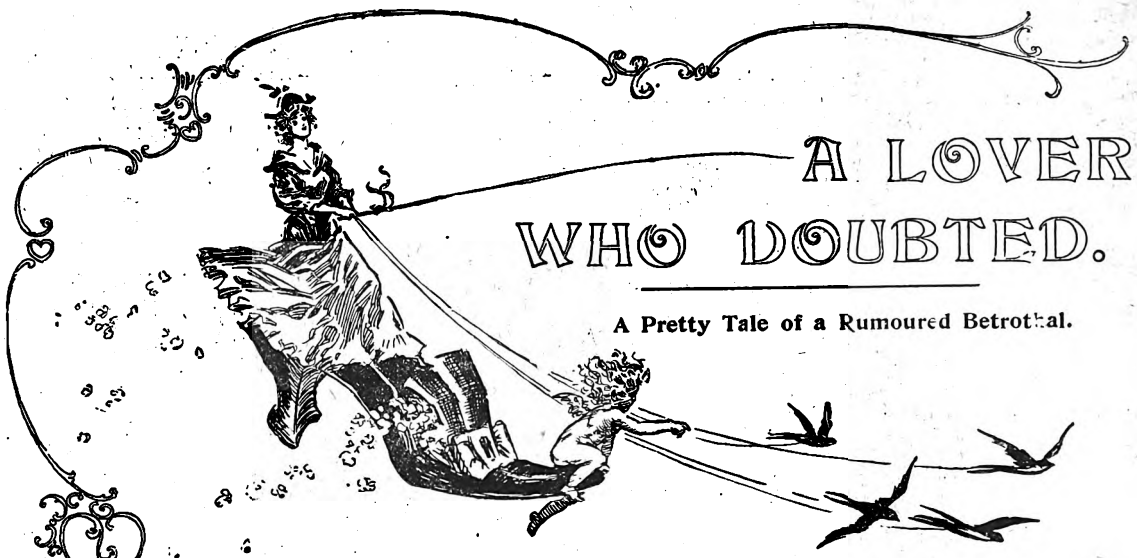
"When shall it be, dear?" said Frank, a few weeks later. "May I fix the date?"

Moyna only blushed, and clasped her lover's hand in her own.

"Silence gives consent, so I fix it for the fourteenth of February," said he. And with a tender kiss he sealed it.

Clifton Bingham.

Digitized by Google



A LOVER WHO DOUBTED.

A Pretty Tale of a Rumoured Betrothal.

"WRITE to me sometimes, Nan," Gladwyn said. "You know time will not pass so quickly with me as it will with you, Nan, dearest."

"Oh, I will," she answered. "That is, if you don't demand long letters. I never can write a long letter properly, but notes or postcards, now?"—she smiled a question into his eyes.

"Oh, postcards!" Gladwyn objected. "Make it notes, Nan, as short as you please, only put them inside envelopes."

"I'll remember—that is, I'll try. Oh, the train's moving! John, you must get off. Good-bye!"

"Good-bye, dear, and good-bye, Mrs. Wentworth," he grasped a hand of each. "God bring you safely and happily home again." The train steamed off, Nan waving her handkerchief from the window. He answered from the platform by a wave and lift of his hat, then turned squarely about and walked towards the place where a carriage stood waiting.

"Home!" he bade the driver, as he entered and settled himself amongst the cushions, which still bore a hint of the perfume Nan so dearly loved. A rosebud from her bouquet, broken off at the stem, lay on the carpet at his feet. He caught it up and crushed it against his lips, then, bowed forward with his face in his hands, he sat without moving until the opening of the carriage door aroused him.

He straightened himself with a start and stared at the man's mildly wondering face.

"We're home, sir," he heard.

"Oh, yes. Thank you, Brooks," John said, and alighted at once. As he mounted the steps on his way into the house he held one hand closely shut at his side. In it was Nan's rosebud.

Most of you know what a house is like when you go into it after it has been emptied of the presence that filled it with life and delight.

It is as if all that made it a goodly and pleasant thing had been carried dead out across the threshold; there is an unearthly stillness and vastness there, and the unearthly loneliness as well, which strikes you like a breath of pain as you enter.

John went slowly down the great entrance hall towards his own study door. He dared not look to right or left.

It seemed to him that at any instant one of those closed doors might open and show him a white, girlish shape on the threshold, or a step might sound on the shallow, polished stair and Nan's mocking laughter ring down to him as it had so often rung.

The study was the only place in the whole house which had not changed in his brief absence from it. He put his hat and gloves aside, and sat down in his revolving chair.

The morning had but fairly begun, as he could see from the little gilt clock on the mantelpiece. Beside the clock was a recent photograph of Nan, which she had placed there herself upon one of her infrequent visits hither. Upon the desk before him was a tinted miniature, as nearly life-like as a picture may be. He took this in his hand and examined it closely.

How would she come back to him? With her soft eyes full of the old dreams, her mouth all sweetly innocent of kisses as a child, the old sunshine in her hair, her heart free still from the care love brings? God grant it so.

But if, indeed, it needs must be otherwise, God grant him grace to bear it like a man, such a man as only was worthy to love her.

Yesterday—surely it could be no further back than yesterday—she had stood beside him here in this very room, a little child. To-day she was a woman grown—and the room was empty of her!

But he sat here still a man, fast growing elderly, whom Fame bespoke kindly, too grave perhaps, for such a winsome gaiety as hers, yet loving and missing her, God knows how deeply.

A year! It would be short enough for her to whom enjoyment was new. The old cities—the old sights—he knew well enough how keen would be her delight in them. But he must sit quietly here at home writing the books a greedy public demanded—writing them with pen only while his heart roamed unrebuked in distant lands with her.

He put the minitaure down and opened the book which he had left off reading a few hours before. He laid the rosebud reverently across a page and closed the book upon it; then, rising, put it away upon the shelf. So had he shut the sweetly fragrant secret of his love into his life against the time when she should pluck it forth.

Next day came a note from Nan, written from the house of the friend with whom she and her mother were staying until ready to start.

"DEAR COUSIN JOHN," she wrote, "you see it's to be notes after all, not postcards, and here is the first one! Are you looking after the doggie as you should? And the birds—don't let the maid forget them. And is Mrs. Hunter looking after you? I hope your coffee is hot in the mornings and strong enough to please you. How is the book getting along?

Digitized by Google

You ought to accomplish wonders in that big, quiet house, with no such hindrances to annoy you as your naughty cousin —Nan."

The next note was inclosed in a letter of her mother's and bore the Continental post-mark. Ah, well! Her feet were on Continental soil at last. And she still had a thought for him. All that summer his heart followed her in her journeyings from the Swiss Alps to Venice's purple lagoons. Autumn found them settled for the winter in Rome. A box of such things as tourists love to gather came to him from there, and what he prized most of all was a sheaf of Roman lilies, still fairly fresh, and breathing forth exquisitely their pent-up fragrance. Once she wrote:

"Rome is lovely—better than all my dreams. It only needs one thing to be quite perfect, and that is—no, I won't tell you, though you may guess if you can. Oh, Cousin John, you should see me holding court! These young Italians and some of my own countrymen, too, pay me as much honour as if I were a queen in very truth. Already I have refused a title, and they tell me there is another at my command. It is as if I were taking part in a play."

How much of her heart was in all this John didn't know. She was surrounded by men, young, handsome, courtly, some of whom it seemed must sooner or later capture her girlish fancy.

Once he thought he would himself go to Rome. To be near her were surely better than to stay here with this gnawing suspense. Then his heart failed him.

What chance had he there—he, old and plain, and so grave among men who knew the value of a compliment, who bought favour with the golden coin of smiles and courtly graces?

No, he would stay and bear it, as he might, and when she came back—if she came back——

For days he roamed the country over with gun on his shoulder and a brace of dogs at his heels. I don't know that he shot anything, but the exercise and the keen, strong open air did him good and kept his head clear.

Two weeks before Christmas he received a box and a letter from Rome. Then began a silence that lasted until the days could be gathered into weeks. No further word came from either Nan or her mother.

One morning, as John sat lingering over his coffee and the Daily Courier, a friend, who lived on a neighbouring estate, strode in, crop in hand, just as he sprang from the big yellow hunter which the groom was holding at the door.

"No, I can't sit down," he said in answer to John's invitation. "Ah, I see you have the Daily Courier there! Seen the news from Rome? That pretty little cousin of yours is doing what she likes with Roman hearts. But they say she is fairly caught at last. Nothing like a title to win a girl's fancy. Wonder if we'll all get asked over for the wedding?"

John turned cold and white. His hand shook. Nevertheless, he managed to smooth out the sheet and read the paragraph pointed out to him. There it was in black and white. "Rumour has it that the beautiful Miss Wentworth will soon marry the young Prince di Aligheri, who has for some time been devoted to her."

After his friend had gone, John still sat on the at table. His coffee turned cold in the cup and a little slanting sunbeam wandering among the breakfast things reflected its gay gleam upon its surface. So this was the end of it all! His dream—his dear, foolish dream was over, and he was awake at last to know he must dream no more for ever. Well, if it meant happiness for her he could bear it bravely—if she loved this prince—if he loved her—ah, no man, John knew, could love her better than he himself had. Had? Did? Would so long as he lived. But why had they not written? Surely they need not fear his disapproval.

The servant came in, a little bewildered at finding him still at table. John rose.

"I fear I have kept you waiting, Margaret," he said, and went out of the room to his own study. He never knew how he got through that day. The maid came to see if he would have luncheon. "No!" "Dinner?" "No!"

"The master do look awful," she told her companions in the kitchen. "Something dreadful must have happened to make him look like that."

All night John sat at his desk staring blankly at the opposite wall. The clock on the mantelpiece, where was Nan's picture, ticked wearily on until it stopped dead. Morning came, and with it much sunshine and twittering of birds looking for their breakfast outside underneath the windows. The day was February 14th, St. Valentine's Day. John had sunk forward upon his desk; his tired head resting on his folded arms. He had fallen asleep.

The servants went about softly, wondering if the master would be as queer to-day as he was yesterday. Suddenly there was a bustle and confusion throughout the house. A cab had driven to the door and deposited two ladies, who entered the house with an air of gay mystery about them.

"Cousin John—where is he?" was demanded.

The stupefied maid pointed towards the study and stammered something. The girl left her mother to explain and give orders, and ran down the hall. Her hand grasped the brass handle tremulously. It turned, and the door slid open.

She went a little way into the room, then paused as she saw the sleeping man before her. Her finger touched her lips instinctively, and for an instant she pondered. Then her face broke into a mischievous smile, and, unwrapping something from her handkerchief, she flung it at the bowed head. It fell with a soft thud—a golden rose!

John woke. He was dazed with suffering and heavy sleep, but he saw the rose quick enough and caught it up, staring at it as if it were a fairy gift. Then a laugh rang in his ear and two hands fell on his shoulder. He wheeled round and beheld Nan, rosy above her furs, standing beside him.

"Oh, Cousin John, do you know what day this is? That's my valentine you have in your hand. I brought it all the way from Mr. Green's hothouse, wrapped in my handkerchief—it's the finest he had and worth its weight in gold. We've travelled night and day, mamma and I, to surprise you. I couldn't stand it any longer. I just had to come home and see the doggie and the birds and—and—you, of course, you dear old, stupid Cousin John. Aren't you glad to see me? Now tell me!" Her eyes laughed into his.

He caught her by the arms and held her close.

"The prince!" he demanded sternly.

She hung her head.

"Oh, you've heard that wretched story. I didn't mean you should, that is—oh, Cousin John, it wasn't true, not a word of it. I never cared for him, and I—I begged mamma to bring me home. That's all."

"And enough," John said. A great light broke over his face. He drew her down on his knee and laid her head on his shoulder and bent his over it. She was crying.

"And you've come home to me," he said, in an odd, shaky voice. "Just as I used to dream you would. Is it true—shall I believe it? Oh, Nan, my child, my darling, look in my eyes and tell me what it all means." He put his hand under her chin and tipped the sweet, shy face towards his. Her lashes slowly lifted.

"Why, don't you know?" she said. "You're such a dear old stupid, John! It just means that—that I'm your valentine!"

Constance Coniagh.

Digitized by Google

Two Lovers and a Maid.

Telling How a Valentine went to the Wrong Person.

THE guard had whistled, the train had just begun to slip away from the platform, when a young gentleman rushed up to the moving carriages, opened the first one he came to, and flung himself in, having hurled in various minor articles of luggage before him. Putting his head out of the window he shouted to a groom standing on the platform:

"Have you seen to the luggage?" Receiving an affirmative touch of the hat, he added, at the top of his voice: "Tell them I was in lots of time," and subsided into his seat. Then recollecting the reckless way in which hat-box, sticks, and rug had preceded his entry, he looked round the carriage with a view to collecting them, and met the gaze of a fellow-passenger, at whose feet his hat-box had rolled.

This was a girl of about seventeen, with a small, pale face, clear-cut features, and a rather large mouth, whose amused expression displayed a very white and regular set of teeth.

"I am afraid I must have startled you by my abrupt entry," said he, agreeably surprised, as he picked up his various possessions, and began to arrange them in the rack above his head; "but it was a very near thing. I ran it rather too close."

"Indeed," rejoined the young lady. "I thought I overheard you say to someone on the platform that they were to be told you were in lots of time."

"A pious fraud!" exclaimed Mr. Trevor—to give our hero his name. "To have to scramble for your seat, as I have just done, is almost worse, in my governor's eyes, than to miss the train altogether."

As neither of the travellers was at all shy, they were soon deeply immersed in conversation, in the course of which the singular coincidence was elicited that they were both bound for the same destination.

"You see," said Trevor, who, after the ice had been broken by various commonplace remarks, had begun to wax confidential, "my father thinks it is time I got through sundry examinations. So he wouldn't let me go back to college this term, but packed me off to a parson; and I've got to read hard with him for the next three months. A lively time I shall have of it, by all accounts, down in Glendale."

"Glendale!" exclaimed the young lady, "Why I am going there. How very curious!"

"Indeed!" said Trevor, thinking it might not be quite so dreary as he had at first feared. "Do you live there?"

"No; I'm only going to stay with my aunt for a few weeks. It certainly is not a very lively place. But you knew I was going there," she added suddenly, "for you have read the label on my hand-bag. I've seen you looking at it a dozen times."

"I have certainly tried to read it," said Trevor, "but I could never get my neck far enough round to see the last word. 'Miss Kate Grey, Miss Foster, The Grange,' is as far as I ever managed. I hope we shall be able to keep the carriage to ourselves till we reach our destination."

And they did have it all to themselves as far as Glendale; during which time Miss Grey told him that she was very angry at having to leave home to-day, as to-morrow was Valentine's Day, and she felt sure her sisters would open her valentines to see from whom they came, and then pretend they did it under the belief that they were addressed to themselves. Mr. Trevor sympathised with her, inwardly resolving she should have one valentine, at least, that no one should open but herself.

At last they steamed into Glendale. A prim old lady standing on the platform as they passed being identified by Miss Grey as her aunt, the young lady suggested they should shake hands in the carriage. Which they did, Trevor remarking that it wasn't going to be good-bye for long, as of course he should see her often enough during the next month. At which Miss Grey blushed, and said, "Perhaps."

On emerging on to the platform Miss Grey was at once claimed and marched off by her aunt to point out her luggage to a porter; while a tall, handsome man of about thirty, in most untidy clerical garb, introduced himself to Trevor as the Reverend Paul Vyner, remarking that he believed he was right in supposing him to be Mr. Trevor.

* * * * *

We must now say a few words in defence of our heroine, whose conduct so far may appear indiscreet. Certainly she was wrong to enter into conversation with a strange young man in a railway carriage, and very wrong to more than half-promise to meet him on some future occasion; but as we have started a paragraph in defence of her, we must do our best in her behalf.

Firstly, then, she was caught laughing at his unceremonious entry, and so, in the most innocent way, laid herself open to be addressed. Secondly, he was not only a handsome man, but evidently a gentleman. Thirdly, she was a flirt, though a very prétty and innocent one, and was very glad to meet with someone likely to relieve the monotony of a month in the country with no one to speak to but an elderly maiden aunt.

Now all this may account for her behaviour down to this point; whether it will continue to do so is for the reader to judge.

"Aunt," began Miss Grey, at lunch, "who is the rector of the parish?"

Digitized by Google

"Mr. Vyner, my dear," replied Miss Foster. "The Reverend Paul Vyner. He is a Cambridge man, and, I am told, of very good family. However, he is poor, and takes pupils. He conducts the service very badly, and is utterly useless in the parish."

"Oh! Has he any pupils just now?" inquired Miss Grey innocently.

"No, my dear," replied her aunt; "and I don't see what difference it would make to you if he had."

For Miss Foster, though a kind-hearted and good woman, was a great stickler for propriety. Her other main characteristic was that of saying disagreeable things she didn't mean, and was sorry for afterwards.

Miss Kate, having learnt all she wanted to know, now glided gently but swiftly away from the dangerous topic of young men, and being a bright, clever girl, succeeded in producing a favourable impression on her aunt.

During the afternoon she retired to unpack. In the course of this occupation she came upon a large envelope, which she took out of her trunk and balanced thoughtfully in her hand; then shook out the contents on to the dressing table and began sorting them through.

They were half-a-dozen cards, bearing the devices common to the feast of St. Valentine, which she had brought with her to dispatch from Glendale to various acquaintances.

Having selected one which seemed to suit her purpose, she wrote two lines on it in pencil, and, placing it in an envelope, directed it to:

"A. T.,
"Care of the Rev. P. Vyner,
"The Vicarage, Glendale."

For though Trevor knew her name, it being written in full on her luggage, she only knew his initials, which she could see printed on his hat-box. However, having ascertained from him that he was going to live at the vicarage, and from her aunt that the vicar's name was Paul Vyner, and that he had no other pupils just now, she felt sure that her letter, though vaguely addressed, must find the right person.

* * * * *

The next morning at the vicarage, when Mr. Trevor lounged down an hour late for breakfast, he found his future tutor in a curious state of bewilderment. "Considerably knocked out of time," commented that shrewd youth, when Mr. Vyner answered his apologies by saying in an absent way: "I believe it is only selfishness." And then perceiving by Trevor's face of astonishment that he must have said something very odd, he got up from his untouched breakfast, and went into the garden, pleading a headache.

This is what had happened.

On coming down that morning, he saw on the mantelpiece in the spot where his letters were always placed, an envelope with his name written across it. Being the most careless of men, he never noticed the "A. T." written above, so tore open the envelope, flung it behind him, and, to his surprise, found in his hands a card, bearing on it a gracefully-executed bunch of primroses, while underneath was written in a lady's hand:

"In the Spring a young man's fancy
Lightly turns to thoughts of love."

His first thought was to examine the envelope; he turned round to pick it up, but, alas! he had thrown it into the very heart of the fire, and nothing remained of it but a sheet of black ash.

After all, there would be nothing in this to account for the vicar's mental disquietude. The reception of a valentine from an unknown hand would scarcely disturb the equanimity of most young men.

But Kate's seed had fallen on fruitful ground.

It was singularly apposite (when opened by the wrong person), and chimed in so well with many of Mr. Vyner's thoughts during the last year or two, that, while the valentine in itself, or its sender, never cost him another thought, the tempest of recollections, wishes, self-reproaches, and plans for the future that it raised in him were more than he could at once allay.

The reflections that had so engrossed him at the breakfast-table, and which he was now attempting to reduce to order, by walking up and down the garden puffing furiously at a big pipe, ran briefly something like this:

"Why don't I marry? Is it, as I tell myself, because I do not wish? Because I am too poor? Because no girl would marry a slovenly object like me? Or is it because I am too selfish? Because I should have to sacrifice so much that has now become second nature to me? My bachelor's ease; my summers on the Continent; my untidy habits; and, wretch that I am, my claret and cigars? Do I do my duty here? Not a bit. I know no one intimately; I care for no one's opinion; I hate the place. With a wife, all that might be changed. A pleasant companion and a comfortable home are surely worth the surrender of a few of my special self-indulgences. I should be a better and a happier man. Besides," he thought, with a touch of selfishness on the other side of his argument, "she could do that horrid visiting; I absolutely dare not. I should resent anybody coming here and telling me I was leading a wretched and godless life. Why should anybody else be better pleased if I drop in at their cottage and tell them so? Women do that kind of thing much better than men do."

Thus the result of Miss Kate's valentine was that, for his own good and the good of his parish, the Rev. Paul Vyner decided to take unto himself a wife.

* * * * *

During the afternoon of St. Valentine's Day, Miss Grey started out for a walk, and we blush to state that she stopped the first rustic she met, and asked the way to the vicarage.

"It will amuse me to see him, and please him to see me," ruminated the young lady. "And, after all, where is the harm so long as we understand each other?"

With which very stale apology for flirtation she comforted herself, and strolled on until she came to the vicarage.

The house, a handsome, old, red-brick building, stood in extensive grounds surrounded by a high fence.

On one side, between this fence and the adjoining fields, ran a narrow lane, and down this lane Kate made her way, trying to persuade herself that she went there because it was pretty, and a likely spot to find primroses, and not because it was now possible for her to see into and be seen from the vicarage grounds.

So she dawdled listlessly down the lane, half-amused and half-angry with her own folly; at one minute wishing to see Trevor, at another, hoping she should not; poking the end of her parasol into the banks as she passed with a vague sort of idea that that was a recognised way of hunting for wild flowers.

Digitized by Google

Suddenly she was brought to a full stop by a voice right above her, inquiring if she were looking for anything.

Kate turned her eyes up, and mentally decided that she had seldom seen a handsomer man than the one now leaning over the hedge, and in whose eyes she was quick to detect no little admiration of herself.

And certainly the parson in his lawn-tennis costume was a goodly sight. Six feet high, long in the leg, broad in the shoulder, and flat in the back, his loose flannel attire displayed as much as his dilapidated clericals concealed, his personal advantages. His handsome, clean-shaven face glowing with exercise, small head, and closely-cropped, dark curls, surmounted by a shooting cap, which he had pushed back as far as was compatible with its remaining on his head at all, formed a whole that was undeniably pleasant.

But before going any further let us just account for the vicar's presence and his pupil's absence.

After lunch Mr. Vyner had suggested a game of tennis. Both being expert, they had no difficulty in keeping themselves warm, even in February, and were just playing the deciding game of a hard-fought set, when suddenly Trevor remarked:

"I say, isn't this St. Valentine's Day?"

"Yes," replied his opponent, thinking that it was the first time for ten years that he had any special reason for recollecting the date. "Yes; why?"

"Well," said Trevor, "I ought to send a valentine. I'm afraid I'm rather late about it. Where can I get one?"

"I don't know much about that kind of thing," returned the parson. "But I should say not in Glendale."

"I think Moresborough is your nearest town. How far is that off?" inquired Trevor.

"About two miles."

"Then, if you'll excuse me," said the young gentleman, turning rather red, "I think I'll run over there."

"Certainly," replied the vicar, surprised at finding himself so sympathetic.

And so it came to pass that while Mr. Trevor hurried over to Moresborough as fast as his legs could carry him, his preceptor took a stroll round the vicarage grounds, and, coming to a railing in the fence overlooking the lane, leant over it, lost in reverie.

He was startled by the apparition of a young lady strolling slowly down the lane towards him.

"Surely," said the parson, "you are a little too early; they don't blossom till May."

Then seeing by Kate's extreme discomfiture that she was meditating a hasty retreat, he deceitfully added:

"At least most of them. Of course there might be a few early ones about, but they are rather difficult to find. I'll come and help you hunt for them, if I may."

The next minute he was on the path by her side, looking rather ashamed of his own alacrity. Though of late he had abjured female society, he was not one of those unfortunate men who cannot open their mouths in a lady's presence; and in a few minutes he had set Kate at her ease by a few commonplace remarks.

A very pleasant change the vicar found it from his ordinary afternoon's employment, to saunter down a lane with a pretty and amusing girl. There was a spice of romance about the suddenness of their acquaintance that just suited his present state of mind; while the mischievous Kate almost laughed outright, when she remembered that she had come out to look for the pupil, at finding herself strolling about in a confidential manner with the tutor.

But all good things must have an end, and when they had walked to the top of the lane and back once or twice, Miss Grey said she must be going.

"I hope I shall see you again shortly," said he, as they parted. "I must make up some excuse to call upon Miss Foster." And then he leant over the gate, and watched her graceful figure to the corner in the road where she turned back and smiled.

The vicar, forgetting alike his manners and his cloth, kissed his hand to her, then bolted down the lane as hard as he could, blushing like a girl; until he was suddenly pulled up in his stride by a thought so ridiculous that it at first made him laugh, and then made him downright angry with himself for being such an idiot.

"I have decided I want a wife; why won't she do?" he thought.

On reaching the house he found Trevor just returned. He held a parcel in his hand, and asked the vicar if he had a small box that he could pack it in, as he wished to dispatch it by post.

"Come into my study," said the latter, "and we will see what we can find."

After a few minutes' rummaging about, Trevor found one to suit him. It was a small cardboard box that had lately come down from London with some fishing-tackle, and still had the vicar's address upon it. This box Trevor carried off; and placing the parcel within it, dispatched it to Miss Grey, astutely remarking to himself that "It would be a pity to scratch old Vyner's name out, as then she won't guess who it comes from; but knowing I am at the vicarage, and seeing the parson's name on the box, I shall get the credit of it."

* * * * *

It was with considerably more consternation than pleasure that, next morning, when Miss Grey opened this parcel, she found herself the possessor of a very handsome locket and chain. Never doubting that the parson was the donor, she argued that she had given him no right to take such liberty.

She grew angry with him for his want of tact; and then remembering her valentine to Trevor, and the fact that she had taken that eventful walk solely to meet him, she grew angry with herself, and was also illogical enough to be angry with him for not meeting her, or sending any answer to his missive; for which variety of reasons she avoided the side of the village on which the vicarage lay.

Trevor, not seeing or hearing anything of her, decided he had offended her by sending her presents on so short an acquaintance, and reviled his folly for so doing. But of the three Mr. Vyner's plight was the worst. That ridiculous idea of his, that Kate, if he could persuade her, would make him the very wife he wanted, would keep recurring to him. In vain he told himself he had only seen her once; in vain he tried to persuade himself that what he had seen he didn't like; he was haunted by the idea, and at the end of a day or two he made up his mind to see her again at all hazards.

Having arrived at this decision, he was prompt to act upon it. Making as an excuse a subscription for a Christmas treat to the poor children of the parish, he called the very next morning upon Miss Foster.

That good lady received him in a manner peculiarly her own.

"Good morning, Mr. Vyner," said she. "It is a very long time since I have seen you. I suppose you want some money."

Mr. Vyner explained the object of his visit as well as he could, remarking that the idea only occurred to him that very morning; that the third week in February was late for a

Digitized by Google

Christmas treat; but that he supposed children could eat cake at any time of the year.

Kindly Miss Foster told him that he was the worst clergyman both in the church and the parish she had ever met with, and then got up to fetch her cheque-book, remarking, as she went out of the room:

"That's my niece. Katie, dear, Mr. Vyner, our vicar."

There was a very embarrassing pause when they found themselves alone. Then he said blunderingly:

"You see, Miss Grey, I found an excuse."

"I hope," said Kate, "you don't mean me to believe that this children's treat exists only in your imagination, for my aunt has gone to get some money to pay for it."

"No, not exactly," said the vicar, who felt himself on rather dangerous ground.

"Because," continued the young lady, "I should not think very highly of you, if such were the case, Mr. Vyner."

Kate decided that she had seldom seen a handsomer man than the Vicar who was addressing her.

And then rapidly leaving the subject, she remarked in very chilling accents upon the state of the weather.

Mr. Vyner, who was no fool, in spite of his infatuation, was quick to perceive by Miss Grey's manner that he had not found favour in her sight, and immediately there flashed across his mind a remembrance of the parting salute he had waved to her.

Just then Miss Foster's step was heard outside. Determining to make the most of his opportunity, he bent down over her seat and said:

"Miss Grey, I owe you an apology for my conduct. At the risk of making matters worse, I'm going to beg of you to take a walk to-morrow afternoon in the lane where we met before, and I will try and remove the bad impression I fear I have made on you."

Before he could receive any reply, Miss Foster entering, handed him a cheque, and begged to know if it was enough.

The vicar, who felt heartily ashamed of this part of the business, began to stammer something about munificence, but was speedily cut short by the old lady, who said that now he had got what he wanted, he need not make himself miserable by stopping any longer out of politeness; that she herself was not amusing company; that Kate never flirted in her aunt's presence, whatever she did out of it; that doubtless his duties in the parish required his presence elsewhere, and fairly drove the poor gentleman out of the house.

The next afternoon the vicar, who was now growing old in deceit, gave Trevor a holiday, dispatched him to Moresborough on various pretences, and then went and sat on the railing, where he had first seen Kate, and smoked his pipe and waited.

He had resolved that he would fall in love with her if she would let him; and he was wondering how long she would consider he ought to cultivate her acquaintance before making any advances of that sort, when her slender figure came slowly down the road.

In another minute he was below, shaking hands with her.

"I don't think I ought to have done this," said Kate; "but as you asked me, you must not think any the worse of me for it; and"—extracting the obnoxious parcel from her pocket—"I have brought you back your very kind present."

"Done what?" said the astounded vicar.

"Brought back the chain and locket," said Kate. "I was so sorry you sent it. I have been very silly, but I never gave you the right to send me this."

"But," said Paul, turning Trevor's luckless valentine over and over in his hand, "I never sent you anything. Hallo! this box is directed to me. Why, it's that young scamp Trevor, who sent it to you; I gave him the box. How came he to send you a valentine?"

Poor Kate! This was turning the tables on her with a vengeance.

"I suppose because I sent him one first," she said defiantly.

"Well!" returned the Reverend Paul, "this is most extraordinary. I suppose you sent it by a messenger. There was only one letter delivered at the vicarage on St. Valentine's Day, and that was for me."

"Oh!" said Kate, glad to get a chance, however poor, of carrying the war a little into the enemy's country. "Is she good-looking?"

"Who?" said the vicar innocently.

"Why, the young lady who sent you the valentine."

Digitized by Google

"I haven't the least idea who sent it. I burnt the envelope without looking at either writing or post-mark. Here it is," he added, taking a crumpled piece of card from his pocket, and handing it to her.

"Why!" said Kate, "that's the valentine I sent Mr. Trevor."

"Impossible!" cried Paul; "it was addressed to me."

"No, I am sure this is it. It was addressed, 'A. T., care of the Rev. P. Vyner.' You see," said Katie, "I knew he was at the vicarage, but I didn't know his name."

"I am so sorry," began the parson. "I quite thought it was addressed to me. Indeed, I scarcely looked at the outside at all. It stood where all my letters are always placed, and I opened it, never doubting it was for me."

"I am so glad he never got it," said Kate. "I have been ashamed of myself ever since I sent it. I am afraid you must be dreadfully disgusted with me."

"I think she's very pretty," said Paul, smiling rather wickedly.

"Who?" asked Kate.

"Who! Why, the young lady that sent me the valentine, of course."

"Oh," said Kate slowly, and looking down on the ground.

Then, as if anxious to change the subject, she suddenly asked:

"What were you going to apologise to me about? As you didn't send me that thing, how did you think you had offended me?"

"I was afraid you were angry because I kissed my hand to you when we parted last time," said Paul, stammering and blushing, and scarcely knowing what he said.

"I suppose I ought to have been offended," said Kate, laughing; "but, the truth is, I did not think you quite knew what you were doing. I—I forgot all about it the next moment."

There was a minute's silence, broken suddenly by Paul:

"Kate, I may offend you in reality now, but I cannot help it. Will you forgive me? Nay, more; will you give me some answer if I ask you to be my wife?"

"Your wife!" cried Kate. "Impossible, Mr. Vyner; I know nothing of you, and what you know of me is not to my credit. You cannot mean what you say."

"Listen to me," said Paul, quite in earnest now, and catching both her hands in his. "I have loved you since the first moment I saw you; I have tried to persuade myself that it was impossible; I have laughed at my own folly, as I thought it—but all to no purpose. Kate, I love you. What chance have I of winning your love in return? Not now—I am not so foolish as to suppose you can answer me yet—but in the future."

"But I know so little of you," stammered Kate.

"That, at any rate," said Paul, who was beginning to think he should have his own way, "can easily be remedied. Suppose, for instance, we walk up and down here once or twice, and cultivate each other's acquaintance."

So they wandered up and down the lane for the rest of the afternoon. We have never learnt exactly what passed between them, but they seemed to be perfectly satisfied with each other's company.

Suddenly the tête-à-tête was broken in upon by a voice from the railing where Kate had first seen the parson.

"Hallo!" said Mr. Trevor; "I hope you two are getting on all right. Good afternoon, Miss Grey."

"Trevor, come back here," said the Reverend Paul. "I wish to give you back this from Miss Grey. Don't take offence, my boy; you must see you had no earthly right to send it."

"There's only one decent way out of this hole," said Trevor imperturbably; "and that is, that Miss Grey should keep it as a wedding-present."

And Miss Grey was graciously pleased to receive it on those terms.

Thus everything turned out all right.

Barry Lefevre.

A Stitch in Time.

Everyone knows that a stitch in time saves nine, so, readers, take warning of the old proverb, and make a note not to miss entering our coming competition. There will be thousands of persons going in for it, but do not be deterred by this fact. You have quite as good an opportunity of carrying off one of the magnificent prizes that will be offered as anyone has, for this most novel and unique of schemes will be equally interesting to all types and classes of readers. It will form a most diverting pastime to while away an idle evening, and, if you are diligent enough to win a prize, you will find you will be most handsomely rewarded. I can promise you that whilst you study the competition you will indulge in many smiles that won't come off.

To You All.

I hope you are all pleased with this, our Valentine Number. I think you will find it bears out my appreciatory remarks about it in preceding chats. This column is a very great boon to me, as in it I am able to foreshadow my future ideas for the welfare of this little paper. I know my readers take what I say in good faith, for the letters that I constantly receive tell me so. Many correspondents at the end of their epistles say, "With apologies for troubling you"; now, to all such I wish to point out that, far from being worried by your letters, I am delighted to read them, and if possible to act on their suggestions. So do not think, when you get it in your head to write to me, that I am anything but pleased to hear from you.

"Running Riddles" Competition—Result.

This competition was announced in the Christmas Number. A great number of readers entered, and many of the replies were most ingenious. After very careful scrutiny of all the attempts, it has been decided to award the prize of £2 to

William Vickers,
26 Hythe Park Road,
Staines,

whose answers were decidedly clever.

The Five Hand Cameras, with complete Photographic Outfit, are won by Miss A. Arthur, Greengairs, Airdrie, N.B.; W. C. Hodsdon, Mill Rise, Church Road, Teddington; Mrs. Henrietta Suffling, 1 Portsdown Road, Maida Vale, W.; Miss Mary May, 139 Fulham Road, South Kensington, S.W.; and B. J. Whall, Lynwood, Millport, N.B.

The Seventh Love Problem.

I have very much pleasure in announcing that Mr. Arthur Taylor, of 30 Napier Road, Leytonstone, is the winner of the guinea I offered in connection with the Seventh Unsolved Love Problem.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

OLD VALENTINES.

I turned an old box out to-night,
A task that I had long neglected;
A bundle dingy met my sight,
A packet strangely unexpected.
Of fleeting time it bore the signs,
In opening it I felt quite chary;
Yet they were but old Valentines,
And dated fourteenth February

One was from Charlie — silly boy,
He was ten years too young to marry.
"The heart is but a woman's toy";
The next said, 'twas from Cousin Harry.
"The rose is red, the violet blue";
How silly now sounds that old motto;
I kissed the sender once — poor Hugh,
And mother told me I ought not to.

An arrow through two hearts the next,
Entwined about with verse impassioned;
From Jack — and oh he was so vexed,
Because I said 'twas so old-fashioned.
Another — such a quaint device —
How sweet — I wonder if he meant it;
What charming lines — it would be nice
If I could recollect who sent it!

Well — put them in the fire — good-bye!
To keep them now seems rather stupid;
Their givers married — so did I —
And no one now thinks much of Cupid.
You're out of date, Saint Valentine,
Your florid cards, your verse impassioned;
Yet take my hand, dear husband mine,
Thank God true love is not old-fashioned.

C.B.

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID NEW SERIES. BEGIN READING TO-DAY.

DECOYED!

A Striking Series of Astonishing Revelations.

Told by the Decoy Herself.

OF WHOM YOU READ.

Vivienne D'Alton, the decoy. She, an innocent girl, unwittingly leads young gentlemen of good social standing to their ruin, at the hands of her father.

Beverley D'Alton, who poses as a millionaire who has made his money by judicious speculation. He assumes to lavish great affection on his daughter, from whom he has been separated for many years.

Mrs. Sherwood. A florid person, who is introduced to Vivienne by her father as a great friend of her dead mother. She lives with the D'Altons, and requests Vivienne to call her "Aunt Flora," which the young girl reluctantly does.

Annchen. A lady's maid, whom Vivienne greatly detests. She seems to be on very familiar terms with Mrs. Sherwood and Mr. D'Alton.

SIXTH EPISODE.

Half-Confidences.

"A most terrible thing! It is enough to make one afraid to leave the house."

"Yes, I think it is simply awful! Just fancy us seeing the poor man in good health only last night, and now! Oh, Beverley, it can't be true!"

I had been standing beside my father for some little time, wondering how it was that both he and Mrs. Sherwood were so agitated, that they seemed to be quite oblivious of my presence.

But, though they talked past me, just as if they thought themselves alone in the room, it was impossible for them to really overlook me, and I knew quite well that they intended me to hear all they said.

"Last night!" I exclaimed. "What has happened since last night? And of whom are you speaking?"

Mrs. Sherwood affected to give a violent start of surprise, and my father uttered an exclamation of dismay.

"Upon my word, Vivienne," he said irritably, "it seems impossible to keep anything from you, for you are here, there, and everywhere. But I daresay you will show less curiosity after you are more accustomed to the ways of the world."

"You have not answered my questions," was my answer, spoken calmly enough, in spite of my father's censorious attitude. "Were you alluding to Mr. O'Connell?"

"Why should you think that?"

"Because you expected him to dine with you last night. And because Mrs. Sherwood spoke of 'seeing the poor man in good health only last night.'"

"Well, I suppose you are sure to hear all about it, anyway, so you may as well hear it from us. Mr. O'Connell's dead body was found in the river last night, near London Bridge, and now lies in the mortuary."

Mrs. Sherwood was sobbing violently, with her face hidden in her handkerchief, and even my father's lips were quivering with emotion, while his face wore a most curious expression, just as if he were only simulating grief, which, of course, he must really be feeling.

As for me, the shock nearly made me faint. But I made a strong effort at self-control, and exclaimed:

"But how could his body be found last night, when he did not leave here till long after nine?"

"How do you know that?" was the sharp query, which showed me that I had made an incautious admission, if I did not want to betray what I was doing last night. Happily, I am fairly quick-witted, and was able to rectify my mistake at once.

"If he dined with you," I said, "I don't see how he could possibly leave here much before ten. And if he stayed still longer, it is less than ever likely that the body which was found last night could be his."

A breath of relief preceded my father's next words, although they were spoken gloomily.

"Unfortunately," he said, "there is no mistake as regards identity, for some letters and a card-case established that beyond doubt. It seems almost too awful to credit, but the unfortunate man must have met his death soon after he left here, for the body was found and identified in time for the tragedy to be reported in the morning papers."

"Is—is it suicide?" I gasped, for it had suddenly struck me that self-destruction might possibly have been the eventual outcome of Mr. O'Connell's disappointed love-making.

But my father's next words dispelled this fear.

"No," he said firmly, "it cannot have been suicide, for there is a great wound on the head, which must have caused death before the body was thrown into the river, after it had been stripped of money and valuables. It is a case of murder, murder most foul, and to me has fallen the painful duty of setting the authorities on the track of the murderer."

"But how can you do that?"

Digitized by Google

"By simply describing what happened last night. Mr. O'Connell dined with us, but pleaded an engagement which compelled him to leave here at half-past nine. I daresay he would have stayed longer, if my answer to his proposal for your hand had been different. But Fate willed it that he hurried away. Unfortunately, also, he drank more Veuve Clicquot than was good for him, and the instant he stepped into the fresh air its effects were painfully manifest. He became drowsy, and staggered so much that I had to help him down to the gate. A growler was passing at the time, and, with the aid of the cabman, I got Mr. O'Connell inside. Then I told the cabby to take him to the Cecil, and the sequel is easily guessed at. The cabman has robbed and murdered him, and he would meet with no resistance, for O'Connell was absolutely helpless when I saw the last of him."

I listened to all this as if I were in a dream, and my father, hastily turning to leave us, added:

"And now I am going to the police station to tell all I know, and to give as accurate a description of the murderer as I can. I shall never forgive myself for letting O'Connell drive off alone, although it did not occur to me that he would not be quite safe. But I can at least help to avenge his death, by putting justice on the right trail."

"Oh, Beverley," wailed Mrs. Sherwood, whose emotion was still too great to allow her to show her face, "I wish you wouldn't mix yourself up in the case! Just fancy! We were the last people who saw him alive before the cabman drove away with him. Suppose we were actually blamed over it!"

"Don't be so absurd!" was the ill-mannered reproof to this outburst. "Whether I am blamed or not, I must do my duty. And I am sure Vivienne will support me when I say that the only right thing for me to do is to tell all I know."

Was this remark intended as a challenge? I thought not. On the contrary, it struck me that my father must be acting in a very self-sacrificing manner, for it must be exceedingly painful to be publicly associated with a tragedy, no matter how noble one's motives may be.

But another idea also occurred to me.

"Father," I faltered, "what about Mr. O'Connell's wonderful diamonds? Have they been stolen, too?"

The effect of this question was enough to frighten me from ever addressing another to my father. He reeled as if I had struck him, and positively gasped for breath, glaring the while at me with eyes which shone fiercely out of a lividly pale face.

"Wonderful diamonds?" he gasped, staggering towards me with so threatening a mien that I involuntarily retreated until the closed door prevented me from going any further. "What are you talking about? And why do you connect Mr. O'Connell with diamonds?"

"Because," I answered, "there is every reason to do so. Yesterday Lady Windelmore and I called at a jeweller's in Bond Street, and saw a most wonderful suite of diamond ornaments, intended for the Empress of Russia. We were told that only royalty or millionaires could afford that kind of thing, and that Mr. Emil O'Connell had ordered an identically similar set to be made. He paid for it, and fetched it away yesterday afternoon. He was coming here last night for my final answer to his proposal, and it seems only natural to suppose that even if he brought no other of the costly gems with him, he would at least bring the diamond half hoop, on the chance of its being needed."

Mrs. Sherwood was still too much agitated to join in the conversation, but she looked eagerly at me as I spoke, and I remember thinking it odd that, though she had been crying violently for about twenty minutes, her eyes were not in the least red, like mine would have been.

"This is news to me," was my father's gravely spoken response. "I had no idea that O'Connell had anything valuable on him. Of course, he would not, in any case, have brought more than the ring with him. And even that would not be alluded to in face of the emphatic way in which I declined to accept him as your husband. But the mere mention of that treasure will be enough to ruin us all for ever."

"Ruin us? Father, how can that be possible?"

"It is not merely possible, but certain. Unless it transpires that Mr. O'Connell's diamond suite is safe in his own room, or in the care of the hotel manager, it will be inferred by the world at large that he brought them here, and that we are responsible for their disappearance and the death of their owner."

This view of the case was a very dreadful one. But my father overruled all my objections to it, and succeeded in convincing me that, for all our sakes, it was vitally important to say nothing at present about the priceless gems of which Mr. O'Connell had been the purchaser.

"But what about Lady Windelmore?" I asked. "She heard just as much as I did."

"Did she also know that Mr. O'Connell was to receive his answer last night?"

"Oh, no! I didn't mention a word about it to her."

"Then she will not imagine that he had anything valuable here with him, and I trust to you to enlighten her no further."

Under the circumstances, I willingly promised to be discreet, and my father, having apparently regained possession of his nerves, soon afterwards hurried off to set the police on the track of the cabman, but not before I had asked him one more question.

"Father," I said, "what was the number of the cab? If you can tell that, there will be to difficulty about finding the driver."

A slight pause preceded the reply given to me.

"I never thought about the number. It is a thousand pities that I didn't notice it. But it would only have entered my head to do so if I had been suspicious of the cabman's bonâ-fides."

Another moment and my father was gone. Then Mrs. Sherwood, who had again been indulging in a display of emotion, recovered sufficiently to level a sneer at me.

"You ought to be a detective," she said aggressively. "Nothing seems to upset you. And you forget all womanly regret at the loss of a friend of the family in your anxiety to show how easy it would be to fix suspicion on the most innocent people in the world. Faugh! I've no patience with such an unnatural daughter!"

There was no time, even if there had been inclination, to reply to this undeserved tirade, for the speaker flounced out of the room as she said it, leaving me to wonder whether she was entirely wrong or not when she accused me of being unnaturally anxious to disclose incriminating facts. Nor could I entirely exonerate myself, for did there not linger in my mind the lurking conviction that my father had been as careful to avoid telling the whole truth as I had myself?

I could not be sure whether there was a number on the cab or not. But I knew there was no mistake in supposing that I had heard my father say more to the cabman than it seemed necessary for him to say.

"'I'm afraid the gentleman has had a glass too much. He lives at the Cecil. Here's your fare.'"

Those were the words that he had addressed to the cabman. But what could be the meaning of what he added, in a lower voice:

"'Lose no time. You'll find all serene at the office'?"

I would fain have gone back to my own room for the rest of the day, but was unable to do so, owing to various social engagements which it was necessary to keep. By this time I quite understood that the rule of fashionable life which commands most obedience is the one which enjoins us to hide all our troubles and our perplexities behind a smile. The smile may be either amiable, satirical, or arrogant, but so long as it forms a mask which covers all deeper emotions, it finds a welcome which is denied to sorrow.

It must also be accompanied by a corresponding lack of interest in other people's worries, and it appears to be the essence of bad taste to either court pity or bestow it.

This being thoroughly realised by me, I was apparently as gay and as careless as anybody while Lady Windelmore and I paid a visit to the Academy. Mrs. Sherwood was to have gone with us, but excused herself on the plea of a sudden attack of neuralgia, and though I have no desire to see anybody suffer from neuralgia, I must confess that I was glad to be spared the infliction of her presence.

Digitized by Google

There is an idea among some people that the Academy is visited for the sake of the pictures. But very few people, comparatively speaking, would go to look at the pictures if nobody else were there. Anyhow, her ladyship and I only called in on this particular morning on the chance of her meeting some friends of hers whom she wanted me to know.

That which we hoped for duly happened. Mr. Greatham and his sister were here, and I took such an immediate fancy to them that I invited them both to lunch with us. Such slight objections as were raised by Clarissa Greatham were promptly overruled by Lady Windelmore, who smilingly informed her that Mr. D'Alton's chef was above being surprised by an inrush of unexpected guests.

She and I were about the same age, but she was as petite and dainty as I was tall and vigorous. In fact, we were as as dissimilar as could be Claude Greatham had the same colouring as his sister, but was a well-grown specimen of manhood hailing from New Zealand, where his father, it appeared, had made an enormous fortune by sheep farming. This fortune, on the death of Mr. Greatham, was divided equally between his two children, who, armed with numerous letters of introduction, were now having a good time in London, amongst people whom their parents knew before they sought better luck over the seas.

When we all went back to lunch, we found Mrs. Sherwood looking her usual self, and my father welcomed our new friends in his most genial manner, for he already knew of them by hearsay.

"And you like being in London?" was one of the questions Mrs. Sherwood put beamingly to Claude Greatham, who responded at once:

"Madam, it is a delightful life, though it has its disappointments."

"Disappointments?" echoed Lady Windelmore. "Whatever can there be to disappoint you, who have everything to make you happy?"

"Not quite everything. I have a great friend who has spent many months with us, and who promised faithfully to be the first to welcome us at Southampton if we should visit the old country. He knew exactly when we were coming, and amongst the letters brought on board at Madeira was one in which he enjoined us to be sure and look out for him when the ship entered the home port. But he never came, and we have neither seen nor heard from him, although we have been in England nearly a week."

"The young man is evidently ungrateful, and has no desire to pay for past hospitality," observed my father. But Clarissa Greatham exclaimed confidently:

"Viscount Broomville is no ingrate. The letter which met us at Funchal was as cordial as possible, and I am sure it isn't his fault that nobody knows what has become of him."

"No," added her brother, "that's why I'm uneasy. If it had been anybody else, I wouldn't mind. But Broomville isn't the kind of chap to break his word."

I felt myself growing alternately hot and cold. Hot because Viscount Broomville's name always brought the uncomfortable conviction that I, who already had the choice of several eligible lovers, had given much secret admiration to a man who evidently did not care two straws for me. Cold—because the steadfast confidence of the Greathams re-awoke the fear lest harm had befallen him. I recollected the adventure on the last occasion I had seen him, and I turned pale with a sudden dread lest the "birds of evil omen" had secured their prey after all.

But I resolved to say nothing on the subject to either my father or Mrs. Sherwood, for I knew that neither of them would sympathise with my fears. The Greathams and I would meet at the Countess of Alwinnot's "Small Dance" in the evening, and I would find some means of having a chat with Clarissa about Lord Broomville.

Meanwhile my father, with his usual tact, had ingratiated himself so much with Claude Greatham that I foresaw what would soon happen. He would be asked, or would offer, his advice re investments, and I found myself hoping that such a course would not have the same result it had had in the cases of Lord Broomville and Alan Melrose, neither of whom I had seen after business had been satisfactorily arranged by them.

"And you must understand that I want you to make yourselves at home here," smiled my father. "I like nothing better than to have young people about me, and the oftener I see you here, the better will both Vivienne and I like it."

Lady Windelmore seemed very pleased at the favourable impression the children of her former school friend had made, and was saying as much to Mrs. Sherwood, when she suddenly faltered in her speech, turned very pale, and murmured:

"Oh, I feel so faint! Do give me another drink!"

Quick as thought, Mrs. Sherwood pressed a glass to the lips of the fainting woman. But she was already powerless to drink the wine offered her, and, with a shuddering groan, she fell back lifeless!

Instantly all was commotion! My father sent half a dozen servants in different directions, in search of the doctors whose attentions could be of no avail to the poor lady so suddenly stricken low. Mrs. Sherwood went into hysterics, and accidentally knocked into fragments the wineglass from which Lady Windelmore had taken a drink a few minutes before she was taken ill.

Claude Greatham lifted the body gently on to a lounge, and his sister and I, though we were both nearly distracted with the horror brought on by this sudden calamity, did our best to aid respiration.

But our efforts were useless, and we knew only too well what the verdict would be when the first doctor arrived on the scene.

"The case is quite hopeless. The lady has died of syncope, possibly due to unsuspected heart disease."

Thus said the doctor, and I, of course, believed implicitly in this verdict, for how was I to suspect that Lady Windelmore's sudden death was really caused by her accidentally discovering information which might prove dangerous to the security of a gang of hardened criminals?

(Another instalment of this series next week.)

BDLO

WHAT WORD DO THESE LETTERS FORM?

The above is one of the sets of letters which those who enter the Great Letter Juggling Competition in Pearson's Weekly are asked to solve. In this Competition is offered the sum of £500 IN CASH PRIZES.

To the first prize winner £250 will go; to the second, £100, and to the third, £50; while prizes of £1 each will be given to the 100 competitors next in order of merit.

This type of competition is most fascinating, and will prove a most agreeable pastime for the long winter evenings.

The current number of Pearson's Weekly contains the third coupon, while copies containing the previous two can be had of any newsagent, or the Publisher, Pearson's Weekly, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., will forward them post free for 3½d.

Those who wish to enter should dispatch their orders for the copies they require as early as possible.

Digitized by Google

THE BLACK SPOT.

The Story of its Regeneration.

THAT particular portion of the parish was the despair of the vicar, the curate, and the inhabitants of the rest of the district. It was a curious condition of things; the parish, as a whole, was a well-to-do one in the south-west of London; the houses were large and were occupied by people who could well afford to maintain a residence of a rental value of £100 a year; yet, in the centre of this comparative luxury and wealth, was an exceedingly poor locality—a sort of mud pool in a field of flowers, inhabited by some of the least respectable persons to be found in any part of any town or city.

"Most Londoners," as the vicar said, "speak of the East End as the part of our great city where poverty and vice are to be found at their worst; but this black spot in our parish, although its poverty may be on a par with that of the East End, can give a start and a beating to the said East End in other ways. I have had the experience of rude, impudent children and disreputable adults in the other side of London, but the conditions here are worse!"

And those who knew the district were able to testify to the accuracy of the statement.

It was to "civilise" this black spot that the curate, the Rev. Edward Whitford, set to work in real earnest and in a manner that was not quite ordinary.

He was a splendid specimen of muscular Christianity; he was a University scholar and athlete, six feet tall, with a firm, determined face (which could, nevertheless, look very pleasing) and a frame that was sufficient indication of the physical power that could be called into action if required. Altogether, both in physique and bearing, the Rev. Edward Whitford was a man to command respect.

He was just the kind of man to take these people in hand; but it was, notwithstanding, a bold move. The only other individual who had attempted any sort of ameliorating work among them was the visiting woman; she had been protected from insult by the fact that she was a woman and that she occasionally brought cast-off garments and other welcome gifts to the inmates of the tenement houses.

"Of course, I cannot accomplish much by myself," said the curate to himself and then to the vicar. "I really want the assistance of a lady or two—one at least!—and of some young men, in order to put my idea into execution!"

The worthy vicar, who devoted his attention to the well-to-do members of his congregation, agreed with him, but that he would not get the assistance; he might have a helper or two for a week, but they would quickly fall away after an experience of the black spot. However, a notice could be read in church to the effect that helpers were wanted for the curate's campaign (without making special reference to sex), and so much was done.

The request met with very little success; two or three rather shallow young ladies, who had the curate himself and not the task in contemplation, volunteered to do something, but they were not precisely to Whitford's liking, so he told them politely that he would keep them in remembrance and assign them a part when he saw one that would be appropriate. A whole week passed; the notice was repeated in the church on the following Sunday. The next evening, Monday, when the curate called on his vicar, the latter had a communication to make.

"Here is an offer of help for you from an unexpected quarter," he remarked with a dubious smile. "Miss Eileen Richards writes to me to say that the work which is about to be undertaken by Mr. Whitford, if her information is correct, is exactly the kind of work in which she will be greatly interested, and she is prepared to assist. Now, Whitford, Miss Richards is a newcomer in this district, but from all I learn about her she is just the kind of woman to be a good helper, if——"

"If?" repeated Whitford encouragingly, seeing that his superior stopped.

"If she consents to work under your directions!" concluded Mr. Winter, with a significant look.

Whitford laughed. "I know the character which public opinion has attributed to her of being an independent, masterful young woman!" he observed. "And that opinion appears to have something in the shape of a solid basis; yet—yet I have an idea that we shall get along! For I propose to accept that offer; Miss Richards is, as you have said, exactly the kind of helper required for work of this kind. She would not be afraid of the dirt, the general lowness of the surroundings, and her air of authority will do a great deal towards moulding the parents as it seems to be doing in the process of reducing the little savages of children to something like order and decency. I am very glad!"

So a meeting was arranged, at which Whitford was to unfold his plans to Miss Eileen Richards.

The lady in question had been head teacher of the local board school for about two months, and in that short period she had made a decided impression on the lawless children whose parents were forced to send them to this educational establishment.

She was between twenty-eight and twenty-nine years of age; tall, with a well-shaped figure and a pretty face.

Some people would have called it a beautiful face, but the adjective "pretty" was a compromise, as there was an opinion that the look of decision upon the features somewhat spoilt the beauty.

Everyone who came in contact with Miss Eileen Richards acknowledged her power over others. She was a "very learned person," according to Mrs. Little, who was given to sarcasm; this description was due to the fact that Miss Richards had gained her B.A. degree at London University with flying colours, and to gain that degree at London is something to be proud of

Digitized by Google

Edward Whitford and Miss Richards were well matched in two respects; both were endowed with that grim determination that enables people to carry out a plan in spite of all the obstacles which may arise, and both were in earnest in their desire to improve the condition of those who lived in the black spot.

The meeting at the vicarage between these two newly-made fellow-workers served to show more clearly that something would be accomplished in the low-class locality.

Although Mr. and Mrs. Winter were there, they had practically no part in the discussion, but remained interested listeners. Miss Richards heard the plans of Edward Whitford, made suggestions in a quick, matter-of-fact manner, and declared that they would achieve much before they had finished with the black spot. It could not be said that she showed enthusiasm in the ordinary sense of the word, yet she was enthusiastic, as the others confessed quite readily. In fact, good-natured, simple Mrs. Winter was so impressed with the result of the interview that she let slip a remark as Whitford and Miss Richards left which might have upset all. She intended it only for the ears of her husband, and she had no idea that anyone else heard it; but it was caught by both the new colleagues.

"They are admirably suited to each other; I shouldn't be surprised if——"

That was all they heard. Whitford pretended to ignore it, but Miss Richards, with her usual way of going straight to the point, interrupted him as he was about to wish her good evening.

"Mr. Whitford," she said, looking him squarely in the eyes in the full light of the chemist's shop, "this is a serious business, and we have engaged in it in order to carry it through, and for no other reason. You agree with me? Yes, I thought so! Then we must ignore such idle remarks as that which we have overheard, and others of a less charitable nature which we shall overhear!"

"Precisely!" he replied, with just the trace of a smile. He had come from the University with the fixed purpose of settling in a district in which he could devote himself to the improvement of the lower classes, like many other Oxford men of means, and he had found his chance in an unlooked-for direction; the idea of falling in love was so much outside his scheme that it amused him. "I think," he added, "that it is possible for two persons of opposite sexes to work together without making f——." He checked the impolite word. "I have always been a believer in platonic friendships!" he concluded.

"So have I!" she returned frankly. "We understand one another and we can go on! You will hire the large, covered yard at once, and we will get to work?"

He replied in the affirmative, and they separated.

The first movement in this battle against lawlessness and depravity was to interest the inhabitants in something other than the beershops and the attractions which unscrupulous individuals had provided in sundry underground kitchens—which were nothing less than gambling and betting places.

It was not the intention of Whitford to preach religion, because he would not have been listened to. Provide them with some novel counter-attraction, and gradually inculcate in them a liking for something better than squalor and unhealthy amusements; it was a huge task, this regeneration of the black spot, but the two workers were determined.

The covered yard belonged to a large firm which did a considerable amount of carting; the carts and vans entered this yard, went to a platform at the end, were loaded or unloaded, and went their way again. After seven in the evening this yard was empty, for it was not used for holding the carts at night. There were proper stables elsewhere.

Whitford knew the head of the firm, and he determined to hire the yard two or three evenings each week. He could purchase some collapsible chairs and tables, which could be stowed away easily during the day, and the platform would serve splendidly as a stage for singing or conjuring tricks and what not. Whitford made inquiries immediately of the head of the firm, who responded heartily, and would take no rent.

The chairs and tables were ordered, and an opening date had to be fixed, so that bills and notices could be distributed.

Miss Eileen Richards was sitting in a cosy parlour of the house in which she had rented rooms when Whitford was announced. He looked anxious.

"Sit down," said Miss Richards with refreshing coolness. "You look worried; you have been working too hard at this new idea, perhaps? When do you propose to make a start?"

"That's just it!" declared Whitford enigmatically, as he seated himself. "We are not quite ready for an immediate start, yet—we ought to begin on Monday, and to-day is Friday!"

"And Monday is Bank Holiday!" observed Miss Richards calmly. "That is rather a hard nut to crack! I thought it was your original idea to start on the following Saturday if you could, as then the people would have very little money, and would be glad to have a free entertainment. That would be the thin end of the wedge! On Monday, when they have money, saved for the purpose!" She shook her head slowly and knitted her brows thoughtfully.

"That is right enough," said Whitford, "but circumstances alter cases. The landlord of the 'Black Bull' is becoming enterprising; he has kept his plan quiet, but you can see that it is a counter-move to ours.

"He has arranged for a kind of fair to be held in his yard on Monday evening; there will be roundabouts, shooting galleries, cocoanut pitches, and all sorts of things, and he announces that he will have other attractions in the future! The result of that will be that these people will get a liking for that thing and our efforts will be nullified at the outset, our whole plan ruined!"

Miss Richards looked grave for a while, then her eyes kindled, and her usually pale cheeks had a tinge of colour.

"We must fight it!" she cried. "The opposition nerves me to battle. It is a good thing that this beershop show is not to begin till evening; we must have a rival entertainment to offer!"

"Throw drink into his scale, and he will win!" murmured Whitford dejectedly. "Still, we must try! But we are so unprepared!"

"Will the furniture be ready?" asked Miss Richards. "Yes? Then we open on Monday evening! We are not so unprepared as you think! I have made a point of visiting these dwellings, and asking about my scholars. I have called at night, when I could expect to see both parents.

"It has been rough work, but it served two objects, do you see? Now, if you get some bills printed and circulated with our names mentioned, their attention will be attracted. We can get up our programme very soon! See here!"

The next moment they were eagerly discussing some ideas of Miss Richards, and when he left her it was understood that the battle between the rival forces of good and evil would begin on Monday evening in deadly earnest.

Surely there never was such excitement in any one corner of the great Metropolis as there was that Saturday evening in that infamous locality when Whitford's bills were circulated! Everybody was invited to witness the free entertainment to be held in Mackington's yard on the Monday evening; there would be chairs and tables, and the men could smoke, and the women could sit and sew (if they liked) while they listened. The yard would be well lighted, extra gas jets having been installed, and everything done to make the audience comfortable. The programme would be announced on Monday afternoon. This last was the outcome of necessity and shrewdness; the programme was only half ready when the bills were printed, for one thing, and for another thing it was well not to show their hands too early, or the landlord of the "Black Bull" might go one better.

Digitized by Google

As it was, that worthy individual only laughed, and half wished that he could have arranged his show for Saturday and Monday also, but that could not have been done, as the various items of the fair would be busy elsewhere on the Saturday night and during the daylight hours of Monday.

The inhabitants grinned when they saw the handbills, and some threw them aside with a remark that cannot be reproduced in cold print; it would lose some of its warm colour, to use a paradoxical observation. Others, who had felt inclined to do the same, thought differently when they saw that Miss Richards, of the Board School, was in it. "There's summat in it," was the opinion, and they began to talk about it and to look forward with curiosity to the further development of the idea. Miss Eileen Richards had commanded their respect.

"If we could have started on Saturday!" was Whitford's comment. But after a chat with his coadjutor he thought differently. It was better as it was.

Somehow, nobody quite understood why, the free entertainment captivated the thoughts of the district. Men and women, saving their money for the "go-in" on the Bank Holiday evening, caught themselves wondering whether they would spend it then, after all.

Whitford and Miss Richards were busy, and it is doubtful if the young University man went through that Sunday with his thoughts so much on his immediate work as he should have centred them. And then came the Monday morning! People looked for the programme, but it did not appear. They laughed, and yet they felt slightly disappointed. And after dinner on Monday they strolled about waiting for the evening.

The rival entertainments were to begin at six o'clock. Miss Richards and Whitford left their respective lodgings at three and went into the yard.

"We'll put the bill out now," said Whitford with a nervous laugh. "I say, we have the best pitch, you know! People must come this way to get to the 'Black Bull,' and they will see our attraction first!"

"It will be hard work," said Miss Richards with quiet determination, "but I think we shall win!"

He took a glance at her from the corner of his eye as he unrolled the huge poster which he had painted himself; she was one of those who command success!

That poster was hauled outside and affixed to the gate, and within a few minutes there was a crowd round it. The word passed round, others came to look, and the publican sent a bar frequenter to examine and report to him.

Oh, the excitement after five o'clock! Saturday had been an exciting day, but it was nothing to this! Whitford disappeared, but Miss Richards smiled consciously and she went boldly round to many of the houses—those which sheltered the worst of the populace—and invited them to the free entertainment!

At half-past five a curious thing happened. People were strolling towards the "Black Bull," and they meant to stop at Mackington's yard to get a passing view, but when they reached the yard they were electrified with surprise. One half of the gate was open, but the space was filled with the booth of a Punch and Judy show, and Punch was giving a brand new entertainment to all who cared to stop. He stopped every few minutes to invite those outside to walk in and be happy—to walk in if they wanted to see more of him as he wouldn't be able to stop outside long, because those inside would be disappointed.

What is there which attracts more attention from young and old than a Punch and Judy show? A big crowd gradually collected, and the landlord of the "Black Bull" waited with ill-concealed rage for his customers who were not coming!

About fifteen minutes to six Punch popped down suddenly, and Whitford—who was giving the entertainment—whispered to Miss Richards. Punch re-appeared, but the small door in the other half of the big wooden gate was opened and the Board School teacher appeared.

"Won't you come in?" she asked of those who stood nearest. There was nothing of the showman or tout about her; she was plainly dressed, and she spoke in a manner that was at once persuasive and commanding. "Do come in! I'm sure you will like it!"

Some tried to peer in, but a partition had been arranged directly at the back of the gate.

Punch supported her efforts, and the people felt that they could not resist, it was so novel, and their curiosity got the upper hand. Slowly they began to file in. Whitford and Miss Richards were exultant.

Alas! There came diversion in the shape of a small band sent by the owner of the "Black Bull." He had been rendered desperate, and was making a final effort. He was not a bad man, but he thought only of his business, and this endeavour to retrieve the character of the locality appeared to him in a totally different light.

It never occurred to him that it was a desirable thing that the locality should be improved; he saw in this attempt only an effort to reduce his business, started by faddists. The band played a lively air; most of us are partial to lively tunes, so the people stopped going into Mackington's Yard and turned to listen. Then the small band turned and began to march away to the "Black Bull" to a quick march, while a man walked backwards at the rear and shouted out to the inhabitants to "come on!"

There was a conflict of emotions; the crowd began to waver; some marched off with the band, others stood as if they were inclined to follow. Punch redoubled his efforts, and shouted that there was nothing to pay. Miss Richards took a bold course. She pulled the bolts of the closed half of the gate and threw it open.

"All are welcome! Come!" she cried.

The Punch and Judy booth was quickly shifted by some willing young men helpers inside, the partition was removed, and the people saw the well-lighted yard, with warm sacking

Whitford unrolled the bill and shot a glance at Eileen from the corner of his eye.

Digitized by Google

on the ground, and with tables and chairs placed in front of a platform on which was a painted scene—and they followed the Punch and Judy booth into the yard.

It was "follow-my-leader" in this, as in most cases, and the crowd surged in. The gate was closed and the entertainment began at once. Only a few went to the "Black Bull."

For nearly three hours Whitford, Miss Richards, and the young men and women who had agreed to act as chorus, kept those rough, coarse inhabitants interested. There were several repetitions of Punch's performance, always new and always entertaining, in spite of its age.

There were songs by Miss Richards, whose voice proved to be of extraordinary sweetness—songs like "Home, Sweet Home," and "Auld Lang Syne," which touched an audience whose homes were none of the best. There were glees by the chorus, duets, recitations, and some rather clever conjuring tricks by Whitford, a violin solo by another helper, and many other "turns."

And at intervals both Whitford and Miss Richards addressed the audience; their remarks had nothing of maudlin sentiment in them, but were bold and vigorous, uttered in tones of earnestness that went home. They were full of sound sense, and the effect was seen in the parish later.

It was early, perhaps, to close, but the two principals were thoroughly fagged, and they hoped that the audience would show enough sense to go straight home. and the majority did so. The victory of the Bank Holiday fight lay with the regenerators.

A proportion of the parishioners were inclined to blame Whitford for "lowering himself so," but he declared that he had done nothing "lowering" in saving people from intemperance and Bank Holiday excesses and brutality. That entertainment was the first of many, and everyone admitted that the black spot was really becoming less black. Whitford and Miss Richards devoted all their leisure to the regeneration, as they called it, but she had more leisure than he during the evenings, and her work became better known among the poor.

It would be interesting to relate in detail the progress of that struggle for the regeneration of the plague spot of the fashionable parish, but it would be rather a series of stories than one short narration. The landlord of the "Black Bull" was only one of the representatives of the enemy; neither Whitford nor Miss Richards had any personal feeling against him, but they believed that it was absolutely necessary to bring about a moderation, at least, of the drink traffic, as well as to effect the abolition of other even less desirable places in the neighbourhood; and Fate had willed it that his stronghold was the first to be attacked. Afterwards, he became friendly with them and arranged his house on a basis that made it more tolerable.

For twelve months the fight was waged with untiring vigour against the causes of degeneration, and there came a day when Whitford and his gallant fellow-worker could feel that they had won, and that the black spot was losing its blackness rapidly. Within a month from that great time there came a revelation.

Whitford called on Miss Richards, and, after a few commonplaces, announced that his work in the parish was at an end. Miss Richards looked up with a start, and her pale face grew a shade paler.

"I think that the completion of our work can be left to other hands," he observed gravely. "I am about to leave here."

"But why?" asked Miss Richards, her lips quivering slightly.

"You know that my recent work has not met with the entire approval of certain persons who are influential here," he said quietly. "They think that I have not properly upheld the dignity of my position, and so forth. I do not care for that opinion, because I feel that I—that we—have done the right thing. But Mr. Winter has now taken their side, and, rather lamely, he has this morning told me that he thinks a change will be beneficial to both him and myself. That intimation came just as I was about to answer in the negative to an offer of the vicarship of a small district in a very poor locality; I had conceived it my duty to renounce the chance of preferment in order to remain here, but Mr. Winter's communication settled the matter for me in a different way, and I wrote an acceptance instead of a refusal."

"You will be greatly missed!" That was all she could say; she was surprised at her own awkwardness, and at the strange, strained tone of her voice.

"Do you think so?" he inquired. And then there was silence.

Neither of the two ventured to glance at the other; each wondered why his or her own feelings were so tumultuous, and silently asked whether the other was similarly agitated; each tried to think that this agitation was due solely to the prospective loss of a friend and fellow-worker, and each felt a kind of inner shock as the words "Platonic friendship" flashed through the brain. Suddenly, Whitford took a firm hold of himself, as it were, and spoke boldly.

"Will you be sorry, Miss Richards?" He saw something in her eyes which encouraged him to go on, more boldly. "Will you miss me very much, Eileen? Yes, I think you will! It has come to me as a revelation that—that I want you with me always, Eileen! Has a similar revelation come to you?" He rose and went over to her, leaning over her chair. "Has it, dear?"

Eileen's face flushed rosily; she gave him a quick, upward glance, and dropped her eyes. That glance satisfied him; he bent lower over her and kissed her with a passion that surprised her, and made her very happy.

"We have unconsciously grown to love one another, Eileen, in the midst of our battle together!" he said tenderly. "Some will say that we are another example of the impossibility of Platonic friendship, but I am still a believer in it, although—I must confess it!—we made a muddle of it and fell in love."

"I think that, as we work together in the new sphere, we shall be glad that we did make a muddle of the Platonic friendship idea, Edward!" she confessed, with a happy laugh.

One of the most prized of the wedding gifts was a silver-mounted ink-stand, purchased by means of a subscription raised by the people who lived in the now regenerated black spot!

Leslie Grant.

INDISPENSABLE TO THE YOUNG HOUSEWIFE.

Part 2 Now Ready.

Pearson's Home Management.

Edited by ISOBEL, of "HOME NOTES."

To be issued in 12 Fortnightly Parts. Price 7d. net each.

This work is the most thoroughly up-to-date and exhaustive book on household management ever published, and contains 12 beautiful coloured illustrations, 64 full-page illustrations, together with a very large number of cuts in the text.

Some of the Subjects Dealt with are:

GENERAL MANAGEMENT OF THE HOME,
PLAIN COOKERY, with Hundreds of Recipes,
HIGH-CLASS COOKERY, with Many Recipes,

Carving, Folding of Serviettes, Spring Cleaning, Laundry Work, Dairy Work, Choice of a House, Furnishing and Decorating, Furnishing Small Homes, Doing-up a House, Etiquette, Toilet, Sewing, Poultry Keeping, Gardening, Indoor Flowers, Home Doctoring, Legal Points.

To be had at all Railway Bookstalls and Newsagents, or of the Publishers, C. Arthur Pearson, Ltd., Henrietta Street, London.

Digitized by Google

Smart Youth!

Teacher: "What is the definition of flirtation?" Intelligent Pupil: "It is attention without intention."

Then He Kicked Himself.

George: "You would marry the biggest fool in the world, if he asked you, wouldn't you?" Ethel: "Oh, George, this is so sudden."

A Tribute to Her Judgment.

Ada: "Why should you think that I will ever be willing to marry you?" Jack: "Because I have so high an opinion of your good sense."

Much More Comfortable.

"Maria," said Joseph, as they were going down to dinner, "may I sit on your right hand?" "Why, of course not! You'd better take a chair."

Showed His Sprinting Powers.

Tom: "I asked old Goldman for his daughter last night." Dick: "What luck?" Tom: "Well, it was what you might call a run of luck. I got away."

That Stopped It.

He: "They met at the seaside. Then commenced an acquaintance that would soon have ripened into love. But——" She: "But what?" He: "They married."

Nineteenth Century Sentiment.

Gladys: "How do you like a man to propose?" Gertie: "By post." Gladys: "But that is so prosaic." Gertie: "Prose goes further than poetry in a breach of promise suit."

She Wanted an Explanation.

Jones: "Confound it, it's too bad of you! Didn't I telegraph to you not to bring your mother?" Mrs. Jones: "I know you did, love. That's what she's come to see you about. She read your telegram!"

A Sensible Suggestion.

Softleigh: "I always weah gloves foh the—aw—purpose of keeping my hands soft, dontcherknow." Miss Cutting: "Indeed! And don't you think it would be a good idea to discontinue wearing your hat for a similar reason?"

The Only Time.

"Do you not sometimes have soulful yearnings which you long to convey in words, but cannot?' asked the sentimental girl. "Yes, indeed," replied the young man. "I was once dreadfully anxious to send home for money, but I didn't have the price of a telegram."

No Danger Whatever.

He had risked his life to rescue the fair maid from a watery grave, and, of course, her father was duly grateful. "Young man," he said, "I can never thank you sufficiently for your heroic act. You incurred an awful risk in saving my daughter." "None whatever," replied the amateur life-saver; "I'm already married."

The Reason.

She: "Really, now, aren't you a married man?" He: "No, why!" She: "Oh, you have such a settled look." He: "Yes; I've been refused by thirteen girls."

Spring is Coming!

"I dearly love birds," he gently sighed. And then what did she do but hasten to the open piano and softly begin singing, "I wish I were a bird." They are looking for a nest now.

Accounted for It.

He: "Look at that woman on the other side of the street waving her hands about her head. Is she practising physical culture?" She: "Goodness, no! She's describing her new hat to another woman."

Convincing Signs.

"How still they are," remarked Mrs. Frobb, apropos of the young couple in the next room. "Yes," replied Mr. Frobb, "it reminds me of my army days. It was always wonderfully quiet just previous to an engagement."

Just Like a Man.

Husband (irritably): "Can't you remember where I said I left my glasses at breakfast this morning?" Wife: "I'm sorry, dear, I really can't." Husband (peevishly): "That just shows the forgetfulness of you women!"

It Mollified Her.

Young Bride: "Why, Herbert, do you call this little pigeonhole a shoe cupboard?" "My love, that will hold a hundred pairs of shoes of the size you wear." "Well, perhaps you are right. It's neat and handy, anyway."

Diplomatic.

Wife: "Don't you think you might manage to keep house alone for a week while I go off on a visit?" Husband: "I think so. Yes, of course." "But you won't be lonely and miserable?" "Not a bit." "Then I won't go."

Quantity and Quality.

"He throws a kiss to me every morning as he goes by!" "What a waste of good material!" "Oh, dear no, it's not a waste. They're just the superfluous ones that he can't deliver in person owing to the shortness of the evenings."

On the Horns of a Dilemma.

His Sister: "It is true that Helen Goldust has money, but she is so exacting. If you were to marry her you would have to give up smoking and drinking." Her Brother: "If I don't marry her I shall have to give up eating as well."

A Covert Insinuation.

Maud: "Dicky seems to be very timid. He was afraid to kiss me last night." Marie: "I don't think he is timid. He kissed me the other night." Maud (spitefully): "That does not show he isn't timid. He probably was afraid to refuse."

What He Thought.

"With your strong arm about me I fear nothing," she said as she looked searchingly into his eyes. "Phew!" came the voice of the sarcastic small brother who had been peeping in at the door, "you don't take many chances of getting scared so far's I can find out."

A Regretful Pun.

A lady, who was very submissive and modest before marriage, was observed by a friend to use her tongue pretty freely after. "There was a time," he remarked, "when I almost imagined she had no tongue." "Yes," said the husband, with a sigh, "but it's very long since."

Desperation!

Young Wife (at dinner-table, sobbing): "I think you—you—are just as mean as—as—you can be. I made that—that apple-dumpling as a pleasant surprise for you, and—and now—you—want me to bring you a hatchet to cut it in two with." Young Husband: "Good heavens, Maria! Is that a dumpling? I took it for a cocoanut." (With desperate firmness.): "I'll eat it now, Maria, if it kills me!"

Digitized by Google

TRUE THROUGH ALL.

Showing How All's Well that Ends Well.

"You fully understand me, Ethel? Unless you do as I wish in this matter, you cannot remain an inmate of this house. I will not have such an example of disobedience set to my own daughters. They are at an age when they may be badly influenced by it, and seriously harmed."

Mr. Stephen Curliss, broker and speculator in general, threw himself back in his chair at the breakfast table, and looked with a frown of dislike on his swarthy face at the delicately beautiful girl who was pouring out his second cup of coffee.

A wealthy widower, with two plain daughters, he had married, in a moment of weakness, the beautiful widow of an acquaintance who had died deeply in debt. His wife retained her good looks, and was, after a fashion, dear to him.

But Ethel, with the face of her dead father, who had been his rival at school and in business alike, had been obnoxious to him from the first. And now that she daily and nightly attracted the attention in Society which he felt that his own daughters ought rightly to receive, his mind was made up to be rid of her at the earliest possible date.

Ethel Vere was proud as well as beautiful. She tried to hide from his notice the wound that his words inflicted.

But her lips trembled, her dark eyes moistened, and it was some moments before she could reply:

"I thanked Mr. Winslow for the honour he had done me," she said at last. "But I told him of my engagement to Frank Hartwell. I think it ungentlemanly of him to renew his proposal, and I cannot accept it."

"Then you must find another home," frowned her step-father. "I am in earnest, Ethel. Winslow is rich; he is a respectable merchant, and he is quite foolish in his fondness for you. I am acting for your own good in urging you to marry him. You will say so yourself ten years hence, if you take my advice. But if you persist in refusing him because you were once engaged to that unfortunate young sailor, who has gone down with his ship, you must take the consequences."

"Say no more!" exclaimed Ethel, brokenly. "I do refuse, I must refuse. Only let me remain here till my mother returns from Yorkshire, and then I will find another home."

"Your mother is quite too ill to be disturbed by this nonsense, Ethel. I wrote to her last week. There is her answer. You must decide this very day. And she will not be here for three weeks to come."

With her mother's letter in her hand, Ethel hurried to her own room. Hot, blinding tears fell over the words which the weak and delicate wife had written by her stern husband's order.

"Since poor Frank is lost to you for ever in this world, do, my dear child, be guided by Mr. Curliss." The last lines ran: "Marry Mr. Winslow, and in the home of wealth which he will give you, you and I may yet see some happy days."

"A home of wealth, and that man its master, and I the wife of another than Frank!" moaned the poor girl in her despair. "Oh, Frank, my darling! How lightly they all speak, and think, and write of your loss, when it has wrapped the whole earth in mourning for my eyes and heart."

She rose and began to make preparations for her departure. She knew that her mother had no power to protect her in a strife between Mr. Curliss and herself, and she would not subject her to the pain of witnessing the misery which she could not lighten or avert.

Within an hour her trunk was packed ready for removal. In a small bag she placed such articles as she would require. She wore her plainest dress and a thick veil. Counting the contents of her purse, she found that she had but a couple of sovereigns in the world.

"But I have my watch and chain, and a well-stocked wardrobe," she thought, mentally reviewing the situation. "I will go at once to London, and I can find some kind of work, no doubt, in a very few days. Anything will be better than to ask Mr. Curliss for money. If I really need any I can write to mamma."

Without bidding farewell to a person under that hostile roof, Ethel left the house.

Mr. Curliss, glancing over his paper by the window, saw her go, noted the little bag, and whistled softly to himself.

Presently came a carrier with an order for Ethel's trunk. Mr. Curliss saw the man himself, tipped him liberally, made a brief explanation, and sent him away without the luggage.

"That will bring my lady back to ask my pardon," he chuckled, returning to his paper.

But the hours went on, till twilight deepened into nightfall, and no Ethel came. Friendless, alone, and well-nigh penniless, she had made her desperate plunge into the great world.

* * * * * * *

It was nearly dusk when Ethel reached London. The lamps were twinkling in long, unending lines throughout the streets when she timidly entered a hotel and asked for a room.

Young, lovely, unprotected, coming on foot and with no luggage, it was little wonder that the "gentlemanly clerk" found that the house was full.

But his wondering stare, and the audible comments of several well-dressed loungers near his desk, sent the hot blood surging to Ethel's cheeks, and hurried her from the place at a speed which soon outstripped several idlers on the pavement, who were tantalised by the glimpse of her fair face as it flashed by.

"What am I to do? Where am I to go?" thought the poor girl, when she had reached a poorer and safer part of the city, where she could pass unmolested among the crowds, who were too much absorbed in their own troubles to have leisure to think of hers.

What a waste, what a desert of houses the great city seemed to her, who there could claim no home!

It was the hour of reunion among the humbler classes, who depend upon the day's earnings for their daily bread.

Fathers were hurrying home from work, and at the house door the good wife met them with a smile, and the little ones drummed eagerly upon the window panes, or ran a race down the narrow passage to claim the first fond kiss.

Digitized by Google

Some pale widow passed along, with a little parcel in her hand—the toy or cake which should make amends to her darlings for the long day's absence, spent in work for them.

Over and over again did Ethel, footsore, weary, and heart-sick, see these little domestic revelations of happiness in which she had no share. Each time she witnessed them her heart sank lower and lower.

"In this great city there is a place, a home, a welcome for everyone save me," she thought, blinded by the tears she tried to force back. "And yet if my darling's life had been spared, oh, God! how happy I could have been, even in the humblest of these homes, with Frank!"

One by one the cheery welcomes died away, and the doors and windows were closed on the fireside groups within.

"Perhaps some of these people would be willing to shelter me till morning," thought Ethel who was growing tired and faint from inanition, for she had eaten nothing all that day.

She searched for her purse, intending to ask the question of a meek-faced woman in mourning, who had just passed her.

The purse was gone!

Throwing open her cloak in an agony of horror, to search its inner pocket, she found that her watch and chain had been taken, too!

Where or when she had been robbed she knew not. It was useless to waste thought over that question. She had only to face the terrible fact that she was entirely without resources in a strange city, and to decide upon the course that she was to pursue.

Hunger and fatigue were alike forgotten in the overwhelming shock of this discovery. Some words of prayer fell vaguely from her lips as she turned into a side street that looked darker and narrower than the others.

Ethel fell into Frank's outstretched arms, and fainted away.

But she scarcely knew what she was doing; she only walked on, almost stunned by her appalling situation, till she heard the rippling of water near by, and knew by the cold breeze that blew towards her that she stood upon the river's bank.

By day this place was a busy scene. At nightfall, being lined with warehouses, it was deserted and quiet.

Ethel leant against a railing and looked out upon the dark river with its forest of masts and its twinkling lights.

For one moment a terrible temptation possessed her.

"One plunge, and it will end the trouble," she sighed, leaning over the wharf. "And Frank will never come back. What have I to look forward to—what to hope for—if I live?"

She was young and strong, and the dark mood could not long endure. With a shudder she drew back, and looked up at the dark walls around her with anxious, questioning eyes.

The door of the nearest warehouse opened softly. Two men came out—a third remained at the door—and the flash of a dark lantern was thrown across the girl's figure and face.

"All right. The cab is ready, down below at the corner, and there is the girl. You know what to do," said the man in the doorway.

"All right," replied the other two.

Ethel, frightened, yet scarcely believing that they could be speaking of her, had turned to fly, when the foremost man seized her by the arm.

"Not that way, miss. The gentleman is waiting for you down yonder," he said, trying to speak in a gracious and assuring tone.

"You are mistaken. I am not waiting for anyone. Please let me pass," replied Ethel, white with terror.

"Lood alive, Ben!" said the man in the door, with an oath. "You'll have the cops here next, at this rate."

"That's so," said the second man in the street.

Snatching Ethel from his companion's grasp, he placed one hand over her mouth, and hurried with her to a cab that stood in the shadow at the end of the street.

"I've got her safe and sound," he said, through the window, as soon as they were safely within the carriage. "Run, Ben, and tell him; and stir yourself, my man, for if we are not out of this in five minutes, some of them blessed sailors will come loafing by, and then we may see trouble. Now, missy, do you just keep quiet," he added, in a surly tone, as the poor girl struggled in his arms. "No harm's going to happen to you, if you'll only be still. You may take Jack Chapman's word for that."

The noise of Ben's running feet could plainly be heard by Ethel, mingled with the creaking and swaying of the great ships at anchor alongside the piers.

The sound of sailors singing a rude chorus floated through the air. Then came a voice whose lightest sound would have had the power to awaken her, she often thought, even from the sleep of death.

"No, thanks. You are very kind, but I must find my dear ones at home before I join in any merriment on shore," said the deep, grave tones. "I have been reported lost, you know, for some months past, and one heart, I am very sure, has mourned for me. I'm off at once. When I come back I will gladly accept your invitation—if all is well."

"I hope it may be. Good-night."

"Good-night, captain."

The voice was near. The step—the dear, familiar step was nearer yet.

Putting all her strength into one wild effort, Ethel shook off the rough hand that was laid over her mouth, and screamed:

"Frank! Frank! Save me! I am here!"

"Confound you! Will you hold your tongue?" cried her captor, savagely.

Digitized by Google

But still she held herself aloof from his grasp, and cried aloud her lover.

The door of the cab was wrenched open.

"Who is calling me? What is wrong? Ethel! Good Heavens, Ethel, how came you here?" cried Frank Hartwell in blank amazement, as Ethel, with a sob of joy and thankfulness, fell into his outstretched arms, and fainted away.

The man, alarmed for his own safety, had opened the opposite door of the carriage and vanished. The messenger, Ben, held himself discreetly aloof in the distance. The horse, the only honest element in the mysterious business, for obvious reasons was unable to explain it. The door of the warehouse to which Ethel pointed when she recovered her senses was fast closed, and no answer was made to the repeated summons of the angry sailor by anyone within.

Nothing could be done, except to conduct Ethel to a respectable and pleasant shelter, under the roof of his widowed aunt, and leave her there until arrangements could be made for a wedding, which came off within a week. For Frank Hartwell, after the ill-luck which had wrecked him with one ship, had found good fortune in another, which picked him up at sea, and conveyed him to China, where in a short time, the foundation of a respectable fortune had been laid by him.

"And being a rich man's wife, my darling, you may go and bid your mother farewell before we sail for the Flowery Land," said Frank. "But never again shall you face the world alone."

* * * * *

It was nearly a month after Ethel's marriage that her husband solved the mystery of her night adventure near the pier.

He was summoned to a private conference one day by the head of the great shipping firm by whom he was employed, and offered the command of one of their finest vessels, then about to make an immediate voyage.

"I owe you this, or, rather, I owe it to your wife, in common gratitude," said the merchant in a low tone. "I know that neither of you have spoken of the events of a certain night, and you must continue to keep silence for my sake. I have a daughter, Hartwell—my only child—and very dear to me. But she is weak, fond of admiration, and with no mother to watch over her.

"Recently, while at school, but how I know not, some rascally foreigner contrived to make her acquaintance. He persuaded her that he was a nobleman in disguise, and the poor, foolish child agreed to meet him near my warehouses on that very night, and to marry him, after which my forgiveness was to be asked.

"By chance your wife happened to be on that very spot just as my daughter, with her maid, who was her confidante neared it. What the two girls saw and heard thoroughly frightened them. My child hurried home, and confessed everything to me, and she is now safe at my country-seat, with her good aunt, who will watch over her hereafter, and teach her better things.

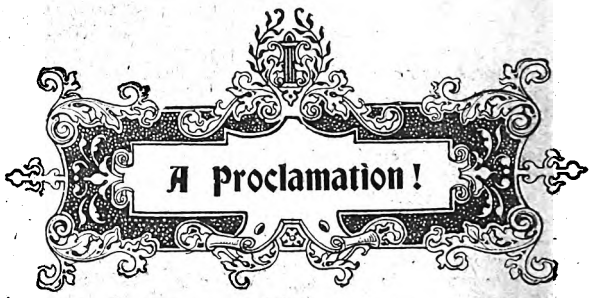
"Through her confession I got at the whole plot, and punished everyone concerned in it. It is now my happy task to reward you for the share you unconsciously had in saving my poor child from a fate that would have been worse than death. You will tell your good wife the story, of course. Then let it be forgotten. And now, Captain Hartwell, let us go and see your ship."

Thus ended Ethel's troubles. In a foreign land, as in her own, she is happy, as a loving heart must be that is true through all.

Would that thus safely and sweetly might close the story of every sad and lonely wanderer upon the city streets!

Margaret Blount.

FIRST SWELL (pretending to mistake for an attendant a rival whom he sees standing in dress clothes in the cloak-room of the theatre): "Ah! Have you a programme?" Second Swell (up to snuff): "Thanks, my man, I got one from the other fellow."



OYEZ! Oyez! Oyez! This is to proclaim and announce to all and sundry that on February 12th of the present year of grace Messrs. C. Arthur Pearson Ltd. will issue the first number of a new magazine, priced at sixpence, entitled THE RAPID REVIEW.

Now, it is going to be a magazine which will interest all—which all who wish to be right up-to-date in everything must read, unless (1) They can afford to buy every magazine, review, and periodical published. (2) They can afford to buy every new book published. (3) They can afford to go to every new play. (4) They can afford to go to every new concert. (5) They can find time and patience to read the political accounts in all the papers. (6) They can afford time, money, and trouble to trace through old newspapers, text-books, and maps why nations are quarrelling, where they are quarrelling, and everything connected with the matter.

Unless they can afford to do all these things, then they must buy THE RAPID REVIEW. For this new magazine is a monthly review of the world, of its thought and progress in every form of enterprise and advancement, from politics to literature, from the drama to country life and pursuits.

All this it will accomplish by presenting each month the essentials of what the best books and brightest brains have given during that period to the world. Obviously, then, above all others, the busy man and busy woman will be the persons directly appealed to by THE RAPID REVIEW.

They will buy it, and immediately will have in their hands a brightly-written summary of every event of topical importance. They will read, for example, a concise explanation of the Russo-Japanese crisis, and forthwith will have the whole matter from its cause to its then position at their finger-tips—and will be able to talk about it clearly, intelligently, confidently. If for its treatment of such affairs alone, the busy man will find himself compelled (and, after he has seen the first number, anxious) to buy THE RAPID REVIEW.

Imagine the entertainment given, and imagine also the money saved. For, having read this new Review, you will be able to see exactly which magazines will interest you, what new books, new music, and new plays have been brought out. You will find all you want to know about country life and pursuits, science and art, woman's work and interests—about everything, in fact.

So that it is manifestly your duty, and obviously to your advantage, to order at once and buy on February 12th the first number of THE RAPID REVIEW.

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID SERIAL.

Dupes of Destiny

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT

By Blanche Eardley, Writer of "The Bond Between."

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS IN THIS STORY ARE:

SIR CYPRIAN RUST, who has inherited the baronetcy and estates of Sir Basil Wingate, though he is not the legal heir.

MARCELLA RUST, his daughter, a very lovely girl, who is greatly in love with

PHILIP NULLIUS, the curate of Crawley Village, where the home of Sir Cyprian, Wingate Court, is situated.

LADY VIOLET FRAYNE-LENNOX, whom Marcella believes to be her aunt. She is a very beautiful woman, and loves her niece dearly, but Sir Cyprian has, for some reason, immense power over her, which he uses to further his own ends.

EDWARD DAY is an orphan whom Lady Violet has befriended. He, however, in making unreturned love to Marcella, insults her, and Lady Violet refuses to have anything more to do with him.

CALEB J. JOHNSON, a City magnate and millionaire, who marries Lady Violet, though he knows that her husband is still alive. This husband,

MAJOR RICHARD FRAYNE-LENNOX, is a good-for-nothing, who has been turned out of the Army. Lady Violet believes him dead.

THIRTY-FIRST CHAPTER (continued).
On the Eve of a Discovery.

EDWARD DAY went into the grimy little shop, smelling of old clothes and a paraffin lamp. On the other side of the counter a little, faded-looking woman was seated, examining some article of wearing apparel. At the sight of the aristocratic visitor, she jumped to her feet and curtsied nervously.

"Are you Mrs. Robson?" Edward inquired graciously.

"Yes, sir," she answered, "that's my name. Do you come about selling any wardrobe?" she asked in a timid voice.

Day smiled. The idea tickled him, that anyone should imagine that he had come all the way from Piccadilly to sell his old clothes.

"No. I received your letter about the information you had to impart about the woman who died on the ship coming home from Australia about twenty-five years ago," he said. "I am interested in the case, because I believe there is money in it, and if I find out anything that will throw a light upon the mystery, you will be handsomely paid."

Mrs. Robson leant across the counter, her pale, worn face and scanty grey hair lending her a look of frailty.

"Then you are not the son—or one of them?" she asked slowly.

Edward started. The question was unexpected. He had not calculated upon another waif being cast upon the world's mercy with himself, and he was rather inclined to resent it as an impertinence.

"No, I am not," he returned glibly. "But I fancy I could lay my hands on the son of that woman if I tried, but I wish to be sure that it is worth while telling him about his birth at all. Of course, if the poor woman was simply an unfortunate creature who had no name to speak of, it will be kinder to let the son live and die in ignorance of his antecedents."

"She was no common woman," Mrs. Robson said suddenly. "Although she did go steerage and was in rags, she was a lady every inch, she was, and the little chaps as she was mother of looked fit to live in a palace. I was in the same cabin with her and nursed her, and a softer spoken lady never breathed."

He looked at her closely. It almost appeared that there might, after all, be a story behind his birth, one that it were just as well to find out. But the mention of a brother stuck in his throat. He wanted no one to share his fortune, should there be one; on the other hand, it would be a nuisance to have a hanger-on in the shape of a down-at-heel brother, begging from him!

"You insist on two boys," he said. "What were they like?"

"One as dark as night, sir; black curls on 'is little 'ead, even as an infant; the other one, the younger of the two, was as white as milk—flaxen 'air and blue eyes."

"Well," he said impatiently, "I want to hear whether you have anything to tell me that will help me to unravel this mystery. Did the mother ever say anything that would lead you to believe that her sons had any right to a name at all?"

Mrs. Robson shook her head regretfully. She was living over again the tragedy of that little stuffy cabin

Digitized by Google

(continued.)

"As she lay dying, sir, she said a few words that showed there was something on her mind, and she wanted to get it off. I can't remember now what they were, but I know she was very anxious for the certificates of birth to be sent to someone; one word I know, because I thought it so odd coming from the lips of a lady who was travelling steerage."

Edward Day leant over the counter. There was no one in the shop, and he began to experience a strange feeling of excitement in the unravelling of a dead woman's stray words of long ago.

What, if after all, he could hold his head up with the highest; then with his appearance and brains no woman would be too good for him. As for Marcella, she would be at his feet, and he would remind her of her scorn!

"Well," he said sharply. "What word was it?"

The old woman puckered up her brow. "It was 'heir,' sir," she pronounced it 'hair,' but Day knew what she meant, and he was too interested to smile.

"I remember," Mrs. Robson went on, "the poor soul tried to say something. She pointed to the elder baby and said 'the heir—the heir,' and she went on with a lot of talk I couldn't foller."

Edward's breath came in uneven gasps. He had one clue that he was not of ignoble birth! The word "heir," although applied to his elder brother, proved that, and it was not his intention to seek that brother. He sought for himself alone; others must do the same for their chances.

"Did she give any clue to her surname?" he asked with trembling lips. Upon the woman's answer hung a great deal. Once let him hold his own name firmly—the rest would be easy.

"No," Mrs. Robson replied. "She died just before she got more than one quarter the name out. She tried twice, too, and all she said was something that sounded like 'Jer.'"

He bit his lip with vexation. It was too bad to lose just when success had been so near.

"And have you no papers—or even a trinket?" he asked. "After all, you have not told me very much that will be of use, you know."

The woman flushed a dark red colour.

"I know nothing about any papers, sir," she said slowly. "I think that if there were any they were taken by the doctor for the elder boy. But there were two little lockets, just alike, that she had round her wrist on one chain, one was taken off and put round the dark child's neck; the other the doctor gave to me for my services in nursing her."

Edward drew out his pocket book. His eyes were sparkling. The most important clue of all was almost within his reach.

"Well, Mrs. Robson," he said pleasantly. "I am prepared to give you ten pounds for that locket the doctor gave you. It can be of no use to you now, and in working out the mystery of the birth of those boys it will be of great service to me, if you will let me have it. I am sure," he added quietly, seeing her hesitate, "that you would not care to stand in the light of those helpless boys getting their due, and the mother—think how she would feel if she knew that they had been waiting so long for their inheritance!"

Mrs. Robson was silent, then she thought of the ten pounds and how much value it would be to her just now that times were so slack, too! Besides, an old locket was no use to her now. The memory of the dead woman grew fainter as the crisp note crackled under her eyes.

"Yes, I'll see if I can find it, sir," she murmured. "I always kept it in a little box with some things I never use, and bad as business has been in the past, I never once thought of pawning it."

She left the shop, and after some little time returned.

"Here it is, sir; there's a picture of the poor lady inside—leastways, I think it is."

With trembling fingers Edward opened the spring of the tiny locket, and inside saw the face of a young girl looking up at him. She was dark; even the faded photo could not hide that she was beautiful as well. Edward wondered what picture was in the other locket.

"This may help," he said slowly, concealing his glee under a pretence of indifference. "Anyway, I promised you a tenner, and here it is."

He flung the note on the table and, with a careless "Good-night" left the shop, and in a very short time was speeding westward once more, the locket containing the face of his unknown dead mother reposing in the inner pocket of his waistcoat.

He dismissed the cab at Piccadilly Circus, and strolled up towards Park Lane. He was excited and flushed with success.

So far he had done well; now he had to reveal himself as the heir to a good name—and then the ball would be at his feet.

He turned into one of the fashionable restaurants and ordered a bottle of champagne. He could afford it now, for was he not soon to prove himself a man of position and wealth?

The wine went to his head, but did not intoxicate him. He was too braced up by his dreams of the future to be affected by anything he drank, but he grew affable and exchanged a genial "Good-night" with the commissionaire who hailed his hansom.

A girl walking along the pavement turned suddenly at the sound of his voice, and gazed at him with distended eyes until the hansom drew up at the kerb. Then as she saw him about to step in, she darted forward with a choking cry and grasped his arm.

"Edward—stop! my husband!"

With a livid face the man who had arranged his future so brilliantly, turned and saw the white, thin face of the woman he had married, gazing into his own.

Their eyes met, both desperate, both determined not to yield an inch. With an effort of will, conscious that the wondering gaze of strangers was fixed upon the fashionable man and his shabby companion, he beckoned her into the hansom, his white lips forcing a conventional smile for the benefit of the onlookers. She obeyed his gesture silently, the look in his eyes quelling the words she would have spoken.

"Where to, sir?" the cabby inquired, opening the little flap at the top of the hansom.

He hesitated slightly—then said, "Drive along the Embankment, I'll tell you when to stop."

For some time neither spoke. The man was almost frightened of his own awful hatred for the frail, weak creature he had hung round his neck, to find in her an incubus that would drag him down when he wished to rise.

To meet her on the very day when he had clutched at Fortune's robe was an ill omen in itself. She would, in her insensate folly, send his house of cards tumbling at his feet. Her empty, doll-like prettiness, which had long since cloyed upon him, would for ever stand between him and his ambition, unless.—

The hansom trailed down one of the side streets that led off the Strand on to the Embankment, and the keen air from the river fanned his hot forehead, and moved the curls on the woman's brow. The evening was young, a few flickering lights standing pale against the grey of the sky twinkled on either side of the river with a monotonous regularity that irritated him.

He turned to her sharply: "Well, what does this mean?"

His tone stung her to retort. "That I intend to take my place by your side as your legal wife. I've been neglected long enough, but now it's my turn!" She laughed, a nervous, shrill note that jarred on his sensitive ears.

He looked out of the hansom without speaking. He could not trust himself to say a word. His mind was in a turmoil of hate and disgust.

"My legal wife!" and his voice sounded to himself rasping, as though something had broken in it. "You are very sure that you are my wife, aren't you?"

She flushed. "Yes, I am—and to-morrow your aunt, Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox, of Grosvenor Place, shall know it took

Digitized by Google

He started and bit his lips savagely. The breeze tossed the lace round her neck, and the soft whiteness of it filled him with a longing to hold that throat until the taunting voice was still! Then he laughed at himself; that would be to place his own neck in a worse peril!

"Yes, I have met and talked to Lady Violet," she went on calmly. "She did not know who I was, but asked me to the house to see her. Unless I understand to-night that I am to be recognised by you—I shall go to-morrow."

He did not answer. The blood was coursing through his veins like quicksilver. The lights on the river dazzled his eyes.

The river!

For a moment he fancied he must faint, so intense was the throbbing in his brain.

He turned to her suddenly and slipped his arm round her waist.

"Come, we will get out and walk."

THIRTY-SECOND CHAPTER.

The Price of Silence.

It was long after midnight when Edward Day returned to the house of the financier, Caleb J. Johnson. He let himself in with the latchkey, and went to the study he had left earlier in the afternoon. He had a vague sense of having lived years since he had gone from the financier's study to visit the old clothes woman in the Walworth Road. Everything was the same—everything wore the old familiar aspect—save himself. He alone had changed, a distance seemed to have arisen between himself and the usual objects of ordinary life—a distance that made him feel lonely in spite of the luxury round him.

He laughed uneasily as he flung himself into a chair near the financier's desk.

"Bah, what a fool I am!" he muttered. "My nerves seem to have become rotten all of a sudden. I suppose I am over-tired and done up—that's it. I've crowded too much into the twelve hours since I got up. I'll have a peg—that will put some life into me—revive the fainting spirit." He poured out a glass of whisky and gulped it in its neat state with one long sigh of relief.

"Ah, there's nothing like a little stimulant to pull one together!" he muttered. "I feel a different man at once!"

He paused suddenly and bit his lip. He had caught a glimpse of himself in the glass over the mantel, and what he saw reflected there undid the little good the whisky had worked. His face was pale—that greenish, livid tint between white and a more ghastly hue, and in the handsome blue eyes that stared back at him there was a strained, desperate expression like unto the look of a man who had forced himself to gaze upon a fearsome object. His fair hair was disordered, and clung to his brow in damp little wisps, and above the weak mouth there was a long scratch, that looked like a thin red line, and gave his face a sinister expression.

His usually smart appearance had also deteriorated, the glazed collar was bent and limp, the tie awry, and two buttons were missing off the top of his coat as though it had been suddenly wrenched from the button-holes. His cuffs also had suffered with the rest of his attire.

But the expression of fear and horror on his face was intensified as his eyes travelled slowly from his collar downwards. Across one sleeve of his black coat something sparkled dimly under the flare of the electric globes, something yellow that contrasted vividly with the sombre hue of the black sleeve. He put up his hand, and with clenched teeth and trembling fingers picked up the yellow, thread-like object. It was a hair, a long, silky, golden hair, that had twined itself round his arm—something so pretty, so delicate and infinitesimal, that it seemed almost incredible for the sight of it to have sent the blood ebbing from the man's face. He dropped it carefully into the blazing fire, then examined the coat closely

"Wherever did I put that BOVRIL?"

Bovril is invaluable for adding strength, flavour, and richness to Stews and Soups, and just as excellent as a nourishing beverage.

Bovril adds shillings' worth to the value of made dishes at the cost of pence.

"TELL THE COOK."

Digitized by Google

(continued.)

in search of others. But there were none, and with a deep-drawn breath he staggered to the door.

"It will be just as well if I change these things and get into a lounge suit," he muttered. "I'm glad none of the servants were about when I came in—they're inquisitive beings, servants. Then I can attend to these letters before I go to bed; a long spell of work will take my thoughts off myself—and"—he shivered—"they are not very cheerful ones to-night."

He left the room and went to his own quarters, and presently returned, looking the same as he generally did—well-groomed, nonchalant and supercilious, but his eyes alone remained strained, fierce, and burning. He could wash his face, smooth back the fair hair, and change into immaculate linen, but he could not alter his eyes. The windows of his soul could not be taken out and replaced. They were beyond his reach, and he could not force them to his will.

He sat down at the financier's desk and lit a cigarette, then turned over the papers carefully. He was a clever business man, and the fascination of the City was upon him—the smell of gold in his nostrils. He touched the many mining prospectuses that the financier had left in his hands as women touch children—tenderly and with light fingers. His alert brain was busy; he had many things to work out—and none of them could be approached until he had mastered the first, which was the conquest of gold, the lust of power!

Caleb J. Johnson had left his secretary his power of attorney, upon which to act in an emergency, and he had made himself fully acquainted with the contents of the financier's prospectuses, and the letter books that contained copies of the vast correspondence such things entailed.

As he looked steadily on through the pile of letters that had been brought over from the Dovermarle Hotel in the financier's absence, a sudden peal of the bell, that echoed through the silent house with an eerie vibration, stayed the pen in his hand, and sent the blood throbbing to his head.

He sprang to his feet, dropping the half-burnt cigarette on to the thick rug, where it smouldered among the fur, and it was not until the dazed man became conscious of the smell of burning that he put his foot out and ground it beneath his heel. He drew his hand across his brow—it was wet with perspiration.

"Who can that be?" he muttered. "Surely not old Johnson—he would not come at an hour like this! Why, it must be nearly two o'clock!"

He opened the door and went out into the hall. All was in darkness, but coming down the stairs was a manservant, looking half asleep, and carrying a candle in his hand. Day went forward quickly. "It may be someone for me, Robert. I will go and see, but you had better wait here in case you should have to receive some message. It is probably a wire."

He went to the door and drew the latch quietly. His pulses were quivering with the strain he had put upon his self-control, and beads of moisture trickled down his neck.

He opened the door just as there sounded another peal at the bell. On the step a man was standing, his face was in darkness, but Edward Day could see that he was big and square of frame.

"Well," he said sharply, "what do you want? This is a nice hour of the morning to knock people up. Have you come with a message?"

"I have come on important and urgent business," was the answer in a not unpleasant voice. "I wish to speak with a gentleman who lives in this house. His name is, I believe, 'Edward'—his surname I cannot remember."

Edward Day looked at him intently, but the pitch black of the sky hid the man's face.

"I think you must be mistaken, for——" he began curtly, when the stranger cut him short

"No, I'm not—an Edward someone lives in this house, because I saw him enter it with my own eyes. He came in about one!"

A sharp exclamation escaped Day. This man had come to see him, and, what was more, he intended to. Perhaps it was the better policy to admit him. He need not acknowledge that he was the "Edward" in question. After all, he was some begging letter sort of chap, who had discovered that he was the secretary to the rich financier. Anyway, he would see him in case—in case he was not a begging fellow.

"I will see you and hear what your urgent message is," he said, "and when you tell me I will judge whether it is worth my while putting you in touch with the gentleman you desire to see."

A dry smile puckered the mouth of the silent intruder, who followed the secretary along the dark hall to the study of the financier. The manservant was still yawning his head off, wondering how much longer he would have to wait. Edward turned to him suddenly. "It's all right, Robert, only an urgent message I must attend to for Mr. Johnson."

When the study door had closed, Edward turned and looked at the man who had dared to intrude at such an unearthly hour. He saw a man with the appearance of a Colonial in his breezy self-possession. He was also of great physical strength, with a bull-dog type of face, humorous eyes, and a loose, insolent mouth, which broke into a wide grin as he caught the secretary's eye.

"You haven't asked me to be seated, so I will take a chair near the fire," the stranger said in a pleasant tone. "It's no treat to be waiting about in the cold this weather."

"Then allow me to suggest that you are entirely to blame for waiting," Edward said sarcastically, suppressing his inclination to kick his unbidden guest out of the house. "Surely your news cannot be of so interesting a nature that you could not have deferred it until a more conventional hour? You had better be quick, my man. I am busy, as you see, and not inclined to waste my time. Besides," he added sharply, "the gentleman you wish to see will not care to be disturbed at this hour."

"No," laughed the man with the humorous eyes. "I can quite believe that. He has had a busy day—a very busy day."

Something in the tone of his voice sent a cold, sickly fear into Edward Day's heart. He turned abruptly, and for a moment looked as though he would have fallen on the man who sat watching him with a slow, amused smile.

Then he pulled himself together, and said hoarsely: "Well, out with it, what do you want to say? Only don't take too long—that's all."

The stranger leant forward, and said in a low, cautious voice:

"No, I won't take up more of your time than I can help, Mr. Edward. Oh," he laughed, "don't fancy I am making a mistake, my friend—I know you a little more than you know me."

"I'm not surprised," Edward retorted, seeing that disguise was useless. "Beggars like yourself make a point of knowing the people from whom they hope to extort money. But let me tell you, my man," he sneered, "unless you make short work of your message to-night, I shall kick you out of the place, and give you in custody for begging."

"Really," laughed the stranger genially, "I am half inclined to let you put your threat into execution. It would be the most amusing experience I have ever had!" He ceased laughing, and a sudden cold menace crept into his voice as he continued slowly: "See here, Mr. Edward, I'm no beggar—though I'm quite ready to acknowledge myself a scamp when in the society of a——" He stopped, and the eyes of the two men met in a flash of understanding.

Edward Day reeled against the table, and a low cry of baffled rage and fear rose to his lips, but at the sight of the other man's steady smile of power, he checked it, and said with a hoarse laugh:

"I begin to understand now. That's it, is it? Well, you want what?"

Digitized by Google

"When I followed you," the stranger said slowly, "I was not prepared to do anything but satisfy my natural curiosity about a man with such a—a talent as you seemed to possess for disposing of, shall we call it—obstacles? But when I saw that you resided in a mansion in the heart of the West-end, I concluded that it was my duty to myself to make a suitable allowance for my old age by selling my silence to you!"

Day turned a livid face to him. "Stop that joking!" he snarled savagely, "and come to the point. What's your price?"

The other looked at him thoughtfully. "We'll say two £2,000 to begin with."

The financier's secretary and future man of wealth sprang to his feet with a rasping laugh. "Are you a madman? Such a sum is as far beyond me as the stars! You may think yourself lucky if you get a fiver—and, remember, there is such a thing as protection from blackmail," he blustered.

"Then you know your remedy," the other returned calmly. "I am quite prepared to face the penalty, if you are! For blackmail I should probably get seven to fourteen years; you——" He paused, and his humorous eyes sparkled with amusement. "I am afraid after all I can take no less than the two thou," he finished blandly.

Edward Day turned to the desk and moved some papers about aimlessly.

His brain, recovered from the first shock of knowing that his secret was no longer confined to himself, began to think rapidly. He had no intention of going under, even in the face of such odds. No, he must pay this man somehow, by hook or by crook.

Afterwards he might think out a way of getting clear of his clutches. Suddenly he paused, and his eyes, haggard and bloodshot as they were, brightened with a new inspiration. The financier had trusted him with his power of attorney—he was a rich man, and his money was at the service of the secretary, as Mr. Johnson had left a few bank-notes to the value of some hundreds in his hands, with which to meet emergencies, should occasion arise.

He opened the secret drawer in the back of the desk, and drew them out, then paused; with them was a cheque-book of the financier's. Perhaps it would be wiser to sign a cheque—the financier's signature was an easy one to copy; he had done so lately very frequently in signing letters, and had marvelled at his own cleverness. Why not settle with the blackmailer in this way? Caleb J. Johnson would not suspect him of a fraud, and even if he did, he could deny all knowledge of a cheque-book being in the desk. He turned to the stranger, who was looking at him curiously.

"I suppose it is hopeless telling you that I cannot give £2,000?" he asked curtly.

"Quite," was the laconic reply. "Either that or——"

With a muttered imprecation Edward Day bent over the financier's cheque-book and filled in a cheque for £2,000, then signed the name of "Caleb J. Johnson," just as that gentleman himself would have done.

Edward Day had a taste for imitating other people's signatures.

"What name am I to make it payable to?" he asked curtly.

The stranger hesitated, then said slowly: "To J. Rayne, and leave it open and uncrossed. I have not the luck to have a banking account—just yet!"

"There you are," and Edward flung the cheque across the table. He was quite cool, all signs of hesitancy and fear had gone from his manner. "I shall give no more," he said curtly. "Do what you like—this is all you can get from me."

Mr. Rayne looked at the signature curiously. "Caleb J Johnson" conveyed no meaning to him, but evidently the man he had shadowed to such good effect was a golden goose whom it would be wisdom not to kill. He folded the cheque and put it in his pocket, then rose.

"I will go now," he said, "but you will probably hear

"NOTES OF HAND."

It was the convenient habit of Mr. Micawber when he owed money (as he constantly did) to give his creditors, in lieu of cash, written promises, which he called "notes of hand." Mr. Micawber's notes of hand were never taken up, and never will be. Nature, a just but remorseless creditor, cannot be cheated so. Errors of living, inseparable from modern civilisation, are paid for in suffering, chiefly in the form of indigestion. For this complaint, Mother Seigel's Syrup is at once an antidote and a cure. "Indigestion reduced me from a strong, healthy man, almost to a shadow," says Mr. Alfred Clapham, of Windmill Lane, Cheshunt. "There was always a feeling of oppression at my stomach; and I suffered much from headache, want of appetite, and sleeplessness. From this wretched condition Mother Seigel's Syrup rescued me, after numerous other medicines had failed."

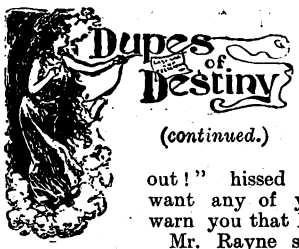
IF YOU FEEL LIMP AND LISTLESS, are worried and upset by trifles, can't think, can't work, can't smoke, or enjoy your food; if society bores you and work is irksome, you need a root and herb extract like Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup to cleanse and give tone to your liver, assist digestion, brace up your nerves and invigorate your system.

MOTHER SEIGEL'S SYRUP

Nurse Douglas, writing from 3, Cromwell Road, Redhill, Surrey, says: "About five years ago I began to suffer from indigestion and biliousness, and for eighteen months my life was a misery. Nothing I tried did me any real good until I commenced taking Mother Seigel's Syrup. Then I began to mend. It seemed to put new life into me and soon fully restored me to health."

WILL RE-INVIGORATE YOU.

Digitized by Google



(continued.)

from me soon. I shall not lose sight of you, Mr. Johnson; to-night — or rather last night—has been a lucky one for me, and perhaps for you," he added significantly.

"Confound you, get out!" hissed the secretary. "I don't want any of your congratulations, and I warn you that I shall give no more."

Mr. Rayne smiled. "There's plenty of time to think of that," he said, "but you will find it difficult to get away from me, Mr. Johnson. Will you show me to the door—or shall I go myself?"

Silently Edward Day ushered him out, and shut the door on him with a savage bang.

"It's awful," he muttered, as he flung himself by the desk again. "Here is a far worse incubus hanging on to me now, and one that I shall not easily shake off! How is it to end—how am I to fight it out?"

Then he stooped and picked up some papers—a packet of letters that had fallen from the secret drawer in the financier's desk. He opened them absently. They were old and had apparently been tied up a long time. Then after a few minutes he sat up and began to read earnestly.

In the meantime Mr. Rayne was chuckling to himself as he walked along the deserted streets. "Two thou! Not bad! I'm glad I happened to see that little episode near the river. Now I'll go and see what is happening down there? By this time all ought to be well. I shall be a rich man yet; Jerningham's money, and now this young Johnson's. He must never find out the truth of to-night."

THIRTY-THIRD CHAPTER.

The Man with the Beard Again.

When Philip Nullius, disguised as the "Vicar" at Water Grange, reached the village, he risked being traced to his rooms by the men who were naturally incensed at having let him slip through their fingers, and were probably searching high and low for him. So it behoved him to be very careful and, as far as was possible, to avoid being seen by anyone in the beaten way.

His mind was occupied with many things. It had seemed almost incredible at first that anyone should desire to deprive him of his liberty, even temporarily, and after the first flush of anger, he knew that there was a greater reason behind it than the signing of a paper promising to relinquish all claim to the hand of Marcella Rust, that had actuated the extreme measures of Sir Cyprian's tools. But why should the baronet have taken such a keen dislike to him?

He wondered what mystery was at the back of his hatred? It was almost as though he hated him for some reason beyond that of having won the love of Marcella!

His lips relaxed into a tender smile. Marcella! His guiding star and own true love. They had dared to ask him to sign a paper that would lose him for ever the right to call her his. Then the sudden memory of that lie they had flung at him—the lie that had caused his face to flush and his heart to throb with anger—Marcella engaged to her cousin, Edward Day! No, he could laugh at such falsehoods when the vision of Marcella's beautiful pale face rose before him. Such a man as Edward Day could never win the love of a girl like Marcella, let alone keep it, and Philip glowed with a warm thrill as he knew that he—and he alone—was the man who had been blessed with the inestimable boon of her love.

It was dark when he reached the house from which he had been taken by the specious stranger with the shifty eyes. Remembering his disguise, and also fearful that some of the "enemy" might be lying in wait, he did not reveal himself to the landlady when she opened the door, but since he required the papers that had been left behind, and which were valuable to him on account of being the only links with his unknown past—he was obliged to run some risk in speaking to her.

"I—I have called for some papers that belonged to Mr. Nullius," he said, in a low, husky voice. "They are important to him."

The woman stared in amazement. "Well now, sir, that's a strange thing," she said, "a gentleman called 'ere about an hour ago with the very same question. I showed 'im into the room, and some time after 'e rushed out of the 'ouse like one mad."

Philip staggered back with surprise. Who could have taken sufficient interest in those letters, of a dead unknown mother to have read them? There were tender little notes which he had received from Marcella, too. Then all must have been seen.

"Have you the papers now?" he asked quickly. "I will take them with me, if so."

She shook her head. "The gentleman took them, sir—every one. I looked into the room afterwards."

Gone! Then the man from Water Grange had called again! "Was he the same gentleman who—who called for Mr. Nullius last night?" he asked, expecting an answer in the affirmative.

"No, sir, 'e was what I should call a toff," she said; "'e 'ad a diamond ring on 'is little finger."

More mystified than ever Philip murmured some apologetic speech, and moved away. Who was the man with the diamond ring? he wondered. He had an indistinct recollection of having once seen a man with such a ring on his little finger—but who, he could not think. He only knew that none of the men he had seen at Water Grange had worn a diamond ring. But he had no time to waste on further inquiries. He wanted to get away, to think and plan out his further movements. It was one advantage that he knew where to locate his enemies, and from whom to expect the next blow; but he resolved, with a tightening of his muscles, that forewarned was forearmed, and the next attempt—should there be one—would find him well equipped. He caught an up train to London, and, arriving there, put up at a hotel for that night, and the next day waited until dusk fell, and then sent a telegram to the Vicar of the parish Church at Crawley, which he couched in the following words:

"Kindly grant extension of absence—most important—writing fully.—Philip Nullius."

He waited in the telegraph office for the reply. In about an hour and a quarter's time it arrived:

"Certainly—take two weeks.—Preston."

He left the office thoughtfully, and paused, wondering as to his next move. It was quite dark, and the heavy coat he was wearing, together with the soft slouch hat, and the disguise in which the kindly girl at Water Grange had got him up, utterly changed his appearance and made his mind easy on the score of detection.

As he stood irresolute, two voices, coming from a couple of men close by, made him wheel suddenly round and stare at them. One was a tall, dark man with inky black beard and hair, and long, white hands, which he used frequently. His companion was not so tall, and Philip instantly recognised the man Boulter who had called for him in the trap to take him to Water Grange.

Very quietly he drew near to them, one at least he knew only too well, but it was the man with the black beard who puzzled him.

There was something vaguely familiar in those white, soft fingers, but he was speaking in such a low undertone, that though he went as near as prudence would admit, Philip could not make out what he was saying.

"It's not my fault, anyway," grumbled the man Boulter. "He knocked me down, and when the 'Vicar' went to my help, he got out of the room and turned the key. Then when we got out there was no trace of him anywhere, though he only got off in a dressing-gown."

"Fools—the whole lot of you," muttered the man with the

(Continued on page 223.)

Digitized by Google

Page Woodcock's Pills

50 years' increasing British reputation has proved them to be the safe, sure and speedy remedy for Wind on the Stomach, Indigestion, Biliousness, Sick Headache, Palpitation, Depression, Nervousness, Languor, &c. Sold by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ & 2/9, or post free for price from Page Woodcock, Ltd., 14 and 16, Euston Buildings, N.W. (late of Lincoln).

SMITHS'

To Asthma Sufferers.

Instant relief is gained in all cases of Asthma, Bronchitis, Croup, and Whooping Cough, by the use of POTTER'S ASTHMA CURE. Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists in Tins at 1/-. Test it free of charge. Send post-card to POTTER & CLARKE, Wholesale Druggists, Artillery Lane, London, E., for Free Sample Kindly mention this paper.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 13½d. tins everywhere.

PAWNBROKER'S SALE

Every article in new condition.

SUITABLE FOR PRESENTS.

A full list sent post free on application.

SAVE £ d S

13/6 Gent's magnificent 18-ct. Gold-cased Chronograph Stop Watch, jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper, 10 years' written warranty; also fashionable curb (pocket to pocket) double Albert same quality (stamped and guaranteed), with handsome seal attached; three together.

12/6 Lady's handsome 18-carat gold-cased Keyless Watch, jewelled movement; exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also fashionable long watch-guard, same quality (stamped and guaranteed) elegant West-End pattern the two together

14/9 Furs.—Magnificent Alexandra Dagmar necklet and muff; beautiful real Russian sable hair, worth 4 guineas, not been worn; sacrifice for 14/9; approval willingly.

19/6 Genuine Italian Mandoline, by Stridente, Naples; fine tone; 21 ribbed, real rosewood, pearl and tortoiseshell inlaid, in saddler-made case; approval.

21/- Fine Old Violin, by Pietro Antorious: magnificent rich solo tone; in perfect condition, with fully mounted bow and case; approval.

10/6 Lustrous diamond and ruby Half-hoop Ring, set with 5 matchless doublet rubies and 8 real diamonds; solid gold, hall-marked.

7/6 Curb Chain Bracelet, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case.

6/9 Brooch; very handsome 18-carat rolled gold, 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls in case.

21/- Lady's solid gold Keyless Watch, jewelled in 10 rubies, beautifully engraved case, splendid time-keeper; 10 years' written warranty; week's free trial.

8/6 Fashionable Long Neck-chain; genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished; very choice design.

9/6 Organ Toned Melodeon; magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, and 4 acting stops, including Tremolo and Diapason action; rich powerful tone, perfect order.

9/6 Necklet with Heart Pendant, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern; heart set with pearls and turquoise.

12/6 Magnificent 5-row Pearl Collarette; finest quality, mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case.

Any of the above articles sent on approval willingly.

R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller, 284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

Ask your grocer for

EPPS'S

(The most nutritious)

COCOA

And take no other.

Secrets of Youth.

How to have a beautiful face and figure. How to have beautiful eyes and hair. How to curl the hair naturally without curling pins or tongs. Little people can be made tall. Noses that are red or ugly shape can be cured, and looks greatly improved.

This Pretty Book will be sent FREE. Ask for "BEAUTY'S BOUDOIR." Stamp must be sent for postage. Peralia Perfumery Co. (Dept. 14) 73 Camden Street, North Shields, Eng

EARN A BICYCLE

distributing circulars and taking orders from sample machine furnished by us. Active Agents wanted in each district. Large profits easily made. Highest grade fully warranted

BRITISH MADE CYCLES

LATEST MODELS £2-10 to £6.

New Departure Coaster Hubs, Dunlop licensed Tyres, and best British-made equipment throughout.

200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES

all makes, £1 to £2-10.

good as new,

Great factory clearing sale at half factory prices. We send on approval and allow ten day's free trial on every cycle. Money with carriage charges refunded without question if not perfectly satisfactory. Write at once for free catalogue and our special offer.

Tyres, Accessories, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonographs, &c., at half usual prices.

MEAD CYCLE CO. (Dept. 44E),

85-97 Paradise St., Liverpool, 19 Charing Cross Rd., London.

TO CURE DRUNKARDS

without their knowledge, send stamp for FREE TRIAL PACKAGE of a wonderful remedy that has saved homes. Send no money. Address in confidence. WARD CHEMICAL CO., 51 Century House, Regent Street, London, W.

Chilblains

Icilma Natural Water Soap prevents and cures Chilblains, Chaps, and Gouty Irritations of the Skin. Rose-scented. Price 10d. Send 2d. stamps for Samples of Soap and of Icilma Fluor Cream, perfect for the complexion against cold winds.—ICILMA (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

PART 1. READY JANUARY 26.

Ask Your Newsagent

to let you see a copy of PART 1. of

PEARSON'S HOME MANAGEMENT

Edited by ISOBEL of "HOME NOTES."

To be issued in TWELVE FORTNIGHTLY parts.

Price 7d. net each.

This work is the most thoroughly up-to-date and exhaustive work on HOUSEHOLD MANAGEMENT ever published, and contains 12 Beautiful coloured illustrations, upwards of 54 full-page Illustrations, together with a very large number of Cuts in the Text.

The parts may be obtained at all Railway Book stalls, Booksellers and Newsagents, or of

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD.,

17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ON THE WELL-INFORMED WOMAN.

THE majority of her less up-to-date sisters envy the well-informed woman, and they do so with reason—she is never at a loss for conversation, no matter what society she may be in—that is the whole secret of the matter. She can talk with women on all that interests women, and she can express an intelligent opinion on those many matters of topical interest which appeal, particularly, perhaps, to men. Her husband, coming home from business, finds no desire to go out to his club for the discussion of this or that important question—his wife is there to delight him with her ready grasp of the chief points of the matter. Decidedly, the well-informed woman is a woman to be envied.

And yet the acquisition of knowledge, desirable though it is, is one rather difficult of attainment. Politics are interesting when it comes to a government being thrown out; international quarrelling is interesting when it comes to war—but all the events which lead up to these crises make, as a rule, but dry reading. And so the average woman "skips" the long, dry newspaper reports, and, consequently, when the climax comes—knows nothing about it, and bitterly regrets the fact.

On the 12th of this month such a state of affairs is going to be no longer possible!

On that day there will appear the first number of a new monthly periodical, entitled THE RAPID REVIEW.

On its cover you will see a picture of the world with, written across it, the magazine's title—THE RAPID REVIEW. And this is exactly symbolical of its contents and scope. It is a monthly review of the world—of its thought and progress—and it is a rapid review. Political matters, foreign affairs, Parliamentary doings—all these are full of interest when treated in the right way—in the way in which they will be treated by THE RAPID REVIEW.

Yes, and that is only one point. Do not imagine that THE RAPID REVIEW is going to be simply a political magazine—far from it; it is going to treat interestingly much lighter matters.

Every month, for example, when you have read THE RAPID REVIEW you will have read all the reviews, all the magazines, all the periodicals. For it will contain extracts from all the most interesting articles of the month—extracts which will be full of entertainment in themselves, and which will have the further advantage of helping you to buy just the magazines which you know will interest you, and of preventing you from wasting your money on those which will not.

And it will be just the same with the latest books, the latest plays, the latest music. THE RAPID REVIEW will be a guide-book to all these things, and a guide-book very nearly as interesting as the originals themselves. In fact, very often it will be more interesting, for it will give you the best parts of everything—the kernal of the nut, without the shell.

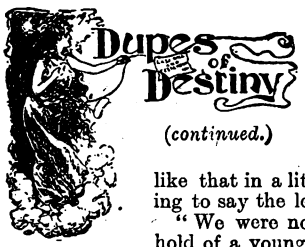
Nor is this by any means all; for now we come to yet another feature which clinches the matter. No woman who wishes to keep in touch with the thought and progress, the doings and the sayings of her sisters all the world over, can possibly afford to miss THE RAPID REVIEW.

Turn, when you buy your first copy, to the feature under the heading "Woman's Work and Interests." There you will find bright and brief résumés of all the work and progress accomplished by women during the past month. Extracts from their writings, their speeches, and their lectures; reviews of their meetings, their employment, their sports—in fact, of all their interests.

So that, whether a woman cares to take an interest in the weightier matters of current interest or not, she will at least find in THE RAPID REVIEW very many other features which are bound to interest her.

And so, let us in conclusion put forward a definition: What is a well-informed woman?—The woman who reads THE RAPID REVIEW.

Digitized by Google



(continued.)

black beard in a louder key. "Now I must begin again. With that man loose, my own liberty and all I enjoy are in jeopardy. I came down here with Winter the moment your wire reached me. To fail like that in a little thing is infernally annoying to say the least."

"We were not to blame if you let us get hold of a young tiger for strenght," growled the other man. "The Vicar thought a clergyman would be as easy to manage as a kitten."

"Instead of which he found you as easy as kittens," sneered the other voice. "Well, he will now be on his guard and more difficult to trap—but trapped he must be. Is there a traitor among you lot at Water Grange?" he asked sharply.

"Only the 'Vicar's' girl. She's left to-day, though, to get work in London!" was the reply.

"Ah!" breathed the man with the black beard. "That's it, his handsome face has got round her, and she helped him to get off! The 'Vicar's' a fool for keeping her there!"

"If the 'Vicar' thought Lottie had betrayed him he would kill her," Boulter said savagely.

"It's too late to lock the stable door when the horse is stolen," snarled his companion. "Anyway, I shall be in town some days myself, and will watch for him. He will not return immediately to his curacy, but there is one house he may visit to get news of Marcella Rust. I will meet him there, I know." He laughed softly. "In the meantime be careful to notify me what happens—within a short time something is bound to be known. And, remember, you cannot be too careful. They have not dropped the search for the instigator of the 'Mona Lisa' deal. Leave no trail behind you that can be picked up, and be sure to stick to the signal, the sign of the"—here his voice was lowered again, and Philip was left in a maze of doubt and wonder as to who this black-bearded stranger could be, whose enmity he seemed to have also aroused.

They moved away, and he followed at a safe distance, then they parted—the man with the beard getting into a passing hansom, the other going on foot. Philip gazed after the hansom thoughtfully, until it was lost in the maze of traffic, then he started. He had reached the kerb where the bearded man had stopped the hansom, on the ground was a little piece of twisted paper. He stooped and picked it up curiously. It was a telegram; the part with the address was torn off, but the message was intact: "Bird flown—cage empty—no trace—send message in cipher.—Vicar."

"Phew!" Philip murmured, "so the 'Vicar' was waiting for orders, was he? I am glad I have seen his worthy colleague—I know a little of their movements. What's this?"—his foot had touched something on the ground, where he had seen the piece of paper. It was a coin of some sort. He looked at it closely in the dim light; it was strange that no one should have noticed the man with the beard drop it when he got into the hansom. As he looked he uttered an exclamation of surprise. The coin in his hand was a spade guinea!

"By Jove! What an odd sort of coin to be dropped at one's feet!" he muttered—then laughed. "It may bring me a slice of luck. I will throw it in the air and if it comes down with the shield up, I will chance everything and go to Marcella, in spite of her father's bitter enmity!" He threw the coin lightly in the air and caught it quickly. The shield was uppermost. Notwithstanding his disbelief in anything that depended on chance, he felt glad, in a happy, boyish way, that it had fallen as he had hoped.

"So be it!" he murmured. "I will go to-night. I shall find some means of seeing you, my darling love!"

He went back to his hotel, and there changed into his normal dress, putting the wig, eyebrows, beard, and moustache into his pocket. He felt that, once in the train, there would be no necessity for disguise until he left it, and no one would think of watching for him at Paddington; he knew that from what the bearded man had said. He took his ticket and was making for the refreshment room, when a slight touch on his arm roused him to a sudden regret that he had not kept up his disguise. He turned sharply to see a tall, beautifully-dressed woman standing beside him. Her face reminded him in a way of Marcella, and he looked at her with interest.

"I beg your pardon," he said politely, "did you wish to speak to me?"

She inclined her head, and then, speaking in a low, cautious voice, said: "You are Mr. Nullius—are you not?"

"I am," he answered slowly, wondering whether she were not also a decoy of the unknown enemy.

She saw the distrust in his eyes and coloured warmly.

"You have a right to suspect everyone, Mr. Nullius," she said softly, "but your distrust will go when I tell you that I am Marcella's aunt, Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox!" She had paused at her surname, remembering the new name she had had bestowed upon her by the millionaire, Caleb J. Johnson.

Philip's face brightened. "Lady Violet!" he exclaimed "How did you know me? I did not think you had ever seen me!"

"I saw you some time ago," she said quickly, then went on: "I came to the station to meet someone, and recognised you at once. How did you get away—tell me—was there danger?" she whispered anxiously.

He looked at her in surprise. How had Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox learnt that he had been lured to a den of rogues! She saw the expression on his face and said gently: "I guessed that you were in danger, Mr. Nullius, and found out, for Marcella's sake, where you were. I cannot tell you how I found out," she added, "but something told me that you were in danger—and—and I sent a—a friend to find you. Did anyone see you who came from me?" she said anxiously.

Philip shook his head. "No one seemed to be possessed with a great desire to help me," he said grimly, "with the exception of one person—but I am well out of it now, Lady Violet, and though I can't understand why I should be the object of so much attention, I fancy I shall not be annoyed again. I am going to Marcella."

"Going to Marcella," she echoed—her eyes flaming with a sudden light. "Thank God, Mr. Nullius, that you are! I hoped it was so, but waited until you mentioned it yourself. Promise me," she continued in a low, hurried whisper, "that, come what may, you will stay near Marcella always—don't be turned away; she wants you—your protection and love, more now than at any other period of her life. The danger that menaces Marcella is in the Court." She removed her hand from his arm, where she had placed it in her eagerness. "Good-bye, Mr. Nullius," she finished. "If you have any disguise, wear it. Don't go half way to meet danger; it is very near you now!"

She turned and moved away as abruptly as she had spoken to him, and as he took his seat in a first-class carriage, Philip found himself pondering over the words Lady Violet had breathed so earnestly into his ear. Danger at the Court! Danger for his beloved Marcella! Surely Sir Cyprian—then he paused, a man of Sir Cyprian's character would stick at nothing. He must be careful for Marcella's sake—he must not meet her father at the Court.

A sudden impulse caused him to lean out of the window of his carriage before the train started. He had quickly resumed his disguise, so feared no chance eye spotting him. On the platform he saw Lady Violet, and with her was a tall man, and as he saw the man more clearly, Philip gave an involuntary cry of amazement.

The man talking to Marcella's aunt was the same bearded stranger he had seen earlier in the evening with the man Boulter, and who had dropped a spade guinea on the pavement!

(Another long instalment of this serial next week.)

HANDWRITING DENOTES YOUR CHARACTER.

And if you wish to learn what this is send a specimen of your handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope, to Ranee, 23 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. A reliable delineation of your character will be sent in return.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

"Natty" Men and Marriage.

"Do natty men make good husbands?" asks "PERPLEXED." "My young man is the neatest, tidiest man I ever knew, particularly about his personal appearance and dress. I should almost call him 'finicking.' I love him very dearly, but am rather afraid this quality of his may make him a tiresome husband."

* * * * *

I don't very much care for the "natty" man myself. From the wife's point of view, though, he should be pleasing, as he is unlikely to cause her extra work by untidiness, and may perhaps help her very much in keeping the house as it should be. But, in my experience, I find that "nattiness" does not, as a rule, last very long after marriage. Though a man may take no end of trouble about himself when he alone is in charge of matters, when he finds that there is a wife handy to do things, quite likely he falls off very considerably. In a year or two he may lose all that "finicking" way of his. How often is it that the neatest, sprucest single man becomes untidy and careless after marriage. So I do not think "PERPLEXED" and her beloved need think of separating on this trivial score, for things will probably turn out all right in the end.

Dressmaking and Married Life.

"SOPHIE" writes: "I am a business girl, and engaged to a clerk with a small salary. When we marry, would you advise me to help matters by taking in dressmaking—at which I am rather clever? I have asked other people about this, but they advise me not to, as they think it would interfere with my other household duties, and also, later on, with my care for any children we may have. I should very much like to know your opinion on the subject."

* * * * *

I should think your husband-to-be would be the best judge of the matter. If his means are really very slender, then what you might earn would perhaps help you both a great deal. Of course, it is quite true that dressmaking does interfere with a woman's home duties. If unable to keep a servant, too, she would soon find that the strain of housekeeping as well as dressmaking would break down her health. It would certainly interfere with her care of children. So, "SOPHIE" had better decide the matter with her fiancé. In any case, it is a very good thing to have such an accomplishment as dressmaking, if the family should in future be in any financial trouble. It would always keep the wolf from the door, if ever there should arise a case of urgent necessity.

Propose or Postpone?

"Q." sails for South America very shortly. While in Britain, he has, he thinks, fallen in love with a girl. He is not quite sure of feelings, but thinks if he knew her longer he would certainly be devoted to her, and she to him. Would I advise him, under the circumstances, to propose before going abroad, or to postpone it until he returns, say, two years hence. By that time he expects to have an assured business position, which he has not at present.

* * * * *

I advise "Q." not to propose. He is not, he says, sure of either his own or the girl's feelings, and to bind himself and her to an engagement during his two years' absence, would be unfair to both of them. Let him wait until he returns, though it is two years from now.

Two Eighteen-Year-Olds.

"Is a man in love if he does not, after fourteen months' courtship, take his sweetheart home to meet his family?" "ANXIOUS" asks this question, as her lover, while always talking of his love and their marriage, has not yet introduced her to his people. They are both eighteen.

* * * * *

He may quite possibly be very much in love. But a youth of eighteen might, quite naturally, be reluctant to take his sweetheart home. While I hope you will both continue to love each other, you are very young to talk of an engagement, and no doubt the reason he has not taken you home is that either his people are ignorant of your courtship, or opposed to it. Wait until you are both a little older before you think about marriage. When you are in a position to think of it, no doubt he will introduce you to his people.

The Casual Acquaintance.

"I TRAVELLED from Plymouth the other day," writes "W. E.," "and in the same carriage met a very charming young lady. I made some passing remark about opening the window, and as a result we got into conversation. By the time we reached our destination, we seemed to know all about each other, and to be very good friends. Now, what I wish to know is: Ought I to endeavour to resume her acquaintance? Or would that be resented by her as taking advantage of her? By-the-way, though she gave me no address or name, I think I could easily trace her again."

* * * * *

If the girl did not give you her name and address, and in any way hint that she wished to resume your acquaintance, of course it is not for you to make overtures. At the same time, if you think you could find her, it would not be a bad idea to try to meet her again by accident. Such things have been done by ardent lovers, times out of number. By-the-way, I happened to know some years ago of a similar case. The man was travelling in the same carriage as a girl, and they got very friendly. The man knew that he could not ask the girl her name and address outright, but he somehow managed to get it by other means. The girl was reading a certain book. The man, on seeing it, pretended that it was the one book he wished to read. At the end of the journey, the girl promised to lend it to him—giving her name and address for its return. When he sent the book back, he wrote a little note, which the girl answered. A correspondence sprung up, which led to meetings, and not a very great time elapsed before the two became engaged.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

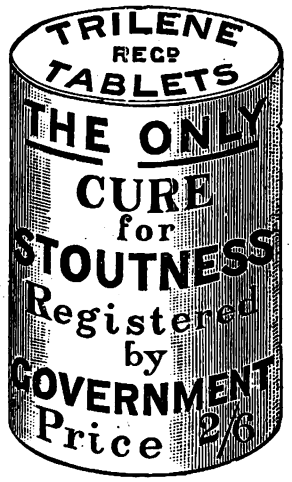
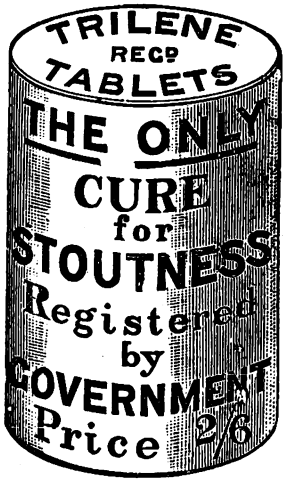
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."



Send 2s. 6d. to Mr. T. Wells, THE TRILENE CO., 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.

"Yours faithfully, J. B. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Liatorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18lb. during the cure.

Mr. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st. 8lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

Mrs. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

Mrs. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagillt, Wales, writes Nov. 22nd, 1898: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 29 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mrs. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9½st. and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have done a world good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets.

Miss JANE CARTER of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest value. I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

Mr. THOS BLAKELY, of 37 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

THE TRILENE COMPANY, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

None can have a Well-Balanced Constitution without taking BEECHAM'S PILLS.

All people subject to Bilious attacks, or who suffer from stomachic disorders, should never be without a box of BEECHAM'S PILLS.

The Stomach is toned up, and its proper action secured and maintained. The Bowels are made to act with quiet regularity, and the functions of the Kidneys are vastly improved.

The gigantic success and genuine worth of BEECHAM'S PILLS are known all over the world, and the proof of their excellence lies in the fact that they are generally adopted as the Family Medicine after the first trial.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

by their purifying effect upon the Blood cleanse and vivify the entire system, causing every organ of the body healthfully to continue its allotted function, thereby inducing a perfectly balanced condition, and making life a pleasure.

BEECHAM'S PILLS . .

are specially suitable for females of all ages. Every woman who values health should read the instructions wrapped round each box.

BEECHAM'S PILLS . .

maintain their reputation for keeping people in Good Health and Good Condition, and have stood the test of the most exacting experience through many years.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, 1s. 1½d. (56 Pills), and 2s. 9d. (168 Pills).

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 790. Week Ending February 20, 1904. Price One Penny.

"I will never marry him! As he once rejected me, so do I now reject him!" she cried.

(A Thrilling Incident from the Dramatic Story "The Revenge of Barbara Walker." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE

The purest and most efficient Remedy procurable for
COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, CATARRH, WEAK LUNGS, and CHILDREN'S COUGHS.

BRONCHITIS AND ASTHMA

Veno's Lightning Cough Cure
Produces its most brilliant effect in Chronic Bronchitis and Asthma. It effects astonishing cures in the worst and most persistent cases.
Rev. W. W. TULLOCH, D.D., Bonar Bridge, Sutherlandshire, writes: "July 22nd, '03.—I have been a martyr to asthma all my life and lately to chronic winter bronchitis. I have found Veno's Lightning Cough Cure a valuable medicine."

CHILDREN'S COUGHS

Mrs. ADA S. BALLIN, 5, Agar Street, London, Editor "Womanhood," and a great authority upon children's diseases, writes:—"Veno's Lightning Cough Cure is an exceedingly successful remedy; it is very pleasant to take and the relief it gives is very rapid. The preparation is perfectly safe for children."

W. LASCELLES-SCOTT, F.R.M.S., in his Certificate of Analysis among other things says:—"I have pleasure in certifying that in my opinion VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH COUGH is an exceptionally pure, safe, and effective preparation

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES 9½d. Regular Sizes, 1/1½ and 2/9.

Ask for VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE at Chemists and Drug Stores, or post free from the VENO DRUG CO., Hulme, Manchester, England.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache and Neuralgia.

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Kaputine is not a single crude drug such as has been condemned as dangerous by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients, having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The SAFE Remedy.

Kaputine is the only preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and infirmaries. Proof positive of its superior and sterling qualities.

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1½;

Samples 1d. each.

Kindly mention this paper.

J. G. GRAVES' COSTUMES

J. G. GRAVES' Handsome Fashion Book of Mantles and Costumes is sent Post Free, and fully illustrates the present Season's Designs. All Garments are sent subject to approval, and accounts may be paid by Easy Monthly Instalments, or Important Advantages to Cash Customers.

ASK FOR CATALOGUE No. 4.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., Sheffield.

GIVEN AWAY

with this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 527)

A PAPER PATTERN of this

Jack Tar Suit.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY!

This Phenomenal Offer is made to the readers of "Short Stories," 20/2/1904. On receipt of Postal Order for 5/-, we will forward, Direct from our Looms to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in 30 different patterns and art colourings, to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for our goods below the actual cost of production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, thus saving the purchasers all middle profits.

OVER 200,000 SOLD DURING THE PAST 12 MONTHS.
GIVEN AWAY! GIVEN AWAY!

With every Carpet we shall Absolutely Give Away a very handsome Rug to match, or we will send 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs for 9/6.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

Thousands of Repeat Orders and Unsolicited Testimonials Received.

Illustrated Bargain Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Table Linen Curtains, &c., post free.

F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.) Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants.
WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Sale Price: 3/6 Postage 4d. extra.

Free Gifts. Sizes: 38, 40, 42.

F. HODGSON & SONS, City of Leeds, will Present Free to every reader of Short Stories, 20/2/1904.

carriage paid, on receipt of postal order for 3/6, with stamps 4d. extra, for postage, for one of our Ladies' Beautiful Tailor Made Cloth Costume Skirts, in Serge Dress Black or Navy, richly trimmed with mercerised silkette straplings, and fitted with good linenette pocket. We shall include FREE with each Skirt a Massive 18-ct. Gold Pattern Curb Bracelet, with Heart Pendant, mounted with Pearls and Turquoise, and scented with Forget-me-Nots. Cased with Pure Gold.

Money willingly returned if not approved. Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Curtains, &c., post free.

Address: F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.), Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

BODLEIAN 17.2.1904 LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 790.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending February 20th, 1904.

Her Desperate Venture.

The Tale of a Desecrated Ideal.

THE brilliant October morning, promising so much, had clouded over. Valerie Blanchard declined going for a walk; the wind did not improve her complexion at nine-and-twenty as it had at nineteen. She half envied insignificant Doris Norwood, who would come back all abloom like a wild rose, her bluish-grey eyes full of violet lights. Youth was charming, and there could be but one youth.

"I have a headache," she said, sharply.

"But it may cure your headache, and freshen you up a bit."

All such illusions, however innocently made, held a sting for her now.

"No, run along by yourself, Doris! I shall go to bed. It looks as if a storm might blow up."

"And a storm will spoil the foliage. I must see the hills once more in their glory."

Doris tripped down the wide lawn path bordered with chrysanthemums, with a wall of late dahlias at the back. Miss Blanchard went to her room. The grate fire was laid, and she touched a match to it. The apartment was soon in a glow. She did not go to bed, but dropped into a capacious arm-chair.

To-day was her birthday. Her cousin, Ellen Norwood, had forgotten, for which Valerie felt thankful. Just now she was at odds with the world, with life, with everything. A handsome woman, whose triumphant girlhood lay behind her, whose later triumphs were as nothing, now they had passed, and whose future——

She had come to this dull little Westborough to consider and decide it; to economise in purse and in strength, after a wearing summer campaign, and to make up her mind to marry Digby Kemp. He was old—past sixty—and there was much that was artificial about him. He was rich and luxurious, always travelled with a valet and a man, if he took his horses. Twenty years before he had buried his wife and his son. Since then he had been constantly in Society. He had a handsome town house, and gave elegant dinners to his lady friends, with some unexceptional matron to play propriety. Women had tried their utmost for him, and so far failed.

Miss Blanchard had not tried, but he had made her an urgent offer with generous settlements. At first she was quite incredulous, and suspected some ulterior motive. She was an elegant, well-trained Society woman, and when made up did not look a day over twenty-five—was indeed regal.

All rights reserved.]

She had been extravagant, and some losses had made rather startling inroads upon her capital. She did not like poverty. This little round in which her cousin lived would kill her. Of course it was restful, and just what she needed now.

Next year she would be thirty. Looking over that was like peering down a chasm. The best of single life would be gone. If she were not tall, stately and imperious, she would have been relegated to the wall ere this. So far she had held her own bravely. What did it all amount to? The flower of young marriageable men were not for her. There were widowers and somewhat passé bachelors—and love was at a discount. Did she care to be loved? Why, Digby Kemp was certain he loved her with the fervour of youth. How much of the fervour of middle life had he wasted on pretty actresses? Faugh!

She never said to herself she had been waiting a whole year for a sign, and that now her hope was like a little heap of grey ashes. Nothing could kindle the hope again; but the sting of the old love remained. Had she never met anyone equal to that youthful lover? Well, she had never loved anyone in that fashion since, though she had played with love, and more than one heart had been laid at her feet. She had tried to forget. Yet a year ago her pulses suddenly thrilled and the flame leapt up anew, at a few lines she saw in a paper. Yes, over a year she had waited. He had not married. She had read of men and women who had waited half a lifetime with no absolute promise between them. And this had been only ten years, ten fast-flying, delightful years.

Why could she not make up her mind to answer Mr. Kemp? She had pleaded for a month, and three weeks were gone already. It was time she was married. Here she could still be a queen in the fashionable world. What utter folly to hesitate!

The room grew warmer. A soft drowsiness pervaded her nerves and brain. Outside long, black drifts went scurrying across the sky, each one breaking into a gust of wind that racketed like a tornado, creaking and groaning through the trees, and sweeping up the falling leaves in great windrows. It was only a vague music floating through her sleepy senses. Then something roused her. A confusion of voices and sounds of hurrying, scraping feet in the wide porch startled her. She sprang to the window. The door opened, and there was a shriek. She hurried down the wide stairs, and stood in the hall dazed and speechless, as her eyes met those of the lover of her youth.

He was the first to recover.

Digitized by Google

"I am answerable for a sad accident, I fear," he began in a grave tone of concern. "We have Miss Norwood—how much she is hurt we cannot tell. I have sent for the physician. We judged it best to bring her home at once——"

"Yes."

She stood like one in a dream. A tall, regal woman in the affluence of mature beauty, her complexion softened by the warmth and touch of slumber, her eyes dewy, her lips in beguiling scarlet curves; her white cashmere gown trailing around her in billowy softness, the lace open at the neck and showing her shapely throat; and her slim, fair hands dropped at her side.

"Where shall we take her?" said one of the bearers of the improvised stretcher.

"Oh! Yes—to her room, I think," rousing herself. "This way."

She preceded them upstairs, and opened the door of a large room that Doris shared with her mother. There was a wide Turkish couch, and they laid her on this.

"Her mother——" Boyd Jeffries began.

"Mrs. Norwood is out—attending some church meeting. Is she——" Miss Blanchard shuddered.

"She is unconscious. She was startled by the report of a gun, I judged, and a young tree she grasped for support gave way. She came crashing down at our feet. The shot was in another direction. There must have been a landslip some hours before; there was an accumulation of fresh earth we noticed as we were passing. You had better summon her mother," he said, authoritatively.

Miss Blanchard turned.

"Give me the message," said the man who had helped to bring her in. "It will be on my way."

Valerie Blanchard began to recover her presence of mind. With gentle touches she divested the girlish figure of its wrappings.

"There is a faint pulsation," remarked Jeffries. "What a sweet, innocent child's face! It looks like a bit of sculpture."

"She is hardly more than a child. I ought not to have let her go—at least I ought——"

Jeffries bit his lip and frowned unconsciously. Miss Blanchard was trying restoratives and chafing the dimpled hands, several shades browner than her own. There had been so much between these two, and yet he would rather have gone to the world's end than have met her, and she would gladly have gone to the world's end to meet him. It had come about by the purest accident; yet as they stood there they might better have been the veriest strangers with no past between them.

He could not go. The commonest politeness compelled him to remain and apologise for his unwitting share of the transaction; and his own interest in the result held him. For many minutes no word was spoken. All Miss Blanchard's delicate efforts were fruitless.

"You were out hunting?" she ventured presently. The silence seemed insupportable.

"Yes." Briefly, and without raising his eyes from Miss Norwood's face.

She hated the child bitterly. She had treated her with the rather contemptuous tender tolerance one gives to a pretty kitten. Did she recognise a possible rival? If this man had waited ten years and loved no other woman, must there not have been something—and now for this chit to come between! Valerie had never studied the face before. It was a rather short oval, with a low brow clustered about with bronze-brown tendrilly curls. The lids of the closed eyes were almost transparent, and defined the shape of the long eyeballs. They were edged with a long, silken fringe. A small, straight nose, lovely lips, and a rounded chin that sloped down to the white throat. An insignificant little thing she had considered her. Yet she was really beautiful with the budding sweetness of first youth.

"Are you staying at Westborough?" she asked after another silence.

He glanced up inquiringly. Whatever he had meant to say died away on his lips, and he merely answered, "Yes," again.

"He is bitterly resentful," she thought.

There was a diversion in the embarrassing interview, a swift rustle up the stairs, and Mrs. Norwood came flying in with a shriek as she threw herself beside the couch.

"No, she is not dead," he said. "Believe me, madam. As soon as the doctor comes——"

The carriage drove up. Jeffries ran down and held a few moments' conversation with him, briefly explaining the manner of the fall. She had struck on her shoulder on the soft earth, but what had happened in her downward descent they could not tell.

"I will wait here. You may need a steady hand if there are any bones broken. And I shall be anxious to hear the verdict."

Dr. Fields bowed. Jeffries paced up and down under the large trees. A fine, drizzling rain had set in. The air was chilly and penetrating, but the man's pulses hammered all his being to a strange white heat. He had come upon Valerie Blanchard utterly unprepared, and the resolves, the hatred, the contempt had almost died as he remembered his olden infatuation.

"I wonder why she has not married?" he said hoarsely to himself. "A woman like that does not go begging. There was the talk about the French marquis—the family was impoverished, to be sure, and old French castles are wanting in comforts. Ten years is a long while. She was just nineteen, I remember. She said she would wait. But she was engaged to Fessenden—that I am certain of. I wonder——"

He gnawed the end of his moustache, and drew his brows into a savage frown. Did any point of honour hold him? What an unfortunate episode to meet in this way! He had counted on seeing her someone's wife, if he saw her at all. And to find her the same, perhaps—no, not the same, after all these years.

It was quite dark when Dr. Fields came down.

"It is concussion of the brain and a dislocated shoulder. I cannot tell just yet, but I do not anticipate anything fatal. And the superb coolness and presence of mind of the girl staying with them is worth everything. I shall look in about nine this evening, but I do not count on any change. Jump in with me."

Jeffries sprang in and shivered as he settled himself. Then he exclaimed suddenly:

"But I thought——"

"They are best let alone for the present. The mother is almost wild. Miss Blanchard will do and say all that is necessary."

"I am taking you out of your way——"

"Not at all. I was going over to Kingswood when the man came. So I shall pass Old Place on my way."

"You are quite sure Miss Norwood——"

"There is every reason for hoping. She is young and her frame is elastic, but I am not sure that it is a sensible thing to go wandering about in dangerous places. They have been taking out sand, and the point above had caved in. The prospect is fine, and it is a favourite walk. There are some beautiful wild flowers. But its insecurity must be understood."

"I'll send some men out in the morning to render it less dangerous. Here we are at Old Place. Thank you."

Jeffries walked up the broad avenue lined with tall elms. There had been generations of Jeffries here. After newer homes had been built this had been termed "The Old Place," and finally the article had been dropped. For several years it had been in the care of a keeper while its owner was abroad. He had died at length, and during the past summer it had been opened and renovated by the heir, a nephew, who had passed some of his early years in its sheltering walls.

Valerie Blanchard came out at her very best in this sudden disaster. Society training had not been quite worthless, since it had given her steady nerves, and a kind of disciplined brain. She restrained Mrs. Norwood's passionate anxiety and frantic forebodings. She was soothing, really gentle, a kind of grand gentleness that held one in check. And now she was minded to make herself not only necessary but really admirable.

Digitized by Google

Presently she brought up a dainty little tea, and in spite of Mrs. Norwood's indifference, she tempted her into sipping the tea and eating the toast.

"It will not do to waste your strength in the beginning," she said kindly.

Then they waited. Mrs. Norwood paced the floor until Valerie, with gentle insistence, drew a chair to a point where she could watch Doris, and be in range of the cheerful fire. She took up a book, but now and then said a comforting thing to the poor mother. And so the slow hours toiled on till the doctor came.

"She looks so like death," and Mrs. Norwood's voice quivered with fear.

"But she is not dead. Indeed, I trust she is a long way from it. Everything about her is more favourable than it was five hours ago. Will you remain with her through the night?"

This to Miss Blanchard.

"Oh! thank you!" she cried. "I would gladly suffer it all over again for that result."

"Most assuredly," with a slight inclination of the beautiful head, and eyes full of sympathy.

"When she wakes, answer her questions with no air of mystery, but do not let her waste her strength in talking. Fever may supervene—then she is to have this medicine. But if she is quiet, do not disturb her. To-morrow we may count confidently on a change—I do not really expect it before. But note the slightest variation in her. If she appears to be sinking, give her this." He touched the second phial.

Both women settled to their watch. Past midnight, Mrs. Norwood succumbed to the fatigue and anxiety and drowsed. Valerie seemed as if she would never sleep again. She was almost breathless with retrospection. She had been a little weak in that old time. She should have held him more securely! She might have known his uncle would relent, all the sooner, perhaps, if she had married him. But the certainty of poverty appalled her then. Now, as she thought her life over, it seemed rather singular that she had not married. Was there some curious interposition of Fate? It gave her a sense of exultation.

When the doctor came in the next morning, Valerie was curiously fresh, and evinced no trace of fatigue.

"She has moved of her own accord," Miss Blanchard announced. "Half an hour ago she opened her eyes."

"That is promising. Now I am going to dismiss you two ladies for an hour. Mrs. Norwood had better go to bed at once. You are a marvel," and Dr. Fields smiled. "But there will be more real nursing presently."

"Dissipation may have its wise purposes. I am quite used to being up at night," and Valerie gave him a half-deprecating, half-enchanting, look.

"Your steady nerves have been invaluable. But for you, I must have remained myself. The one most interested at such a crisis is the one least to be depended upon. I saw your courage. It speaks in every gesture. And one doesn't always meet it conjoined with ready sympathy. Go now, and get a little rest."

"I will be back in an hour," she said softly, with an appreciative deference that had found its way to more than one man's heart.

Valerie was as good as her word. The mother was asleep.

"She has spoken," said Dr. Fields, "though she does not remember what has occurred. She is not out of danger, but all the chances are in favour of her recovery."

Down the road a short distance he met Mr. Jeffries and announced the good tidings to him in a few words.

"It will be safe to call this afternoon," he said.

Valerie Blanchard stationed herself at the window, where she could watch the callers. Mrs. Norwood had risen, much refreshed. Luncheon was past, and the dull, rough sky showed signs of clearing. A few anxious inquiries were settled with messages. Then Mrs. Norwood went down to meet the rector's wife, and she was lingering in the porch when Jeffries walked up the path. Valerie frowned savagely. She had trusted to her woman's wit to manage this interview, and it had been snatched out of her very hands. How long it seemed! What were they talking about all this time?

Mrs. Norwood had praised her warmly. Boyd Jeffries had expressed his sincere regret for the accidental part he had taken in what might have proved a tragedy. He hoped to be allowed to send Miss Doris some choice fruit and flowers, and see her presently, when she could receive visitors.

"You will be most welcome at any time. And I cannot see that it was your fault, since you did not fire the shot."

"The old story of poor dog Tray," and he smiled. "I have never been especially fond of shooting innocent birds, and shall eschew such pastime in the future, I assure you."

"What a long call Mr. Jeffries made!" Valerie cried, rather impatiently, as Mrs. Norwood entered the room. "Was he duly penitent?"

"It was not his fault. And he has sent his men out to the woods to-day to take down the treacherous edge, though it is not absolutely his affair. He is really charming."

"You have known him—how long?"

"Why, I have not known him at all. Old Place has been shut up four or five years, and we have only been here three, you know. Last autumn Mr. Jeffries was brought here for burial, and there was some gossip about the young man—though he is thirty or past. There was some difficulty years ago—a love affair, I believe, and the young man quarrelled with his uncle, and went away. Later on they had some odd kind of encounter on the Continent, and became friends again, and he was devoted to his uncle after that. There is a great deal of property, I believe. The old gentleman was very rich. Old Place has been greatly improved. The Jeffries' estate consisted of a great deal of the river front, which is now very valuable, since Westborough has become a thriving town."

Digitized by Google

"And the girl who was the cause of the—whom the difference was about, I mean?"

"Oh, no one knows anything about her. She was quite a Society belle, I believe. I daresay she was married long ago."

Valerie Blanchard considered some moments.

"In such cases the woman—the girl—is often blamed. In this case—she has married no one. If he had listened to her, much of the trouble might have been averted."

"You knew her?" Mrs. Norwood ejaculated, in surprise. Then she studied her cousin intently.

"I knew her, yes. Both were very young. He was dependent upon his uncle, who, wisely enough, considered them too young to marry. She was willing to wait. He insisted on an immediate marriage, and that she should trust to his energy and industry. She saw that such a step would wreck his life at once, and perhaps break kindly relations with his uncle. So she withstood his eager pleading. He was irritated with her, quarrelled with his uncle, went abroad in some capacity, and for awhile was lost to sight. Then the difficulty with his uncle was made up. But the other——"

"Why, he owes her some reparation, surely!" cried Mrs. Norwood indignantly. "Has he never sought her out? Perhaps she would not receive him!"

"He has never made the slightest overture. Since old Mr. Jeffries' death he has been quite free, even if he felt himself bound by duty until then."

"Oh, the poor girl! Can you not do something for her, Valerie? He doesn't seem like a man who could be so cruel! And he must know that she has waited for him."

"You think I might—that I ought to try? There is an old proverb that 'It's ill-meddling with other people's love affairs.'"

"I shouldn't mind proverbs. Why, he ought to give her the opportunity to accept him, if she cared to. He might not know if she has remained single all these years. Yes, I should try"—and a soft flush of eagerness lighted Mrs. Norwood's face.

"Ellen, I beg of you to keep this secret, even from Doris. I am not sure I had a right to betray it. And I think—if I can find an opportunity——"

"Oh, you shall find that!" She smiled a little.

That afternoon Doris seemed to awake from a troubled sleep. She watched her mother for many seconds.

"Mamma!" faintly. "Is it you? Where have I been? I feel so strange and weak."

"Yes, dear. You have been ill. But you are better now, and will soon be well again."

Then Doris closed her eyes, and drowsed off to dreamless slumber.

For several days there was little alteration. Valerie was an indefatigable nurse. Dr. Fields sounded her praises enthusiastically, was indeed fascinated with her himself. Mrs. Norwood felt conscience-smitten that she had never known her worth before. Their paths had lain in such different directions. Mr. Norwood had been an engineer, and Mrs. Norwood's marriage had practically shut her out of the sphere in which she might have moved.

Her husband's death had reduced her to poverty, but soon after this an old aunt, whose favourite he had been, left all her fortune to Doris, charged with a life-right to the mother. This consisted of a pretty old-fashioned but substantial house, with two acres of land in lawn and garden, and some bank and railway stock. Several of her relatives had looked her up to congratulate her. She and Miss Blanchard had crossed each other's orbit accidentally, and Valerie had come to Westborough as a place of refuge while she was settling her future plans, though she put it down to a desire to find some quiet place in which to recruit. Now that she had heard Boyd Jeffries' brief story, she recalled the fact that his uncle, who had made such havoc with their youthful attachment, lived in a small manufacturing town. Had Fate interposed signally in her behalf?

It was comforting to think so. Yet the matter must be entirely taken into her own hands, she foresaw. She must make the first advances. He was in no haste to see her. He called every day, but never asked for her, and only twice entered the house. But Valerie Blanchard was wary and patient where she had an object to gain. She made herself attractive to the doctor by her womanly sweetness and intuitive knowledge or appreciation. And Mrs. Norwood was beginning to be strangely fascinated. She was the more ready to be generous because she fancied she had been unjust in her first impressions.

"I want you to see Mr. Jeffries," she said, one morning. "He knows what you have been to us in this time of trial, but he seems to think he has no right to take my time whilst Doris needs such close attention."

"You surely have not proposed to inflict me upon him as your substitute?" And Valerie gave a short laugh. "Cousin Ellen, let the matter come about naturally, or not at all. I may not be able to plead my friend's cause to any advantage. I certainly shall not injure it by dragging it in with undue haste or imprudence. When Doris is better he will wish to see her, and we can make acquaintance by degrees. I daresay he has seen enough of Society to be slightly blasé, and imagine that because he has known a few women he is entitled to judge all. That is a man's way. They seldom make any allowance."

"My dear Valerie, men are not the only sinners in this respect." Mrs. Norwood flushed a little and smiled in a beseeching fashion. "I have made a great mistake about you, and I sincerely beg your pardon. You are so different from all my impressions of you. I have looked upon you as a mere fashionable woman, caring for nothing but admiration, and—very unjustly, I think, rumour had given you the reputation of a coquette."

"Because I have not married, I suppose?" Miss Blanchard interrupted bitterly. "Cousin Ellen, how many men do you imagine have wanted to marry me for my handsome face? They are like moths in a flame. Did any of them take pains to learn whether I had any heart or not, any qualities that would make a satisfactory home? And if I longed for something better than mere appreciation of my beauty——"

Her voice broke a little, her eyes were lustrous with a certain dewiness.

"My dear Valerie!" Mrs. Norwood clasped her arms about her neck and kissed her warmly. "I am glad to have had this glimpse of your heart. No sister could have been more tender to Doris, and I had fancied she was rather tiresome to you."

"We change a little with years and experience. Fancy my trying to be as youthful and kittenish as Doris! Why, I should make a complete guy of myself. And if I tried to make her as worldly and experienced as my years give me the right to be, I should spoil her youthful charm. It would be cruel of me."

"Yes, I see," answered the mother.

"Doris must remain a sweet, innocent little maiden for years to come. Wisdom would crown her like a grandmother's hood. Between us there is quite a gulf." And Valerie laughed.

She had made a fast friend of Mrs. Norwood.

That day's post brought a letter from Mr. Kemp. Her month had expired. He made his excuse his anxiety about her health, but he was very importunate about her assent to his suit. He proposed visiting her at Westborough.

Digitized by Google

She hesitated some time with the letter in her hand. It was too good a chance to lose. She had considered it in all its bearings. The Kemps were not a long-lived family. Out of seven or eight children, only two had gone past middle-life. Miss Kemp was nearing seventy and very frail. Her fortune would go to her two nieces, and render them quite heiresses. Two nephews had inherited their father's fortune. Digby Kemp could endow his wife with all his own, and as a widow she would be the envied of her sex. Was it worth while to throw away such an opportunity for a bit of old romance, and a man who had ceased to care for her?

Then her anger blazed up to white heat. She would make one effort to bring him to her feet, even if he rejected her. If Digby Kemp had asked her eighteen months ago, before she had heard the sequel of Boyd Jeffries' fortune! If some event had taken the opportunity out of her hands! But here it was staring her in the face, tempting her with the old passionate tenderness that she had never been quite able to efface.

She answered his letter with the most delicate discretion, making the most of her cousin's accident and the necessity of her further stay. To have him come now would be most inconvenient. He had only to be patient if he really cared for her. But it would be cruel to leave these relatives in their trouble and anxiety. She would write to him again.

A fortnight had elapsed before Doris was able to see visitors. Boyd Jeffries was certain Miss Blanchard would be present and he was not mistaken. For more than a fortnight he had heard her praises continually. Had he been mistaken in her? Had she changed? Had the worldly-wise girl developed into the sympathetic, tender woman?

Yet he could not rouse that old enthusiasm. Passion for her lay dead. The girl he had loved so ardently had existed only in his youthful fancy. His meeting her had surprised him, but no pulse thrilled with vivifying warmth. Dr. Fields might as well have talked of a statue.

So when he entered the room she sat at the head of the couch with a trifle of silk knitting in her hand, and their greeting was simply polite. Doris stretched out a soft hand, white enough now, and smiled.

"I have to thank you for all your beautiful flowers, and such grapes and peaches as I have never seen before. You have been very solicitous, mamma said. And you are not to blame yourself, for you were not the cause of the accident, since you did not fire the gun."

"That was a mere chance—a sort of quibble—since I was with the party, and had the same intent."

He sat down, still holding the hand whose pulse seemed to throb with a soft, warm rapidness that thrilled him.

"I should have been braver," and the pale rose lips curved with a half smile. "But the sound startled me, and I caught the sapling, never dreaming it was so near the edge. I think I must have leant against it a little, and over we both went. What might have happened if you had not been there——" And she shuddered. "I did not know of the landslip. I came up from the other side."

"Did your mother tell you that I had forsworn shooting round about here? It may do well enough for Western wilds or Northern forests. I think a man can find better pleasure than the exercise of cruelty to harmless birds."

"Oh, thank you!" she cried, raising her soft, gratified eyes to his. "I would gladly suffer it all over again for that result. It seems the one terror of autumn. I cannot bear to have them killed."

"It is your ring," she said. "I have kept it all these years."

Something in the sweet, innocent face touched him, took him back to the youth of faith and high endeavour that this other woman had come so near wrecking. What if he began his life over again? At two-and-thirty it was not too late.

The other deep eyes were watching him narrowly. They saw that old light dawn like a flash and then vanish. Another woman could call it into existence, a mere child! She could have strangled her in that instant's anger, so vexed she was that her charms had failed.

Mrs. Norwood had been arranging the flowers. She stood the table with its choice burden at the foot of the couch which was Doris' change by day.

"Oh, how lovely! Mr. Jeffries, you must be passionately fond of flowers. And there are Parma violets."

"Yes." He drew some out and laid them in her hand. "There was a large verandah at Old Place glassed in, and my man has made a delightful conservatory of it. It adjoins my library. When you have recovered, your mother must bring you over some day. There are a greenhouse and vinery besides. I have knocked about the world so much that a home of one's own seems good. And Westborough looks really picturesque to me, with the high-wooded range at the north, and the river winding in and out. Some of my early days were passed here, but I am afraid I thought it stupid then."

"Go on," said Doris in a quaint, persuasive fashion. "We have looked at the place so many times while it was shut up.

Digitized by Google

And this summer it has blossomed into strange beauty. Tell me about the inside. It is a very old house, I believe ?"

Mrs. Norwood was curiously interested. With her kindly gratitude and tact she made the talk more general, appealing to Valerie now and then, who posed in her most seductive fashion while her heart was seething with rage. To play a second part—when she had been first with this man !

"I have stayed unconscionably," he declared an hour later. "If I have tired you or made you worse, Dr. Fields will forbid me the house." And he rose.

"You have not tired me. Why, I feel almost well," and she smiled mirthfully. "I have been spoilt by indulgence. Cousin Valerie and mamma have been so devoted !"

Jeffries came the next day and the next. As soon as Doris was able to be taken out he sent the carriage for the use of the ladies. Valerie would not go. She pleaded some important letters to write, and that done she indulged in a very unusual thing—a stroll through the woody edges of the hills. It was a solitary ramble.

Sometimes it seemed to her as if she should go quite mad with a sense of her own impotence. If Jeffries had shunned her, if now and then he had betrayed some consciousness of the past, a touch of embarrassment, an expression off guard ; but to her he was always the courteous gentleman whom she might have met for the first time on the day of the accident. She was more beautiful than ever. The rest had improved her in many ways. Could these magnificent charms make no impression on him ? They had parted in passionate anger ; now she could not rouse him to a hasty retort.

Was he in love with this silly, honest, unformed girl, fifteen years his junior ? What idiocy ! To spend his life and his fortune in a philanthropical effort to benefit this ugly manufacturing town—for now he was on a committee to consider a public library, and another looking to the erection of a home for old people. And he, in the prime of manhood, with a presence and the gifts of nature that would distinguish him in Society ! Why, even to save him from such a mental suicide would be worthy any woman's effort.

She used her arts to perfection. He neither sought her nor shunned her. He really enjoyed sensible, sincere, well-informed Mrs. Norwood, and began to take a hearty interest in her charities. Doris he treated like a little sister, with the delicate, indescribable touch that defined the lack of relationship. And so things progressed.

Summer came with flowers and sunshine. Valerie's old lover grew urgent. Time was flying on the fleetest of wings. She must take the matter in her own hands. For now she did not mean to relinquish him without an effort. She would render it difficult for him to banish all the remembrances of the past. She was desperate enough to make an appeal that no man of fine honour would resist, she imagined.

They had been invited over to Old Place to dine. They were to be sent for quite early that they might have time enough before dark to inspect the house and the curiosities brought from abroad.

Jeffries had announced this to a visitor staying in the house for a few days. He had said :

"Wait, Jack, and meet one of the most magnificent women you have ever seen. I think her destiny is to show the world what a royally beautiful woman can be. You can go back the day after."

"Is that all her destiny—to simply look beautiful for the world ?" and his friend gave a meaning smile.

"So far as I am concerned—yes."

"How has a place like this raised such a marvel ?"

"Oh, she is not a native ! She has been a London beauty."

"And what may be this wonder's name ? Have I heard of her ?"

"No doubt ; and met her as well. Miss Valerie Blanchard."

Jack Spencer gave a half-laughing whistle.

"Why, yes," he said, "though I only know her very slightly. But I believe she is to shine shortly in a new orbit. Somehow, last summer, she caught one of the matrimonial prizes. She is no 'chicken,' as you are aware, but one of the regal full-blown roses. She is to marry Digby Kemp, one of the many-times millionaires."

"She has been here two months or more. It cannot be a very ardent courtship."

"Oh, yes ; taking care of a sick cousin, who was half-killed, or something. Lovely devotion, and all that ! But the old man is tremendously hard hit, Jeffries. If she should play fast and loose with him it would nearly kill the poor fellow. I'll tell you, in confidence, how I come to know so much. Our firm does his legal business. He has been making some magnificent settlements on her, and has his will drafted, ready to sign on the wedding-day, or the night before, maybe. There are no near heirs who really need anything, so the old fellow can do it with a clear conscience. Why, I'm lucky to have a sight of her."

"The cousin will be here, too ; she has quite recovered. No bones were broken. It just missed being very serious. The young girl's mother is one of those nice, honest, sensible women who are born ladies. They have lived here some three or four years."

"I'll be glad to stay, Jeffries. I doubt if I shall ever get so near to regal magnificence again."

Boyd Jeffries went for them himself. It was a beautiful day, and the drive brought a wild-rose tint to Doris Norwood's cheeks and gave her a strange beauty.

Afterwards they rambled through the house and unearthed old curiosities, as well as modern treasures.

It was at the dinner that Jeffries first noted a ring on Valerie's finger. It was a small but fine diamond in an old-fashioned setting. It seemed rather odd to him. And at last the fortune she had been seeking all her life had come to her. What if he had cared for her all these years, and met her thus to lay his heart in the dust at her feet ? She would walk over it with her royal smile. Ah, well for him the old love was dead beyond recall, gone to dust and ashes—the love that had so nearly made a wreck of him.

It was a gay little dinner. Spencer was a rising young lawyer, and at his very best. The table was like a picture. Valerie Blanchard was a magnificent woman, but to-night Jeffries liked best the simple, honest little girl who had as yet kept, unspoilt, from the great world.

They had some music later on ; they strolled about, and Spencer took Doris off to explain a ghost chamber to her. Mrs. Norwood was busy with some engravings. Valerie sauntered out to the small conservatory with its glass dome, through which the stars looked down, and a small crescent of yellowish moon.

She held out her hand suddenly to Jeffries, and the long ray of the diamond flashed in his eyes.

"It is your ring," she said under her breath. "I have kept it all these years."

Jeffries started, and his breath for a moment left him. He seemed groping for possession of himself.

"All these years," she said proudly.

"It was folly." His voice was low and husky.

"A woman's folly, then. Men are sensible, and forget." She looked at him with dark, glittering eyes. "And sometimes they are merciful and forgive."

"You do not mean—you cannot mean—— "

She stood there proudly. He should interpret himself.

Digitized by Google

He thought of the man loving her now, and having the utmost faith in her. He did not love her. He had no faith in her.

"That past is dead and done with," he made protest. "Do not recall it."

"You loved me then." She raised her seductive eyes; her scarlet lip quivered.

"Yes, I loved then. But you——"

"I preached patience," she interrupted. "If you had been willing to wait——"

"And deceive the man who loved me as only the best of fathers can love? No, I could not do that. He said, 'Tell this woman you are poor, with only your health and your energy to offer her, and she will reject you.' You did not quite reject me. You played with me, like the coquette you were. Perhaps you believed he might relent."

"Good Heavens! I loved you! Did I not offer to wait until you could take me?"

"And let him believe it was broken off! Take his love and his money and wait for him to die or something! No. I was too honest for that. I kept my faith in you and quarrelled with him, headstrong fool that I was. And then—you did not quite throw me over, but you gave me that three years' probation abroad, with no engagement, no promise of letters to live upon. And meanwhile you accepted Ralph Fessenden."

She turned pale at that.

"He pleaded so; I felt I had no right——"

"You might have recalled me if you were so conscientious. He lost his fortune, and you threw him over."

"No, it was not altogether that. There were other reasons. He went the swift road to destruction—there was a talk of his unsteadiness before. Why should I have ruined my own life——"

"Why hold out hopes at first? He died almost in the arms of a friend of mine, indebted to him for shelter, for decent burial. I will not tell you his dying words. Then my heart began to yearn for the other love I had thrown aside for you. I was a coward, and ashamed to ask for it. But he came to me in his great love and kindness——"

"And bound you never to forgive me?" she interrupted, passionately.

"No, I am quite free. He made no conditions. I took back my son's place thankfully, glad to make some amends for my wrong-headedness. Thank God for that comfort and pleasure!"

"It might all have been so different with you, and with me, if you had listened to reason. I, too, was young, and not over wise. And in my anger I did try to put others in your place. I never succeeded. Boyd, think of me with a little pity, a little tenderness. If you have been forgiven for what you did in anger and impatience, think how divine a thing forgiveness is, and be merciful."

She bowed her head towards him. She stretched out her hands. He had only to clasp her to his heart, and the old flood of love might return. Then he remembered the other man who was buying her.

"I forgive you," he said coldly. "But the old love is dead. Let it go with the past. If I were a richer man my money might make amends for the ghost I should bring to the feast. As it is——"

She looked at him for a moment as if she could kill him where he stood, if a deadly glance could kill. All this she had done for love of him! Was it love? If he had not proved his uncle's heir, he might have gone his way. Yet she hated to think of another woman rekindling the flame that she could not.

"Here is your ring," she said mockingly. "Doris Norwood has a plump finger; it may fit her."

He took it, and throwing it on the ground, crushed it under his heel.

Spencer and Doris entered from the hall, laughing, yet Doris looked a little pale and tired, but very sweet. What if he made that part of Valerie's prediction true? Was she not the sort of woman to make him happy?

"We must go home," said Mrs. Norwood. "It is late for you to be up, my child."

They all expressed their delight and satisfaction; but the drive home was strangely silent. Valerie went directly to her room. Her desperate venture had been of no avail. He had penetrated her inmost soul, and now she hated him.

Nearly noon of the next day a carriage drove up, and an elderly man alighted. From her window Valerie saw and recognised him. She had been packing, but she slipped into her prettiest gown, and sped downstairs, where he was awaiting her in the drawing-room.

"Forgive my impatience. I could not stay away." His voice was tremulous, his eyes eager. "I heard——"

"Did you hear I had stumbled over an old lover here?" in her silvery, half-teasing voice. "Well, that is true. When he was young and poor I fancied myself in love with him. Now he is older, richer, and I have seen him every day for three weeks. Do I look as if I meant to break your heart?" She held out both hands, and smiled beguilingly. "Did you bring me a ring?"

"The ring you would not wear before!" He began to fumble in his pocket.

"You may put it on now. There, you may take me home. Then—you may fix the wedding-day, and I promise the ghost of no old lover shall appear at the feast."

He clasped her in his arms in a transport of bliss.

Just before she left she sank a parting shaft into Mrs. Norwood's very soul. A month later she was Mrs. Digby Kemp, and on her way to Paris.

Boyd Jeffries felt the indescribable change in the pleasant friendship of the past month. He let it go for awhile until he had quite resolved upon the future. Then he spent an evening with Mrs. Norwood.

"Confess," he said, "that your coldness is due to a warning of Miss Blanchard's. You have heard her story, now hear mine, and judge between us. Then let me prove myself worthy of your friendship."

She was a good deal surprised and shocked at Valerie's duplicity. Or was it the desperation of love?

"She is very fascinating when she chooses, but I am thankful our ways lie apart," the elder woman said, gravely.

"She is better fitted for the life she has chosen," was the rejoinder.

Valerie Kemp was still abroad when she heard of Jeffries' marriage. She ground her heel in the soft rug as if she were gladly crushing the life out of something.

But the picture of Doris by the cheerful fire at Old Place, with her husband smiling down in her face, was the ghost at her feast.

Aubrey Leigh.

THE TERRIBLE Q.

CAPTAIN KETTLE—you remember his adventures in Pearson's Magazine—was an unpleasant person to meet if he wasn't in a good temper. But he was a perfect angel when compared with Don Q. This gentleman is a Spanish brigand, punctiliously polite, and consistently courteous: at the same time, he will gladly torture his captives to death if the fancy strikes him; or throw them over 500-foot precipices as an after-dinner amusement. He is like a vulture in appearance, and like a vulture, too, in rapacity. At the same time he can sometimes show the utmost unselfishness and chivalry. He's really a character worth knowing—so read his adventures—written by K. & Hesketh Prichard—in PEARSON'S MAGAZINE.

Digitized by Google

- THE -
REVENGE OF BARBARA WALKER.

Telling of the Fearful Consequences of a Great Wrong.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

BARBARA WALKER, blooming with all the freshness of eighteen summers, sat curled up in the bay-window watching for the postman; her eyes were full of dreams, her mouth smiling, the whole picture suggestive of youth and happiness.

Half an hour later the picture was changed. A woman sat there, rigid, stricken with sudden age; the eyes were filled with a great despair, the mouth hopeless in its painful compression. Yet Barbara Walker had not exchanged her seat with anyone; the change had come to her, swift, sudden, and appalling.

The postman had given a letter into the outstretched hands of the young girl in the morning of light and love. The letter was opened and read, it fell from the nerveless hand of a woman matured by sudden and awful horror. Only another man faithless, another life blighted. Only the old story.

"DEAR FRIEND BARBARA," the letter began. Oh, Heavens! how like the keen cut of a sword that word friend goes to the heart when it takes the place of another dearer word.

"DEAR FRIEND BARBARA,—I fear that you will be somewhat surprised and pained at what I feel compelled to write you. For many weeks I have been conscious of a growing change in my sentiments towards you. What I thought was love was only fancy—the result of association. Knowing this, I could never make you happy as my wife. Therefore, I trust you will give me my freedom, as I give you yours, and always think of me as your friend. "HOWARD SNOW."

So the beautiful dream of a year that had filled a young life with the golden glory of a June sunrise was quenched in the blackness of a starless night.

Do you know what it is to see a great hope die? To have the happiness that makes all of life for you crushed with one blow from the hand of Fate? Do you know what it is to drop from noonday heights of joy to the depths of the darkest midnight? If you do, I need not try to tell you of the days and weeks that followed for Barbara Walker. If you do not, it would be useless for me to try; for only through experience, or close companionship with an awful sorrow, are we enabled to comprehend it.

And while she sat in the shadows, struggling with her stricken young heart, that knew not how to entertain the stranger, Pain, striving vainly to pierce the impenetrable gloom that shrouded her, a hundred miles away Howard Snow basked in the sunlight of another woman's smile.

He was not a cruel or a heartless man. But his better impulses, his sympathies, his regard for the feelings of others were all lost in an infatuation for another beautiful daughter of Eve.

Howard Snow was only twenty-three, and Helen Thomas was thirty; one of those women who ripen like a peach in the sun, and to whom mature years add only richer charms.

Rightly directed, her life might have been of rare usefulness and power, for she possessed that strong magnetic charm that sways the world.

But she used it only to draw men to her feet.

Howard Snow was the only desirable young man in the little village where she chanced to be spending a few months with a relative.

"He has the face of a Greek god," she said, "but it needs strong emotion to perfect it."

"He is engaged to a lovely girl, a fresh wild-rose of womanhood, who visited here last summer," said her relative.

"Is that so?" responded Helen, as she dropped her lashes. But she was most cordial and alluring when she next met Howard Snow.

It was an easy conquest. He was unused to women like Helen Thomas, and he did not know himself. She played upon the slumbering passions of his nature, and set his blood on fire by the soft touches of her caressing hands and the languor of her glances.

It was the old story of a young man's infatuation for a woman older than himself. It blinded his judgment and blunted his sense of right and wrong, and made him conscious of but one desire in life—to be free and under no obligations to any woman but his Helen. His bonds to Barbara Walker grew hateful, and she seemed to him a child, whose weakness would be a drag upon him always.

So he freed himself, and for a time was happy. Then his better nature awoke with a sudden shock. He spoke of marriage to Helen Thomas, and she laughed in his face.

"Marriage!" she said. "Why, you are only a boy! How can you think of so absurd a thing?"

And her laughter had the ring of scorn in it.

"A boy?" he answered. "Yes, I was a boy when I met you, and you were not content to let me remain so. You played upon me by every art in your power till you woke up the man in me. Now it demands its own, and you laugh at me. I did not know before that a woman could do a thing like this and not die of shame if she knew it.

"You have lessened my estimate of the sex, Miss Thomas, and no woman can do a crueller or baser thing than that. The upward growth and glory of the world depend upon man's estimate of woman. And you have lowered her standard in my sight. May God forgive you!"

Then he went his way, with a face that bore the marks of the "strong emotions" which Helen Thomas thought it needed to perfect it, and a heart that was bitter and cynical.

He thought of Barbara Walker with a strange tenderness, but with no idea of insulting her with any attempt at a renewal of old ties. He felt no love for her, in truth; only he felt his own baseness and lack of stability. She was to him like a child he had cruelly hurt, and he was filled with tender pity. For Helen he grew to feel only scorn. Her hold upon him had been solely physical, and when a man grows to notice that, the woman is sure to be scorned.

Digitized by Google

He applied himself to his profession, and made a success of it. He grew rich, prosperous, popular with men, but feared by women, for his sarcasm was unsparing and his wit always two-edged. Yet marriageable women sought after him, for he had personal attractions, added to his wealth and influence, and seemed a desirable husband for an ambitious woman.

But he reached the age of thirty-five and was still free. And then he met Barbara Walker again.

Through all these years he had lost trace of her, and had heard nothing of her.

Now they met suddenly, and to him, at least, unexpectedly, at a formal dinner party, given by a prominent politician.

Howard Snow was presented to Miss Walker by the hostess, and requested to lead her into dinner. It was Barbara Walker! There was no mistaking the face and form he so well remembered, and yet what a change!

The nine years had but perfected the girlish graces that were pleasing of old, and lent the charm of dignity and elegance to what was once only sweetness and simplicity. The shy, modest manner had given place to a perfect self-possession, and rare conversational powers rendered her the star of the evening.

"It is a long time since we last met, Mr. Snow," she said, as they went to dinner. "I am pleased to know of the success and prosperity that have attended you during these years."

How quietly she spoke of their last meeting. He wondered if she remembered the parting—a lover's parting!

"I had lost all trace of you," he answered, "but am glad to find, as I do, that you have been well and happy. Your face denotes both. Where are your parents?"

"In Heaven I trust!" she said, softly. "They died eight years ago, and left me all alone. I had an uncle in America, and went to him, and have spent most of my time in travel since. A few months ago a longing seized upon me to see my own land and my old home again, so I came back."

Howard Snow scarcely left her side all the evening. She charmed him with her descriptions of scenery and chit-chat of foreign life.

"I would be glad to call," he said, as they parted. "Where can I find you?"

"In the house where we first met," she said, glancing up at him, with the old, shy look. "I am visiting the same friends."

He could not have described his sensations as he rang the bell the next day, and was ushered into the presence of that woman who was once his betrothed wife. Admiration, reverence, respect, and, it seemed to him, love, stirred together in his heart.

It was only one of many calls. She was so kind, so cordial, so entertaining. Her soul was too large to treasure any resentment against him for that old wrong.

Then by-and-by he grew to realise how he was loving this woman. Not the old love awakened, but a new love created—the one grand passion of his life.

Mentally, morally, and physically this woman ministered to him; her conversation charmed him, her moral atmosphere elevated him, and the touch of her hand electrified him. Surely a love like this was from Heaven, and must meet with some response. Still he hesitated, not daring to speak. But so strong grew the emotion, it overpowered him at length.

"God knows I feel my unworthiness," he said, "but I love you, Barbara, and I want you for my wife. I said the same words to you years ago, and failed you. I was only a weak boy then, swayed about by a designing woman. Now I am a man, knowing my own heart, and with all its intense, pent-up passion it cries out for you."

For a moment Barbara's face seemed glorified with light. Her cheeks glowed, her eyes enlarged, her breast heaved. She put both hands in his.

"I have never been content without you—not for one moment," she said. "Nothing filled my life so full that I did not feel the need of you, Harold."

Their marriage was arranged for three months later. She lingered until the last month, seemingly unwilling to separate from him, and then went back to her old home. It was occupied by tenants, but she wanted to make her preparations there, she said, as she had dreamt of doing so long ago.

And they were to be married in the village church by the old family rector.

"Let the old dream reach perfection in every detail at last," she said.

The little church was crowded when the day came. All in a sheen of white, Barbara stood before the altar, and felt her hand taken by the man who had discarded her years before.

"Wilt thou have this man to be thy wedded husband?"

The old rector waited for the response. It came like the report of a pistol.

"Never! As he once rejected me, so now do I reject him!"

And she swept down the aisle, whiter than her robes, and left a gasping crowd of astonished people staring blankly after her.

Very calmly and very coldly Howard Snow passed down and out of the church. He went to the hotel where his luggage was left, and began to make preparations for departure by an early train. But his hands seemed paralysed, and strange lights danced before his eyes.

Before midnight he was in a raving delirium. The next morning they found him in a high fever, calling wildly on the name of Barbara, and reviling some woman he called Helen, who seemed pursuing him.

"He cannot live," the doctor said the next evening. "Will someone go and ask the woman who has done this cruel deed to come here for a moment? The sight of her may quiet him, perhaps."

But while he spoke she came in, her bridal white exchanged for funeral black, her long hair falling loose about her.

She glided to the bedside and put her hands on his face.

"Howard!" she called, in a trembling voice; "oh, my love, Howard, forgive me before you die."

But he fancied she was the woman Helen, and shrieked and grew so violent that they sent her from the room.

There was a week of wild delirium, and then a week of stupor, and then, like a pale wraith of her former self, she came slowly in and knelt beside him.

She put her wasted cheek beside his on the pillow, and the tears that had refused to flow fell slowly down, as she said:

"Oh, I thought revenge was sweet, but it is bitter, bitter, my love."

How long she knelt there she did not know, but suddenly she was startled by a sigh—a very ghost of a sigh, it seemed to her. She put her hand over the heart she had believed still for ever. It fluttered feebly.

"Oh, thank Heaven!" she cried, and fell unconscious.

An hour later she found herself in bed, and kindly cared for, and smiling faces all about her.

"He lives," they said. "Your touch brought him from the very gates of death."

A few weeks later a pallid bride, and a still more pallid groom, passed down the old church aisle, and out into the great world.

Somewhere they dwell to-day—happy, let us hope, since they had both so suffered in the past.

Stanley Hammond.

WHAT HANDWRITING WILL TELL.

It can tell you what sort of a person you are as regards disposition and many other points that it is as well to know. If you wish for this information, send a specimen of your handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope, to Ranfe, 32 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. You will receive in return an accurate delineation of your character, which will tell you what you wish to know.

Digitized by Google

Splendid Series.

A Striking Series of Astonishing Revelations.

Told by the Decoy Herself.

OF WHOM YOU READ.

Vivienne D'Alton, the decoy. She, an innocent girl, unwittingly leads young gentlemen of good social standing to their ruin at the hands of her father.

Beverley D'Alton, who poses as a millionaire who has made his money by judicious speculation. He assumes to lavish great affection on his daughter, from whom he has been separated for many years.

Mrs. Sherwood. A florid person, who is introduced to Vivienne by her father as a great friend of her dead mother. She lives with the D'Altons, and requests Vivienne to call her "Aunt Flora," which the young girl reluctantly does.

Annchen. A lady's maid, whom Vivienne greatly detests. She seems to be on very familiar terms with Mrs. Sherwood and Mr. D'Alton.

SEVENTH EPISODE.

Mr. D'Alton Prevents Unpleasantness.

I used to have an idea, shared by a great section of humanity, that money was the cure of all evil. Nowadays my opinion is considerably modified, for I have seen for myself that, though wealth may mitigate many evils, it is not proof against sickness, domestic trouble, or sudden calamity, such as overtook me when poor Lady Windelmore expired before my eyes.

Of course there was any amount of help forthcoming immediately, but the end had come almost like lightning, and nobody considered that we could have done anything to postpone it.

My tears fell fast and copiously, for Lady Windelmore had already won my love, and for a time it was difficult to believe that she was really dead.

"She was quite well an hour ago," I sobbed. "She cannot be dead!"

My father's face wore the look of a man who is struggling with sudden grief, and even Aunt Flora, who was always jealous of her ladyship's presence in the house, was pale with the shock she had received. Her voice was very gentle, too, as she strove to convince me of the reality of my bereavement.

"My poor, dear child!" she murmured. "It is a terrible affair to have happened. But it's no use encouraging you to believe anything but the truth. Nothing on earth could ever bring the unfortunate lady back to life. But if she would only have heeded me, she might still have been alive and well, though of course I hardly expected her to take advice from me."

"And," added my father, virtually addressing himself to the two other doctors, who had just pronounced life to be quite extinct, "I feared this when I noticed how vigorously her ladyship attacked her lunch to-day."

"What do you mean?" was my sharp interjection. "How could advice from Aunt Flora have saved Lady Windelmore? And how could you tell that there was anything wrong with her at lunch? I'm sure she seemed to enjoy the meal heartily."

My father turned his eyes up to the ceiling; Mrs. Sherwood groaned aloud, and the two doctors looked significantly at each other.

"Yes, that's the crux of the mischief," said my father. "I never saw so small a person eat so much."

"Enormous!" added Aunt Flora. "It was an enormous meal."

I was about to protest that Lady Windelmore had eaten far less at lunch than the rest of us, when Dr. Spondan hastily observed, "Yes, Mr. D'Alton, it is only too evident that the poor lady died from syncope, brought on by eating too hearty a meal. What do you say, Dr. Arnold?"

"I agree with you in toto," was Dr. Arnold's response.

"Wouldn't it be more charitable to indorse Dr. Marshall's opinion that she suffered from unsuspected disease of the heart?" remonstrated my father in his gentlest manner. "You see, the unfortunate lady has relatives who would be needlessly pained by the bare, brutal truth."

"Exactly! I see no reason why we should be unnecessarily precise," agreed Dr. Arnold, and Dr. Spondan also nodded acquiescence.

"Of course," continued my father, "if you two gentlemen think there should be a post mortem, I must agree to it, though naturally such a course will be very painful to all concerned. However, I am willing to take your advice, irrespective of personal feeling, and, in addition to the cheque for a hundred pounds, which I hope Dr. Marshall and each of you will accept in payment for the trouble already incurred, I shall insist upon defraying any expense connected with the inquest."

"An inquest!" exclaimed Aunt Flora. "Why, it would ruin Vivienne's season!"

The idea horrified me also, but not from a selfish point of view. I was thinking of how Lady Windelmore herself would have endured anything rather than be the centre of notoriety. And, these being her principles when she was alive, why should they be violated when she could no longer help herself?

Digitized by Google

Greatly to my relief the doctors seemed to take this view also. They were firmly convinced that there could be no doubt as to the cause of death, and the ultimate outcome of the sad affair was what we all hoped for.

The body was reverently removed to another room, to await the ministrations of the undertakers and their assistants. Then the doctors, each a hundred pounds richer, left the house, after certifying syncope to have been the cause of death, and the unpleasant prospect of an inquest no longer stared us in the face.

Nobody could have been more generous than my father. And nobody could have been more courteous to the relatives of the deceased lady than he was. Their rank was all that could be desired, but their income was totally inadequate for their position, and they were very favourably impressed by the tactful manner in which Mr. D'Alton relieved them of all pecuniary outlay in connection with the dowager's sudden demise.

They were also thankful to be spared the pain of an inquest, but there came a time when they must have wished they had had not been quite so ready to believe all that was told them.

It was so with me. But, meanwhile, I was still free from the dreadful suspicion which gradually forced itself upon my notice, and life seemed to move so swiftly that there was little time to bestow upon individual griefs. No sooner had my late chaperon's relatives removed the remains for interment, than my father and Aunt Flora seemed to think that I would suffer mental and physical harm if I were not kept constantly amused.

It had not been a family bereavement for us, so it was only considered necessary to make limited concessions to conventional restraint, and though one or two big receptions were postponed, my father insisted that I should be the centre of a constantly coming and going crowd of visitors.

Some of these alluded to the mysterious fate which had overtaken Mr. O'Connell, for the case had made a great sensation, and Scotland Yard was very keen in working up fresh clues. But nothing seemed to come of them, although my father himself went to Scotland Yard and gave all the information he could.

Somehow, I could never bring myself to talk of the tragedy at all, for I was haunted by a strange uneasiness whenever I thought of it. The sleepy, helpless face seemed to reproach me for having stood idly by while the dastardly cabman drove away, and time and again I tried to think what my father meant when he said, "Lose no time! You'll find all serene at the office."

And time after time I wondered if the police had traced any of the jewellery which I knew Mr. O'Connell to possess. Certainly he may have taken it to his rooms before he came on to our house. But I had persistent doubts on the subject, and could not help thinking that the diamonds were the direct cause of his death.

However, there was no mention of them in connection with the case, and Lady Windelmore, the only person besides myself who could have guessed the probably intended destination of the costly parure, was no longer able to give me her advice as to whether or not I ought to mention my knowledge.

"And after all," I thought eventually, "I do not suppose that I could do anything but harm by appearing to be familiar with Mr. O'Connell's movements and possessions. As for that speech to the cabman—well, I was excited and nervous, so I very likely misunderstood what I heard."

This solution of the worry helped to raise my spirits considerably, until a visit from Sophie Melrose made me wonder if Fate intended me to be always pursued by the shadow of tragedy.

* * * * *

Miss Melrose looked the picture of distress and burst into tears as soon as she saw me.

"I suppose you have heard of our trouble?" she asked, and, without giving me time to reply, she continued: "It is the most terrible thing, and the doctors say that it may last indefinitely, unless we can do something to rouse him."

Sobs made some of Sophie's words almost indistinct, but there was no mistaking the fact that she was in great grief, and I felt glad that there was nobody likely to interrupt our conversation before the poor girl had opened her heart to me fully.

My father never seemed to turn a deaf ear to applications for charity. But he was hardly a congenial recipient of a girl's confidences, and I thought it just as well that he was not at home just now.

Aunt Flora was indulging in a nap in her own room, so we were spared her flagrant insincerities, and I was able to devote myself entirely to the task of soothing my excited visitor.

"Now, dear, if you will tell me what has happened," I said, putting my arms comfortingly round her, and pillowing her head on my shoulder—"if you will tell me what has happened I shall know better what to say to you in return. At present I am quite in the dark."

"It is Alan," was the sorrowful answer. "He went out one afternoon last week, saying that he would probably dine with his old schoolfriend, Seymour Phillips, and that we were not to be surprised if he spent the night at his chambers. Knowing that they had only just discovered their mutual presence in London, we thought it quite natural that they should want to see a great deal of each other, and never worried until forty-eight hours passed away without any message from Alan. Then Mr. Phillips called at our house and it transpired that my brother had never gone to dine with him, as he had promised to do. Of course this put us all in a great state, and we communicated with the police at once, for we were afraid of foul play. But it was two days later before we discovered the poor boy's whereabouts. He was found wandering on Clapham Common in a most distressing state of mental collapse. He was hungry, weary and penniless. His memory was an absolute blank. He could recollect nobody nor anything, and it was only by comparing him with the description we had given of him to the police that his identity was discovered.

"We have him under a skilled brain specialist, who says that some terrible shock must have made his mind a blank, and the fact that not a card, or letter, or anything of value was left on him seems to prove that he has been in the hands of thieves. Oh, Miss D'Alton, if you could but see what a pitiful state my brother has been brought to, your heart would ache for him!"

My heart already ached for both Alan and his sisters, and I eagerly questioned Sophie concerning the strange calamity that had befallen them.

"Mr. Phillips is very good," she continued. "He immediately did his best to become acquainted with Alan's business affairs, so that they would not suffer while he was away. But, to all our amazement, it turns out that they could not be much worse. He has actually realised most of the fortune lately bequeathed to him, and no less than eighty thousand pounds seems to be missing. There is not the slightest clue to what has become of it, and the poor boy himself can tell us nothing concerning it. He does not recognise a single one of us. In fact, he doesn't even remember his own name!"

Sophie Melrose was evidently almost distracted. But her feelings were nothing to mine, for one awful dread was thrusting itself upon my notice. How was it that I seemed to be indirectly connected with a sequence of tragedies, concerning each one of which I possessed some knowledge which I dared not communicate ? And how was it that my thoughts at once flew to my father, as the one man who might be able to elucidate the mystery of the lost fortune.

Digitized by Google

Did I not hear young Alan tell him that he had realised all he could, and that he was prepared to immediately invest £80,000 in the New Barbary Land Development Co. ? Did I not hear him implore to be allowed to place it in my father's hands ? And did I not hear the latter consent to waive his own preferential rights in favour of Alan ?

" I shall go mad if I let my thoughts run that way ! " was my mental exclamation. " It is merely a coincidence, and very likely this happened some days after the interview I overheard."

" Tell me," I urged, and Sophie looked quite thankful when she saw how desperately interested I was in her story, " when did you see your brother last ? "

" It was Tuesday week, about three o'clock. He had been out all morning, on business, so he said, and was as bright while we were having luncheon as ever he was. There was nothing to indicate trouble of any sort."

Tuesday week ! That was the day he had the conversation with my father, and, if I dared but do so, I could tell Sophie that I had seen her brother two hours later than she did !

I was in a whirl of doubt and amazement, but my agitation was accepted as nothing more than the outcome of pity, and Sophie kissed me warmly as she whispered: " Vivienne, we centre all our hopes on you ! The specialist says that if we can suddenly confront Alan with someone he loves, he may instantly regain his lost memory, and then he will be able o explain all that is troubling us."

" Yes, I will come," was my answer. " And I pray that good may result from the visit. Annchen ! What are you doing here ? How dare you intrude without knocking ? "

How long Annchen had been in the room, I could not tell, for she had entered noiselessly, and stood within the doorway.

" Please, miss," she replied, without the slightest departure from her usual impassive manner, " I had just come in. I did knock, and thought you would have heard me."

" And now that you are here, what do you want ? "

" Please, miss, the master sent me to say that he would like you to come into the drawing-room. Mr. and Miss Greatham are there, and have inquired for you."

" Tell them that I am very sorry, but that I am unable to see anyone else just now. I am going out with Miss Melrose."

" Yes, miss," answered Annchen. Then she hastened off with her message. But before I could make my departure good, my father came to protest against my going out just then.

" My dear girl," he began, " I hope you do not mean to leave me to entertain your visitors ? Ah ! how do you do, Miss Melrose ? How is it that we have seen nothing of you for several days ? "

" Father," I hastily interposed, wishing to spare Sophie the pain of telling her story all over again, " Miss Melrose wants me to go home with her on a rather important errand."

" I'm very sorry, my dear, but I'm sure she will excuse you when I say that it is more important for you to remain at home this afternoon."

My father spoke as suavely as usual, but there was a determined gleam in his eye, and a firm set of his mouth, which gave me fully to understand that he did not intend to allow me my usual freedom, and I was very glad when Sophie interposed with the words :

" I should be very sorry to inconvenience you, Mr. D'Alton, and as you do not appear to be able to spare Vivienne just now, will you let her come to us to-morrow morning ? "

" With all my heart ! " was the prompt response. " Make whatever arrangements you like with each other, and a carriage shall be at your disposal. I suppose you really want to do a bit of shopping together. Ah, well, girls will be girls, and if they have money to spend, then let them spend it, say I."

We seemed to have no time to rectify my father's mistake, ere we were left alone with a final injunction for me to proceed to the drawing-room as quickly as I could. So Sophie departed immediately, and I, anything but pleased at being compelled to remain indoors, went to see what was the wonderful occasion that demanded my presence.

Claude Greatham welcomed me with a beaming smile, and Clarissa nodded pleasantly to me. Aunt Flora was in evidence, wearing a tea-gown of fearful colour and wonderful make. And my father was making himself agreeable.

" That's right, dear ! " he ejaculated as I entered the room. " We want you to preside at the tea-tray. Your aunt has hurt her wrist, so cannot touch the teapot. And, in any case, when I do happen to be at home in the afternoon, I like to receive my tea from you."

So that was all ! Fancy considering afternoon tea of more importance than helping to do an inestimable service to somebody else ! Worse still, fancy having to let Sophie go away without a cup of tea ! No wonder I felt vexed, but of course the Greathams couldn't help it, so I did not allow my vexation to show on the surface.

But though I tried my best to keep the ball of conversation rolling, without appearing to notice Claude Greatham's fast increasing infatuation for me, it soon became all too evident that he was falling deeper in love every minute, and that he only waited his opportunity to ask me to marry him.

Now Claude Greatham was a nice young fellow. But I knew that I could never feel anything warmer than friendship for him, so I was in one sense relieved when Clarissa, whose fortune equalled her brother's, broached the subject of investments, which nobody seemed able to resist doing after they had spent some time in my father's company.

As usual, he was kindness itself, but I did not quite hear the outcome of what was going to be done with a large sum of money which Clarissa Greatham wanted to place at better interest than she was already getting, for Mrs. Sherwood suddenly complained of faintness, and I was so frightened, remembering what had happened to Lady Windelmore, that I fell in with my father's suggestion that I should go at once with Aunt Flora to her own room.

Happily, the faintness did not last long. Indeed, I couldn't help wondering if it had been real or assumed, for there was no change of colour observable, such as generally accompanies an attack of the kind complained of. It also struck me as more than odd that my father, after compelling me to go into the drawing-room against my wish, should have dismissed me again without giving me the chance of being decently civil to the guests of whom he made such a fuss awhile ago.

One more thing occurred to me. I was evidently growing horribly suspicious, for I seemed to scent a deep motive in almost every trivial little detail that happened, and I was just reproaching myself to this effect when my doubts were reawakened with full vigour.

" You can go now, dear," said Aunt Flora, who was now lying down on a big Chesterfield in her sitting-room. " I don't think I shall come downstairs again, but there is no need to feel uneasy, Annchen will let you know if I have a relapse."

I was not sorry to receive my dismissal, although my pride was very much in arms at the idea of being spoken patronisingly to by Mrs. Sherwood, and I made no pretence of wanting to remain with her.

But I was altogether in a miserable humour, and was walking moodily out of Mrs. Sherwood's suite of rooms, when I espied a red-backed, morrocco-bound book which partially projected from behind a cushion on an armchair I had to pass.

Obeying an idle impulse, I thought I would see if the book would suffice to amuse me till it was time to dress for dinner, and, without being seen by Mrs. Sherwood, I quietly took it to my own room.

But my face turned cold with a strange dread when I saw what kind of a book it was that Mrs. Sherwood must have been studying diligently, for there were numerous pencilled notes in it, and it was impossible to avoid putting a sinister construction upon the ardent study of a book called " The Lives and Methods of Lucrezia Borgia and the Marchioness of Brinvilliers."

(Another instalment of this exciting series next week.)

Digitized by Google

A Double Flirtation.

How a Girl was Foiled with her Own Weapon.

"WHAT! Going to leave a week before your time? What is the meaning of this hasty departure, Dick? Bert is coming this evening, you know, and I thought you were both looking forward to the pleasure of having a week together. I am perplexed, and I can't imagine what he will say!"

"Don't be offended, uncle!" cried Dick Atherton penitently. "I'm very sorry to go, but—well, I simply can't stand it!" he blurted forth hotly.

Mr. John Atherton looked at his brother's son with a searching gaze; his face hardened, and he placed his hand on the young fellow's shoulder with an affectionate pressure.

"I see what it is now, Dick!" he said gravely. "What an idiot I was not to foresee the danger. It's Dorothy Haldane. That girl is a heartless——"

"Don't call her that, Uncle Jack!" pleaded his nephew. "I suppose it was all my fault. She didn't ask me to fall in love with her, and I couldn't help doing so, and if I have burnt my wings in the flame, it is my fault, or the fault of human nature!"

"Fiddlesticks!" retorted John Atherton angrily. "That girl—that woman, I ought to say!—is a coquette; she lures the men and plays with their hearts. You are not the first who has been so dealt with, but it never occurred to me that you would fall under the spell. I was blind! Well, my boy, I am sorry for you, and I blame myself; but you will go away and forget! Don't do anything rash, mind! It wears off, Dick!"

The young fellow laughed mirthlessly, and left the room in order to see about packing his things. John Atherton seated himself in a chair placed sideways to the table, so that he could lie back and rest his elbow on the table in order to support his head. His face assumed an expression of painful reflection.

John Atherton was the youngest son of a large family, all of whom were dead except the two eldest, a brother and a sister. Thus it came about that this comparatively young man of thirty-one had nephews only nine or ten years his junior. It was rather curious to hear broad-shouldered Dick Atherton call this man "uncle."

John Atherton had been living in Wyckham for three years and a half; this was really the fourth summer he had passed in the place, and each year his two nephews had spent a week or two with him. All had gone well till this particular summer.

The ordinary aspect of Wyckham had been changed during the preceding autumn, when Mr. Haldane had rented a fine house in the little town; his daughter, Dorothy, had played a great part in the life of the place, and balls, parties, and amusement of all descriptions had increased greatly. The young men of Wyckham had raved about Dorothy Haldane; some of them had suffered in the flirtations, while others had played with the fire and received no more injury than Dorothy herself. John Atherton had never mixed much in Wyckham society, so most of this information had come to him from others. He was reserved, and shunned the company of other people to an extent which gained for him the epithet of "peculiar," yet all those who came in contact with him spoke highly of him. He was cultured, good-looking, and of a generous nature.

John Atherton had invited his "boys" to stay with him as usual, and it was not till Dick announced his intention of going at once that he awoke to the real position.

"I don't think that Dick will take it to heart very much!" he murmured, after several minutes of deep reflection. "His nature is not so deep. But Bert! If that girl fascinates him, it will serve him as it did me ten years ago! His mother and I resemble each other in disposition, and Bert takes after her. Heavens! what would be the result, and what would Sis think? What shall I do?"

He rose abruptly, and paced the room in agitation that seemed strange in one usually so calm and self-contained. Presently he re-seated himself with an expression of weariness.

"It would be foolish to wire him not to come; besides, he is probably on his way here now. If I warn him that may have just the reverse effect to that which I desire to obtain. I must watch and——"

The sentence remained unfinished, but there was an odd light in the dark brown eyes, and an expression of determination gradually overspread his grave countenance. Some fixed purpose had formed itself in his mind, and those who understood John Atherton knew that if he made up his mind to do a thing, he would do it.

A few hours later he was shaking hands heartily with Bert Allinson, and answering his inquiries concerning the non-appearance of Dick at the railway station.

"No, Bert, he is not ill. The fact is, he went away this morning! Oh, yes, I daresay you are surprised, but—well, perhaps I was wrong to say that he isn't ill; he is ill in a way! But jump in, and I will tell you as I drive you home!"

John Atherton was brief in his explanation; he told Bert that his cousin had fallen in love with a young lady of the neighbourhood, whom some people regarded as a flirt, and that Dick had fancied himself rather hard hit.

"I hope and believe that he will soon get over it, Bert! It is lucky for him, in this instance, that he does not feel quite so profoundly as you and I! Such an experience would be a calamity to us, and we should be careful how we let ourselves go!"

This was an indirect warning; he would not press it further, but turned the conversation.

Alas! John Atherton perceived, three days afterwards, that he had miscalculated the powers of Miss Dorothy Haldane, and his heart felt chilled with concern for his second nephew. His fists clenched involuntarily, and he muttered: "I must stop it!"

On the following day John Atherton surprised Bert by saying that he intended to accompany him on the excursion organised by Mr. Haldane, and take part in the picnic.

Digitized by Google

"I have not been invited formally," he remarked easily, "but that is probably because Mr. Haldane has grown tired of sending me invitations which I have declined. I fancy that I shall not be in the way!"

"I am sure you will not!" declared Bert warmly. "Why, Dor—— Miss Haldane was saying only yesterday, that it was such a pity that you were so—that you did not come out more, you know!" Bert became confused.

"That was very kind of her!" observed John Atherton gratefully. "Yes, I think I must come out of my shell more! It may do me good."

To himself he said: "So she takes a little interest in me, eh? That is because I have taken no interest in her hitherto! Well, that gives me a start, anyhow, and it helps my plans!"

"What in the name of Fortune is going to happen?" That was the question which all Wyckham asked when it became known that the recluse was coming out of his cave.

John Atherton was actually joining in the life of the town in the heartiest of fashions, and everybody agreed that Wyckham had lost something during the preceding three years and a half. Unquestionably, Atherton was an acquisition; for, although there was a certain gravity which seemed to be part of the man, he was excellent company and a perfect cavalier.

Then people began to cast knowing glances at one another and to utter enigmatic expressions; the younger men occasionally scowled, while the marriageable ladies of all ages looked disconsolate and envious. The reason for this was clear; John Atherton and Dorothy Haldane were so often together!

It was with some astonishment, not unmingled with contempt, that Bert Allinson noticed the change which came over both John Atherton and Dorothy Haldane; he could not understand why the former should so completely alter his mode of living and oust him from the place of favour with Dorothy—for that is what actually occurred; nor could he comprehend, at first, why the girl who had appeared so coy, so pleased at his attentions, should so readily transfer her smiles to his uncle.

Fortunately, he was not stabbed as yet by Cupid's dart, only just superficially scratched, and he was able to turn to other attractions very readily. Nevertheless, there was still enough influence to make him linger round the flame sufficiently to render it plain that he would approach close to it again as soon as there was an opportunity. It was this opportunity which John Atherton's new mode of life effectually prevented from arising.

It was amusing to the onlookers to witness the assiduity with which John Atherton, grave, retiring Atherton, danced attendance on Miss Haldane. She was highly gratified at this forthcoming conquest; it was a distinct triumph to have brought this recluse into the daylight, and caused him to fall a victim to her charms!

Life in the little township was more free from the conventionalities than in less sleepy places, so it was nothing out of the way for Atherton to be seen bicycling, boating or golfing, with Miss Haldane.

"Is that your nephew in the distance?" asked Dorothy lazily, as the boat glided along the sluggish river one day, a fortnight or so after Bert's arrival. Atherton was rowing easily, while she was doing all the steering that was required, which was not much. "He isn't a bad sort of a boy, is he?"

"No," returned Atherton, just as lazily. "He is not quite so impressionable as Dick, is he? You remember Dick, of course?"

A slight colour tinged her cheeks. Atherton was glancing at the figure of Bert Allinson in the distance, so Dorothy's sharp glance failed to catch his eye.

"One cannot always go by appearances, Mr. Atherton. People who are apparently reserved, are often the most impressionable!" she was goaded to retort.

"Meaning me?" he said quietly, but facing her abruptly. "It depends on the source from which the impression comes. Don't you think so, Miss Haldane?"

"Perhaps!" was the confused reply. She had not anticipated this deliberate thrust; it was not often that she was taken unawares, and she was annoyed with herself for having shown her sentiments so plainly. Yet her heart beat a trifle more rapidly!

"Perhaps?" he repeated, raising his eyebrows slightly. "I think that it must be so. Now confess. You found your darts—your charms, that is—less powerful in the case of Bert than in that of his cousin, but it does not follow that the different result is due to the different nature of the one to be impressed. I should say that the two young men were much alike in that respect."

The flush deepened on Dorothy's cheeks. She understood that he was surreptitiously quizzing her. She realised that he knew that she had coquetted with Dick and had tried the same amusement with Bert, but had failed.

Her vanity was wounded; she cast about her for some scheme of retaliation, and she resolved upon the only one left to her. She would humble this man; then, if Bert Allinson remained long enough, she would attract him once more to her side. It would be useless to throw over John Atherton now and smile upon his nephew; she had coquetted longer with this grave man than with the younger, and this would, indeed, be counted a failure! In the other affair it would be assumed that she had not considered him worth powder and shot!

"Oh, dear," she sighed, with apparent density of mind, "I am afraid I cannot follow such learned reasoning, Mr. Atherton! I always get out of my depth when I attempt to argue, and I find myself arguing against my own cause. Let us talk of something more congenial."

From that moment, Dorothy set to work to reduce Atherton to capitulation; she used every artifice to capture his heart, and, to her great joy, she found him yielding.

He was more constant than ever in his attendance, his tones were more caressing, his actions more ardent. In the intoxication of success, she cared nothing for the fact that time was flying and Bert Allinson's stay was nearly over. She did not care for that now; she had conquered the man who had chaffed her and called her unsuccessful, when she had not tried. It was not fair, and she would make him confess his injustice.

She had at first asked herself why he had said that; she had puzzled over it, but his subsequent actions had elucidated the mystery. It was the blundering artifice of a man unaccustomed to society; he had desired to know if she had really cared for others, if her heart were still free. Had she really responded to his attentions because she wished to have them, or was she playing with him in order to bring about more ardent wooing on the part of another?

Dorothy laughed joyously as this solution presented itself to her—she laughed again when certain words let fall by him had confirmed her in this opinion. She had vaguely wondered—absurd idea!—if he had tried to flirt with her for some purpose; but that was so unlike grave John Atherton.

They were cycling together to a bicycle meet some ten miles from Wyckham. It was a glorious day and the meet was to be a grand affair. The weather was exhilarating, the ride and the prospect of pleasure were exciting. Dorothy's eyes sparkled and her breast heaved; she knew from her experience that a proposal was the most probable thing in the world on such an occasion, and that it might come at any moment. Triumph was at hand!

Digitized by Google

The time went by, however, and no declaration came from the lips of John Atherton. The meet was a grand success, and all who took part appeared to enjoy it thoroughly, with the possible exception of the one who, in the usual course of things, would have derived the greatest pleasure from it. Dorothy Haldane grew pensive as the hours passed and wondered what had put things out of joint.

To make matters worse, Bert Allinson seemed to be having a very good time with a modest member of the party who was undoubtedly happy to be with him. There was no mistaking the meaning of the glances and whispered conversations which passed between the two. Dorothy bit her lip, and waited for her own cavalier to speak the words which she had been expecting to hear.

The homeward journey by twilight raised her drooping spirits, and she became almost hysterically gay when Atherton suggested a rest on a rustic bench in a deserted part of their route.

"This has been a pleasant day, Miss Haldane; in fact, I have spent several agreeable days lately. I am afraid that this will be the last. My nephew goes home to-morrow, and I must return to my studies. I came out of my seclusion in order to protect him from danger, but my mission is ended. I think I have kept him safe."

An icy chill struck Dorothy's heart, and she had hard work to repress a moan of pain. Her face paled, and she was glad indeed that it was too dark for Atherton to observe it.

"You mean——?" she began, the words coming almost unconsciously from her lips. She hesitated.

"We may as well be plain with one another, Miss Haldane," he replied, somewhat coldly. "I am quite sure that we understand each other. You were flirting with Bert, and I had no desire to see him suffer. With you, it is play; with him, as with most men, it is different. I thought that I could provide you with the amusement which you wanted in that direction, so I stepped into the breach and took Bert's place. He did not like it at first, and I nearly spoilt the plan by twitting you while in the boat."

"You flirted with me?" inquired Dorothy, in a hollow voice.

"Well, I suppose that is what it comes to. I did the same as yourself. We were both flirting, you and I, and we knew it; there was never any doubt in either your mind or mine concerning the fact. You will not suffer in the eyes of the public, for my return to seclusion will be regarded as evidence that I have proposed and been rejected. I do not mind. I have provided you with amusement, and I have saved Bert from a big heartache. Silly fellow! He was not capable of grasping the fact that you did not want him. Shall we mount again now?"

They continued their return journey in silence, and they parted gravely outside Mr. Haldane's residence. On reaching her own room, Dorothy threw herself on the bed with a joyless laugh.

"So that is how it feels to be flirted with and cast aside," she moaned. "I did not know that it was so hard to bear! It is a bitter lesson, but I deserved it. Only—only lately it was not a flirtation on my side. I know now that it was real." And she sobbed hysterically.

"The Haldanes gone!" ejaculated John Atherton some weeks after that bicycle meet. He had not seen Dorothy since. He sat back in the chair and looked graver than usual. "It was a lesson for her, but I wonder—— No, I cannot think so; it is altogether unlikely! I felt the effects of that playing with fire myself. Did she? I hope not, at least. I had no wish, no intention, of inflicting pain on her, although she had done it to others. No, it is only a foolish fancy of mine, so let it pass. But no more of that dangerous sport for me, not even to spare my own kith and kin!"

H. Bramley.

A Surprise for All.

The competition which will be announced in a now very early number of this paper will be one that will come as a surprise to you all. It is an absolutely new idea; nothing of the sort has ever before been published. It has nothing to do with hidden treasure, picture puzzles, or any other time-honoured subject. It is of a perfectly unique description, and will be of enthralling interest to all those (and they should be legion) who enter it. Don't think for a moment that the competition will be too abstruse for him, for the beauty of the whole idea is that everyone has an equal opportunity, whatever may be his walk in life. It will form a most fascinating, as well as instructive, occupation, for the long evenings, and the magnificent cash prizes offered will amply repay the winners for the time and trouble they have spent in complying with the details of the competition. Tell your friends about it, and get them to enter if you can. Remember that in a week or so's time full particulars of the scheme will be published in this paper.

A Curious Coincidence.

"Dora" writes me a long letter in which she says that she was very much interested in our Seventh Unsolved Love Problem, which was entitled "The Engagement of Edith Sargeant," as the case was an exact parallel to her own love experience. Edith Sargeant, it will be remembered, was in an unenviable dilemma. She had pledged herself to a Bishop whom she really did not love, because she thought the man for whom she had an affection did not return it. Afterwards this latter showed that Edith was very dear to him. What should she do?

Well, "Dora" was in a like predicament. She, however, took the course of marrying the one she loved. Her elderly fiancé was much hurt at first, but he very soon saw that "Dora" was very much happier with her husband than she could possibly have been with him, so, being a just man, he was glad that Dora had not married him, though it had broken his heart.

I am very pleased to hear that "Dora's" married life is such a happy one, and I thank her for telling me of her love history. May the love affairs of all my readers end in so lovely a way as Dora's has done!

The Ninth Love Problem.

The Ninth Unsolved Love Problem will probably appear in the next number, and I consider it to be one of the most interesting in the series. A guinea will be offered in connection with it as usual. I am very busy now reading the replies to the Eighth Problem, and in the number after next I hope to announce the winner.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

PAT KELLY'S RING.

The Story of an Adventure that ended as it should.

It was one of those uncertain days, showery and sunny at once, which make the skies of Ireland so like the emotional faces of her daughters. A party of wanderers touring in the Emerald Isle had been deluded into giving up their trip to the lakes and other places of interest in the neighbourhood, until the weather should be more propitious, and were not in the best of humour at the delay.

The prospect of a whole day in the dull little inn at Kenmare was not cheerful, and Mr. Fielding and his maiden sister, their niece, Gladys Fenwick, and Philip Dacre, a student cousin, expressed their complaints forcibly.

"It is too bad that Phil's last day with us should be spoilt," said Mr. Fielding.

"Couldn't you stay another day, Phil, for Muckross Abbey?"

"Impossible. I must be in Dublin to-morrow, or I shall miss that examination, and I wouldn't fail in that for all the ruins on the island."

The malcontents stared out of the windows grimly as the rain began to patter down again, and took what satisfaction they could in watching the fresh-cheeked old women with bobbing white cap-frills and long blue cloaks, and little donkeys dragging big carts in the street below.

A shield, representing a golden lion crowned, hanging over the doorway, led the conversation quite naturally to the subject of heraldry.

"That is an odd seal you have upon your watch-chain, Uncle George," said Gladys. "I never noticed it before; an owl holding a lizard in its claws."

"It is a quaint device, of which I never heard the meaning; it belonged to my wife's mother."

"Fitzgerald's crest is a monkey's head," said Philip.

"Nonsense!" exclaimed Miss Fielding; "crests always take their origin from a brave deed of some remote ancestor, expressed allegorically or any way one fancies. What valiant suggestion could there be in a monkey? You are trying to impose on us, Phil, but we are not so gullible as you think. Are we, Gladys?"

"I certainly should not feel proud of a monkey upon my escutcheon," said Gladys, with her lovely smile; "but I suppose my opinion in such a grave matter is worth very little."

"I wish Fitzgerald were here; he could show you a ring of his, and explain why a monkey's face figures upon it, you incredulous pair."

With this, Philip discreetly left the room.

At dinner the young gentleman began again.

"Wasn't it odd, I met Fitzgerald in the coffee-room here, half an hour ago! He is invited to a ball at Mount Edgecombe this evening and is staying here to-night. I was sorry I did not know sooner of his arrival, as I might have introduced him to you. He is a very nice fellow, and I should have liked you to know him, but it is too late now, as we all disperse to-morrow morning. I only mentioned to him casually that I was here with friends."

"A great pity," said Gladys, "I should like to know Mr. Fitzgerald."

"By the way," continued Philip, "I asked him how his crest happened to be a monkey's head."

"That was thoughtful of you."

"He said that many generations ago, one of the Fitzgeralds, an only son, was sleeping unguarded in his cradle. A fire broke out and spread with great rapidity, so that all approach to the infant was cut off by the flames. No one dared go to the rescue, until a pet monkey of one of the daughters of the house was seen at an open window of the burning building with the baby clasped in its arms. The clever beast clambered down the steep wall by means of the luxuriant ivy, and with a chuckle of delight, restored the baby unharmed to the arms of its agonised mother. Since that time Jacko has figured upon the Fitzgeralds' coat-of-arms. Deservedly too, I think."

"All honour to Jacko! I am sorry I spoke disrespectfully of him," said Miss Fielding.

"I borrowed Fitzgerald's ring to show you. It is as curious as it is valuable."

The trio peered over Philip's shoulder at the ring—a sardonyx, on which was cut in relief, with consummate skill, the crest of the Fitzgeralds—a monkey's head.

"The workmanship is wonderful," said Mr. Fielding. "Any museum would be proud of such a cameo. I almost envy the owner his treasure."

"The stone is an ugly colour," Gladys remarked, slipping the ring upon her dainty finger; "but I like the gold griffin's claws holding it in place. It is a novel idea."

"Thank you for showing it to us, Philip. Be sure you give it back safely to Mr. Fitzgerald, or he will revile our memory for ever afterwards. Such a treasure as that is not easily replaced."

Early the next morning Philip Dacre took his departure for Dublin, the remainder of the party intending to start on their excursion a few hours later.

Through the half-drawn blinds of his room at the "Kenmare Arms" Hugh Fitzgerald was the unsuspected observer of a very pleasing little scene about breakfast time. A bewitchingly pretty girl, with reddish-brown hair curling low about her forehead, and hanging far below her waist in a rich plait, sweet violet eyes, and the daintiest of figures, in a neat-fitting travelling dress, came out upon a balcony within range of Fitzgerald's windows, and began friendly overtures with a flock of pigeons in the court below.

The pigeons responded willingly enough—it would indeed be a low order of creation that would give no heed when Gladys Fenwick called—and began an eager fight for the supply of crumbs generously showered from the girl's pink-and-white fingers.

"She will have no breakfast left for herself if she feeds those cormorants at such a rate," soliloquised Fitzgerald. "Who is she, I wonder? Of all the pretty faces I saw at the ball last night, every one pales before hers. Can she be one of Dacre's party? I am sure he would have mentioned the existence of this lovely little girl if he had known her! Stupid of me not to ask who his friends were before he went."

As the pigeons devoured the last handful someone called, "Gladys, there is no time to lose!" and the girl disappeared.

Mr. Fitzgerald sauntered down to the coffee-room to glean what information he could regarding the guests at the "Kenmare Arms," but the report given him was vague and unsatisfactory.

There were races in the neighbourhood, and the hotel was full to overflowing, and the host was content if he found shelter for his guests, without knowing their names or destinations.

Digitized by Google

"The gentleman who went away early this morning came with Sir William Bancroft and his wife, from Tralee," said a porter, in answer to Fitzgerald's question.

"Ooh, Teddy, what are you thinking of? The young gentleman came with a grey-haired lady and two little girls."

"Young gintleman, is it? He was old as the parish priest, and came alone," said a third disdainfully.

Fitzgerald turned away in despair, and betook himself to the stables to look after the welfare of his horse, and, inquiring of a certain dignitary of that department, called Rowley, was shown into an apology for a bedroom to wait.

Rowley's bower was at one end of the stables occupied by the omnibus horses, and, in its furnishing, showed the occupant to be of very jovial tastes. An old fiddle hung upon the wall, along with highly-coloured pictures. Generous-looking beer-mugs and huge pipes were tumbled helter-skelter upon a shelf, and in one corner were a gay costume and a shabby brown wig, which had evidently figured at a masked ball.

An animated discussion began outside, and Fitzgerald, leaning through the window, gathered the facts of the case.

Patsey Kelly, the only man left to drive the jaunting-car, had been to the races, and was in such an exalted state as to be quite unfit to trust with the horse. A party of tourists had engaged the cart to go to Muckross Abbey that morning, and would be angry if anything happened, as they had been disappointed the day before by the rain.

"Who are the people?" Fitzgerald asked of the despairing landlord, who had appeared on the scene.

"A gentleman and two ladies. One of them as pretty as a picture, with a long plait of hair of the colour of the chestnut over there, and bonnie blue eyes that reminded me of my own girl's. She told me in such a friendly way about her pleasure at the prospect of seeing the Abbey, and the other sights about here, I hate to have her disappointed. Bless her heart! I would drive her there myself if it wasn't for rheumatism in my old arms. Confound that scamp Kelly! There is not another man about the place that I can send."

"If you will lend me an old coat and hat, I will drive the car myself," said Fitzgerald, coming forward. "It must be an unruly horse, indeed, that I cannot manage, and I should like the fun of the thing."

"Do you really mean it?" said the landlord, a look of intense relief lighting his face.

"Certainly, I do."

"There is an old suit of clothes my son wears fishing, hanging in Rowley's room. You are about Fred's height; if you would not scorn them, they are at your service."

Hugh Fitzgerald, an erect, handsome fair fellow of twenty-four with a look about him that proclaimed the gentleman wherever he went, vanished into Rowley's sanctum, from which he shortly reappeared completely altered.

In the shabby, ill-fitting clothes of the inn-keeper's son, his figure seemed to lose all its dignity and grace, and the wig belonging to the fancy costume, surmounted by a battered old hat, made him quite unrecognisable. He had browned his hands with some nut hulls lying in a corner, and only his neatly-fitting boots, which he hoped would pass unnoticed, betrayed the gentleman.

"Ha, ha, ha! you will do capitally," said the old inn-keeper, his fat sides shaking with laughter. "Bring my guests safe home to-night and you shall have an extra half-crown for yourself. Ha, ha, ha!"

The escapade was quite to Fitzgerald's fancy; instead of for ever losing sight of the pretty girl who had so bewitched him, he would be with her all day, even though it were only in Patsey Kelly's humble capacity; he would probably find out whither she was going, and could perhaps meet her again under circumstances more favourable for acquaintance.

As he put the fruit into Gladys' hand, three pairs of eyes lighted upon the beautiful ring on his finger.

"Stop a moment. I had better take off my ring. It might look suspicious," said Fitzgerald, tugging at his seal-ring which was rather tight.

"Kelly, make haste, you rascal! the ladies are waiting," called a peremptory voice from the door.

"Bother the ring! I can't get it off! But I have a shabby pair of gloves in my pocket which will do instead."

Five minutes later the curious, tilting jaunting car, with its seat on each side arranged so that the occupants sat back to back, with their feet propped only on a little shelf which made jumping off upon the road almost irresistible, its two wheels, one horse and seat for the driver in front, drew up with all possible dignity before the doorway of the "Kenmare Arms."

The driver, apparently a rough, good-natured, country bumpkin, with a shock of brown hair and shabby, ill-fitting clothes, made an awkward clutch at his hat as his passengers took their places—a middle-aged gentleman, a lady, to whom the same adjective might apply, and a beautiful young girl with rose-tinted cheeks, and chestnut hair in a long plait.

"Gladys, mind you don't slip off; we cannot catch you if you fall," said the elder lady, taking her place beside the gentleman, while the girl sat alone.

Fitzgerald would have given—not his eyes, for then he could not have looked at her fresh young beauty—but years of his life to have taken the vacant place beside her instead of being obliged to turn his back upon her and mind the horse; but he had begun his acting and he must play the part through to the end.

Digitized by Google

The young lady seemed to be a very enthusiastic admirer of Nature, and she plied the driver with questions regarding the various scenes they entered upon.

Fitzgerald was delighted that she cared to address him, and told, unblushingly, tales of his own manufacture about a region that was as new to him as to Miss Gladys herself.

"I think Gladys is losing her heart to our charioteer," said Miss Field laughingly, in German to her brother.

"The admiration is natural, I fancy; the fellow nearly drove over that donkey-cart, so intent is he on what our young protégée says."

Fitzgerald especially prided himself on his proficiency in the German language, and he was immensely, though rather guiltily, amused at the turn affairs had taken.

"He is very handsome, don't you think so?" asked Gladys, in the same language. "His eyes are a trifle washy-looking, but he has a good complexion and beautiful teeth. I suppose he owes his teeth to his native diet of Murphys and buttermilk."

"Murphys and buttermilk, indeed!" thought Fitzgerald, as he assailed Billy, the horse, for some imaginary viciousness, to conceal the smile that would rise to his lips.

He wondered if his honour as a gentleman demanded that he should tell his knowledge of German; but an Irish peasant speaking foreign languages fluently was too suspicious a character.

Fitzgerald would not now betray his imposture for worlds, for these travellers would naturally be indignant if they knew of the trick played upon them, and the more he saw of Gladys Fenwick, the more earnestly he wished that nothing should occur to prevent their acquaintance in the future.

From scraps of their conversation he learnt that the travellers intended to pass a few weeks at Queenstown for the sea-bathing before returning to the Continent, and he made a mental note of the hotel which they had chosen for their stay, and wondered in what way he could present himself, as the idea that these people were Philip Dacre's friends had never been cherished.

"Are you afraid of spoiling your hands, that you wear gloves this weather, Kelly?" asked Mr. Fielding with a laugh.

A guilty colour rose to Fitzgerald's cheeks, and he made some awkward reply, knowing that gloves were very unsuitable for him under the circumstances.

A turn in the road brought the walls of Muckross Abbey before them, and Fitzgerald was glad for something to direct the conversation from himself, though he regretted the interruption to his chat with his pretty companion.

They all alighted, the driver gallantly lending his arm to assist the young lady in the rather perilous descent from the car, and then Fitzgerald began, for the first time, to realise the trials of his position.

Instead of going with the others to wander about the beautiful old ruin, and speculate upon its history and antiquity, he had to stay behind to feed the horse and guard his employer's umbrellas and wraps.

